The system is so haphazard that no commercial concern would be run in such a manner. If it were, it would probably be liquidated. Certainly the audit would be refused. Therefore, we need to introduce comprehensive and fundamental reforms. We hear nothing of that from the Labour Benches. The Labour party sticks with the rates system, fiddles with the figures a little, tries to alter things once again and only increases our confusion and doubts about the system.

All we get from the Government is a proposal for a poll tax. Last time that was suggested it caused a peasants' revolt and it will cause a revolt again among ratepayers. It is inequitable and unfair and will be rejected. That is why the alliance alone is coming up with radical alternative proposals for basing local expenditure on people's ability to pay. We shall introduce a local income tax that directly relates people's ability to pay to the amount that they are asked to pay. Moreover, we shall move beyond that to create genuine local democracy and the genuine local control of authorities by changing the absurd electoral system to genuine community representation through local proportional representation.

If the Government or the Labour party were serious about controlling the abuses of local authorities or controlling the militants within their own parties, they would accept that the best way in which to make local government representative of the people would be to introduce proportional representation.

Mr. Straw: At what average rate would such a local income tax be set? Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the income which domestic rates produce nationally means that the average local income tax would have to be set at about 8p in the pound?

Mr. Taylor: We would set a local income tax locally on the basis of what needs to be spent. Surely the hon. Gentleman would accept that it is far better for people to pay according to their means than according to some rough and ready estimate through rates or a poll tax. I believe that such a system has the support of the British people.

We are proposing to return local democracy to the hands of the local people. The best way to tackle local problems is to let local people tackle them and to give them the resources to do so. Of course funds will be needed to help those areas that are so starved of income that they are unable to meet their needs. That is why we would have an equalisation fund. But that would be to help local democracy, not hinder it; to make it clear how local democracy can operate, not obscure it.

Our proposals are about giving local control back to local people. I draw Conservative Members' attention to the thoughts of Disraeli who said that centralisation is the death blow of democracy. That is our belief and that is why we would return control to people in their own community.

7.6 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): It is easy to say what one would do without saying how one would do it. The local tax, described by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor), has been considered. The hon. Gentleman talked about people who could pay more paying more, and those who could not paying less, but it is usually those in the areas of greatest need who are not capable of paying. Therefore, Government funding is needed to overcome the imbalance in the needs of various local authorities.

We have talked about the north-south divide. Portsmouth, an area at which I look frequently because my son lives there, has high wages and a large number of people who are earning. Their ability to pay far exceeds their needs. In my area, with low wages and high unemployment, the needs are greater, yet there is no way in which, on the Liberals' policy, we could raise that money. It would be impossible.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: We accept the need for an equalisation fund based precisely on the criteria outlined by the hon. Gentleman. Not everywhere has the same income levels to generate the support that would be needed. What we must get away from is the ludicrous and complicated system that the Government are offering us.

Mr. McKay: If we talk about an equalisation fund, we must ask where the money for it will come from. People will not look favourably at a system which takes a little extra from them in order to pay for what somebody else needs without their having some say in it. I understand the ideas, but putting them into effect needs a lot more thought.

Rates are a local tax. If they are looked at as an income tax rather than as a tax people would probably understand them more. The problem is to find the right formula. You will know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that many people have spent many years looking for the right formula. Finding a suitable rating system is like finding the Holy Grail—we have looked for it but we have not found it. Unfortunately, the Government's approach will make things very much worse. Under the Government's proposed poll tax, my constituents would pay 65 per cent. more in rates than at present, which would place many households in great difficulty.

There is something wrong with the system and with the formula and I would be failing in my duty to my constituents if I did not speak today. The present formula does not overcome the problems in my area, where it is four or five years out of date. It makes Barnsley look like a shire county, which it most certainly is not. There has to be something wrong with a system that works like that. It works against the area. We are having difficulty in trying to promote a new image now that heavy industries such as coal and steel have disappeared because of the Government's policies. While the wealth-making capacity of heavy industry has gone, the legacy remains, but we have nothing to make up for that lost spending power and to overcome our difficulties. That is why we need to examine the system again. However, a poll tax would not solve the problem.

I ask the Minister a straight question: if he brings in a poll tax, how will the water rate be calculated? At present, it is calculated on the valuation of a property. If we do not calculate the rates on the valuation of a property, how are we to calculate the water rates? How will the water authorities get their money—or have the Government decided to introduce compulsory water metering——

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: And sewage meters.

Mr. McKay: As my hon. Friend says, and sewage meters.

There is also a line in the report that refers to payments for the environment. How are those payments to be calculated? People could not afford the standing charge for water meters. If water were metered, the largest families, who are usually the poorest, would be penalised, unless, that is, there was a water rebate. But the Government do not like rebates, so that is not likely to happen.

It seems ironic that we should be debating a Bill which, the Minister says, will give teachers more pay when we have not yet debated the teachers' pay and conditions order. If we passed a Bill that gave teachers more pay and yet turned down the teachers' pay and conditions order, local authorities would get a windfall. But there is no fear of that happening, because of the Government's majority.

Barnsley education authority has produced a very good report which says that, as has been widely reported in the newspapers, Barnsley has the highest proportion of children who do not stay at school after the age of 16. That creates a problem in trying to introduce new industries. The report also says that the area has the worst results. That is not because of the teachers, or the way in which the schools are run or the curriculum; it is because of our area and our environment and because people used to be encouraged to leave school as early as they could—at 14 — so that they could contribute financially to the household. That attitude seems to have nearly disappeared, but we must overcome the problem.

Barnsley education authority has the best record for people entering adult education. People leave school at 16 but then take up adult education. It appears that people want to get away from the school atmosphere but come back to education later. That is why we need to look closely at tertiary education. I have changed my attitude on that. I believed that sixth forms should be attached to schools. That is evidently no longer feasible, so we need money to finance alternatives. The only way to get that money is through the rates, yet if we try to increase the rates, we are rate-capped. It is a never-ending process.

Local councillors are battling against the problem and I admire them for the hours that they put in and the work that they do. However, they need help to get on with the job.

As the Minister knows, because I have talked to him about it, the South Yorkshire fire service has spent all its contingency fund and is now broke. We asked whether the Government would consider that in next year's allocation. Perhaps a Labour Minister will take up the matter where the Government have left off. I therefore ask the Minister to put it on record that the South Yorkshire service will need more money next year so that the matter is passed on quickly and is not lost in the machinery.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): I was glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) ended his remarks in the spirit of optimism shared by all Labour Members — [Interruption.] Conservative Members may regret their laughter in the next few weeks. We are not fooled by the opinion polls, and I am surprised that intelligent young men such as the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Ryder) are fooled.

I share my hon. Friend's concern about the taxation of water and the methods that will be used to calculate it. The Secretary of State gave what appears to have been an off-the-record briefing, in which he said that, in the event of a Conservative victory in the general election, water metering and privatisation would go ahead. The Government have spent nearly £1·5 million during the past year trying to sort out the morass of legal and financial problems involved in privatising the water industry. I suspect that if the Conservatives came back to power, privatisation would be on the agenda again but that it would be resisted as strongly as it has been resisted in the past. I am confident that those in Britain who rose against the proposals last time would do so again.

As the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said, the first supplementary report for 1987-88 distributes the additional rates support grant of £183 million in respect of teachers' pay restructuring. My hon. Friend mentioned the effect on Newcastle. It is worth underlining the fact that for Newcastle, in the north-east—the area in which I live, and an area of massive deprivation as a result of unemployment and other factors imposed on it by the Government—the estimated cost of the pay award will be £2·383 million, while the additional grant will be only £189,000. I hope that the Minister will realise the inequity of that. I hope that he will consider, too, the other authorities listed by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn. The Minister should examine the situation and ensure that the authorities that have been caught in that trap are adequately compensated.

It is unfair that a local authority such as Newcastle has to deal with something that has been deliberately stirred up by the Government—an unwarranted attack on the teaching profession, an honourable group of professionals dedicated to educating our young people, often in the most difficult of circumstances, with poor facilities and a lack of materials. They are educating students who are facing hopelessness in areas of deprivation and high unemployment.

The Government deliberately chose confrontation rather than conciliation with the teaching unions. They chose to remove negotiating rights on salaries and conditions. They used their hefty majority to drive the legislation through Parliament. If the news items today to which I have been listening are correct, later this evening the Secretary of State for Education and Science will announce a change. If he does and if he restores the democratic rights of teachers and their unions, I shall welcome it 100 per cent. But some important questions must be asked.

If the right hon. Gentleman is to restore those rights so quickly after taking them away, why did he take them away in the first place? Is not this change a simple bit of cynical electioneering to attract the votes of school teachers? It is clear that a general election is sharpening the minds of a number of Secretaries of State. Last week, the Secretary of State for the Environment stopped the exploratory drilling in the constituencies of four Conservative Members. Many of my hon. Friends and I suspect that that had something to do with an event that could take place within the next month or so.

Dr. Boyson: Impossible.

Mr. Boyes: The Minister says that that is impossible, but he is wrong. If I were advising the Government, I should say that they should wait a little longer. But it is not for me to advise the Government. If they want to stick their neck out and get it chopped off in the next few weeks, so be it.

I believe that the teachers will see through this cynical electioneering and will neither forget nor forgive easily. They will well understand that the Government who are prepared on one occasion to take away their rights will just as easily take them away again if they are returned with a large majority. Teachers should take the Government's action as a warning that the powers that the Secretary of State can take in a Government with a huge majority are enormous. The right hon. Gentleman has demonstrated that he is prepared to use those powers in a negative way, affecting the education of our youngsters. Teachers realise that. The Secretary of State has betrayed the trust of the teachers. The Government do not deserve any votes from teachers the length and breadth of this country.

Despite the present imposed pay award, the teachers are still badly underpaid in view of the importance of the tasks that they carry out. Many other workers in the public sector will note carefully the way in which the Secretary of State took away the teacher unions' negotiating rights, the way in which, for cynical electioneering, he will make his statement later, and, above all, the fact that, if he can do it to the teachers, he or other Secretaries of State, or whoever heads the Departments, can do it to other public sector workers. Negotiating rights between employers and trade unions are the essential rights of a democratic system. All public sector workers are being warned: if the Government are returned with a working majority, wages and conditions could easily be settled by legislation in Parliament and not by negotiations outside Parliament.

We are concerned with not only the Government's attitudes towards teachers but the entire role of local authorities. The one thing that we can say about the Government's attitude to local government is that it has increased uncertainty. More than 40 pieces of legislation directly affecting local government have been introduced by the Government since they took office in 1979. That has greatly affected the officers and members of councils and the people whom they represent. Some of the legislation, in the morass that the Secretary of State has introduced, was aimed retrospectively to correct legislation that had been demonstrated to be at fault in the courts in actions taken by local authorities to test its legality. The present Secretary of State must have had more legislation taken to court, and findings against him, than any other Secretary of State in modern times.

On 25 March 1987, in the debate on the rate support grant reports for England, my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said:

"Since July the right hon. Gentleman has made five announcements affecting grants to councils, and during that time there have been four Acts affecting local government finance. And Ministers have the gall to criticise councils for inefficiency! The Government have demonstrated an unprecedented level of bungling incompetence, and they cannot escape responsibility for the mess." — [Official Report, 25 March 1987; Vol. 113, c. 448.]

However, by using Parliament to introduce retrospective legislation, the right hon. Gentleman has made planning in local authorities almost impossible. Of course local authorities prefer to plan, as do businesses, for periods of five, 10 or even 20 years. If the Government stay in power, local authorities will be reduced to the absurdity of planning week by week. Then the use of the word "planning" will become meaningless. It is more a case of muddling through as best they can, as one chief executive said recently.

It is downright criminal that local authorities are in this position. Their services are essential to the vast majority of people. Local authority services have acted as an essential shield against the deprivation and poverty of high unemployment in areas such as the one that I represent in north-east England. No wonder the hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) said on 18 December 1984 to the then Secretary of State for the Environment:

"Does he further understand, or has anyone advised him, about the housing decay and the infrastructure that decays by the day in our cities? . . . Does he not understand that, if we go on as we are now, with these voodoo economics where we stick pins in all those people who carried out the policies that most of us believed in, we shall have no freedoms left, we shall have no homes left, and we shall have no sound and sane cities left?" — [Official Report, 18 December 1984; Vol. 70, c. 170.]

Responsible elected councillors have attempted to provide essential services efficiently and effectively. They are trying to cut through the mass of confusion heaped upon them over the past eight years. The attack on local authorities in an attack on our democratic processes. We have witnessed the extremes to which the Government will go with their decision to abolish a whole tier of local government without consulting the people represented by it—the GLC and the metropolitan councils. Yes, there was an opportunity to test public opinion by holding elections, but the Government abandoned elections. The abolition Bill was the first Bill on which I served, and there was no better experience for a new Member to learn about the Government's attitudes to local authorities. The 200 hours of hard debate in Committee exposed the Government's detestation of, and determination to neuter, the local government system.

Since the abolition of the GLC and the six metropolitan counties, the Government's vitriolic attacks have continued. However, as the Government's economic policies have bitten more deeply into the living standards of the people whom the Labour party represents, the greater has been the need for good local government. The harder the attacks, the more we need sound local government. The more difficult the situation, the greater the need for bodies able to make decisions at a strategic level.

It is a disgrace that London is the only capital in western Europe without its own strategic, directly elected authority. My European experience demonstrates that the United Kingdom is travelling in exactly the opposite direction to that of other European Governments in terms of the size of local authorities. That is why I so strongly support my party's proposal to introduce a regional tier of government. This innovative and exciting proposal will be welcomed by the people, who are aware that central Government are continually increasing power at the centre and yet have demonstrated time and again that they are incapable of managing the power that they are grasping into their hands.

One of the ways that the Government will attempt to reduce local government to a petty irrelevance is by abolishing the present system of rates and introducing a poll tax. The present system of local authority financing needs reform, but a poll tax is far from what is needed. The Sunday Times is not one of the favourite newspapers on the Opposition Benches because of the very strong support that newspaper has overtly given to the Government recently. However, on 12 April, 1987 The Sunday Times said in an editorial:

"Nothing became modern Toryism less than the idiocies of local grant penalties, targets and rate-capping, interspersed with half-baked ideas of referendums, rates abolition and community charges."

Was it not the Tory Reform Group that said, in a report that it produced in September 1986:

"A poll tax is fair only in the sense that the Black Death was fair. It is indiscriminate, striking young and old, rich and poor, employed and unemployed alike."?

A poll tax will benefit the wealthy on their large properties and will penalise the poor. Figures that have been produced by my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn—and we are grateful for the work that he did on the poll tax analyses—demonstrate this fact most vigorously. It is another element in the Tory philosophy of the rich getting richer and the poor getting poorer.

The north-south gap, which has been analysed so much in the last few months as more people have become conscious of the difference, will become even wider. A caring Government will introduce measures to reduce the gap and the inequalities, and to help those in areas of high unemployment, bad housing and environmental decay, instead of doing just the opposite.

How anyone can make sense out of a proposal that leads to a couple, living in a small rundown property in a squalid area, paying the same as someone living in a large grand property in a nice area in the same town is beyond comprehension. How can anyone justify highly paid Cabinet Ministers paying less on their property in the south than low-paid workers in say, Rochdale? How can the Secretary of State for the Environment introduce a half-baked new system—as The Sunday Times said—that will reduce his rate bill by about £30 a week when others will be paying more?

It is another example of the Tory rule that it is important to line the pockets of the rich at the expense of others in our society. The Opposiiton want to see a more equitable society, not a divided society in which some people live in decay in the cities while others live in style and pay less.

The gap between the regions must be reduced. Proposals for a poll tax will not help in any way. Our proposal, which is eminently more attractive and constructive, is to retain the existing rating system based on property but to base the payment on the capital value of homes. This will lead to those living in large executive houses in the exclusive south-east paying more. It would take a few pounds out of the pockets of the Thatcher family, when it settles in Dulwich, rather than putting a few pounds into the pockets of the Thatcher family—a pocket that is well filled already and from which it is well able to pay more.

We believe that local government should be protected from the Tory onslaught. We should provide housing, education, social, recreation and other services at local level. Local people know best and they should be elected to run local authorities and provide services for the people who need them, as they need them. We shall bring forward new policy initiatives, be innovative, tackle deprivation and provide resources to local authorities to carry out these tasks.

We believe in a fundamental democratic process whereby the people have the right to choose which political party has control over their affairs, and the equal right to remove from office any councils that do not provide services at an adequate level and cost. We in the Labour party are the true protectors of local services. We are the true democrats. That is why on Thursday—and in the general election—those who desire to maintain an open democratic society, free from centuries' constraints, will know where to put the crosses on the ballot paper, and that will be at the side of Labour councillors and Members of Parliament.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): I am sure that we will not agree with the wishful thinking of the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes), but we all sympathise with him on the debilitating illness from which he is suffering following his recent return from Nicaragua.

We have had an interesting debate. The more interesting parts of the debate have been where we have ranged further away from the rate support grant supplementary reports and into discussion of proposals being by the different political parties for reforming the rating and grants systems.

Nobody in Southampton would describe the average resident in Itchen as being well-heeled and rich. The average resident in Southampton lives in a house that may cost between £25,000 and £35,000. Those houses are not increasing in value as a result of the decisions of the occupiers, but they are increasing in value far faster than the rate of inflation.

The promises of the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington seem to be to introduce a rating system based upon capital value, which would impinge severely on my constituents. Our proposals for a community charge—not a poll tax, because it will be payable by people beyond those who are registered on the electoral register—in my constituency would result in the burden on a pensioner or a single parent being reduced substantially; the average community charge projected is about £144.

Mr. Straw: As I explained to the Minister in detail, the proposals to move to capital valuations will result in no significant change for the vast majority of ratepayers across the country. The values of houses, whether fixed on a capital basis or any other, would not change week by week or year by year. There would have to be regular revaluations every five years, but it would be nothing like what the Minister has suggested. I should be happy to give him an assurance, since he has expressed such anxiety about the change to capital valuations, that it will make, and need make, virtually no difference at all to his constituents who are living in houses of the kind that he described.

The Minister cannot be allowed to get away with the suggestion that the poll tax will benefit single pensioners. If a single pensioner is on a low income and receiving a supplementary allowance, as a great many are in his area, that single pensioner will pay no rates at all. Under the Minister's system, that single pensioner will pay at least 20 per cent. and probably a great deal more.

Mr. Chope: I notice that the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) has not put any figures on his proposal. The hon. Gentleman is referring to generalisations, saying that he will switch to a system that is based on rating capital values, when we know that capital values of houses are increasing in different proportions in different areas, wholly unrelated to the income of the occupiers of those houses.

The consequence would be, would it not, if the hon. Gentleman were able to implement his proposals, that those who are struggling to pay for the repairs and maintenance on their houses would have an even greater burden than at present?

Mr. Straw: Has it not occurred to the Minister that by proper adjustment of the rate in the pound and the equalisation grant system there need to be no change in the rate bills that the vast majority of families would pay under the system of capital valuation? It is a technical change, not a change of dramatic social proportions such as the poll tax.

Mr. Chope: We have moved a long way from radical reform if we are now talking about technical change which is not really going to make any difference. We accept the fundamental unfairness of the existing rating system. That is why we are pledged to reform it root and branch.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: The Minister has just accepted the fundamental unfairness, but he has also criticised the Labour party proposals as having no relation at all to the income of the occupier. Surely that is fundamentally the problem with his own proposals.

Mr. Chope: No. We have already said quite clearly that there will be a generous rebate system for those who are least able to pay. At the moment, many people on high earnings are paying absolutely nothing towards the cost of local services, and we think that that is unfair.

Mr. Taylor: Would the Minister spell out how those rebates would affect the pensioner who currently pays no rates at all, because they are rebated, and what the position would be after the introduction of poll tax?

Mr. Chope: I am quite prepared to make a very long speech about the details of our proposals, but before I do so I want to answer the questions raised by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) and to refer to the proposal for local income tax that he put forward on behalf of the Liberal party.

As I understand it, the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that income tax be determined locally at a level that he is not prepared to disclose, although he did not dispute the suggestion by the hon. Member for Blackburn that it might be 8p in the pound. I have heard suggestions that in some areas it would have to be as high as 13p in the pound, if not higher. That means that, instead of income tax being 27p in the pound, it would shoot up to 40p in some areas. The hon. Member for Truro says in response to that that there would be some sort of equalisation scheme. Surely that is not very different from the scheme that operates at the moment, where income tax and national taxation are contributing something over 50 per cent. towards the cost of local services.

The hon. Member for Truro has been complaining that the way of distributing that money is not as good as it should be, and certainly we are committed to fundamental reform of the grant system and the means by which the grant is distributed. But the Liberal party's policy on local income tax would have a devastating effect upon individuals. Here again, the Liberals are not prepared to spell out the details and expose to public debate the true implications of their policies.

The hon. Member for Truro asked a number of technical questions and referred to the same points as were mentioned by the hon. Member for Blackburn — why Richmond does less well out of this settlement than he would consider equitable and why the Inner London education authority gets no benefit from this supplementary report. I am bound to say that the situation is equitable, and I will seek to explain why.

Richmond is a relatively high-resource authority with relatively low education needs — in other words, its education grant-related expenditure assessment. It can finance the whole of the extra cost of the teachers' pay award at less than the standard increase in poundage. The national standard increase in poundage is about 4p, which ratepayers are expected to provide. The situation, therefore, must be equitable. Indeed, ILEA is better off than many authorities because it can meet the full cost of the settlement at far less than 4p—at 2·3p. That is why it does not get a block grant from this supplementary report.

Hon. Gentlemen who seek to suggest that this supplementary report is distributing grant unfairly are confusing the present system and do not understand it properly. The present system is designed to equalise rate poundages across the country, and that is exactly the effect of this supplementary report.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles) made an excellent contribution to this debate. I noticed that he was not the only hon. Member representing a Nottingham constituency here. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) is also taking a keen interest in this matter. They quite rightly drew the attention of the House to what has been happening in Nottingham and the spending record in that area, contrasting the performance of the Labour council there with that of Conservative-controlled authorities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East may recall that, when he was leader of Kingston council, in the years 1978-79 to 1985-86, he was able to reduce current expenditure per head in Kingston by 5·8 per cent. in real terms. Closer to his present constituency in Nottingham, we see that Broxtowe council, under Conservative control, has been able to reduce its current expenditure in real terms betwen 1978-79 and 1985-86 by some 16·3 per cent. In Gedling there was a modest increase of 2·8 per cent. and in Rushcliffe a significant reduction of 20·4 per cent., while in Nottingham itself, under the control of the Labour party, there was an increase in current expenditure of 12·5 per cent.—far ahead of anything that can be reasonably justified. My hon. Friend was able to expand further upon the wasteful spending policies of the Labour council there. I look forward with interest to hearing the results after the local elections in Nottingham this coming Thursday.

I would not say that the hon. Member for Blackburn sought to confuse the House, because in response to my intervention he came clean and said that he was talking about total expenditure rather than current expenditure. I am glad that he made that clarification because he knows that total expenditure includes use of special funds. He drew attention to, and sought almost to ridicule, what had been happening in Brentwood. I have to tell him that in Brentwood, in 1985-86, some £2·2 million was taken out of special funds; in 1986-87 some £2·3 million was taken out of special funds; and in the budget for the current year, 1987-88, some £5 million has been added back into the special funds. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the details he will find that the use being made of special funds in that authority is a very large contributory factor to the high increase in total expenditure this year.

Mr. Straw: On the hon. Gentleman's figures, the expenditure has gone up from £1·5 million last year to £11·82 million this year. The Minister has accounted for about half that increase. What has happened to the other half? Is this not exactly the kind of creative accountancy to which he has taken such objection in connection with Labour authorities?

Mr. Chope: We have made no bones about the fact that we feel that the use made by some local authorities of special funds in order to attract more grant has in certain circumstances had a detrimental effect upon other local authorities. That was one reason why we abolished grant recycling, which certainly has prevented the consequences of that having an impact upon other local authorities.

We deprecate the use of special funds where this is effectively an abuse of the conventions of local government, but we are working with a definition of total expenditure that was supported by all the local authority associations and about which the hon. Member for Blackburn and the Opposition in general have not been prepared to make any complaints. Indeed, when at one stage there was a suggestion that we might change the system back, I felt that the hon. Member for Blackburn would have been the first to argue the other way.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) suggested that we were putting the cart before the horse because my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education is not going to open the debate on the Education (School Teachers' Pay and Conditions of Employment) Order until later this evening. The fact is that that order was laid before Parliament on 9 April and came into force on 30 April, and the rate support grant supplementary report which we are debating now was laid only on 30 April. The education order is already in force. It is likely that the attempt that may be made later this evening to annul the order will not succeed. With the greatest respect to the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone, I do not believe that his point carries any weight.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone also mentioned water rates. As he will probably realise, that issue is under discussion at the moment.

Mr. Straw: What is the answer?

Mr. Chope: I do not have a brief this evening to make a definitive statement about what will happen to the water rates. However, I am certain that the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone shares my experience and has many constituents who feel that the present system of water rates is inequitable. An old lady living on her own may pay the same water rates as someone in the house next door where four people may be using a lot more water than the old lady. That complaint has been made frequently. Perhaps the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone will not be against reform in that area.

Mr. Boyes: Will there be a flat-rate charge for water or will there be metering? While I am on my feet, will the Minister consider another matter regarding water? I wrote to him in November last year asking whether water authorities would be competent authorities under EEC legislation. I have not yet received a reply to my letter. As this will be a very important issue during the general election, will the Minister ask his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to hire a typist to type out a reply to a very simple question that I asked last November?

Mr. Chope: I will pass that request on to my hon. Friend. I am sure that there is a good explanation why the answer has not been forthcoming in the way in which the hon. Gentleman expected.

Mr. Straw: Will it be metered or will there be a flat-rate charge?

Mr. Chope: If people want to open a book on this matter, that is all very well, but I cannot entertain a debate about that this evening.

I want to summarise briefly the main points of this report. It makes good the Government's undertaking to find a contribution towards the cost of the teachers' pay award in 1987-88. Provision is increased by £460 million, all of which goes to education authorities' GREs. The aggregate Exchequer grant is increased by £183 million; that means that the total of block grant now available is more than £9,000 million. The report also incorporates later information on capital allocations in GREs and reflects boundary changes that took place at the beginning of 1986 and 1987.

The present system is complicated. The Government are pledged to changing that system radically. In the meantime, I commend the report to the House.

That the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) 1987-88 (House of Commons Paper No. 330), a copy of which was laid before this House on 30th April, be approved.

Rate Support Grant (Wales)

8.4 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): I beg to move,

That the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report 1987-88 (House of Commons Paper No. 325), a copy of which was laid before this House on 30th April, be approved.

The main purpose of the supplementary report is to ensure that additional provision and grant in respect of the teachers' pay settlement is incorporated at the earliest possible opportunity within the RSG settlement for 1987-88. I do not intend to refer back to the details of the settlement. The House debated and approved the Welsh rate support grant report for the year as recently as 25 March.

The supplementary report increases provision for relevant expenditure by £30 million in respect of teachers' pay. It also increases block grant by £17 million on that account. That additional provision reflects the Government's view of the share of the increased expenditure incurred by county councils which should be borne by taxpayers and ratepayers. The Government consider it important that there should be a significant increase in teachers' pay, but hope that in return the teachers will accept that they have a commitment to play their part in restoring normality to the education service and putting the care and education of children first.

The pay increases will give teachers on average a 16·4 per cent. increase in pay, in two stages. That amounts to a 25 per cent. increase between March 1986 and October 1987, an increase that most other groups would be only too delighted to receive. The new pay arrangements will be attractive to young people seeking a rewarding and satisfying career. After two years' experience, the pay of a good honours graduate is £10,000. Without any promotion, that teacher's salary would increase to a maximum of £13,300. That is an improvement of nearly £3,000 on the present scale 1 maximum of £10,500. There are also significant rewards and incentives for the better teacher and for those taking on extra responsibilities. Those allowances range from £500 to £4,200. A teacher receiving the maximum allowance would have a salary of £17,500. I am talking not of head teachers or deputy heads, but of teachers doing a very good job in the classroom or as heads of department.

For the most outstanding entrants to the profession, the goal could be the headship of a large comprehensive school with a salary of £30,500 from 1 October. That is an increase of over £4,000. We believe that the management of our schools is a responsible job which requires skills of a high order. It is important that those responsible posts should carry the kind of salary which reflects this. Naturally, only a minority of teachers will become heads or deputy heads; but under the new pay arrangements some 85 per cent. of entrants to teaching could expect at least one promotion during their career. The teachers have received a fair and generous settlement, and I hope that we shall now see an end to disruption in our schools.

I have also taken the opportunity in this report to correct an over-estimate of £2·2 million in the specific grant allocated in the main report for housing benefit administration costs. The effect of that over-estimate was to reduce the level of block grant in the main report and I have, therefore, made a compensating increase in block grant of £2·2 million. I have also revised the estimates for a number of specific grants in the light of information now available from local authorities. As a result of all those decisions, including the teachers' settlement, this supplementary report increases aggregate Exchequer grant by £18·1 million to £1,175·1 million, and increases the amount available for rate support grant and block grant by £19·2 million, to £947·1 million and £920·9 million respectively.

I have made it clear on previous occasions that councils' grant entitlement now depends upon their own spending decisions, and that additional grant is available for those that reduce their spending. The latest available information is that the aggregate of local authorities' budgeted total expenditure exceeds provision in this supplementary report by £23·2 million. That means that £10 million grant remains unclaimed.

That £10 million remains available to Welsh local authorities. I have deliberately chosen not to reduce the level of aggregate Exchequer grant in this report to reflect that underclaim. I urge local authorities in Wales to examine the scope which undoubtedly exists — as successive reports from the Audit Commission have quite clearly indicated—to achieve savings and to bring their spending back into line with the realistic assumptions underlying the settlement. It is perfectly possible for them to do so. Some Welsh district councils have demonstrated this by restraining their spending and, consequently, they will receive additional block grant. Districts as a whole have budgeted to spend less than the level allowed for in the settlement and have therefore increased their grant entitlement by £0·7 million. Extra block grant awaits all councils which reduce their spending and this can only be to the benefit of local authorities and, most important, their ratepayers.

In recent years we have seen that with good will and good sense many Welsh local authorities of differing political complexions can work effectively with the Government and make good use of the instruments that we have given them and the initiatives that we have taken. Places as varied as Rhondda, Wrexham, Newport and Swansea have undertaken urban renewal and housing renovation programmes on a major scale. A number have shown that it is possible to provide first-class services and to hold down rates.

No authority has done this better than the city of Cardiff. The Conservative council in Cardiff has served its citizens well, undertaking not just the usual tasks of a district authority, but the special responsibilities called for in a capital city, undertaking major tasks of urban renewal and support for the arts, and yet it has kept its rates down. The Conservative-controlled Cardiff council is charging the same rate, 19·9p, as it did in its first year of office. With that splendid record, I am confident that it will be re-elected, as it deserves, on Thursday to continue that task.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Before the Secretary of State carries on in this vein, will he tell the House and, presumably, people outside how many council houses have been built in the city of Cardiff since the Conservative party took control of the council and how many more people are on the waiting list there? May we have the figures?

Mr. Edwards: It will be for the electors of Cardiff to decide on Thursday.Cardiff city council, working with the Government, have launched the most major programme of urban renewal to be undertaken anywhere in the country, which will include major housing programmes, both for those in the cheapest form of housing and for all other citizens. I can think of no more considerable contribution to the future housing needs of the people of Cardiff than the projects that Cardiff city council has set in hand with the Government for the redevelopment of that city.

[Mr. Edwards]

Mr. Rogers rose——

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East) rose——

Mr. Edwards: I am interested that an hon. Member representing a Swansea constituency wishes to intervene and I am happy to give way to him, although I do not think that he will vote in the Cardiff elections.

Mr. Anderson: In what may be his swansong in Welsh debates, I am sure that the Secretary of State would like to end on a note of his usual objectivity and fairness. Therefore, having paid tribute to Cardiff, will he pay tribute to the enormous co-operation of Swansea city council with the Welsh Office in the marina project and the enterprise zone, and generally, for the benefit of all citizens of Swansea?

Mr. Edwards: If the hon. Gentleman had not been talking to his neighbour and had been listening to me, he would have heard me do just that. I said that several local authorities, including Swansea, had undertaken urban renewal and housing renovation programmes on a major scale. If he listens to me carefully for the rest of the debate, he will not have to intervene so frequently.

At St. Mellons, the local authority and private sector, with the Government's support, have launched one of the most major innovative schemes for the provision of low-cost housing for the citizens of Cardiff which has yet been introduced. I dare say it will be a pioneer for housing development in the rest of the country.

Mr. Rogers: Will the Secretary of State give the simple figures showing the number of people on the housing list?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. We cannot have two hon. Members on their feet at the same time.

Mr. Edwards: The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) will have plenty of opportunity to make his speech.

Mr. Rogers: Why does not the Secretary of State give the figures?

Mr. Edwards: If the hon. Gentleman will restrain his verbal diarrhoea for a second, he will have a chance to speak later in the debate.

All ratepayers are entitled to expect their local authority to provide effective and efficient services to the community. They are entitled to see services maintained and rate bills kept down through the pursuit of efficiency and value for money. That is exactly what Cardiff has done and what other authorities can do.

Earlier I referred to the Audit Commission. I commend its reports which have examined key areas of council expenditure and pointed to ways of using resources more economically. The increase of £47 million in capital allocations in 1987-88 should allow prudent councils to achieve revenue savings through capital schemes. I urge councils on behalf of their ratepayers to consider carefully all the options for reducing their spending and thereby increasing their grant entitlement.

I commend my proposals for the supplementary report to the House.

8.15 pm

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): My hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) suggested that this may be the Secretary of State's swansong and some of my colleagues, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) seemed to think that his comments were a dying swansong. Nevertheless, we wish him good health and a long, happy retirement in the City or wherever he chooses to spend his retirement years.

As I understand it, the main effect of the report is to adjust grant-related expenditure to take account of the teachers' pay settlement and in that sense it provides Welsh counties with an extra £30 million. The county councils would have liked, and certainly believed that they are entitled to, £35 million, mainly to keep pace with labour costs. Presumably their calculation is based on the settlement figure of 8·2 per cent. backdated to 1 January and a further 8·2 per cent. from 1 October.

It certainly makes good sense to pay decent salaries to attract and retain good teachers. Likewise, peace and calm must replace disruption and demoralisation in our classrooms. There is a need to make better provision for textbooks and even Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools has pronounced unfavourably on that matter.

The deterioration in the supply of books is a reason why parental contributions are on the increase and that in turn widens the differences between individual schools and pupils. The cuts in teaching staff are resulting in subjects being dropped from the curriculum and in those circumstances it makes no sense to pay teachers not to work. I shall be told that investing in education is a costly business, but failure to do so will be ruinous for Wales and, indeed, for the whole of the United Kingdom. The report stripped of its technical intricacies and jargon, is essentially about providing Government financial assistance to local government to administer the services which Parliament has authorised it to do.

This supplementary report, in the dying embers of this Parliament, cannot in any way be said to come to grips with the problems of Wales, which our local authorities are most anxious to tackle.

I note that a Welsh district council spokesman refers to the report as "low key", whereas our problems are enormous.

I have already referred to the problems in education, but the Secretary of State also touched on housing. The scale of the problem in this sector in Wales is outrageous and oozes of neglect, despite what the Secretary of State has said in order to try to keep Cardiff Conservative on Thursday. The White Paper on public expenditure demonstrates that, in reality, there is to be no increase in spending, despite the fact that there is a much higher proportion of older housing in Wales than in any other part of Great Britain. Over 40 per cent. of the housing stock, almost 450,000 houses, is more than 65 years old, compared with the figure of 30 per cent. in Britain as a whole. Many of those old properties lack basic amenities, so a considerable proportion of our people live in unsatisfactory housing conditions. I suppose that we have grown accustomed to the fact that the Government do not care.

Homelessness is on the increase. In 1985 the number of households that were accepted as homeless was 9,200 in Wales. That is 7·4 per cent. higher than in 1984. Newport is a black spot, with a rate of 10 households in 1,000 becoming homeless.

We need to improve existing homes and build new ones. Poor housing is a false economy. It merely stores up problems for the future; yet house building creates more jobs for every pound spent than any other form of Government spending. We have thousands of construction workers on the dole in Wales and a massive shortage of decent homes. The arithmetic is simple. Housing investment makes economic as well as social sense.

I now turn to the vexed question of mass unemployment. It has plagued Wales throughout the eight years that the Government have been in office. With proper Government backing our local authorities could do much about this matter. The Government are now claiming that unemployment in Wales is falling. The Labour party welcomes any improvement in the situation. The CBI says that there is buoyancy in the economy. It is worth reminding the House that it said the same thing before the last election in 1983 but the subsequent three years saw further massive job losses and economic decline. The utterances of the Government and the CBI on unemployment and the state of the economy contain as much truth and authenticity as those wartime broadcasts of Lord Haw Haw from Germany.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): Has the hon. Gentleman noted that the Wales CBI, which often has been cautious in its statements and frequently critical of the Government, has seldom been as optimistic as it has recently? That is the Wales CBI, as opposed to the CBI for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hughes: The answer is simple. The last time that it was optimistic was on the eve of the 1983 general election. It is merely a case of history repeating itself.

The recent report of the Wales TUC is far more realistic when it points out that there are more people without what it calls "regular work" than there were a year ago. It says that there is an increase of 6,933, or 3·8 per cent. There is some difference between the two versions.

The difference in the two points of view is that so many thousands of people have been recruited on Government schemes of one sort of another. Mike Smith, the industrial editor of the Western Mail, clearly sets this out in an article on 4 May. It says:

"The latest figures for such schemes in Wales show that there are more than 21,000 people taking part in the Youth Training Scheme; 22,727 in the Community Programme; 5,000 taking advantage of the Enterprise Allowance Scheme and more than 4,000 in other employment schemes. This makes a total of more than 53,000 people.

In addition there has been a major attempt to encourage and help other unemployed people into regular jobs, training or special employment schemes under the Restart programme. So far more than 57,000 have been interviewed in Wales under Restart."

It does not say how many people have been put into employment as a result of those measures, but I understand that it is a tiny percentage.

"In relation to the size of its population Wales would expect to have around 35,000 — not 53,000 — on these schemes.

This imbalance reflects the high unemployment levels in Wales, the concentration of such schemes in areas of most need and the consequent falls in unemployment rates."

Mr. Anderson: I remind my hon. Friend of the many times, when the Conservative party was in opposition, that the Secretary of State for Wales criticised us for what he called "phoney jobs", saying that the Conservatives would create real jobs.

Mr. Hughes: That is true. Those of us who were in the House during that period will remember the words of the Secretary of State very well.

I agree that some of these schemes may have limited value, but the vast bulk of them are not real jobs at all.

Another vital sector in which our local authorities have a major part to play is that of law and order. I have visited numerous housing estates in my constituency with Labour candidates in the local elections. On the Old Barn estate in St Julians, residents pleaded for more policemen on the beat. The same sentiments were expressed in the Broadmead and Moreland Park estates in Liswerry. One elderly couple in St Julians had their home burned to a cinder after petrol had been poured through the letter box. I remind the House that this was in Newport, Gwent, and not the riot-stricken areas of Liverpool, Birmingham and London. Yet when the police committee of Gwent put forward proposals to Gwent county council for 50 extra police constables they were attacked by the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Robinson), the Under-Secretary of State, for putting up the rates to pay for such expenditure. None of us likes paying rates, but such attacks reek of opportunism.

The report could have been the springboard for the Government to make a fresh start and a real onslaught to tackle deep-rooted problems, with the help and active co-operation of local authorities throughout Wales. In the event the Government have opted for the status quo. Unemployment and decay will continue so long as this Government remain in office. They must be thrown out, and the quicker the better.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): The hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) is ever a pessimist. He tends to use terminology redolent of political disputes of many years ago. The circumstances which he has mentioned obtain in some matters and I should like to comment on some of them.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State pointed out, the supplementary grant is dominated by the provision for the increase in teachers' salaries. All parties agree that this is a desirable allocation. The Government have been right in giving priority to increases in teachers' and nurses' pay. Those were the two outstanding salary needs and I am glad that both have been honoured. The hon. Member for Newport, East said that major provision should have been made, but I think he will agree that the increase in pay is large proportionately. A correct decision has been made and it is not for us to understate such a significant increase in expenditure.

I hope that the teachers' dispute will now die away. Many teachers say that they feel almost as strongly, and some of them perhaps more strongly, about negotiation machinery. It would be out of order for me to elaborate on that but, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has pointed out, he wishes the former Burnham machinery to be replaced by adequate machinery as quickly as possible and as soon as there is general agreement throughout the profession. I subscribe to that view. The main provision in regard to teachers' salaries is all to the good.

The hon. Member for Newport, East also referred to housing needs. We have housing needs which have been aggravated by unusual circumstances. Many of the worst cases with which I have to deal result from broken marriages. That is a real problem, which one cannot under-estimate. I hope that in the months and years ahead, the incoming Government will permit special attention to be given to the problems of one-parent families. The problems of one-parent families and broken marriages may be a sign of a social breakdown for which there are various reasons, but certainly they are serious in many parts of the country.

On housing in general, the hon. Member for Newport, East did not pay sufficient heed to the published statements of the leaders of housebuilders in Wales about their great contribution to the provision of jobs over the last few years. There has been a decided upturn in output by members of the House-Builders Federation and the Federation of Master Builders.

I am not entirely happy about the money which local authorities could use for repairs and renewals from the amounts that they have obtained from the sale of houses. I hope that this can be considered again and that the release of the money can be accelerated, particularly in parts of the country where people are unemployed in the industry.

The hon. Member for Newport, East also referred to unemployment; although it is not covered in the supplementary grant, part of the expenditure could be interpreted as being related to it. I do not quarrel with his reference to unemployment, but, when referring to provision for training, he said that these were not real jobs. Of course the training itself is not a real job, but the hon. Gentleman must appreciate the need to extend training in all parts of the United Kingdom, and not least in Wales where our traditional industries have been in decline and newer industries are taking the place of iron, steel and coal. Therefore, the need for the various training measures introduced by the Department of Employment is very real. We should not refer to these as being undesirable; they are very desirable.

As the CBI in Wales has pointed out, there are grounds for cautious optimism in the Welsh economy. Not for many years has there been such a long period when successive reductions in unemployment have been announced month after month. We can be encouraged by that. I should not like to overstate the case, but each time new figures are published there is cause for optimism. Even more impressive has been the increase in notified vacancies. Opposition Members often refer to the figures having been massaged. They may use that terminology but there cannot be massaging of notified vacancies.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): They fiddle them.

Sir Raymond Gower: The hon. Gentleman may think that, but the published figures of notified vacancies are increasing steadily. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Part-time jobs for women."] They are not all part-time jobs. In any case, the new industries that are coming into Wales will require new skills and different kinds of labour. To that extent, any increase in the number of vacancies is desirable. I hope that the hon. Gentleman does not think that we should be unhappy that vacancies are increasing. That is an encouraging factor. The provision that we have made is encouraging and, without being foolishly optimistic, we can take some consolation from the fact that the worst times of unemployment seem to be past, and that the decline in our major industries is probably now behind us. There are definite prospects of improvement in the months and years ahead.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): While we must welcome the additional money for Welsh local authorities in the supplementary report, I do not think that there is anything in it to make us sing for joy. All that I can see are adjustments in the main report to cope with matters such as teachers' remuneration, and so on. The local authorities are in the same situation as before—having to scrape around for enough money to fulfil their obligations, and getting into trouble if they overstep an impossible financial limit that has been imposed by central Government.

Nothing that we have heard from the Secretary of State tonight has persuaded me that the Government have any sympathy with local government problems. As with everything else, they see such problems as matters of profit and loss, and the element of service and care for the community is entirely missing from their calculations. Their whole attitude is one of criticism of local authorities and a desire to take away any powers that they have, so as to increase power at the centre. Local democracy means nothing to the Government and the whole operation seems geared to stifling local initiative. It does not seem to matter that a generous proportion of local people want improved services, better school buildings, more home help for the elderly and better facilities for the young and the old. We should not allow such services to run down by penalising councils, which are, after all, doing their best under difficult conditions.

The teachers' pay settlement is obviously to be welcomed, but I have no doubt that later in the debate we shall hear about the vexed problem of negotiating rights. The position in the education sector is a grievous one. Capitation allowances are often too low; books are in a tatty condition—I know that from my own children's experience; books are shared, and there is a lack of choice in school curriculums. That is a serious matter. We won the battle in Powys recently over the closures of small schools, and the county council voted in favour of keeping them open. It is noticeable that the Secretary of State for Education is now falling into line with the views of Powys on such matters. There is a huge sparsity factor in our rural communities, and I hope that the Secretary of State will take that seriously, as he is well aware of it.

We also have immense problems of infrastructure—roads, bridges and schools — and we need some recognition of the sparsity problems in these matters too. Housing has already been mentioned, and I wish to make one point about it. Councils and districts have had to sell council houses, and we are in favour of that. However, it is seriously wrong that they have not been allowed to build enough houses in the rented sector, or spend the amount of money that they have gained from selling council houses to invest in new housing stock. Of course, they have been allowed some of the money that they have received from council house sales, but only a small proportion of it.

The Government are imposing ever more centralised control. That can be seen clearly in their proposals for a poll tax, which they undoubtedly want to impose on us if they can. There are great problems in the present rating system but the poll tax will produce even greater inequalities and injustices, and further reduce local control over the revenue for local government. That is a serious undermining of local democracy. Much more feasible would be the replacement of domestic rates, a local income tax, with the rates determined locally, thus ensuring a great deal more accountability.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Will the hon. Gentleman inform the House what the rate of local income tax is likely to be in Powys and the rest of Wales? We have heard figures ranging from 8p to 13p. The Government have published detailed figures on the likely consequences of our proposals. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman will enter the election with a clear statement of the figures and the additional burden of income tax that he intends to impose on the electors.

Mr. Livsey: The right hon. Gentleman will read our election manifesto with interest and see our proposals laid out in it. They have been fully costed and responsibly audited by a national firm of accountants. I am sure that he will see that they are serious and responsible proposals.

Grants from central Government would then be based on an assessment of local needs.

Mr. Rogers: Little Tories.

Mr. Livsey: I deprecate what the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) has said. We are not little Tories: We believe in investing in infrastructure and local government.

Local government would at least and at last be able to provide for its own communities with the full co-operation and consent of that community, which is our view of true local democracy.

Sir Anthony Meyer (Clwyd, North-West): It is evident that the policies that we have heard expressed by Liberal hon. Members on local government will be as ruinous for ratepayers as those of the Labour party.

I shall be brief. I must register relief that the ending of the interminable teachers' dispute appears to be in sight. I shall be glad if my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education can knock away the one remaining and rather shaky leg in the teachers' argument—their preposterous claim to have been deprived of their negotiating rights. They have deprived themselves of those rights by their total inability to agree about anything.

This debate marks one of a series of farewell performances by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. They are becoming as numerous as those of Dame Nellie Melba, and as melodious and agreeable to hear. We were probably also listening to the swansong of the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) tonight. I am sure that some of us, at least, will miss his contributions to our debates immensely, but I shall not.

If the teachers' dispute has not hit my constituency as badly as it might have done, that is because local leaders of the teachers' unions and in particular of the National Union of Teachers have shown a commendable restraint that was in no way encouraged by the attitude of Opposition Members, who seemed to go out of their way to encourage the teachers' organisations to be as obdurate as possible. I wish to pay brief tribute to the president of the NUT in my area who died yesterday—Mr. Aelwyn Morgan, the headmaster of Ysgol y Castell. He led the National Union of Teachers in my area with immense restraint and responsibility, and he will be sorely missed.

The dispute is a shameful story and I hope that when the teachers' strike has been settled and they resume normal working, more and more of them will decide that they wish to be represented by a union such as the Professional Association of Teachers, which has consistently put the interests of pupils first.

Even those of us who have mixed feelings about welcoming the increase in teachers' salaries will have no such feelings about the corresponding increase in nurses' pay. It was won without any threat of industrial action and seems to be a model of how these affairs should be conducted. On that note and with an affectionate farewell to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, I shall resume my seat.

8.50 pm

Mr. Gareth Wardell (Gower): As one of the few Members present this evening who have had experience of sitting and standing in front of a class, I join hon. Members who have thanked the Government for this pay award. The teachers certainly deserve it. The role of the teacher in our schools has changed enormously in the last few years. The mantel that they wear and the burden that has been imposed upon them are enormous. That burden was imposed not necessarily by the Government, but by the changes that have taken place in our society.

I shall mention a few of the things that any Government expects from the teaching profession. It is to teachers that Government seem to delegate an important role in health education. It is teachers who tell children about the dangers of cigarette smoking, of excessive alcohol consumption and of solvent abuse. The teacher is expected to inform his or her pupils about all kinds of problems affecting the health of our nation.

The Home Office provides an excellent pack about fire hazards in the home, and teachers are supposed to use it to explain to children the fire risks in the home to which they may be subjected. It is on the teacher that the Government put the important burden to explain to children the importance of road safety and the problem of deaths on our roads. When the Government decided to introduce the new general certificate of secondary education, they faced the teacher with the fundamental problem about the resources that are needed for the enormous amount of project work that the GCSE system will involve. Of course this is an excellent burden to put on the teacher, but will the teaching profession be able to respond to the challenge, especially in mathematics and physics where there is such a desperate shortage of secondary school teachers?

When did hon. Members last sit at the back of a classroom and observe the conditions in our schools? I am sure that some hon. Members have done that. By doing that and seeing what goes on, we see that the teaching profession is doing its utmost to get its message over. I am glad that money has been made available for this pay settlement, but there is a sting in the tail. It is that this settlement has been imposed on the teaching profession and the Government are unwilling to put a maximum size on the class that the teacher will have. The imposition of that settlement, the lack of future negotiating rights and the amount to be paid to teachers in a few years are at the heart of the concern in the teaching profession.

There is another fundamental point. A teacher finds it extremely difficult to stand in front of his class and transmit the cultural values that are expected of him. That is because he has to ask what those children can look forward to. What kind of society are the Government producing? The difficult question for our teachers to answer is, can the children who are now in our schools look forward to a life of individualism or will they face life in a society in which competition has reached such a level that conscience in terms of the community will almost have disappeared?

Will the Government look back on their term of office and say that they have succeeded in making the market and market values and materialism the prime focuses and determining driving forces of life in Britain? The values that are now being taught do not teach that there are things other than material benefit — much as that is important — that are fundamental to our society. I am extremely perturbed that the sense of community and neighbour helping neighbour and friend helping friend is extremely difficult to engender in our schools, given the values that the Government are building in.

The Secretary of State for Education has gone back on what he said about village schools. I am delighted that he has done so, and in the run-up to the election the more of his colleagues who go back on all kinds of things that they have said the better. I hope that the Secretary of State for Wales has exactly the same formula as the Secretary of State for Education and Science so that no longer will the numbers of children be a determining factor in deciding whether village schools will be closed. I hope he will ensure that resources are made available to local authorities in Wales to ensure that the same facility will apply in Wales as applies in England. He should not do what he did with executive houses and impose on the planning structure in Wales a settlement that the people of England would never put up with.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): For reasons that I think we all know well, this is not the best attended of Welsh debates on this important subject of the rate support grant settlement. I notice that at least 65 per cent. of the Welsh Conservative Members are present. The Welsh Labour party has managed 50 per cent., and for most of the evening even the Liberal party has had the same proportion present as the Welsh Conservative party. As the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) might well appreciate, I notice that the Welsh Nationalist party is conspicuous by its 100 per cent. absence from the debate. I especially remember the hon Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) lecturing me last Wednesday morning about how important it was that the House continue this week. We will see what happens.

As did the hon. Member for Gower, I want to comment on the pay settlement. It seems that there is now not so much talk about teachers' pay, although I could well appreciate any teacher saying to me that, even after the effect of the three pay increases by the autumn of this year which will achieve a cumulative total of about 25 or 26 per cent., he still wanted more. Instead, the argument now is about negotiating procedures or negotiating rights, call them what one may. With rights inevitably go responsibilities. All of us would say that usually there is no more responsible group than teachers. However, I feel that now teachers are doing themselves no service by dwelling on this point.

As with many people from Wales, I come from a family of teachers. There is a natural sympathy towards the position of teachers, but I have observed a widespread criticism of teachers, not least from schoolchildren. Parents have often said to me that children are losing, or have lost, respect for their teachers. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, above all the dreadful discription in our schools must now come to an end. It has done nothing to help the teachers' case and, above all, it has threatened the whole end product about which teachers and everybody else must be concerned — the quality of the education of pupils when they leave school.

The cost of the teachers' pay settlement is the main part of the report, but it is not the only part. We all know that a council's grant entitlement is now dependent upon its own decisions on spending. As a result of the decision of Welsh local councils, there is now £10 million unallocated, about which I understand my right hon. Friend to have said that he is waiting to see what savings can be achieved by local councils which would entitle them to this unallocated £10 million. I suggest to my right hon. Friend that he should not wait too long before these savings become apparent, as it may be possible to recognise those who already play the role of the wise councils in Wales.

The most obvious example is Cardiff city council. Cardiff is a city that is moving forward. For years we have had a civic centre that rivals any in Europe. Rather more recently we achieved a glorious shopping centre in St. David's centre and, as the jewel in its crown, the new St. David's hall. When we have had an early night here, I have often gone back to the flat and put on BBC2 to find that I was reminded of Cardiff because I heard concerts from St. David's hall. St. David's hall has been far more successful than I think anyone anticipated.

In addition to the St. David's centre and St. David's hall is a very active plan for a world trade centre which is being considered with great enthusiasm. Next week, the centre point of the Cardiff chamber of commerce annual general meeting is to be a presentation by the developers of the new world trade centre.

Top of the list in Cardiff must be the south Cardiff redevelopment, a grand plan to transform 3,000 acres of largely derelict docklands. There is tremendous interest in this scheme across the world. Cardiff is truly an international city that is moving forward into the 21st century. I am confident that Cardiff will make other cities in the United Kingdom sit up and take notice — places like Bristol, which all too often has been patronising about the M4 and the Severn Bridge. Bristol regards the M4 west of it as merely a back road. Places such as Bristol will find Cardiff becoming the international centre for the south-western quarter of the United Kingdom, eclipsing many other places. This all comes about because of Conservative drive and enthusiasm.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Absolute rubbish.

Mr. Jones: The hon. Member for Caernarfon has at last arrived and made one of his more intelligent contributions.

It is vital that the drive and enthusiasm be maintained. I am glad that my right hon. Friend has set up a development corporation to ensure that the south Cardiff redevelopment goes through. The drive from the Conservative-controlled city council in Cardiff in recent years has been complemented by Conservative drive from the Welsh Office, which has brought about the south Cardiff redevelopment.

In the tributes that have already been paid to my right hon. Friend, I fancy that perhaps he would be happiest with the tribute that the redevelopment of south Cardiff will come about in the years to come. That will be a permanent monument to what he has achieved in his time as Secretary of State for Wales. I can assure the House that there is a great head of steam to see that redevelopment come about. It is true that we have a large measure of support from the other political parties, but I should be apprehensive if the Conservative drive and determination were to be lost. The redevelopment might still go ahead, but I fear that it would not go ahead as well or as quickly.

I shall return to the unallocated figure of £10 million that my right hon. Friend still has in rate support grant settlement. I can assure him that Cardiff would spend it, and spend it well. We have a tremendous record on housing. The Conservative-controlled Cardiff city council has spent three times as much as the previous Labour administration — £90 million since 1983, compared to £30 million in the four years before. Last year alone there were more houses built in Cardiff than had been built in any other year. As my right hon. Friend said, there is an innovation in housing development, with 600 new houses for rent being built in St. Mellons, that everybody else in the country ought to watch closely. Please let us not wait too long for the savings to come about. Cardiff could spend it, and we could make the House proud in the spending of it.

9.5 pm

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): One advantage of speaking a little later in the debate is that one can hear some of the attitudes of Conservative Members. What has appalled me is the pomposity of Conservative Members in congratulating the Welsh Office on the settlement. We see no value from the settlement in the valleys of south Wales.

As has been rightly said, the major part of the report is to do with the teachers' settlement. However, if one goes into the schools of Wales one will find a profession that has been demoralised by the Secretary of State for Education and Science. One will find that class numbers are on the increase, problems of discipline exist and that teachers are finding it difficult to cope.

The ultimate hypocrisy of the Secretary of State for Education and Science and Conservative Members is that they are prescribing for a system to which they do not send their children. They stand at the Dispatch Box and lay down a programme for our education system when they have no confidence in it at all. They send their children to public schools and tell us how our state schools have to be run. What utter and complete hypocrisy. That extends beyond the education system into the Health Service. They prescribe what health system we should have but at the same time they opt out and go for private medicine. They prescribe for others but they do not have the courage to participate themselves. Now they are sitting there squirming and ashamed of themselves because it is being pointed out to them.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Mark Robinson): Where did the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) go to school?

Mr. Rogers: Who is the hon. Member for Durham, North?

Mr. Speaker: Order. One at a time.

Mr. Rogers: I have been told that my time is nearly up and that we are allowed only two minutes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Not by me.

Mr. Rogers: Indeed, not by you, Mr. Speaker.

I simply wanted to make the point that the pathetic posturing of the Conservative party will stand it in bad stead, not only in the local elections on Thursday, where it will get a drubbing even in the city of Cardiff, irrespective of the oily, treacly words of the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) and it will get a drubbing in Wales in the general election.

9.9 pm

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): I want to make one of my characteristically brief, succinct and low-key contributions to this debate, so I will not pass much comment on the speech by the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers). It is interesting, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Robinson) said, that the Opposition education spokesman, in whom they take such great pride, is a Wykehamist. He had an independent education. It was interesting also to hear the hon. Member for Rhondda whistling to keep up his courage. Conservative Members know how depressed the members of the Labour party are. Whatever they may say in this Chamber, we know that they are calculating on a very heavy defeat, not just on Thursday but in a few weeks' time nationally.

The supplementary report is largely concerned with the pay of schoolteachers, enabling the Government to pay local authorities an extra grant towards their pay increases. The Government's pay proposals for teachers are extremely generous. They will give teachers a 16·4 per cent. pay rise which, added to the existing increases, will mean that teachers will receive an average 25 per cent. pay increase between March 1986 and October this year. That pay award is unique in its generosity. What other profession has received a pay rise of this dimension?

The Government have genuinely attempted to find a long-term solution which will be fair to all, especially to pupils. The Government had no alternative, after two years of ineffectual free collective bargaining, when the teachers could not agree on anything among themselves — as my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) said — but to dispense with the existing negotiating machinery.

The Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act sets up an interim committee to advise the Secretary of State on these matters. I have been assured by my hon. Friend, the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Conwy (Mr. Roberts), that teachers' unions will continue to be involved in discussions about pay and conditions of service. The interim committee will take evidence and receive representations from teachers' unions as well as from local authorities. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State must consult both sides before issuing orders, which in turn will be subject to parliamentary approval.

As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has said, the arrangements under the Act are interim, until 30 March 1990, by which time permanent arrangements should be in existence. There is absolutely no justification for renewed disruption. I, no doubt like other hon. Members, have received heartfelt letters from schoolchildren in my constituency who are extremely worried about the effects of renewed disruption on their examinations. I will quote from one letter, but I will not disclose which school it comes from as that might disclose the identity of the young boy. I will read it because I believe it is important. It states:

"I am a fifth year pupil . . . I am taking my O level and CSE examinations in June/July of this year. I have been informed . . . that I am to be the victim of yet another afternoon off school due to the selfish action of the NUT and the NAS/UWT. I am very worried that this could seriously damage my examination chances as I will not have the full assistance of my tutors.

I would be very grateful if you could do anything to prevent me losing too much schooling. I have spoken with my headmaster . . . who has said there is little he can do."

This is a genuine letter. [Interruption.] I am quite happy to show the letter to any hon. Member after the debate. I am as anxious as the pupils who have written the letters.

I, no doubt like many colleagues, spend at least one Friday in four visiting schools in my constituency. The hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) said that he did not know the last time that any of us had been at the back of a classroom. In my case it was last Friday morning in three of my junior schools. I always come away impressed by the commitment, the dedication, of the teachers I have met. I have the highest respect for them as a profession. I know that the vast majority of them put pupils first and would do nothing to harm their examination—and so their future—prospects.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Raffan: No, I will not, because I am making only a few brief points.

I am dismayed that any teacher would take out his or her discontent on children, especially at this highly pressurised time when they are about to sit exams. I have tried to reassure those schoolchildren who have written to me and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Conwy for telling me that the Welsh Joint Education Committee's monitoring of last year's exam results reveals that industrial action had no significant effect. I am also grateful to him for informing me that if a school considers that its pupils have been seriously affected by industrial action, that school can apply to the WJEC for consideration as a special case, for that action to be taken into consideration in the marking of its pupils' exams.

However, that should not be necessary. There should not be disruption. Schoolteachers have been given the best pay deal that they have ever had. I hope that those teachers who are considering disruption will think of their pupils and their profession. I hope that they will not continue their campaign so that they do not lose the further respect of parents and pupils.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred in his opening remarks to the Audit Commission's reports on how resources could be spent more economically by local authorities. I come back to the question of surplus places. How can it be sensible for a local education authority to spend £3·5 million a year to keep 22,300 school places empty? It is mad. Yet that is exactly what is happening in Clwyd with, I am sad to say, the strong support of both the real Labour party and its faded photostat, the Liberals.

The Government do not want to remove all those places because they know, as I and my hon. Friends know, that many rural schools are thriving, playing a vital part in the life of the community that they serve. But the Government know, as do my hon. Friends, that when a school becomes too small, with the few remaining pupils in single figures and different age groups, that is not in the interests of a child's educational or social development, nor is it the way to realise the full potential contribution of a teacher to his or her community.

Just think what could be done if the Government's target of removing two fifths of those places was to be reached in Clwyd. Just think what we could do with the £1·4 million that is currently wasted, and how that money could be redeployed with great advantage to the education of children in the county. I hope that all Opposition parties, including that represented by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) whom I now see in his place, will think seriously about that point. It is not just a financial point; it is an educational and social point. Just think what could be done with that money in our hard-pressed urban primary schools. As I said, I visited three last Friday morning. Some of them have classes of between 35 and 41. I am so sad that the Opposition parties, particularly the Labour and Liberal parties, forget about those hard-pressed urban primary schools. We must also think about them, their need for resources—and the need for a balance of resources between rural and urban schools.

Just think, too, what could be done with some of that £1·4 million for Clwyd's school library stock, which was slashed in 1985 from £75,000 to £15,000, where it has remained ever since. Just think too, what could be done with some of that money for the county's school maintenance budget which was cut, wrongly in my view, by £11,000 last year.

I am happy that Clwyd county council is looking at each school within the county on its merits, not just on its financial merits but on its educational and social merits. Every aspect should be taken into consideration.

With this supplementary report the Government have shown their generosity and the fact that they are determined to improve education and education standards—the quality of the teaching of our pupils. I hope that in return our local authorities, particularly my own in Clwyd, will respond by spending their resources more efficiently, and thus more effectively, to ensure that all the children in my constituency and the other constituencies within Clwyd have the best possible education and the best possible start in life.

9.18 pm

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): The hon. Members on the Conservative Benches form the opposition party in Wales. They will form the opposition after the local elections and after the next general election.

They had two themes this evening. First, there was a general attack on the National Union of Teachers, and, from one Conservative member, a plug for the Professional Association of Teachers. Do they not consider that the current troubles in our schools are due, at least in part, to the way in which the teaching profession has been used and abused by the Government over the years? Was there not something just a little Janus-faced in the comments of the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan)? He talked about saving the money that goes on empty places in schools, yet praised the Government's new pre-election initiative on rural schools. We cannot have both.

Another theme from Conservative Members was a plug for the beleaguered Cardiff city council as it approaches the local elections. The hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) told us of an array of achievements by the city council, but he did not respond to Labour Members' simple questions: how many houses have been built in the public sector in Cardiff in the past year, and by how much has homelessness increased? Surely those matters are of considerable interest to Cardiff ratepayers.

The Secretary of State's approach throughout his speech was that of a complacent accountant — an approach clearly ill suited to the many needs of Wales. That approach is reflected, too, in the attitude of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to our national problems. He claims that we have the most successful economy in Europe, and that is true if our economy is looked at purely through the eyes of a City analyst. It is not so if we examine the economy in broader terms, taking into account social questions, unemployment and related problems. I do not define the performance of the economy in terms of what is good for the City.

In much the same way, the Secretary of State stressed that local authorities in Wales can do a good job by reducing their spending and increasing their grant aid from central Government, to the benefit, as he said, of ratepayers. I remind the Secretary of State that ratepayers do not have as their sole and narrow concern the level of rates. Of course they are anxious for their money to be spent efficiently, and that is a proper consideration. However, ratepayers have parents who want to find places in residential homes and who need home helps. They also have children who may not be able to afford their own homes and face the consequences of the slump in house building.

Ratepayers realise that, in spite of our aged and declining housing stock in Wales, we still spend less proportionately on housing than other regions of the United Kingdom. Ratepayers have children who are looking for jobs. The hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Sir R. Gower) talked about the increasing number of job vacancies, and we certainly welcome that. However, if we analyse the figures, we find that many of them are part-time jobs, relevant for women. They are frequently low-paid jobs. I invite the Secretary of State to provide an analysis of the new jobs. He will find that they are frequently low-wage jobs that do not add substantially to the economy of our communities.

Ratepayers are concerned not only with their rate bills but with the security of their homes and their estates and with the quality of their environment. Goldsmith—and not Sir James or Sir Walter Goldsmith—talked about a society where wealth accumulates and men decay. That process characterises much of Government policy today. Wealth is certainly accumulating—we can see that from escalating house prices in London and the profits and salaries in the City—but, in terms of their quality of public provision, the lives of our men and women are decaying.

I am confident that that strain of Government policy which is content to allow the City to flourish and to look narrowly at the bill for the ratepayer will be rejected by ratepayers in the local government elections.

It will be rejected in Swansea. Even in spite of what the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Cardiff, North have said, I am confident that that basic strain in Conservative thinking will also be decisively rejected in Cardiff.

9.25 pm

Mr. Roy Hughes: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply briefly. I should like to ask the Secretary of State a question on which I stand to be corrected. Why are our county councils losing £12 million by the non-recycling of grant this year? They can do with that money.

I very much admired the noble sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) in his defence of teachers and the important role that they play in society. By contrast, we heard the reactionary, scab-ridden remarks of the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer), who seemed to justify taking away the teachers' negotiating rights. I thought for a moment that we were back a century and a half with the disputes over the Combination Acts. Negotiating rights for our trade unions are basic to a free society. The sooner those rights are restored, the better it will be for all concerned.

I appreciate that there are nine district councils for whom the change in grant-related expenditure is equivalent to a rate increase of 1p or more. Then there are the seven district councils for which the change is equivalent to a rate reduction of 1p or more. We have noted that one of the authorities to benefit is South Pembroke—quite a coincidence, I am sure. Even with small changes, the difference in grant distribution shows that the Government's method of calculating payments to local authorities is inadequate. It certainly prevents our local authorities from engaging in long-term planning with any confidence. The report, even in a narrow context, does nothing to alter the essentially unsatisfactory nature of the 1987-88 settlement.

The fact remains that Wales has lost more than £650 million in rate support grant since the Conservative party came to power. I feel sure that the vast bulk of our local authorities are glad to get away from the diktat of the present Secretary of State and the ruthless, uncaring policies of the Thatcher Government whom he has supported.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Presumably, the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) opened and closed this debate because he suddenly realised that he has a marginal seat. The other day, the South Wales Argus proclaimed:

"Roy Hughes to lose after 21 years."

The hon. Gentleman opened the debate by questioning the £30 million increase and saying that the county councils would have liked £35 million. The allowance for expenditure was based on careful calculations using the best available figures for teachers' pay. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman has any substance for his figure.

[Mr. Nicholas Edwards]

The report only adjusts the 1987-88 settlement. A later supplementary report will cover the period from 1 January to the start of the new financial year.

The hon. Member for Newport, East referred to cuts in teaching staff. Pupil-teacher ratios have improved under the Government. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman, like so many others in this debate, called for a return to peace in our schools. He and others spoke of housing needs. He said that we did not care. He talked about housing investment making economic and social sense. The last Labour Government decreased growth capital expenditure by just over 50 per cent. We increased growth capital expenditure by 14 per cent. between 1985-86 and 1986-87, and there will be a £47 million increase in the allocation for 1987-88, with housing provision up by 19 per cent.

There was a lot of talk about the condition of the housing stock. The last Labour Government spent £143 million on improving the housing stock, whereas we have spent £615 million on improving the housing stock. The Opposition talk about it but have done nothing about it; we have.

Unemployment in Wales has been falling for 10 consecutive months, and in 11 of the last 12 months it has been falling faster than in any other region of the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman quoted Mike Smith, of the Western Mail, on the scale of schemes to train people and help the unemployed. He commented that those schemes were being concentrated on areas where help is most needed. I cannot think of a greater compliment. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman should criticise. Can I assume that it is the policy of the Labour party to cut such excellent programmes, or to target them less effectively?

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) welcomed, as did many other hon. Members, the additional resources to cover the teachers' pay increase, but he did not seem to understand that better care for the community also means making more effective use of resources. He spelt out the Liberal party policy for an additional tax on income, but he was characteristically unwilling to give any figures, although figures of between 8 and 13 per cent. have been frequently quoted and not denied by the Liberal party. That is interesting, if they are really proposing that income tax should go from 27p to 40p in the pound, but no doubt when their manifesto is published all things will be made clear.

We have been given that promise by the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor. We will examine that manifesto with great care and I will have more to say about his pronouncement in due course. He had better wait and see whether I have the opportunity to play any part during an election campaign in relation to the manifesto. I think I may find some time to devote attention at least to seeing that he does not continue to be my own Member of Parliament in Brecon and Radnor.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Sir A. Meyer) made a plea for putting pupils first. Surely every hon. Member endorses that plea. The hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) welcomed the extra provision for teachers' pay, but I understand that he intends later tonight to vote against the order making the necessary resources available to local government. The hon. Gentleman spoke about a desperate shortage of teachers of maths and physics. I can tell him that, as one result of the settlement, there has been an increase in recruitment for teacher training, particularly for maths, up 42 per cent., and physics, up 80 per cent. That suggests that our policies are moving in the right direction.

The hon. Gentleman talked about neighbour helping neighbour and friend helping friend. That is very difficult to achieve at a time when he and his colleagues have been encouraging a dispute to rumble on in the schools and the teachers have been disrupting the education service. My hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) was right about rural schools and about getting better use of resources. He produced the balance to be found absolutely correctly: the need to cut the number of empty places in the schools but at the same time to take proper account of the needs of rural communities.

I believe that my hon. Friend was also right when he said that there was absolutely no excuse at all for renewed disruption in the schools. Surely on that point at least, there must be total agreement throughout the House.

Teachers' Pay and Conditions

9.46 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): I beg to move,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Education (School Teachers' Pay and Conditions of Employment) Order 1987 (S.I., 1987, No. 650), dated 6th April 1987, a copy of which was laid before this House on 9th April, be annulled.

Normally an order that involves increases in pay does not lead to political controversy. However, this order is an exception to that rule, first, because the provisions on pay are introduced in conjunction with provisions covering the conditions of employment. For the first time, conditions of employment for teachers are being laid down by statutory instrument. It is certainly the case that the ACAS agreement covered conditions of service, as well as pay. Indeed, that was one of its main strengths. However, the key difference between that agreement and the order that we are debating is that whereas the ACAS agreement was freely agreed between the local authority employers and the majority of teachers, this order is being imposed on the local authorities and teachers.

Under the Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987, that highly controversial piece of legislation that we debated for 23 hours continuously last December, the Secretary of State has the power to make provision on pay and conditions by order. During those debates we predicted that the Secretary of State would use the power contained in that legislation to impose his own will on the teachers and employers, and that is precisely what he has done. Therefore, as the Opposition, we are using the power that we have under that Act to protest against the Secretary of State's diktat by praying against the order tonight.

Our argument against the Secretary of State's diktat is twofold. First, it is wrong in principle to set aside an agreement that has been freely negotiated between the employers and the majority of their employees and to impose a ministerial solution by statutory instrument. Secondly, as I have frequently warned the Secretary of State, a settlement that has been freely negotiated is always more likely to stick than one that has been imposed from the top.

The conditions of service laid down in the order are complex and wide-ranging. Even if the main teachers' organisations were not so hostile to what the Secretary of State is doing, it would need give and take on both sides for the conditions to work successfully in practice. The problem for the Secretary of State and the tragedy for pupils and parents is that new conditions will be introduced at a time when relations between the Government and teachers are even worse than they were when the right hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Sir K. Joseph) was Secretary of State, and that, indeed, is saying something.

Instead of accepting the new conditions of service as a necessary part of a new deal, teachers are bitterly resentful of what they see as yet another act of provocation by a hostile Government. After all, this Government have taken away their bargaining rights and replaced them with ministerial diktat—a position which, according to the Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987 will last until at least 31 March 1990.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Not beyond?

Mr. Radice: Until at leact 31 March 1990. If the hon. Lady doubts me, she should read the Act, which I suspect she has not done.

We all know that the Secretary of State, in one of those manipulative press leaks which have become his trade mark, told The Daily Telegraph that tonight he would tell us that there may be—just may be—some permanent body set up to decide pay and conditions before 1990. Apparently the interim advisory Committee — the Secretary of State's tame poodle — will advise the Secretary of State on what sort of body that will be. Obviously, the Secretary of State knows perfectly well that proposals along those lines are unlikely to satisfy the teachers. They rightly want the restoration of their negotiating rights.

Before the Secretary of State says that that means the restoration of Burnham, I shall remind him, as I have done on many occasions, that both local authority employers and teachers now accept that pay and conditions should be discussed together and that the Secretary of State's position on the negotiaing body should be fully protected. Even the Secretary of State must admit that that is a considerably different proposal from that of the old Burnham committee.

I have been watching the Secretary of State for many months—and the truth is that he is not in the business of settling the teachers' dispute. That is presumably why the so-called stressed to The Daily Telegraph yesterday that his proposals were not to be seen as an "olive branch" but were instead a "step along the road," whatever that may mean.

"sources close to the Education Secretary"

The Secretary of State is not interested in solving the teachers' dispute, at least before the general election. That is presumably why he is not prepared for the future of pay determination to be discussed until the summer. Incidentally, when will he announce the names of those on the interim committee?

Typically, what the Secretary of State wanted is what he got—a friendly headline in a friendly newspaper. [Interruption.] As is so often the case, what the Secretary of State wants is to give the illusion of compromise without in reality giving anything away and to give the illusion of action without doing anything positive or constructive. The tragedy is that the Secretary of State could speedily bring peace to our schools if he was prepared to accept a new negotiating body for teachers' pay and conditions which would discuss pay and conditions together, and on which the Secretary of State would be properly represented.

Mr. J. F. Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): When the hon. Gentleman refers to illusions, does he look on the 16·4 per cent. increase as an illusion?

Mr. Radice: I have often said to the Secretary of State that if only that offer had been made two years ago we would not have the current problem.

The Tories have been in government for quite a long time and they have made a terrible hash of the education service. It is because the Secretary of State still insists of depriving teachers of their bargaining rights and because he seeks instead to impose his will that I shall be asking my colleagues to vote for our prayer tonight.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Baker): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this prayer and put right a catalogue of union-inspired confusion and fallacies.

I am grateful to Her Majesty's Opposition for giving me this opportunity by praying against the first order under the Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act. That decision is confusing, and the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr Radice) referred to it at the beginning of his speech.

The Opposition are praying against the first stage of a 16·4 per cent. pay increase. The order — which the Opposition will be voting against—will enable teachers to get substantial back pay, ranging from some £300 for a teacher on the top of scale 1 to £600 for some deputy heads, in their pay packets within weeks. There is no other way of getting this money into teachers' pockets. I want the many teachers I meet to get this substantial increase as the just reward for the enthusiasm and conscientiousness with which they do their jobs.

The ordinary teachers' first concern remains to give their pupils a good education and a good start in life. That is why the Government have moved to give teachers such a big increase—16·4 per cent. this year with an overall 25 per cent. average increase in the 18 months between March 1986 and October 1987. From October a good honours graduate will start on £175 a week and after two years will receive nearly £200 a week. The many teachers now stuck at the top of scale 1 on £9,800 will be able to progress up a scale running to £13,300.

Opportunities for allowances above that will be expanded. Today, 30 per cent. of primary school teachers and 45 per cent. of secondary school teachers are on scale 3 or above, or are heads and deputies. Under our plans these figures will go up to 50 and 60 per cent. by September 1990. The first 25,000 new allowances of £500 will come on stream this October. They are part of a reform that is designed to make teaching a more dynamic, rewarding and attractive career.

The appeal is working. Good news gets through, despite the propaganda of the unions, I am talking about the recruitment figures for teacher training. Applications for this September are up by 14 per cent. Even better news: applications for maths teachers are up by 42 per cent.; for physics teachers 80 per cent.; for CDT a staggering 92 per cent.—and this while the unions are peddling stories of gloom and doom.

How interesting it is that poor pay no longer features in the unions' campaigns. They know that it is not on to tell the British public how hard done by one is when one has received a 25 per cent. rise in 18 months. If they had any illusions on that score, they will have been shattered by the recent MORI poll, which showed that parents do not think that teachers are underpaid. As I have always said, I want teachers to be well paid. If the pay is OK, the unions have to look elsewhere for a campaigning issue. They have been developing a string of fallacious arguments with which I shall deal tonight. Four of the seven fallacies were repeated by the hon. Member for Durham, North.

Fallacy number one is that disruption is Baker's fault. The unions really must think that parents have very short memories. When was it that one of the two militant unions was not disrupting our schools? They have been at it on and off for years. Do they really think that we have forgotten their endless campaigns—the half-day strikes, the disgraceful ten-minute withdrawals of labour, the refusals to cover, the refusals to attend parents' meetings and so on?

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Ways and Means motion may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Teachers' Pay and Conditions

Question again proposed.

Mr. Baker: As I was saying, I do not cause teachers to disrupt; the union leaders issue the orders. It is tortuous logic to pretend that one does not cause what one commands. The half-day strikes taking place in 10 local education authorities this week are the direct consequence of actions taken by the National Union of Teachers and the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers. The strikes are totally unjustified.

The second fallacy is that Baker's contract will choke off good will. The order clarifies the range of duties teachers can be called upon to carry out. It is based closely on the proposals developed in the ACAS talks. For the great majority of conscientious teachers these duties will mean little, if any, change from what they have been doing for years. In an ideal world, there would be no need to spell out a profession's duties in this way. We had to go down this path because of the way in which the unions repeatedly exploited the lack of clarity in teachers' contracts. It is a travesty that the unions should suddenly forget the disruptive use they have been making for years of so-called "withdrawals of good will". The order is a major step forward in protecting parents and pupils from these abuses. Certainly parents will not understand or forgive teachers for clock-watching when they know that the required hours are far from onerous. Teachers will work under the direction of the head for 1,265 hours over 39 weeks of the year.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the teachers' strike has resulted in a considerable waste of resources which would otherwise have been devoted to the benefit of pupils? Will he make it his business to estimate the cost of the wasted resources to the nearest thousand million?

Mr. Baker: I agree with my hon. Friend that the strikes have wasted resources. But they have wasted something more precious — the opportunities for children. It is always difficult to recapture those opportunities. I repeat that the strikes are unjustified.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Can my right hon. Friend tell the House how he will ensure that the Inner London Education Authority applies these conditions to the Inner London Teachers Association?

Mr. Baker: I have just been talking about how endemic disruption has become in certain areas. In many parts of inner London disruption has become a way of life for many teachers. Many children are sent home day in, day out, week in, week out because in parts of London the ILTA has taken over the running of the education service. That is totally and utterly unacceptable.

[Mr. Baker]

The third fallacy, repeated by the hon. Member for Durham, North, is that I overturned a freely negotiated agreement. What agreement? The so-called ACAS agreement contained a little mentioned clause. Roughly translated, it said "We"—that is two of the six unions, not the other four, and the Labour and alliance employers, not the Conservatives—"agree subject to Mr. Baker providing the money". I had already put up £608 million of taxpayers' and ratepayers' money. But Burnham negotiators have Burnham ways. "More," they said—£85 million more for pay and over £100 million more for changes in working conditions. They knew it was not on, but Burnham cultivated gestures rather than realistic negotiations. So they got up an agreement — a conditional pay deal. It was bizarre then. It is even more bizarre now when one of the non-signatory unions—the NAS-UWT — proclaims the virtues of this so-called negotiated agreement. It was not a party to it. It sat on the sidelines prepared to take any advantage that came out of the talks without participating in the negotiations.

The fourth fallacy — also mentioned by the hon. Member for Durham, North—is that all would be well if Baker gave the unions their negotiating rights back. It is typical that there should be a move to fundamental rights. What about practical reality? The reality was Burnham, which was utterly discredited as a negotiating body. In the years 1974 to 1986 Burnham delivered only four negotiated settlements. In other years there were special awards, so in the last 12 years there were only——

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are used to hearing a smear a day from the Labour party, but, so that we can hear the rest of the debate, would you be kind enough, in the immortal words of the Leader of the Opposition, to tell the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) to shut up?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The Chair deprecates sedentary comments and interventions.

Mr. Baker: I was on the point of saying that in the 12 years from 1974 to 1986 only four settlements were negotiated by Burnham. In the other eight years there were either special awards, arbitrations or pay policy prescriptions. In its final months, Burnham needed the prop of ACAS to stagger from endless meeting to meeting. Always the inter-union rivalry and the battle for members took precedence over the search for a sensible negotiated agreement. As one union leader admitted, commenting on the Burnham machinery, some unions used Burnham as a recruiting tent rather than as a negotiating body. Let there be no mistake: Burnham had become the misuse rather than the exercise of negotiating rights.

The fifth fallacy, repeated by the hon. Member of Durham, North tonight, is that I have excluded the unions. The teachers' unions have a real, important part in the new, strictly temporary arrangements set up by the Act. The Act was the product of 50 hours of debate. There was no guillotine, and we accepted 13 amendments——

Mr. Radice: In the other House.

Mr. Baker: —here, and in the other House. We are a bicameral legislature.

One of the amendments that we accepted includes "interim" in the title of the body. The Act requires me to set up an interim advisory committee to consider teachers' pay and conditions. The committee will be appointed in the summer and will be made up of indpendent people. It will be responsible for advising on the April 1988 pay settlement. Given the divisions between the various parties on what should be the long-term replacement of Burnham, I do not see any way in which we can get an agreement with legislation enacted in time for April 1988. That is not realistic.

What is realistic is for the unions to take part in the interim arrangements. They have an important part in the process. I wish to remind the House of the involvement of the unions in the process. They will give evidence to the committee in the full glare of publicity, and they will be consulted on the committee's recommendations. Those are the union's statutory rights. They would serve their members better by preparing to use them effectively instead of by pretending that they have been completely cut out of the action.

Another of the accusations made by the hon. Member for Durham, North constituted the sixth fallacy—that Baker's interim means for ever. Interim means what it says. The Act set up temporary arrangements, and it expires in 1990. When procedures produce chaos and breakdown, one replaces them. If there is no agreement on what to replace them with, one goes for a short-term solution that will give everyone time in which to work together on the long-term solution. That is what we have done, and that is the purpose of the interim advisory committee. So far, the two big unions have merely repeated that they know the solution: to set up a joint negotiating council. That, however, amounts to Burnham revisited, and I am not prepared to go back to that. We need some real thought, real reflection and real analysis to find a long-term solution that is fair not only to teachers, but to parents, taxpayers, ratepayers and, above all, children. It is not simply a question of one group's rights. It is a question of finding machinery which fairly reflects the genuine interests of all these groups.

The interim advisory committee will provide us with a breathing space to work out effective permanent machinery. I have made it clear that I do not want to be the determiner of teachers' pay. I and my colleagues intend to enter into detailed discussions later in the year with all those with an interest, including the teacher unions, the local authority associations and the churches. I also want to find a way of bringing in the views of parents. This consultation will get under way early in the autumn.

The hon. Member for Durham, North says that I am putting it off. I remind him that I invited all the unions to come and see me to discuss the details of the order that is now before the House. Two of the unions that now recommend disruption refused to come and talk, but the other four unions did come.

To assist in this important process of consultation, the Government will publish a Green Paper surveying the issues and setting out a variety of alternative possible solutions. This document will carefully examine all the options and consider their relative merits. It will look at statutory and non-statutory negotiations. It will look at possible developments from the interim advisory committee machinery. It will also examine suggestions for separate arrangements for heads and deputy heads.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Will the Minister please tell the House whether he has a target date by which he wishes to see the replacement full-scale mechanism in place? Secondly, will he assure the House that he expects that within that mechanism the teachers' right to negotiate their own pay and conditions will be restored?

Mr. Baker: I can answer that point specifically. I have already said that I do not believe that it will be possible to find an agreement between the various interests for the April 1988 settlement. As I have said, that is because there are very deep differences of opinion. I am aware of the alliance proposals. They are for a form of independent review body coupled with a form of negotiations—a mixture of both systems, as I understand it. We must try to be fair to the alliance. Its proposals have been developed since they were debated in the Lords. That proposal needs the most careful consideration and will be considered in our Green Paper.

I do not think that it will be possible to get an agreed new permanent machinery by April 1988. However, that does not mean that we will not be able to get it in place by April 1989—that is, before 1990—and we must strive to do that.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend say whether he envisages a final end to majority voting in the successor to the Burnham committee as a means of achieving agreement more simply? Does he envisage separate negotiations for heads and deputy heads?

Mr. Baker: The Green Paper will set out the points for and against separate negotiations for heads and deputy heads. The largest head teachers' union, the National Association of Head Teachers, has put to me strongly the view that it would like heads to have a separate negotiating arrangement. That view is not shared by the smaller heads' union or, I believe, by the two other larger unions, although they have not been to see me about it.

The case for separating the determination of an ordinary teacher's pay from a head teacher's pay needs the most careful consideration. There is a strong case for it, but it has to be set out. If I were to announce that that is what I favour, I can assure my hon. Friend that several of the unions would say that they would not accept it because it had been put forward by the Government. We have to go through a process of consultation with interests wider than just the unions. There will have to be consultations with the local education authorities, with teachers and with parents.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, as I was told only on Saturday morning by a teacher, it is not just the long-haired, bearded, corduroy brigade that represents the teachers of this country? Many people are tired of teachers thinking that their job is to represent activist teachers and not to attend to the problems of students? Does my right hon. Friend accept that, if we are to get teaching right in this country, it has to be on the basis of what is good for children, not what is good for teachers who want to be political activists more than they want to be teachers?

Mr. Baker: That is absolutely right. The difference between the union militants and activists and the bulk of the profession is vast. It is a huge gulf and we all know from our own experiences that the sorts of teachers we meet in schools we visit are very different from those we see on the television screen during union conferences. The prime consideration in all of this must be the welfare of the children. I do not believe that parents, or the country, accept that teachers are justified in walking out on their obligations and disrupting schools.

I was dealing with the various issues that could be covered in the Green Paper. The National Confederation of Parent Teacher Associations has suggested a review body. The alliance has suggested the variation of a review body with some sort of negotiation or pendulum arbitration. The Association of Municipal Authorities wrote to me last week suggesting a national joint council, recognising that it would have to take account of my statutory duties and powers in respect of school teachers.

That takes me back to the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) made about majority voting, that with a national joint council one has to face head on the relative voting strengths of the various unions, their respective influence and authority, and their changing memberships. The membership of the two most militant unions is declining and the membership of the less militant unions is now rising. One also has to examine and determine the exact role of the Government because they still provide about 46 per cent. of the money.

The list I have just set out gives some idea of the wide range of possibilities and it shows the need to balance carefully the different interests of six unions, the local authority associations, the voluntary schools and parents, and the taxpayers, who must not be forgotten.

Because of the firmly entrenched and conflicting views about the best course of action for the future, general agreement involving the whole of the education service and the Government will not be easy to achieve. However, let my commitment to this consultation exercise put to rest the claim of the unions that the temporary machinery will be there fore ever.

I again make clear that the holder of my office would not want to be the determiner of teachers' pay and conditions. I am simply not prepared to lurch back into a form of Burnham. We have an opportunity now to find a long-term permanent arrangement that will be more effective than Burnham.

The last fallacy again was not touched upon by the hon. Member for Durham, North, because I do not believe that he favours disruption in our schools. The fallacy of the two union leaders is that they must disrupt because they have no choice. That is utter nonsense. It completely ignores the constructive path to be followed. We should use the breathing space granted by the interim advisory committee to work out a new, effective, long-term way of settling teachers' pay and conditions. Certainly more than half of the parents polled by MORI thought that teachers should not disrupt. Unions should abandon this negative, harmful course. The public relations officer of the NCPTA is now telling teachers that sympathy with them is not widespread among parents.

The public relations officer said:

"Threats of further disruption shock parents to the core."

The suggestion that parents would support strikes against their own children is a delusion.

I believe that most ordinary teachers consider that they have now been fairly treated as regards pay and conditions of employment. I understand their concern about permanent machinery. However, I ask the individual teacher to accept the necessity of the interim advisory committee as a temporary arrangement. We cannot just go back to the chaos of Burnham. We must be open-minded about devising effective long-term machinery. It is very important that all teachers should fully understand the present positon and the Government's intentions. I shall write to all head teachers during the next few days setting out the key points I have put to the House today.

I hope that over the months ahead agreement can be reached by all parties. But I must ask union and local authority leaders to be open-minded and not hidebound by past arrangements. They must realise that if there is a lesson to be learned from recent years it is that we cannot go back to a revamped Burnham.

In the meantime, I urge all teachers to put once again the care and education of children first. Their passage through the education system is a once-only lifetime chance. Their performances in the examinations many of them are shortly to take will have crucial effects on their future. I have pledged to resolve the question of future pay determination for teachers. I ask teachers to pledge the restoration of uninterrupted education for our nation's children.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The atmosphere in the House is somewhat excitable tonight — [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) is clearly as excited as all his colleagues. Whether that is boyish enthusiasm for the forthcoming general election or the result of an over-generous dinner I shall leave future Hansard readers to decide for themselves.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not mind the boyish enthusiasm, but the inference that I have had over too good a dinner when I have only ate here in my view is outrageous.

Mr. Ashdown: I hope that Hansard will carry my report in full and leave future readers to draw their own conclusions. I hope also that it will carry the hon. Gentleman's precise words because his grammar left as much to be desired as his sense.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Let us get back to teachers' pay and conditions.

Mr. Ashdown: I am happy to do that.

I listened with care——

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did not think that it was allowable for another hon. Member to impute the honour or grammar of any other Member. I find it extremely offensive that the hon. Gentleman has said that my grammar is not as good as what his is. I take great offence at that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can defend an hon. Member's honour, but not his grammar.

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Gentleman does far too good a job imputing his own grammar to leave it to me.

I listened with great care to the speech of the Secretary of State. I remark merely that the national press has widely leaked the prospect of some great concession, some new initiative, that the Secretary of State is about to launch that would assist in the solution of the trench warfare that is now continuing in our schools—for which, let me be clear, the unions have a responsibility to bear. I believe that it was a silly and stupid action. It is my message—I believe that it is widely felt outside the House—that the Secretary of State has to bear some of the blame for the present situation because of the way in which he has managed the affair.

We sat on the edge of our chairs waiting for the great initiative to arrive—I wonder whether that is the right way to run such affairs—but, of course, nothing at all happened. There was some slight moderation in the tone, to which I shall refer later, but no prospect of any initiative to break the log-jam and deadlock that is now inflicting disruption upon our schools.

From the earliest days we said that the real issue in this dispute would never be pay: it was the removal from teachers of the right to negotiate pay and conditions. When that was said, it was greeted with some derision by the Minister and other Government Members, but so it has proved and so it remains today.

This order will put into effect legislation which has passed this House for the teachers' pay rise. For that reason, I agree with the Minister that it would be difficult to oppose the order and therefore to deny teachers the pay rise which has been granted, rather than negotiated. I am glad of this debate, because it enables us to make some broader comments about the handling of this sorry affair.

I do not seek, nor have I ever sought, to deny the Minister the right to impose a solution if the situation had come to pass that schools and the education system, therefore our children, were being damaged. We do not deny him that right, but whether or not this is the moment to do it is a matter of judgment. Any Secretary of State who had a proper regard for the democratic process and fundamental civil liberties, particularly of those 400,000 teachers who have held that right since 1919, would, at the moment he took that power to impose, have sought also to put in place some solid mechanism to replace those rights. If, when the Minister had taken that power, he had said, "I only want to have it and this is the time when it will come to an end," and had given some idea of how the negotiating right would be replaced, he would not have had this dispute on his hands or, if he had a dispute, the Left-wing extremist teachers—we saw many of them on the rostrums at the teachers' conference—would have been isolated and standing alone.

The Minister has created an issue about civil liberties —it has always been about that—which has unified the teachers across their unions and has driven the moderates into the hands of the extremists, instead of isolating the latter to bring peace to our schools. I have come to the conclusion that the extremists and the Secretary of State need each other. He needs the extremists to give him the votes at the ballot box, which he has been seeking in the way he has pursued this dispute; and they need him to give them a cause to unify the teachers' unions and put the moderates behind the extremists. They need and deserve each other.

Mr. Greenway: Will the hon. Gentleman explain, when he talks of moderate teachers being driven into the hands of the extremists, why the Professional Association of Teachers and AMMA have grown at the rate they have in such a short time?

Mr. Ashdown: I draw the hon. Member's attention to the fact that when the members of AMMA came to discuss this action in the lobby in the House of Commons, they were united with the NUT and the NAS-UWT. It may be that they did not decide to strike, but they voted with them in their opposition to the withdrawal of their rights to negotiate pay and conditions.

The hon. Gentleman will also know as well as I do—at least, he should, given his background—that there are many moderate members of the NUT and the NAS-UWT. Their instinct is not to strike but they have been driven to support those Left-wing extremist calls that we heard so clearly at the teachers' conferences only a matter of weeks ago.

The hon. Gentleman must have received the same sort of letters that I have received from moderate teachers in the NUT and the NAS-UWT who are desperate about taking this action but who feel that they have no other way in which to defend their civil liberties. He will know the heart-searching that is going on. Conservative Members are shaking their heads, but all hon. Members who are interested and involved in education will have received such letters from moderate teachers belonging to those two unions, expressing their deep concern about taking the only action that they feel is open to them to preserve their civil liberties. Those are the people whom the Secretary of State has driven into the arms of the extremists. He has provided the one unifying call which was possible under the circumstances.

I pleaded with the Secretary of State in a letter of 5 April, as did my right hon. Friend the leader of the Liberal party, to make some move. We gave him a number of options. He could have published a programme of how he saw matters developing in the restoration of those rights. He could even have published his own proposals. He could have taken any action to make sure that the teachers understood that he was committed to the restoration of their rights in the end.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: It is simply not the case that the unions are united against the Government's proposals. Four of the unions have come out clearly against disruption. They are consulting and discussing with me. They have come in to discuss the order. I have just issued a further draft order and invited all the unions to discuss that with me. I have already received representations from two of the unions. I very much hope that the other two large unions will do so. Nor must the hon. Gentleman exaggerate the extent of disruption in our schools. Well under 1 per cent. of our schools have been disrupted.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Does the right hon. Gentleman want more?

Mr. Baker: I certainly do not want more, and I trust that no one in the House wants more. What I have suggested tonight is a path of discussion instead of disruption.

Mr. Ashdown: The Secretary of State should not misunderstand coming in to talk to him as support for his actions. There is a fundamental difference between the two. I very much hope that other unions will also come in to have discussions with him. But let us not misinterpret such actions as supporting his action in withdrawing their civil liberties. That is a misjudgment of the events, and the right hon. Gentleman knows it.

I make the point that I made clearly in my letter in April, which was also made by my right hon. Friend the leader of the Liberal party, that the end of the dispute is in the Secretary of State's hands. If he takes concrete action to lay down a programme for the restoration of teachers' rights, or puts forward his own proposals, the disruption will swiftly come to an end; what would then happen is what should have happened previously, and the extremists in both the unions would be isolated.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ashdown: No, the hon. Gentleman must forgive me. I have given way three times and I should like to make a few more points before I sit down.

The Secretary of State has consistently refused to take such action. He has consistently refused to show much leadership. Therefore, we can only assume that he is more interested in playing party politics for votes than in bringing peace to our schools.

We now note some slight amelioration in tone. There have been no positive proposals, but there has been some slight amelioration in tone. One wonders why. Again, the answer is votes.

There is no doubt that the public have rumbled the Secretary of State. [Interruption.] Conservative Members may shout in derision, but they have only to look at the opinion polls. That is what is driving the Secretary of State. I will put this point on the record. The opinion polls on the education issue and about who is responsible for the dispute show that many of the public the Secretary of State knows this—put the blame fairly and squarely where it belongs, at least in part—with the Secretary of State.

Conservative Members do not need to look at those polls. They can look at the Daily Mail, the Daily Telegraph or The Times last week and see that in the serious press the Secretary of State got some of the worst press for his part in this dispute that a Conservative Secretary of State has had for many years. There is no use dodging that. That is what has caused some softening. There are no concrete proposals, of course, I suspect that the Secretary of State has delivered too little too late.

Mr. Greenway: What would the hon. Gentleman's party do?

Mr. Ashdown: The hon. Gentleman asks what I should like to tell him—what we propose. Before I tell him, I shall enter this warning: there are two elements to the order. One is pay. We would not vote against it—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Conservative Members obviously have not been listening. I said early in my speech that we will not vote against the order, because it gives the teachers their pay rise.

There is a second — [Interruption.] This is a short debate, but I will be heard if I have to repeat what I say several times. There is a second element to the order. It is certain conditions which are now to be followed by teachers. I do not mind if the Secretary of State has 15, 50 or 50,000 conditions. He knows as well as I do that, however many conditions he may have, he cannot define the duties, responsibilities and work of a teacher, unless he has the good will to put it into practice. It does not matter how many conditions he imposes. He has lost that good will. I suspect that those conditions will return to haunt him. There are many in the teaching profession who will follow those conditions to the letter and use that mechanism and the statutory instrument to disrupt schools.

The hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) asked what our proposals are. They are clear. They are laid down. The Secretary of State knows them. He referred to them clearly enough. If the hon. Member for Ealing, North wishes——

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Who supports them?

Mr. Ashdown: I shall come to that in a moment. If hon. Gentlemen wish, I can take another 10 minutes in this short debate to explain them again. I should like to give their ingredients. First, they will return the rights to negotiate pay and conditions for teachers. Secondly, they will establish a mechanism for unblocking blockages in negotiations. [Interruption.] Hon. Gentlemen may laugh, but I shall explain later why they would be well advised not to rubbish them too far. Thirdly, our proposals will provide a framework for negotiations. Fourthly, they will encourage the unions and the local education authorities to speak with a single voice. Fifthly, they will give a legitimate and proper role to the Secretary of State. I recognise that neither Burnham nor the joint negotiating council did that, as the right hon. Gentleman rightly said. Sixthly, they will enable some kind of ultimate solution — [Interruption.] — to be enacted, if necessary — [Interruption.] I do not mind how long this disruption continues. I will make my points heard. It is of no consequence to me if Conservative Members intervene. It is their debate. If they want to speak in it later, perhaps they will listen.

Our proposals will allow for a process of pendulum arbitration to achieve a final solution. [Interruption.] I can hear Conservative Members doing their best to shout down our proposals. They laugh, but perhaps they should laugh on the other side of their faces. I make this prediction: when the Secretary of State comes up with his final solution, it is likely to be very close to what we have just suggested. He knows that very well. That is why— Conservative Members might note this—he gave it a cautious welcome in his speech. We have not found the right hon. Gentleman taking the same attitude as other Conservative Members.

Those who support these proposals include many whom the Secretary of State has prayed in aid on many occasions. These proposals, first put forward in the other place, are supported in broad outline by the National Confederation of Parent-Teacher Associations, the National Association of Head Teachers, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the Professional Association of Teachers and the Secondary Heads Association. All those moderate unions—[Interruption.]—to which the Secretary of State referred, unions whose opinions in the past he has said he values, support them. But we know —[Interruption.]——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Back-Bench Members complained when the Secretary of State appeared not to be getting a fair hearing. I hope they will have in mind the complaints they made then and will give the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) a fair hearing equal to that for which they were asking.

Mr. Ashdown: It is their own debate that Conservative Members are interrupting, so it worries me not in the slightest if they prolong my speech.

It is evident in the House, in the serious press and among the public at large that the Secretary of State has been rumbled. He has failed in his job to lead the education service out of this dispute. He could have done so; the power to do it was in his hands. Indeed, his actions are seen by many as a contribution to the continuing disruption in the schools. He has been discovered as rather too slick and ambitious for the nation's good. He has been found out.

We shall not oppose the order, because the right hon. Gentleman has shown at least some movement and because it institutes the new pay deal. But we do so for this year alone, and we demand that the right hon. Gentleman now puts schools before his own and his party's electoral advantage. He must now move substantially, as he can, to end the dispute without further delay.

Sir William van Straubenzee (Wokingham): It is easy in a complicated situation such as this to postulate a number of general principles of total acceptability and say that because that is the path one wants to follow, that is the way forward. The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) should accept that that is similar to saying of sin that we are all against it; at least, we all have to say we are against it.

I have little doubt that the hon. Gentleman is right and that when eventually the Secretary of State's proposals emerge, after extensive consultation, they will contain a number of the points he made, simply because no sensible set of proposals could avoid doing so, being in general principle the sort that we are all anxious to see. I draw the line, though, at unblocking blockages. He is not the type of doctor in whose hands I should like to find myself, and I was not sure what he had in mind in his references to blockages.

The hon. Gentleman underestimates the present problem in relation to the sheer unwieldiness of the immediate past Burnham machinery. I was glad to hear my right hon. Friend say that he had no intention of toppling back into that machinery. It is hopelessly unwieldy, and let us remember the essential weaknesses associated with it. As it grew, like Topsy, it was dominated until recently by one union, which itself was dominated by electoral considerations of numbers—that is, the broad numbers of largely junior teachers. Therefore, there was inbuilt opposition to any arrangement that would make special provision for shortage subjects, for example, for special skills or for special responsibilities.

I believe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has a great opportunity that I should like to outline briefly in what can be only a short debate. First, the blame must be laid firmly where it belongs. My right hon. Friend and his predecessor have taken a good deal of stick in the debate, and that is fair in an assembly of this sort, but the main blame for the position in which we find ourselves lies in the leadership of the two main teacher unions. Any observer who has watched the scene for a number of years will be saddened that the two main unions are led by pygmies. Some of us look back and remember great names such as Gould, Britton and Casey. I pause for a moment to mark Mr. Casey's recent death, which caused great sadness to a wide range of individuals who did not share his views. These were big men, and no one could say that they sat in the lap of or were subject to the diktat of, the Department of Education and Science. No one could say, either, that they did not represent their membership. Unfortunately, strident trade unionism has led us away month by month from the commitment to professionalism, which must surely be the way in which in future the education service is administered.

I speak harshly this evening because I wish my contribution to the debate to reflect my strong feelings. Much of the industrial disruption that took place last year was because the general secretary of the National Union of Teachers had to prove his virility and his claim to office in the TUC. That is the reality. We know — hon. Members on both sides of the House have the connections that enable them to know that this is so—that many of his members are deeply unhappy with his actions and are leaving the union. Hon. Members are not the only people who have contacts. There are important members of the general secretary's headquarters who are deeply unhappy about and concerned with his strategy.

No trade union can overturn the elected will of the House that is set out in a measure that has been enacted by Parliament. Those teachers who are conducting the present campaign had better understand clearly that the relevant Act remains upon the statute book and that no amount of disruption will have it repealed by the presently constituted House, or any other House.

It is right that teaching is often referred to as a profession, but the dreadfully sad truth is that in Britain it is not. The hallmark of a profession is that it is self-governing and self-disciplined, and in this country teaching is neither. There are one or two others in this place who have had the enormous privilege that I have enjoyed of serving in the Department of Education and Science, and who have had the unpleasant task, like those of my right hon. and hon. Friends who now occupy the Treasury Bench, of administering discipline. They are the ultimate court of appeal. I wish to share with the House the anguish that I used to feel—I am sure that it is felt by Ministers of all political persuasions—and the hours that I used to spend upon such matters. I had a feeling of horror that it was upon a Minister that a decision eventually had to rest. Such decisions related to the professional future of a man or woman. In a profession, such matters are determined by the profession itself. We have an opportunity here, as the whole matter is in the melting pot, to create a professional body—if we take some time to do this—which will be self-governing and self-disciplining. It is not without the bounds of possibility that groups within the profession should be specially represented. That applies to other professions.

I accept that there are major decisions for the existing unions and for the Government. It is not impossible that this might require the central employment of teachers, and until now I have considered that with the greatest reluctance. I do not care for moves to centralisation and the centralisation of power. However, as part of the general concept that I have sought briefly to put before the House, central employment may be one of the features, if it was balanced by the professional body of strength, professional power and professionalism, that I envisage for the teaching profession.

Those of us who have never taught and who are not adequate to teach should always remember the demanding nature of the teaching profession. To care for very young children, older children or students, day after day, to give of one's very best, and to remember that one is always in the public eye, always in the front and always to have to give a good or, sadly, a bad example, is mighty demanding. At times, we Conservative Members rightly expressed the strongest views about disruption. We carefully distinguished between the leaders and the followers in those matters. However, our words should never fail to do honour to the many man and women who devotedly, day in and day out in our schools, give their very best to the young people in their care.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): It is always a pleasure to listen to the hon. Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee), who chairs the Select Committee on Education, Science and the Arts very well indeed. Even when we profoundly disagree with what he says, we must — as I always do — listen to his comments with respect and courtesy. However, I hope that parents and teachers will take note that this very serious subject was treated for some time at the beginning of the debate with levity and rowdiness. An attempt was made to stifle the opposing view. I hope that hon. Members will do me the courtesy of listening to the serious view that I want to put forward. The Secretary of State has missed out a great deal which I know that he knows about and I want to raise those points.

The bland and urbane effrontery with which the Secretary of State — his effrontery knows no bounds — treats this subject is angering people and making him vastly unpopular not only with teachers, but with many honourable people who want to see an end to this disruption caused by the Government and by the Secretary of State's attitude.

When the hon. Member for Wokingham invokes the names of Sir Ronald Gould, who, as he knows, died last year and was a great friend of mine, of Ted Britton, who was at the NUT conference this year, and of Terry Casey of the NAS, for whom I had great respect and knew for many years, he missed out an important point in saying that they did not do the things that are being done today. However, there was never any mention of negotiating rights being taken away from their unions. The difference between them and this Government and this Secretary of State is that the Government are doing something which not only the teachers' unions but the entire trade union movement cannot tolerate because the reason for the existence of a union is its negotiating right, and it has a right to negotiate freely—[Interruption.] If Conservative Members interrupt me rudely as though I am saying something wrong, in the alphabet of politics they are stumbling over the letter A. The reality is that they will bring into play a vast number of people who, at this stage, are holding their hands. Those people know that if negotiating rights are taken from the teachers, it will next be the civil servants and the public service unions and then an attack on the entire trade union movement, in keeping with the anti-trade union laws.

This discussion is not only about the order; it is an opportunity to discuss something else, using the order as vehicle for so doing. The fundamental problem that we are discussing is the right of a trade union to negotiate freely with its employers. We can never allow that to be taken away from us. It took hundreds of years to get it, and we shall not relinquish it. The Government and the Secretary of State know that as well sa I do.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): What about the children?

Mr. Flannery: The tribute paid in the last sentence of the speech by the hon. Member for Wokingham made it clear that teachers teach because they want to teach children. God knows that there is little enough in it for them. I should like to see some Conservative Members take a class all day for the pittance that the teachers have been getting. However, the issue is no longer about money, nor, temporarily, is it about conditions. It is, as I have said, about the right to negotiate.

In Russia, teachers are only an advisory committee. In Chile, teachers are only an advisory committee. Franco had them as an advisory committee. The incipient and developing tyranny that the arrogance of power among Conservative Members is bringing about is appalling.

We believe in a good education for our children and we need no lectures from those who send their childern to private schools and heap inequity on our children — [Interruption.] I hope that the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) will not stand up and tell me how many children he has at school. I am interested not in his sexual prowess but in something rather more than that.

In Britain, no previous Government of any political colour has tried to deprive a trade union of its negotiating powers. However, the present Government have retreated from position to position. But for the rudeness of Conservative Members, it would be laughable — those public school louts who do not want to listen to the other case that is being put — that, as the Secretary of State knows, the Government have retreated from position to position. They offered 4 per cent. to the teachers and finished up at 16·4 per cent.

Does the Secretary of State think that the teachers would have got anything more if they had not struggled for the education of children and for a living wage on which to teach them properly? Does he think that the gentlemen with supple spines among the NAHT would have got what they were after without the unions who fought for them? Does he think that PAT members will not eagerly reach out their hands for the money which others have fought, struggled and paid for?

The right hon. Gentleman is welcome to their support because people who pack it in and, with their crocodile tears, intone incantations about how much they love the children are not fit to struggle alongside. To Tory Members who say, "How much we love the children", I say "Come off it. Who do you think you're talking to?" We know how much they love our children when they make the schools miserable places, leave the roofs leaking, provide too few books and deny schools the wherewithal. In posh areas money comes from parents, but children in poor areas must put up with what they can get. That is the reality.

The Government were dragged kicking and screaming to the 16·4 per cent. increase. The Secretary of State, with such blandness, says what a good offer it is, but his predecessor talked in the same way and he was defeated, as this one will be. They thought they could impose their will easily, but they cannot. The Secretary of State's offer has turned out to be a crown of thorns. Today I have spoken to some union leaders, and I warn the right hon. Gentleman in advance that it will not be accepted because he is still depriving teachers of the very thing they need —the right to negotiate freely.

The Secretary of State has never made a bigger mistake. Parents and many others support the teachers. The Government now face an election while they are in a mess about education and the teachers' dispute. That is why the Secretary of State has come here tonight with this so-called olive branch. Three quarters of the teaching profession are solidly against the Government and what is happening to our children's education. The Secretary of State may say that that does not matter because four unions support his proposals, but those four unions do not represent even a quarter of the profession. Two unions represent three quarters. The Secretary of State should go among them and, instead of arrogantly talking, he should with a little humility try to learn something from them. [Interruption.]

The two main unions, the NUT and NAS/UWT——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Earlier Conservative Members below the Gangway called for a fair hearing for the Secretary of State. I hope that they will be prepared to — [Interruption.] Order. The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) raised a point of order earlier. It ill behoves him now to ignore the reproach I am levelling at him, among others, that he should be prepared to give to other Members the fair hearing he requested for his Minister.

Mr. Flannery: The NUT and NAS/UWT were backed by their annual conferences of freely elected delegates. That has never been the case at a Tory conference or certain other conferences which I could mention. The delegates were elected properly and democratically which is something that the Tory party will never understand, despite its immense propaganda machine. At those conferences an overwhelming majority voted to carry out industrial action. Then — this is something that the Secretary of State never told the House, so I shall—as I told the Secretary of State the other day when he brushed it off in his usual casual, arrogant way, thereby deepening his dilemma, those two unions wrote to the Prime Minister, asking to meet her to discuss free negotiating rights for the unions. She replied that she found it surprising that the two unions should want to have a meeting now as both unions had refused the invitation from the Secretary of State for Education and Science to discuss the draft order on teachers' pay and conditions.

That is totally untrue, and, like most of the material in the letter, it is a distortion of reality.

The Minister knows as well as I do that what the unions wanted to discuss with him and the Prime Minister was not wages and conditions but negotiating rights, and that is why he will not speak to them. He is willing to speak about water that has gone under the bridge, but the fundamental problem that we now face is the disruption of our children's education by the Minister and the Government, not by us.

Nobody wants to teach the children more than the teachers. One could not be a teacher if one did not want honourably to teach children. Anybody who thinks that one can go into a classroom and teach without having a great affection for the children is dreaming. Conservative Members have had teachers. They know that their teachers did not receive vast salaries and that they taught because they wanted to do so.

The abuse that I have received from Conservative Members characterises their attitude towards this subject. They do not regard it with proper seriousness. I hope that that gets into the press so that everybody knows it. Some Conservative Members genuinely and honourably want to solve this problem, but members of the ultra-Right wing that is in command of the Tory party do not want to solve it, and one begins to wonder whether they want the disruption to children's education which they have caused in the last couple of years.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) asked whether Conservative Members wanted to solve this dispute. We all want to solve this dispute, and that has not only been the case tonight. Conservative Members have made many suggestions as to how the dispute could be solved.

This is a short debate, so I will make only a couple of points. First, I detected from what the hon. Member for Hillsborough said that he welcomed the pay agreement but that he was dissatisfied about negotiating rights. I hope that he will realise that, as we are in negotiation, there should be give and take. The unions that are in dispute with the Government could at least say that they will protect O-level classes for this term. It is the last year of the O-level examination. It is an exceptionally important examination which will weigh heavily with employers as we move to a new system. The least that we could expect at this stage of the problem is that the O-level classes will be protected.

Secondly, while the teaching unions are in dispute they should look for some outside advice, because they are trying to set up a new negotiating system, which many firms and industries are constantly doing. I and my hon. Friends have said to the unions, "Why do you not seek advice from firms, employers' organisations and the Industrial Society, which for years have spent their time creating new negotiating machinery?" The unions should be seen to be coming forward with constructive ideas, not just blazing away at the Government and saying that the Government are half-hearted about negotiations.

As to the order, I shall make one point. In the section on cover and in the section on working time there are two matters which rely on good will. There is what I would call the "three-day rule" under "cover." In that section it says that cover will not be provided,

"unless — it is not reasonably practicable for the maintaining authority to provide a supply teacher to provide cover".

Under "Working time" section 4(f) says that a teacher will,

"work such additional hours as may be needed to enable him to discharge effectively his professional duties."

Paragraph (f) goes on to say that duties,

"shall not be defined by the employer but shall depend upon the work needed to discharge the teacher's duties."

One of the many constructive matters that the Government have done for the education service in the last eight years has been massively to strengthen and improve the curriculum and pour millions of pounds into it so that it is better planned and better constructed to give young people a better chance when they leave school. The professional duties of teachers require that they make the new curriculum effective. Any argument about cover and working time—and there is bound to be some argument as we are in new territory—should always bear in mind that the new and improved curriculum is what matters in teachers' duties. If the curriculum takes root we shall have better opportunities for young people when they leave school. A new examination system is coming in. Above all, we shall have a greater recognition of teachers' professionalism if they work the new curriculum well.

I appeal to the teachers when considering this statutory instrument to bear in mind, if they have problems over cover and working time, that what matters most is that the vastly improved curriculum is made effective. I appeal to them to work the new document in the spirit in which it is written, which is asking for constructive negotiation with the teaching profession.

11.10 pm

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I have listened to the whole debate. I came here expecting the statement from the Secretary of State for Education and Science that has been advertised in some of the prior comments about the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) suggested that he, too, came to the debate hoping that, despite all the events of the past, the Secretary of State would make at least some gesture. I have been following the debate to see whether that would happen.

Anyone who has followed the dispute must recognise that some of the fault lies with the Minister and with the Government. To suggest, as some of the more raucous Tory Members have done in interruptions, that all the blame rests with the trade unions, is absurd. The hon. Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee) made comments on the personalities. He is a fair-minded person and I do not think he could possibly try to load all the responsibility for the dispute on to one or two leaders of the two main unions. Of course, they have been responding to their members. Anyone who followed the dispute could see how they were representing their members, especially at the recent conferences. It is utter absurdity for the Government to try to pretend at this eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth or whatever hour that all the blame rests with the unions.

Like others, I came to see whether the Secretary of State at this stage in the proceedings had learned the beginnings of humility, which for him would be the first step back on the road of wisdom. If only he had had the humility to say, "Maybe I did make a mistake; maybe I am not so knowledgeable about the whole educational world," he could have made a gesture and started back on the road to sensible negotiation.

The right hon. Gentleman must recognise that it is not only the teachers and the teacher unions who have been up in arms. I do not know whether hon. Members have read the debate in another place about universities in which eminent leaders representing all the universities said that, after six or seven years of this Government having been in power, the morale among university teachers was at rock bottom. Anyone can see the appalling state of affairs in many universities, including Cardiff. The Government have made a few monetary gestures over the last few weeks. Although anything is welcome, they have not cured the appalling position in universities and the desperately lowered morale in education which they have piled up in the last seven or eight years.

The same is true of the rest of the educational system. There has been a lowering of standards, of morale and of the teaching being given to the children, chiefly because of the failure of the Government. We thought that, when the new Secretary of State arrived, he might apply to these problems some of the arts of public expression in which he is so proficient. As I said when the right hon. Gentleman was briefly absent, I thought that he might come to the debate and start on the process of trying to repair the present state of affairs. He has failed to do so, and has thereby made matters all the more difficult for himself. Sooner or later, proper, full negotiating rights will be restored to the teaching profession. If the Government agree to that, why do they not say so right away, and move speedily in that direction?

However, the Government have a reserve position—I daresay the Minister is guilty of this too—and believe that there is some political capital to be gained from trying to browbeat the teachers, in the same way that they think that there is capital to be gained from the other sections of the community that they try to browbeat. The right hon. Gentleman should have the nerve and courage to go back to the wretched Tory Cabinet and say that he will start to restore the same negotiating rights to the teaching profession that are enjoyed elsewhere. For a change, he should take back messages from the House of Commons, instead of bringing messages from the Cabinet.

The right hon. Gentleman has so far failed us. I hope that he will pluck up the courage to come forward in the next debate, and it will be better if that is before the election, because it is highly probable that he will have no chance of doing so after it.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): It is always a great pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), if for no other reason than that we attended the same private school. I hope that my children, who attend the local village school, will end up as eloquent as the right hon. Gentleman; I hope to match his eloquence some day, too.

There should be no doubt that hon. Members on both sides of the House want an end of the sordid dispute of the past two years. It is a completely futile waste of time to be striking and demonstrating against a system that failed. If one examines the negotiating rights that are the alleged touchstone of the problem, one finds that they were not exercised, because they did not work. Much more often than not, settlements were reached by being imposed or arbitrated. There was rarely a settlement as a result of the negotiations between the teachers, the local authorities and the paymasters. That was the fatal flaw in the system.

We must therefore look forward. One of the most important features of the instrument that we are debating is the list of the contractual requirements of a schoolteacher. It is a great shame that the teaching profession—of which I still count myself a member—has come to a time when we must list teachers' duties and responsibilities. That has lowered the tone of teachers' professionalism. However, no one should doubt the sincere anger and frustration that is felt throughout the teaching profession about what has happened.

We do not move any further forward by imputing blame to the teachers' unions' leaders or to the Government—some of it will be true. We must get away from all that and look forward to the future. The time-limited Act and the order provide a great opportunity for the teachers' unions and members of the teaching profession who are in such disarray to get their act together, come forward and accept the repeated offer of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to talk and negotiate a new settlement and arrangement for the long term. I believe my right hon. Friend when he says that he wants to see that sooner rather than later. I hope that it will be very soon and certainly within the designated three years.

My right hon. Friend has done a great deal for the teaching profession, if only because he has knocked together certain heads in the profession. I regret that, as usual, it is the children who have suffered. Too often they are left out of the equation from dawn to dusk and beyond. The teachers want to do a professional job and are more and more being blamed for the ills of society. We too readily forget the statistics published by the Department of Education and Science which show that not only are examination results better than they were, but that the general education provided for our children is rapidly increasing. I strongly support the teaching profession. This order must be temporary. The quicker we can get back to an alternative arrangement with full consultation and negotiation the better; but let us use this opportunity positively.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I certainly agree with the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) that the quicker we get back to proper negotiations the better. It is sad that we did not have more conciliatory speeches from other hon. Members. I agree with the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) that the Government ought to give careful consideration to the matter of cover. Everyone welcomes the fact that there will now be cover after three days, but that will be practicable only if we address ourselves to the problem of supplying teachers. I plead with the Government to have urgent discussions with the local authorities about how supply cover can be provided in some of the inner-city areas and in London where it is proving difficult to attract supply teachers.

In four minutes I cannot go into much of the detail of the order. It is sad that, although the Secretary of State for Education and Science has been in office for 11 months, he has not dealt with this problem. He came in quite clearly aware that, after seven years of Conservative Government, education was neglected. Even though he knew very little about state education, he must have been conscious that he had to face three major problems — the general certificate of secondary education, resources for higher education and the whole question of teachers' pay. In all that time he has turned most of his attention and most of his officials' time to gimmicks rather than addressing himself to the real problem.

If only the right hon. Gentleman had put half the effort that he has put into the new technology colleges into trying to provide resources for the GCSE, it would have made a tremendous difference. He talked glibly last week about making schools elastic and about taking curriculum away from the experts, the teachers, and giving them back problems of purchasing and he went for a gimmick a day to keep the parents and teachers at bay. If he had not done those things but had addressed the problems of solving the teachers' dispute, he could have produced a solution, as could any Secretary of State worthy of the office.

During the 11 months that he has been in office, the right hon. Gentleman has taken every opportunity to make life more difficult for the local authorities and the teachers' unions. In the negotiations at Coventry and Nottingham, he tended to emphasise the disagreements and when agreements had been reached he talked to each of the unions and tried to encourage them to go back on the discussions that they had had. He went on trying to cause disruption. Then, when he failed to make any progress with the teacher unions or the local authorities, he went for the simple solution of forcing legislation through the House. At this stage, he is still telling us that he has no replacement at all for Burnham.

It is quite clear that people on all sides in the discussions were saying for at least two years that they were dissatisfied with the Burnham procedure. All that the Secretary of State is able to offer us today is a Green Paper in the autumn on possible alternatives. It is amazing that the Secretary of State can spend 11 months looking at this problem and still not come up with any solution to the negotiating problem. He ought to come up far more quickly with an alternative to Burnham. A Green Paper produced 15 or 16 months after the problem landed on his desk is totally unacceptable.

The Secretary of State ought to attempt a quick solution to this dispute. His only other choice continued disruption in the schools. He said that only 2 per cent. of schools were affected and it seemed to me that, from the Dispatch Box, he was daring the teacher unions to increase it. If he does not get disruption, he will get sullen acceptance. He ought to take a little time off from his electioneering and do the positive thing: get the teachers' unions and the local authorities together, produce new negotiating machinery and say that he will restore that procedure. If he did that, he would bring peace back to our schools and ensure that all children benefit from their education rather than being in the centre of continuing conflicts in the running down of our state education system.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): The hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) mentioned cover. He well knows that some authorities have more generous arrangements for cover. The order enables them to retain such arrangements as they wish because it is a matter for local decision. It is recognised that there are some shortages of supply teachers and that it is not right for children to be sent home because teachers will not cover. That is recognised in the order.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) was naive, both in his perception of what has been happening with the teachers' union and also because of what he thought happened in Burnham. It was absolutely right of my hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee) to condemn the whole machinery of the Burnham negotiations. Those negotiations were only about fixed positions, recruitment to particular unions and press headlines. My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) was quite right to say that the whole machinery had completely broken down. I know that because, like a very few others in the House, I was on the Burnham committee.

There has been a continuous story of disruption and disunity among the unions. Last autumn, I think it was, the NUT and the AMMA appeared to be acting together. But the AMMA membership voted clearly earlier this year not to pursue strike action. The NAS/UWT is now proclaiming the virtues of a negotiated settlement, yet it consistently refused to put its name to any of the so-called agreements reached in the past nine months.

It is now the so-called "unity" between the NUT and the NAS/UWT that is presented in the headlines. But that unity is fragile. NUT members voted to merge with the NAS/UWT but the NAS/UWT would not even discuss merging with the NUT. The NAS/UWT's annual report to this year's conference, about the NUT's behaviour in 1986 when campaigning against the settlement for 1985, stated:

"The NUT engaged in a vicious and scurrilous campaign to try to persuade NAS/UWT members. Facts were distorted and truth turned upside down by the NUT in their campaign."

At the Easter conferences, both those major unions received wide television and press coverage and most parents and teachers must have been horrified to see the parade of militants on their television screens. The display of militancy and narrow-mindedness can only undermine the esteem in which teachers are held.

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) mentioned that my right hon. Friend had not brought any different proposals before the House this evening, but my right hon. Friend announced that the Government are prepared to commit themselves to produce a radical and constructive Green Paper, which I hope will include the suggestions made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) and also by my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury.

The hon. Member for Yeovil also made constructive suggestions, which I hope we shall see within the Green Paper, because all those things deserve to be discussed and looked at. Unless the Labour party wants to alienate parents even further, the teachers' unions should be prepared to be equally constructive. They will continue to lose public support if they continue to follow the line of Mr. Smithies, who was quoted recently as saying:

"We are not in the business to damage pupils more than is strictly necessary."

Such threats are totally unacceptable to the public and the parents. The real issue and what the House should hear about tonight is the education of our children being continued full-time within our schools.

Territorial Sea Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read—[Queen's consent, on behalf of the Crown, having been signified.]

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Baker): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I have it in Command from Her Majesty the Queen to acquaint the House that Her Majesty, having been informed of the purport of the Territorial Sea Bill [Lords], has consented to place Her prerogative and interest, so far as they are affected by the Bill, at the disposal of Parliament for the purpose of the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, pursuant to Standing Order No. 90(6) (Second reading committees) and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

TERRITORIAL SEA BILL [LORDS] (MONEY)

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Territorial Sea Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise any increase attributable to any extension by or under that Act of the territorial sea adjacent to the British Islands in the sums charged by any other Act upon the public revenue.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

TERRITORIAL SEA BILL [LORDS] (WAYS AND MEANS)

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Territorial Sea Bill [Lords], it is expedient to authorise any increase attributable to any extension by or under that Act of the territorial sea adjacent to the British Islands in the sums charged by any other Act upon the people. — [Mr. Boscawen.]

HOME AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That Mr. Tony Lloyd be discharged from the Home Affairs Committee and Mrs. Llin Golding be added.—[Sir Reginald Eyre, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

M11 (Service Area)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): My purpose in bringing this Adjournment debate to the House is, first, to beg the Minister to find another location for the motorway service area now that the airport at Stansted is to be expanded, and, secondly, to support the provision of a green belt around Bishop's Stortford to give the local council the only planning means of controlling housing and commercial development around Bishop's Stortford.

The motorway service area was located by the Department of Transport long before the Eyre report, which led to the Government's approval of the expansion of Stansted airport, originally proposed at 35 million passengers per annum and now happily restricted to 8 million passengers per annum after the strenuous efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst), myself and other hon. Members. Indeed, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope that he will be allowed to take part in the debate.

The difficulties caused by the development of the airport and the need for Bishop's Stortford to control its development are very real. Within a few weeks of the declaration of the expansion of Stansted airport, East Herts district council had applications for over 12,000 houses to be built in Bishop's Stortford alone, leaving aside the applications made for developments in areas around Bishop's Stortford, including in areas as far south as Harlow, but including my hon. Friend's constituency of Saffron Walden. That means that we have a serious difficulty in controlling development in the area. If the motorway service area is established in the currently proposed location, it will urbanise the entire area between the town of Bishop's Stortford and the motorway and beyond to the airport. It has always been the ambition of those in our area to create a rural buffer zone between the motorway and the town and between the airport and the town. If this motorway service area is located as proposed, both ambitions will be sacrificed and it will be extremely difficult to impose any control over housing, commercial and industrial development in the area.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will say, "But I have received planning consent from the local councils" — East Hertfordshire district council and Hertfordshire and Essex county councils. He initially received that consent in 1981 before the development of the airport had been agreed. Consequently, because planning approval ran out, the proposal came forward for fresh approval. It was only because of my efforts and those of my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden that the effects of the proposed 28-acre development on the environment were brought to councillors' attention. The East Hertfordshire district council considered the matter and submitted an objection under the compulsory purchase order for some of the land that my hon. Friend needs to build the motorway service area. On 5 February 1987, in a letter to the Department of the Environment from the director of planning of the East Hertfordshire district council, the council listed these reasons;

"It will effectively cause the coalescence of the eastern edge of the town of Bishop's Stortford and the airport.

It has long been the objective of my council to maintain an open area between the town and the M11. The development of a large motorway service area here will defeat this wish. The county structure plan review presently before the Secretary of State proposes an extension of the greenbelt around Bishop's Stortford. The construction of the MSA will be contrary to this intention. There are serious misgivings over the intention to have the MSA served from the Birchanger interchange as there is a risk of traffic congestion being caused on the A120, the nature of which as a bypass to Bishop's Stortford will be seriously compromised. The activity generated by the motorway service area will have a detrimental effect on the residential amenities of the nearby dwellings.

We understand that both Essex county council and Hertfordshire county council are troubled about the proposal from a traffic point of view and are re-appraising the proposal at the present time. This lends credence to the view that there is a considerable risk inherent in placing this facility in the position proposed. My council urges on the Secretary of State the need to review the whole principle of the motorway service area in this location and strongly suggests that an alternative site be investigated, possibly served directly from the M11 on its eastern side. If the Secretary of State concludes that he should hold a public local inquiry, my council will wish to have the opportunity to appear before it to expand these views and to add such additional comments relating to the planning issues as may be appropriate."

That is the considered view of the East Hertfordshire district council and of the two other councils from which I understand my hon. Friend the Minister has had approval.

I understand that my hon. Friend is reluctant to consider alternative sites because of the difficulties that he is likely to incur in terms of planning and getting approval. That is understandable, but I have asked him to consider this matter afresh because he received approval long before the airport was suggested. It flies in the face of common sense to intensify development and traffic congestion in that area and on the M11 where, I believe, there will be serious build-ups of traffic trying to use that interchange on its way to the airport and to the motorway service area.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will think afresh about these matters and that he will agree to an inquiry in relation to the compulsory purchase order. That will be the only opportunity for the district council, the county councils, the environmentalists and the town dwellers of Bishop's Stortford truly to put forward their considered views and objections to this proposal. I hope that my hon. Friend will ensure that he considers those views. I am sure that when he sees the commonsense reasons why this development should not occur, he will change his mind. If my hon. Friend insists that there must be this interchange, I would very much regret that. But I suggest that my hon. Friend place the motorway service area on the other side of the interchange, in the airport area, because there is a large acreage there and it would not impinge on residential development in Bishop's Stortford.

With only a fence and perhaps a few trees separating them, my constituents would have lorries parked overnight — possibly refrigerated lorries having their motors running the whole time—and the area would no doubt be brightly lit to prevent burglaries and other crime. This development is totally unacceptable close to a residential area. The whole problem would be solved if it were put on the airport land, and that would help the airport to develop.

There are other locations for this development. There is one, for example, at an interchange at Harlow—if my right hon. Friend insists on it being at an interchange—and a new interchange is proposed north of Harlow. In any event, the Department is ill-advised to site this at interchanges. It should adhere to the original policy of establishing areas such as this independent of other roads so that they serve the motorway and the motorway alone. If this service area is to go ahead, lorry parking should be taken out of the town of Bishop's Stortford and located in the area, but that is not in the Minister's current proposals.

I shall conclude, giving an opportunity to my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden to contribute to the debate. I trust the Minister will take the points I have made seriously into account when replying to the debate.

11.52 pm

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Does the hon. Member have the Minister's consent to intervene as well as that of his hon. Friend?

Mr. Haselhurst: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for raising this matter. He and I have fought an almost lone battle to have further close consideration given to the issue since it was overtaken, as it were, by the decision to expand the airport.

The proposal for a service area on the M11 has been around for a long time and obviously needed resolution, but it so happened that the more complex question of the airport overtook it, and that was decided, yet a final decision on the motorway service area has not been taken. It seems incredible, in the light of the airport decision, that the Minister should still consider the Birchanger interchange to be the right place for this development. It would be tempting Providence to attract to that one interchange so much potential traffic.

The Minister has carefully answered representations that I have made about the statistical evidence that has been made available and forecasts that have been examined by officials of his Department and that suggest that perhaps my fears are exaggerated. While one never wishes to treat lightly scientific and objective evidence in matters such as this, one must point out that the statistical evidence and forecasting of the Department of Transport have not always been spectacularly accurate.

I recall a predecessor of the Minister arguing in defence of a view taken by the Department that the proposed A1-M1 link could in places satisfactorily be a single carriageway. I am glad that that view has been abandoned. One must balance statistics with a degree of common sense. It is hoping too much to believe that this one intersection could bear the weight of traffic that is likely to be on it, in the light not only of it being the direct access point in the foreseeable future to the airport, but of the Secretary of State taking the commendable decision to trunk the A120. That means, regardless of the airport, that his decision recognises that the A120 will become an ever more important east-west route. Thus, traffic will be bearing down on this interchange from all points of the compass. To add an entrance to and exit from a motorway service area is a proposal which should be tested more objectively than simply by the statisticians of the Department of Transport.

Secondly, I support the fears that have been expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford about the separation of the urban development at Bishop's Stortford and the airport. Those fears will be echoed by my constituents in the parish of Birchanger, which adjoins the area. They, too, fear that what is a green and pleasant band will be closed by urbanisation if the motorway service area is situated where it is presently intended to be. It is proposed to put a commercial honeypot too near to another one, and there is no doubt that the bees will swarm all round. It will be difficult for the planning authorities, in the wake of the airport and the motorway service area, to defend any sort of rural belt in the area. If they fail to do that, they will be flying in the face of the general undertakings that the Government have honourably given in their airports White Paper about the protection of the environment in the area that we are discussing.

That is why we urge my hon. Friend the Minister to reconsider the matter. It is recognised that there is inconvenience to the travelling public if a motorway service area is not provided on the M11 in the near future. Traffic usage has increased and a service area facility is needed. However, it is to take too great a risk to plough ahead regardless now that other decisions have been taken. I join my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford, whom I thank for allowing me to take part in this short debate, in pressing for a public inquiry so that we may have an objective examination of the issues. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will accede to that.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley): I had not realised that it was possible for a Minister to object to an hon. Member who had not initiated an Adjournment debate contributing to it. I shall remember that in future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) has chosen a good day to initiate this debate. It is today that the Department of Transport has released a booklet on transport and the environment, a document which covers roads, rail, the ports and air movements. The page on which air traffic is addressed reveals that the number of passengers has grown and that the number of those affected by the noise and number index, which is the Department's way of giving a proxy indication of the effect of air traffic movements, has declined. It appears that the degree of disturbance is reducing. This is also the day when I went to Prestwick on a BA146, which is known as the "Quiet Trader". It is almost a whisper jet. On the runway it creates less noise than that which is required in the implementation of a new road scheme to enable a nearby houseowner to obtain provision for double glazing. Over the years we shall see noisy jets replaced by substantially quieter aircraft, which will be welcomed in the constituency of Hertford and Stortford and in many others that are near to airports.

My hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) has contributed to the debate and I hope to reply to as many of the detailed points that he raised as possible within the time that remains available to me. I hope that those who are present in the Chamber will forgive me if I observe that there is not one member of the alliance parties in his or her place this evening. With the exception of yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, there is no representative of the official Opposition in the Chamber. It seems that we have environment and transport to ourselves this evening.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not represent any party in the House. I am neutral and impartial.

Mr. Bottomley: Having read reviews of the book entitled "Faith in Politics", Mr. Deputy Speaker, I think that we would all make that claim. I have made the claim that I wanted to make Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I bow to your ruling on and correction of any imputation that I may have made about you.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford raised a number of issues and I think that it will be best for me to pass some of them to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. I do not think that I am competent to talk about housing development around my hon. Friend's constituency, though I recognise that there are pressures for house building in areas such as the one that he represents. I do not know whether that will boost his majority in any general election that may come, and as the issue is one that is slightly outside my remit I shall choose to adhere to the transport elements of the issue that my hon. Friend has raised.

In some respects my hon. Friend has asked me to prejudge the issues that he hopes will be raised at a public inquiry. Both he and my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden have asked whether I can give a commitment to a public inquiry, and I do so. There will be a public inquiry into the motorway service area proposal. I know that that will come as relief to some and welcome news to others. An announcement that I intended to withdraw the proposal altogether might be even more welcome, but I do not intend to make it. I wish to say that bluntly to my hon. Friends. If we have an independent, impartial inspector hearing our case and the cases of my hon. Friends and others who are objecting to the proposal, there will be confidence that, if the proposal goes ahead, it will be only after an independent, impartial inspector has heard the evidence and listened to the arguments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford suggested one or two other places where there might be—in his view—more suitable locations for the motorway service area. I do not want to go into detail about other areas. We believe that we have picked the appropriate place and quadrant of the interchange. It would also be inappropriate if I went on at length to claim that there are some protections on continuous development. I understand that there is a golf course between the proposed MSA site and Bishop's Stortford.

Mr. Bowen Wells: No.

Mr. Bottomley: If there is no golf course, my eyes have been misleading me. I have seen a photograph of what looked suspiciously like bunkers on the other side of the MSA area.

Mr. Bowen Wells: That is partly correct.

Mr. Bottomley: My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford has said that my argument and my facts are partly correct.

My hon. Friend also raised the matter of lorry parking. No one wants unsuitable heavy vehicles stopping overnight in Bishop's Stortford or any other town or village nearby when it is possible for vehicles to be placed in lorry bays in an MSA. If the MSA is eventually situated at Birchanger, there should be an appropriate number of such bays. We have suggested to the operators that instead of the normal 50 bays there should be 85. That would allow greater control over lorries that might otherwise be placed in Bishop's Stortford. I hope that that will be some comfort to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford and my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden.

My hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden referred to the Department of Transport's forecasting. I have spent some time in industry and commerce. In every area in which I have worked, we have made forecasts. The Department of Transport makes its forecasts public. If we consider how our forecasts have stood up to events, we find that they have not done too badly. We were surprised in some places, and we have over-estimated the amount of traffic in some areas and under-estimated it in others. However, in general we do pretty well. We can hold our heads up among any set of forecasters.

I have news for some of the pollsters who have been considering political affairs over the past few years. I suspect that some of their forecasts or polls have changed faster than the underlying views, although I suspect that they are becoming more accurate the nearer they get to the last year of this Parliament.

I am grateful for the welcome that my hon. Friends have given to the Government's White Paper on roads, produced last week, which refers to trunking at least part of the A120. Trunking a road makes no significant difference to the amount of traffic. However, it makes a difference to the source of funding for improvements. One reason why there has been such a good welcome for the proposal from Essex and Hertfordshire is that the money will come directly from the taxpayer rather than from part-funding from the taxpayer and the ratepayer, as might otherwise have happened. It may also mean that other schemes that the councils have set their hearts upon may not have to be delayed by giving greater priority to the needs of the A120. I make that point because some of my constituents may read the reports of this debate. They saw the GLC spend a lot of money before its welcome abolition, claiming that as soon as the Department of Transport trunked a road, it automatically became a dual carriageway overnight. The truth is that 60 per cent. of our trunk roads are single carriageways and an awful lot of them will remain single carriageways. I am not offering that prospect for the A120, but I want people to know that trunking does not automatically lead to a massive increase in traffic or to major spending in the short term.

We must use that quality to which my hon. Friends referred—common sense. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said in a television broadcast that was repeated on each channel this evening, common sense is basically Conservative policy. If we can mix that with giving people a democratic right to object to or oppose the Department's proposals, we are likely to make progress. Even if all people are not satisfied, they will know that they have at least had their day in court or that there has been a public inquiry at which they have been able to put their views.

It may be worth reminding the House that it is our policy to provide MSAs at approximately 30-mile intervals at the moment so that the needs, comfort and safety of travellers can be catered for. Our present programme is to provide 20 new MSAs to fill gaps in the existing network, and on new motorways. The new sites will provide the standard range of facilities such as parking, toilets, refreshments, fuel and telephones 24 hours a day. We also look for the capacity to meet traffic demand well into the 21st century.

To those who believe that people should not travel around by car, it is worth saying that there are 3 million provisional licence holders in this country, of whom 2 million are female. Therefore, instead of the car being the toy of the rich white male, there are a growing number of women driving, as well as a growing number of pensioners, and members of the ethnic minorities. As the Secretary of State said in a recent speech, it is just as important to cater for the needs of the person running a mark 1 Cortina in, say, Brixton as it is for the person running a new Montego in Watford.

The MSA sites are necessary because, where such services are not available on the motorway, travellers will seek them in nearby communities, causing congestion and thus losing many of the benefits of the motorway. The MSA sites are selected by consultants' study or other means, and account is taken of planning, environmental and traffic grounds, as well as costs and suitability.

As my hon. Friend said, Birchanger was selected in 1980 after consultation with East Hertfordshire and Uttlesford district councils, and with Hertfordshire and Essex county councils. Alternatives were considered in other quadrants of the M11-A120 junction. We consider that the present site in the south-west quadrant is the best. It is near the mid-point of the M11, offers services to east-west traffic on the A120, and will provide back-up for the MSAs that are coming on the M25.

Outline planning clearance was given in 1980 and renewed by all four interested local authorities in 1985. In 1985 they also had the opportunity to reconsider the proposal in relation to the decision on Stansted airport. Draft compulsory purchase orders for land acquisition for the MSA and the road diversion scheme were issued in January 1987. Twenty six objections were lodged, including one from my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford and another from East Hertfordshire district council, which agreed planning clearance in 1985 but has now revised its views.

As I have said, an inquiry is considered appropriate and will be held later this year. Objectors will have ample opportunity to make their case, and to test that of the Department, before an independent inspector.

All new MSA sites are carefully landscaped and screened by trees and other planting with bund walls—earth mounds—where appropriate to minimise environmental intrusion. At Birchanger, landscaping would be undertaken in and on the edge of the site to minimise visual and noise intrusion and light at night. From a visit that I paid, I seem to remember that the site lies in part at least, between the M11 and the golf course, on land that slopes down to the motorway, and that, in itself, will help screening. Investigations—by which I mean the use of my own eyes as well as of the advice that I am given—show no housing in the immediate area, and the golf course provides a buffer to the nearest housing concentration. Of course, the immediate area may be slightly more extensive to my hon. Friend than it is to myself.

We take environmental issues seriously, which is one of the reasons why we produced our booklet on "Transport and the Environment", which will be welcomed by many of my hon Friends' constituents. If they have not been able to get a copy, they should let me know and I shall happily send them one. It is something of which the Department can be proud. We do not claim that we have got everything right, but certainly during the past seven or eight years we have made dramatic improvements. There is not nearly as much controversy over roads and associated schemes as there was during the 1970s.

We have learned, but I think that some of the objectors have learned also. People may often find that there are things for which they can argue if they have had the experience of reading "Transport and the Environment" and perhaps they can also give them more publicity. I am not suggesting that badger tunnels and toad holes are the answer to motorway service areas, but they show the breadth of our environmental concerns. It is worth noting that we are the largest planter of trees for amenity purposes in the country—second only to the Forestry Commission.

I am grateful to my hon. Friends for raising the subject of the motorway service area. Obviously, the development of Stansted will bring some changes to the local area. There will be safe areas for foreseeable traffic demand both from the M11 and the A120, and we propose two accesses to the motorway service area.

My hon. Friends rightly reflect some of the worries of their constituents. By the time the inquiry is completed, people will understand how well they are represented in the House and how far the Conservative party appears to have a monopoly of concern in this area.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at ten minutes past Twelve o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Homelessness

1. Mr. Raynsford asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the present level of homelessness and the cost of the use of bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

The Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction (Mr. John Patten): I refer the hon. Member to the replies given to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 16 January and to my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) on 18 February.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the Minister recognise that, during the eight years since the Conservative Government were elected, homelessness has doubled and that the number of people in bed-and-breakfast accommodation has probably quadrupled? Does he recognise also that it is the most shattering indictment of his Government's policy that more funds are being spent—squandered—on bed-and-breakfast accommodation when, in his reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), he confirmed that it would be cheaper to build houses for the homeless than to put them in bed-and-breakfast accommodation?

Mr. Patten: I know how much the hon. Gentleman is concerned about the issue. I know of his long standing interest in it. However, he is blinkered in his attitude to the possible full range of solutions to the problems of homelessness. I can only draw his attention to the considerable number of empty homes in council ownership in London. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has not done what he could to persuade councils such as Brent and Lambeth to make use of the money that I offered them last year to fill empty houses to house the homeless. They turned it down.

Sir Peter Emery: Will my hon. Friend tell the House when the inquiry that his Department has conducted into the working of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 will be reporting? Does he realise that many unemployed people move to areas such as the seaside and other areas of great beauty in the countryside and create major problems in towns such as those in east Devon? Will he make certain that the report is published?

Mr. Patten: I entirely appreciate the concern felt in areas such as east Devon over this issue. Of course, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I are giving them close attention.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the Minister confirm that one of the ways in which he and his fellow Ministers are planning to try to deal with homelessness after the next election is another Conservative attempt to revitalise the private rented sector and that, at the moment, they are planning to give subsidies to private landlords so that they can make a profit out of housing?

Mr. Patten: It is surely a matter of common interest and concern in the House that there are 540,000 empty homes in the private rented sector. Surely we can find ways of making it possible for some of those homes to be filled to house people in need.

Mr. Squire: Will my hon. Friend confirm that much of the additional funding for the Housing Corporation this year is specifically targeted at replacing bed-and-breakfast accommodation? Pending the reduction and elimination of that unsatisfactory form of housing, will my hon. Friend look closely at the possibility of, at the least, registering the landlords of some of that unpleasant property?

Mr. Patten: I know and respect my hon. Friend's long concern, as a board member of Shelter, in this matter. Almost all the extra money going to the Housing Corporation this year is to provide additional accommodation for the homeless and for young job movers, in close co-operation with the private sector. With £30 million of public sector money we shall draw in about £60 million of private sector money, provide a substantial number of new homes, and get people out of bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Mr. Rooker: The Minister is quite right in saying that there is not one simple solution to the problem. There are a variety of solutions. Why has he not done more to encourage councils such as Bromley and Brent, which have tried, with modest resources, to experiment with making resources available to tenants who do not want to buy the house or flat in which they are living to enable them to have a stake somewhere else in the market, thereby releasing much needed family housing? Why has he not helped Brent council in that direction?

Mr. Patten: Transferable discounts are an interesting idea. That is why my Department is monitoring, for a short period in Bromley, Brent and in Ealing, the effects of the transferable discounts policy to see whether it works. We have three useful experiments going on. We shall look at the matter before the end of the year.

Green Belt (Planning Policy)

2. Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to revise his guidance on planning policy in the green belt; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): No, Sir. The Government's policy is that there should be no inappropriate development in the green belt.

Mr. Conway: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply.

If the acreage of green belt has doubled during the period of this Government, is that not evidence in itself that the balance between the needs of primary agriculture and those who have a genuine interest in matters environmental — not just a party-political, partisan approach—is well safeguarded by the proven record of the present Administration?

Mr. Ridley: Yes, that is the case. In fact, the area of approved green belt in England has more than doubled since 1979 to 4·5 million acres. I confirm again that approval should not be given, except in very special circumstances, for development in the green belt for purposes other than those connected with agriculture, sport, cemeteries or institutions standing in extensive grounds, or for other uses appropriate to a rural area. That has always been the position, and I reaffirm it now.

Mr. Hayes: I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware that in Harlow two controversial planning applications have been made, one of which is concerned with the green belt. They relate to Brenthill park and the Guilden way. My right hon. Friend is shortly to make a decision about Brenthill park, but I understand that a public inquiry is to be held on 16 June on the Guilden way application. As the two applications are intertwined, will my right hon. Friend seriously consider——

Mr. Skinner: Go on, Harpo.

Mr. Hayes: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. For once in my life I have been put off by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). Will my right hon. Friend seriously consider—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Give him a chance.

Mr. Hayes: As the two public inquiries are intertwined, will my right hon. Friend seriously consider on 16 June delaying the decision on Guilden way until after a decision has been made on Brenthill park?

Mr. Ridley: I cannot entirely accept my hon. Friend's assertion about the intertwining of the two applications. I feel that each must be considered on its merits, and I also feel that we owe to those who appeal for permission a duty to deal with their applications speedily. I therefore believe that it would be right to proceed with the first application as speedily as possible, and to take the second in the normal sequence.

Nitrogen Fertilizers

3. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from water authorities concerned about the excessive use of nitrogen fertilizers.

7. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent discussions he has had with public water authorities on the pollution of public water supplies by nitrates; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Environment, Countryside and Planning (Mr. William Waldegrave): My right hon. Friend has received no representations from water authorities specifically on the excessive use of nitrogen fertilizers. However, discussions on effective methods of limiting nitrate levels in water supplies are proceeding with those water authorities most affected.

Mr. Lloyd: The Minister will be aware, however, that the water authorities, including the Severn-Trent water authority, are very concerned about the level of nitrogen use, and that there is a feeling that there is an impasse between the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Obviously, it is in the interests of everyone that the issue and the dispute are resolved. Can the Minister give us a definite time scale under which positive steps will be taken?

Mr. Waldegrave: Not quite yet. The hon. Gentleman is right: the Severn-Trent water authority is one of the authorities with which we have been in the closest touch about the matter, and it has sketched out for the Department some outlines of what water conservation zones might look like. That work has been very helpful, and I pay tribute to it. However, we have not yet reached the point at which we can set a time scale.

Mr. Ashby: Will my hon. Friend recognise that there is deep concern about the excessive use of nitrates in agriculture, and that not only the Opposition parties are concerned about our environment. I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is very concerned. Will he therefore speak to our right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and ask him to try to offer some form of financial inducement, perhaps, to farmers to reduce the amount of——

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not want the hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) to be put off as well.

Mr. Ashby: —to reduce the amount of nitrogen that is used by farmers.

Mr. Waldegrave: These are complicated issues, and there are two or three different ways of approaching them. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has been giving very helpful advice to farmers about how to minimise damage. On some occasions, water treatment can also be used. My hon. Friend referred to the polluter pays principle. Financial compensation could cause difficulties. However, it might be right for experimental zones to have some such regime.

Mr. Speaker: I apologise to the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), whom I should have called first.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The mood at the moment is not conducive to being nasty to farmers, but is my hon. Friend aware of the rising tide of dissatisfaction in areas such as Southend where water consumers are having to pay substantially for the removal of pollution from their public water supplies, particularly when they know that the only effect of the use of nitrates is to produce vast mountains of cereals that cannot be given away? Once the current excitement is over, will my hon. Friend bear in mind his legal obligations under the Single European Act to make the polluter pay for his pollution?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend refers quite rightly to a serious problem, but solutions are not easy to find. That is why it is taking a little time to come forward with them. The detailed control that some people suggest there should be over applications of nitrogen would be exceedingly difficult to run in other than experimental areas. None the less, we shall have to consider whether we can find some solutions.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Is the Minister aware that for nitrogen fertilisers we could substitute part of what is becoming another problem—the manure mountain that is developing in Europe, along with the butter and the beef mountains? Conservative Members may laugh, but there is already a manure mountain in Holland, and one is developing in this country as a result of EEC subsidies for intensive farming. The manure mountain is causing pollution on the land and in the groundwater. If it were used instead of nitrogen fertilisers, we might be able to solve the problem.

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman's chemistry is about as good as that of the famous American senator who, in relation to the acid rain problem, said that the time had come to take nitrogen out of the atmosphere. Nitrogen is still nitrogen, whether it emanates from an animal or from ICI, Billingham. A quite separate problem, that of slurry waste, is affecting water in much the same way as are fertilisers. The question is whether we can treat waste in such a way as to avoid that problem. I do not, therefore, think that the hon. Gentleman has yet solved the problem.

Mr. Key: My hon. Friend is well aware of my long-standing problem with the River Avon, and he will have heard of the considerable disquiet that greeted the apparent decision of his Department to cope with the proposed River Avon survey. Can he say to what extent, and when, that might be funded by his Department? Will he also take on board the considerable concern that is felt by those at the Freshwater Biological Association, which is facing a 30 per cent. cut in its manpower? They are the people who can do most to solve the problem of the nitrate poisoning of our water supplies.

Mr. Waldegrave: The latter point is for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. He is responsible for the science budget. I was not aware that my hon. Friend had any problems on any matters whatsoever, but it is alleged that there are problems with the Avon in his area. The first proposal that was put to my Department for a survey was thought by the scientists in my Department to be not very well based, but discussions continue and if something sensible and helpful can be designed, we shall certainly consider whether to support it.

Mr. Boyes: Is the Minister aware that as a consequence of nitrate levels in some areas being double the recommended EEC values, in April of this year the European Community started legal action against the United Kingdom Government? In addition, the river quality survey shows that the recent trends of improvement have been reversed. What steps are the Government taking to restore these trends? How much cash are they making available to water authorities to bring water quality within the EEC guideline of 50mg/litre? Further to his answers to other hon. Members, will he emphasise in his discussions with his colleagues at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that he is sticking to the polluter must pay principle?

Mr. Waldegrave: There is a certain amount of confusion here, too, I am afraid. The European Commission has not instituted legal proceedings. The hon. Gentleman may be thinking of the quite separate problem of nitrites, which has nothing to do with this issue. His question is a bit off the beam.

I forget what the hon. Gentleman's second point was, I beg his pardon.

Land Use

4. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when, following consultation, he intends to publish a circular on planning and agricultural land.

Mr. Waldegrave rose——

Mr. Ridley: We are giving very careful consideration to the comments that we have received on the draft circular "Development Involving Agricultural Land" and hope to publish it soon.

Mr. Bellingham: I knew that it was a tricky question, but I have a feeling that it was actually a plant.

Is my right hon. Friend aware that in West Norfolk which is, after all, one of the most beautiful parts of the country, there has been some concern about the recent announcement in respect of development on agricultural land. Will my right hon. Friend make it crystal clear that the announcement will not lead to any additional development and, indeed, that it will probably lead to better planning decisions? Will he also make it clear that it will not lead to an increase in the number of planning applications granted on appeal in respect of land outside village development guidelines?

Mr. Ridley: I apologise to my hon. Friend. I received a message that he would not be here. I am delighted that he is, because it gives me a chance to answer his important question.

I hope to publish the revised circular soon, but we are taking account of all the comments made to us. No change will alter the basic fact that planning permission will be required for all developments on open land, although we intend to substitute the need to have environment and countryside objectives in mind as well as the agricultural quality of the land. That does not mean that 85 per cent. of the land will be opened up to controlled development of any sort, either in west Norfolk or in any other beautiful part of the country. It could mean that there will be better planning decisions about the use of the small amount of land that has to be taken. I hope that that will be the result.

Mr. Livsey: What account is the Minister taking of the recommendation of Friends of the Earth that priority be given for public house building and for the planting of deciduous trees? Does he agree that the planning arrangements for agricultural land and its protection have served our environment well?

Mr. Ridley: With that last point, I entirely agree. As I have said, I hope that the new circular will result in even better planning for the use of land. On the first point, I imagine that the hon. Gentleman meant public housing rather than public houses. There is a conflict in many district councils between the refusal to give planning permission for more housing and their desire to build more houses themselves. That is a conflict for the local authorities to resolve.

Mr. Heddle: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the pressure for building on the green belt and on agricultural land is partly due to the fact that we have not yet done enough to recycle urban and fringe land? Will he confirm that perhaps 47 per cent. of all new house building last year was on recycled land, but that much more can still be done to build on land in the inner cities, on land held by local authorities and other statutory undertakers? Will my right hon. Friend undertake to make every effort to ensure that the private sector is aware of urban development grants, derelict land grants and all the other initiatives introduced by his Department?

Mr. Ridley: I agree with all that my hon. Friend has said, with one tiny exception. Last year, 47 per cent. of all development was on recycled land and 45 per cent. of all housing development was on such land. That is the best figure that we have ever achieved, and I hope that we shall be able to do even better in the future. It is remarkable that we have managed to use old land for 47 per cent. of all development.

Mr. Skinner: Build on the old land on the Terrace.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) refrain from holding private conversations?

Mr. Skinner rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call Dr. Clark.

Dr. David Clark: Does the Secretary of State appreciate that his draft circular included no provision whatever for the protection of the countryside for environmental purposes outside the green belt, the areas of outstanding natural beauty and the national parks? In view of the representations that he has received, will he give an assurance that protection for environmental and conservation purposes will be extended to the whole of the countryside?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman's premise is wrong. The original draft of the circular gave the very protection that he seeks, but my colleagues and I are considering whether the English language can be made clearer so that even the hon. Gentleman can understand it.

Radioactive Waste (Hinkley Point)

5 Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment where the low-level and the intermediate-level radioactive waste from Hinkley Point power station is held at present; what plans have been made for holding it in the event of a new pressurised water reactor electricity generating plant at Hinkley Point; what is the size of the area involved; and how long the waste will have to remain on site.

Mr. Waldegrave: Low-level radioactive waste is temporarily stored at Hinkley Point nuclear power station pending disposal at Drigg. Intermediate-level waste is also stored at Hinkley Point pending the development of a suitable disposal route.

No proposals have been received by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for energy for a new station at Hinkley Point. I cannot therefore comment on what they might be.

Mr. Speller: I thank my hon. Friend for those remarks, but is he aware that the Central Electricity Generating Board intends to put a new PWR at Hinkley Point? As nuclear waste is already being stored there, and as even more may be stored there in the future, does he accept that planning is much more than a purely local function? Will he give an assurance that if the new station is built there will be consultation in the whole south-west area and not just in the local Somerset part about disposal and containment and, indeed, about the whole plant?

Mr. Waldegrave: Any proposal—I do not know of any proposals at present—will be considered in the normal, thoroughly rigorous manner.

Dr. Cunningham: May I warn the Government that the consequence of the expedient in relation to nuclear waste disposal policy announced by the Secretary of State for the Environment in the House last Friday is that all Britain's low-level nuclear waste will be concentrated at Drigg in Copeland and there is no other policy in sight for the foreseeable future? Is the Minister aware that that policy is increasingly unacceptable even in a community that supports the development of civil nuclear power, especially when the Government fail entirely to make the necessary investment in the infrastructure—in roads and other communications to the area—which should be an essential prerequisite for the development of any such policy? Is he aware that the people of Cumbria and of Copeland in particular are slowly but surely losing all faith in the Government and their policies?

Mr. Waldegrave: I can put the hon. Gentleman's mind firmly at rest on one matter. There will be a low-level waste disposal route, which will be combined with the intermediate waste disposal route, as many hon. Members on both sides of the House have argued. Drigg will therefore not be the only facility. That would be quite unacceptable. It may even be necessary to create some low-level waste storage facilities at the power stations if there is any slippage in the programme. Drigg cannot be the only national facility—the hon. Gentleman is quite right about that. In fairness, I should point out that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his predecessors have gone out of their way in a number of respects to try to discuss matters with the council at Copeland and elsewhere and there has been a good level of agreement on some of the projects undertaken.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister mentioned long-term disposal routes. Is he aware that since his right hon. Friend's announcement last week there has been considerable alarm in the Highlands and Islands about the possibility of nuclear waste being dumped on the islands?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about Hinkley Point. It is not much wider than that.

Mr. Wallace: Waste from Hinkley Point could go to any of those places, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister therefore confirm his written answer to me last week that no research has been specifically directed to small islands and reassure the people of northern Scotland that there is no intention to dispose of nuclear waste there?

Mr. Waldegrave: Hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and other hon. Members are going around the country trying to stir up the maximum alarm, when they should be thinking about their responsibilities. There is no proposal on the table at the moment, so the hon. Gentleman should not try to get into his local newspapers by believing that there is.

Council House Sales

6. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses have been sold to sitting tenants in England since May 1979.

Mr. Ridley: From April 1979 to December 1986 about 769,000 tenants bought their homes from English local authorities and new towns.

Mr. Knox: Does my right hon. Friend intend to take any further steps to draw the attention of the public to the Housing and Planning Act 1986? Does he expect the provisions of that Act to have a big effect on future sales?

Mr. Ridley: Yes, we have tried to get a circular to every council tenant who is living in a flat. I do not think that we have had a 100 per cent. success rate, but we have done our best to distribute a leaflet to them and the matter has been publicised in many respects. However, I agree with my hon. Friend that much more could be done. We shall seek other ways of making it clear that under a Conservative Government everybody will have a right to buy their house or flat at a discount. I refrain from adding to the leaflet that under either of the two Opposition parties that opportunity will depend on whether the local authority is prepared to give them the right. That is disgraceful backtracking from one of our most successful policies.

Mrs. Renée Short: Is the Secretary of State aware of the seriousness of selling off so many local authority houses when his Government are building only about 130,000 a year, which is about half the number that the Labour Government built before 1979? Does he not understand that the more houses that are sold off to sitting tenants, the longer those who want to rent their local authorities will have to wait?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Lady is putting her desire to be a municipal landlord before the wishes of the people.

Mr. Fallon: Is my right hon. Friend aware that later this month in Darlington the 1,000th council house will be sold to the existing tenant? In view of the fact that many other families in Darlington wish to purchase, will he establish from the Opposition, as a matter of urgency, in which local authority areas the right to buy will be suspended and in which it will not?

Mr. Ridley: I am delighted to hear about the sale of the 1,000th council house in Darlington and I am waiting for the Labour party to declare from which authorities this right will be removed. However, it is a pretty academic question, because I do not think that it will be in a position to remove that right.

Mr. John Fraser: The Secretary of State's description of Labour's policy is a perversion. Our policies on these matters were stated fully in Committee on the Landlord and Tenant Bill. Does the Secretary of State recall that in 1983 the Government estimated that the discounted price at which homes were sold was £9,000, so, on the figures that he has given, does he agree that about £7,500 billion in capital receipts has been generated from sales, which is enough to build about one third of a million homes to rent over the last eight years? Why, with all those extra resources, have the Government built 500,000 fewer homes to rent instead of a third of a million more? Does he not agree that the story of the last eight years with regard to housing is one of squandering the resources for providing homes to rent for the people?

Mr. Ridley: If I have misdescribed the hon. Gentleman's policy on giving local authority tenants the right to buy from their local authority, I would be glad if he will make that clear. I thought that there was a Lib — Lab pact on this matter and that they were in agreement. I have heard Opposition Members say many times that they will give local authorities in stress areas the right to refuse this opportunity.

The hon. Gentleman always talks about council houses, but he knows that private sector house building is at an all-time record. We are encouraging the Housing Corporation, with funds as well as legislative improvements, to go into the independent rented sector and build a great many more houses.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Would my right hon. Friend care to tell the House whether, on the heels of the great success of the municpal right to buy, he can hold out hopes to private tenants of private landlords that they might expect legislation to enable them to become home owners as well?

Mr. Ridley: I would certainly like to tell my hon. Friend that we are very keen to increase the number of houses to rent and in due course we shall bring forward proposals to do just that in the private sector.

Community Charge

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received as to the minimum level of community charge to be paid by those on low incomes.

The Minister for Local Government (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): My right hon. Friend has received, and continues to receive, a substantial number of representations on this issue.

Mr. Sheerman: What will the Minister do to reassure my constitutents in Huddersfield who, if there are three people in a household, are faced with a 138 per cent. increase in their rate bill and a 218 per cent. rate increase if there are four adults in the household? What will the Minister say to those who are not only on low, but middle-range, incomes, who are faced with such a ruinous increase in their rate bill that they will end up either in the poor house or the work house under this Government?

Dr. Boyson: I remind the hon. Gentleman that there are no work houses under this Government. However, there is a considerable amount of income support and help for the low paid in our society. If we concentrate on that, we have already said that the mentally handicapped and those in old peoples homes will be exempt, the severely physically disabled will receive 100 per cent. rebates and that there will be generous rebates for those on low incomes. Indeed, 80 per cent. of old-age pensioners will be better off than they are now as single pensioners. [HON. MEMBERS: "No".] Opposition Members may not like to know that they will be better off under a Conservative Government, but the public know it. It is also important to recognise that it would be unfair to impose financial burdens on those on low incomes. It is equally unreasonable for people to vote in the length and breadth of this country without realising the financial penalties of the policies for which they are voting.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Does my hon. Friend agree that when the community charge is introduced there will be a very much greater incentive for Labour-controlled councils, such as Norwich city council, to keep rate increases down to a low level, and that that would benefit my constituents, business and industry in Norwich?

Dr. Boyson: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. Undoubtedly, the opposition to the community charge from the Labour Benches stems from the fact that they know that it will bring reality home to authority after authority. If spending in Huddersfield and many other authorities was reduced to the grant-related expenditure level, authorities could reduce considerably the burden on ratepayers.

Mr. Blair: Now that even the Prime Minister yesterday admitted that this was a poll tax, and when the Secretary of State takes home about £30 a week extra as a result of the change, what have the Government to say to the millions of families already below the bread line who will be tipped further into misery by this change?

Dr. Boyson: Reference has been made to the question of a poll tax. [HON. MEMBERS: "Poll tax."] Exactly. I have the reference here and I am glad that Opposition Members also read Hansard. If hon. Members would read Hansard and go to the dictionary, they will understand the definition of a poll tax — [Interruption.] If the hon. Member would listen, I will advance his education even further. A poll tax means a tax per head. However, it has nothing to do with the voting register. If hon. Members go back to the dictionary—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question relates to a community tax.

Dr. Boyson: A poll tax is a tax per head. In this case, we are making exemptions, to which I have already referred. According to "Chambers" and other dictionaries, no reference is made—and no reference was made by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday—to the question of linking the definition of a poll tax to the voting register.

Mr. Favell: Is it not true that the only places where the electors have anything to fear is where there are high-spending councils, and that if people are daft enough to elect a bunch of twerps, such as those who represent Manchester, they have only themselves to blame?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that "twerp" is an inelegant parliamentary expression.

Dr. Boyson: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. Indeed, the community tax—or rather the community charge— brings home to voters the cost of what they are voting for. In Manchester, the business ratepayers alone would save £30 million or £40 million. Manchester might then be again the prosperous city that it once was under private enterprise.

Mr. Favell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: If it is about that word, the hon. Gentleman may say something about it.

Mr. Favell: Mr. Speaker, "twerp" is a good old-fashioned northern word, which was used in a sensible parliamentary way. What is unacceptable about it?

Mr. Speaker: It means something rather different in London.

Dr. Cunningham: Why does the Minister continue with useless subterfuge when even the Prime Minister confessed yesterday that what the Government intend to introduce is a poll tax? Why does he seek to mislead people when he knows that his own Green Paper makes it clear that many people who pay no rates now will pay under the new system? For example, of the 7·5 million low-income families receiving housing benefit, 3 million pay no rates now, but will have to pay the new tax. Many of those people, including national insurance pensioners, widows and unemployed people, will have to pay the same level of tax as stockbrokers, moneybrokers and millionaires. Pensioners and unemployed people will be taxed at the same level as the latter group, and everybody will pay a minimum of 20 per cent. Is that what this Government regard as fair and just?—[HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] Say that louder. If that is the Conservative view, we intend to make sure that the people of Britain know all about it.

Dr. Boyson: In setting income support levels, we shall take into account the impact of those levels on the most vulnerable groups, especially those who will pay for the first time. However, let us consider the other side of that. How many people earning £10,000, £15,000 or £20,000 a year, in houses the length and breadth of this country, pay nothing because they are not the householder? Is that justice? Similarly, is it justice that the Labour party talks about capital values, which would double the charge being paid by some people because capital values in London rose by 25 per cent. last year? That would be the threat to people living in Ealing, Brent, Waltham Forest and in other areas. What would people living in those areas do if faced by the capital values that are proffered by the Opposition?

Mr. McLoughlin: Will my hon. Friend point out that it is the present rating system—to which many people do not contribute—that is unfair and that the way in which old-age pensioners are clobbered by the present system is totally unfair? Will he assure us that a Conservative Government would reform the present rating system, unlike the Opposition, who continue to support high-rating councils throughout the country?

Dr. Boyson: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend and I think that most people in the country would agree with him, especially those living in high-spending Labour, alliance and double-alliance counties? The basis of what we are doing is at the least courageous, for a start. We are tackling the question of rates, about which people have grumbled in every party for 50 or 60 years. All that people are offered by the Opposition are capital values and a doubling of rates in many areas of the country, which people cannot afford to pay.

9. Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the level of the community charge and uniform business rate in London.

10. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the likely level of the community charge in inner London boroughs.

Mr. Ridley: Since we published illustrative figures on 1 April we have received a small number of representations about the likely impact of our proposals on authorities in London.

Mr. Soley: As the Government have already caused many local authorities of all political complexions to make difficult choices between draconian cuts in basic services and increasing rates, how on earth does the Secretary of State justify a poll tax which, in areas such as Hammersmith and Fulham, will lead to the average family rate increasing from £365 in 1986-87 to no less than £432 per adult in the same year? What justification is there for such a regressive, heavy poll tax in local areas?

Mr. Ridley: I shall give the hon. Gentleman a good justification. Hammersmith and Fulham is overspending by £16 and the Inner London education authority is overspending by £246 per adult per year respectively on their GRE. That massive overspending must be paid for by the people and I suggest that it is not unreasonable that it should be paid for by the people who vote those idiots into office.

Several Hon. Members: Idiots?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is in the same category as twerp.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Secretary of State's discourtesy towards elected councillors is well known in this House and outside. Does he know that at present the average rate in the London borough of Newham is £517 a year and that if the poll tax is introduced it will mean that a two-adult household must pay £648 a year, a three-adult household £1,026 a year and a four-adult household £1,368 a year? That news will not do much damage to the Conservatives in Newham, because they do not stand a chance there, but how can the Secretary of State defend a system which imposes such charges on the second most deprived local authority area in the country while benefiting Mr. and Mrs. Thatcher in Dulwich to the tune of £37 a week in savings? This is an up the pole tax.

Mr. Ridley: Newham receives a high GRE of £906 per adult and it is spending £167 per adult on top of that. The community charge will be high in Newham because expenditure is high. Furthermore, the Labour party in its publication "Local Government Reform in England and Wales" states that it wants a system of capital rateable values with variations in income, not variations in rateable value — [Interruption.] I am entitled to tell the House what the effects of the Opposition's policy are. The effect of variations in income on the assessment of rates is that rates will increase massively in the north of England and will decrease in the south-east. That is their proposal and it is about time the country knew it.

Sir George Young: If Labour Members are genuinely concerned about the problems of Londoners on average or below average incomes, should they not spend more time talking about local government expenditure, which is at the heart of the problem? Can my right hon. Friend tell the House that he will keep rate-capping provisions in operation after the community charge has been introduced to give protection to people in Ealing?

Mr. Ridley: As the Green Paper showed, we intend to retain some form of limitation on the charges that authorities may impose. My hon. Friend is entirely right that the reason for the high levels of community charge in London is massive spending. The overspending of ILEA above GRE is £246 per adult. Somebody must pay for that and the House will not disagree with the suggestion that the people in inner London should.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend further consider Ealing and appreciate that the pressure for the community charge arises because of the sheer abuse of the rate system by the Ealing Labour council, which has imposed a 65 per cent. increase in rates on domestic ratepayers and a 57·3 per cent. rate increase on industry? That means a rate increase of at least £5 per household. Pensioners come to my surgery crying because they cannot pay it, but the Labour party does not care. Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that the vicious Ealing Labour council will be rate-capped as soon as possible to save my constituents from the bread line?

Mr. Ridley: I cannot say anything about the future of rate limitation or how it might affect Ealing, but I entirely share my hon. Friend's view that the ruthless and cynical imposition of massive spending and massive rate increases on innocent citizens is one of the most disgraceful and distasteful features of the Labour party.

Mr. Dubs: Will the Secretary of State confirm that in Tory-controlled Wandsworth, the Prime Minister's favoured local authority, the community charge will result, per head, in a 115 per cent. increase compared to the present system, and that that is the biggest increase of any local authority in England or Wales? How does he justify that?

Mr. Ridley: I justify it very simply. It is because there is a £246 per adult overspend by the Inner London education authority, of which Wandsworth is part. The Wandsworth rate, and the community charge that follows from it, is extremely low because of the good management of that council, but it is ruined by the surcharge for ILEA.

Mr. Squire: Given the passage last night in another place of the remaining stages of the Scottish equivalent legislation, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the possible advantages of deferring legislation in England and Wales until any minor difficulties are ironed out in Scotland?

Mr. Ridley: We are likely to defer the English and Welsh Bills until the start of the next Session of Parliament, as my hon. Friend knows. That will allow plenty of time to look at any difficulties. It is important to return to the point that the Labour party is proposing a system that would have the effect of putting up the charges that people pay in the north of England through the rating system, and bringing down what will be paid in the south-east. Some of my hon. Friends will be glad to hear that information.

Mr. Straw: The Secretary of State is in the mire on the poll tax and I hope he realises that. Is he aware that his excuse for the 115 per cent. increase in Wandsworth — because of ILEA spending — simply does not wash because, so capricious is the poll tax system that it will lead to a reduction in average rate bills in Conservative Westminster, which is also in the ILEA area? Do the adjectives "ruthless" and "cynical" also apply to the 57 per cent. increase in the business rate that businesses in Wandsworth will have to pay, the 31 per cent. increase that businesses in Westminster will have to pay, the 32 per cent. increase that businesses in Ealing will have to pay, and the 82 per cent. increase that businesses in Kensington and Chelsea will have to pay? When the Secretary of State used the word "idiots", was he referring to those hundreds of thousands of electors who rejected the policies of the Conservative Government and Conservative councillors at the polls last May and elected Labour councillors? Was not the Tory Reform Group correct when it described the poll tax proposals as neither Conservative in concept nor sensible in application?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman might be glad to know that I have announced today proposals which will allow the minority of businesses that might face significant increases in rate bills five years to adjust to the new rate levies and that, where increases in the valuation are greatest, we shall postpone some of the increase in value to the next revaluation period.

Homelessness

11. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the rate of homelessness (a) in 1978 and (b) at the latest available date for which figures are available.

Mr. John Patten: English local authorities accepted responsibility for finding accommodation for 53,100 households in 1978 and for 103,000 in 1986. Over the same period the total housing stock has grown by 1·4 million while the number of households is estimated to have grown by only 1·25 million. Therefore, the overall supply of housing has improved.

Mr. Skinner: In the last few weeks the Government have discovered that public money thrown around reaches those parts of the electorate that monetarism cannot reach. Why do they not tell the local authorities to use the £7·5 billion from the receipts of council house sales to build some homes and provide some shelters for the homeless? The Government do not do that because they have a cynical disregard for the homeless, some of whom are not on the register and therefore, the Government do not have to worry about their votes.

Mr. Patten: If the hon. Gentleman had due regard for the needs of the homeless he would go to a local authority close to Bolsover, such as Manchester, and ask it why it is keeping 5,000 of its houses empty and why it has failed to collect £6 million in rents to help fill those homes.

Mr. Corbyn: Is the Minister aware that in London several hundred people are forced to sleep on the streets because they have nowhere to live? Is he aware that people placed in bed-and-breakfast accommodation by local authorities are being evicted to make way for the tourist trade? Is he further aware that Tower Hamlets council is trying to evict 140 Bangladeshi families from bed-and-breakfast accommodation? Does he not think that the level of homelessness in the major cities is an absolute scandal and warrants immediate and urgent action by the Government to ensure that everyone in the country gets a roof over his head that he can afford?

Mr. Patten: I am not responsible for the activities of loony Liberal Tower Hamlets council. However, I am responsible for drawing to the attention of the hon. Gentleman the fact that there are about 30,000 empty council houses in London that could and should be used by Labour-controlled local authorities to house the homeless.

Tree Planting

12. Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total cost of all the tree planting funded directly or indirectly by his Department in 1985; what percentage of the trees have survived; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Department funds the Countryside Commission, which paid £1·6 million in conservation grants, principally for tree planting, in 1985-86. A sample of trees planted previously with commission aid showed a median survival rate of 77 per cent. Planting by the Department directly during 1985 in the royal parks totalled some £50,000.

Mr. Lord: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. I am sure he appreciates that it is not the number of trees that are planted that is important, but the number that survive. Is he aware that in order to get the maximum number of trees to survive it is important that sufficient is spent on maintenance and not just on planting? I urge him to ensure that, however much tree planting is done, the right balance is maintained between maintenance and planting so that we can get the maximum survival rate, so as to beautify our countryside.

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is quite right. The Countryside Commission survival rate figures are not bad. What my hon. Friend says will have to be taken into account in, for example, any new farm planting schemes.

Mr. Chapman: In commending the work of my hon. Friend's Department and other Departments, including particularly the Department of Transport, in tree planting schemes, may I ask whether he agrees that the real role of Government should be to offer expertise and encouragement to people to plant trees? To that end, does he think that the time is now propitious to have another national tree year?

Mr. Waldegrave: That may well be a good suggestion and perhaps it should be taken forward in the context of the work of the European Year of the Environment Committee. I pay tribute to the work being done all over Britain by farming and wildlife advisory groups on tree planting on farms.

Housing Expenditure (Leicester)

13. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money from central Government funding was provided for the city of Leicester to spend on housing in 1979 and 1986, respectively.

Mr. John Patten: Central Government contributions towards Leicester city council's housing expenditure are estimated to have been £45·2 million in 1986-87. A comparable figure is not available for 1979.

Mr. Janner: A comparable figure, is it, because it would show that the amount available has been reduced by at least 50 per cent., thereby making it impossible for the excellent Leicester city council to carry out its duties in providing, maintaining and improving housing for people who need it in our cities?

On a specific point, what has happened to the £14 million that the Government promised would be available by the end of April under housing defects legislation for councils such as Leicester? Smith houses, Boot houses and houses with other defects are placing an immense burden on the council. Money will have to be spent on these houses instead of on the general provision. The money was promised, but where is it?

Mr. Patten: The announcement about the additional sums will be made in due course, to answer the hon. and learned Gentleman's second point. In answer to his first point, he supported the Labour Administration of 1974 to 1979, which made the biggest capital cuts in the nation's housing programme ever—about 46 per cent.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will my hon. Friend exercise great caution in giving any additional sums of money to Leicester? Is he aware that Leicester city council—sadly, it is Labour-controlled now, but it will be Conservative-controlled after tomorrow — has 1,000 empty council houses and 26,000 council houses needing repair? The council is spending £5,972 on fighting the Housing and Planning Act 1986, which gives more rights to council tenants. It shows no interest in council tenants whatsoever. It is twinned with Nicaragua and does not give a damn for the decent people who live in Leicester.

Mr. Patten: I am delighted to respond to the authentic voice of the city of Leicester. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, and with the editor of the Leicester Mercury, who, on Friday 1 May, condemned the activities of the Leicester city council in its smear campaigns over the rights of tenants in Leicester city—campaigns to which the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) gave his support.

State Security

3.30 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn) (by private notice) asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement in response to the statement made this morning by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Sir J. Callaghan) calling for a review by a senior judge of the findings of the 1977 inquiry into allegations about the operations of the security services in the mid-1970s, taking into account information reportedly contained in a book written by Mr. Peter Wright, examining both him and those officers who have been implicated by Mr. Wright or named by others, and providing the means to gain an independent verdict on the past, and to safeguard the future.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Sir J. Callaghan) has today called for an inquiry into recent allegations about the Security Service in relation to the Government led by the right hon. and noble Lord Wilson of Rievaulx between 1974 and 1976.

Allegations of this nature first gained currency 10 years ago, in July 1977. They were summarised in a speech in the House on 28 July 1977 by my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker). The allegations ranged widely, but were to the effect that the Security Service had sought to discredit the duly constituted Government of the day, and in particular its Prime Minister; or that some members of the Security Service had conspired together to do so.

On 23 August 1977, the right hon. Gentleman, the then Prime Minister, issued a statement in which he said that he had conducted detailed inquiries into the recent allegations about the Security Service and he was satisfied that they did not constitute grounds for lack of confidence in the competence or impartiality of the Security Service, or for instituting a special inquiry.

On 8 December 1977, the right hon. Gentleman told the House that Lord Wilson associated himself with that statement, and therefore there was no reason to carry the matter any further. I accepted the right hon. Gentleman's statement and conclusions without question. I believed them, and I still believe them, to be correct.

Early in 1978, a book was published, entitled "The Pencourt File", which contained fuller accounts of these allegations. My hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow) has let me see copies of correspondence which he exchanged with the right hon. Gentleman the then Prime Minister. My hon. Friend drew the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the contents of the book, and in particular to a number of statements attributed in the book to the then Sir Harold Wilson. My hon. Friend urged the then Prime Minister to arrange for a full inquiry to be undertaken by the Security Commission.

In his reply dated 20 February 1978, the then Prime Minister said:

> "So far as I can see, there are no significant statements about matters of national security in this book of which the authorities were not aware when I issued a statement on allegations about the Security Service on 23 August last; I put the statement in the Official Report on 8 December."

He concluded:

> "I have nothing to add to it."

In recent weeks these allegations have been given renewed currency in press reports which the right hon. Gentleman, in his statement issued this morning, says go into greater detail than the 1977 inquiry knew about.

It would not be appropriate for me or other members of this Administration to see papers relating to that time, and we have not asked to do so. I can, however, tell the House that the director-general of the Security Service has reported to me that, over the last four months, he has conducted a thorough investigation into all these stories, taking account of the earlier allegations and of the other material given recent currency. There has been a comprehensive examination of all the papers relevant to that time. There have been interviews with officers in post in the relevant parts of the security service at that time, including officers whose names have been made public.

The director-general has advised me that he has found no evidence of any truth in the allegations. He has given me his personal assurance that the stories are false. In particular, he has advised me that all the security service officers who have been interviewed have categorically denied that they were involved in, or were aware of, any activities or plans to undermine or discredit Lord Wilson and his Government when he was Prime Minister. The then director-general has categorically denied the allegation that he confirmed the existence within the security service of a disaffected faction with extreme Right-wing views. He has further stated that he had no reason to believe that any such faction existed. No evidence or indication has been found of any plot or conspiracy against Lord Wilson by or within the security service.

Further, the director-general has also advised me that Lord Wilson has never been the subject of a security service investigation or of any form of electronic or other surveillance by the security service.

The right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth, in a statement he issued on 22 March this year, declared that he had every confidence in the integrity and ability of the present director-general of the Security Service. So have I. I accept the assurance and the advice which he has given me.

This latest investigation, taking account of recently published material, confirms the conclusions reached and announced by the right hon. Gentleman in 1977, which I then accepted without question. That was in accordance with the tradition of bipartisan Front Bench support for the security and intelligence services and the work that they do. Like the right hon. Gentleman in 1977 and again in 1978, I do not propose to institute any other inquiry into these matters. In the light of the director-general's assurance and advice, I do not believe that any further inquiry would be justified.

So, once again, as in 1977, detailed inquiries have confirmed the conclusion that there are no grounds for lack of confidence in the competence or impartiality of the Security Service or for instituting a special inquiry.

It is time to stop raking over the embers of a period over 10 years ago and to assert confidence, as I readily do, in the Security Service's strict adherence to the directive under which it carries out its duties, and in its skill and loyalty in carrying out the tasks which it is called upon to undertake in the defence of our security and freedom.

Mr. Kinnock: I share the confidence that the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Sir J. Callaghan) have in the director-general of the Security Service and in his efforts in conducting an internal inquiry and examination into these matters, including the references to recently available information. That is all the more reason for thinking that there is nothing at all to fear from an independent review of that inquiry by a judge.

When my right hon. Friend, who was Prime Minister at the time of the 1977 inquiry, now seeks a review of that inquiry because there is, as he says, a direct conflict of evidence, it is unreasonable, unjust and unwise of the Prime Minister not to make a positive response to that very serious request. Does not the Prime Minister realise that such a refusal can only fuel suspicions of every description and that the resulting circumstances will not assist national security or the people engaged in maintaining national security?

Why does not the Prime Minister accept that allegations and assertions of criminal activity or criminal intentions that, as my right hon. Friend has said, go into greater detail than the 1977 inquiry knew about, have a significance which does not end with a change of Government or the passage of years? Why does not the Prime Minister recognise that those allegations and assertions—whether they relate to people still working or now retired, or to people living or dead—can do no good for either the reputation or the morale of the services and, therefore, must be dealt with in the manner suggested by my right hon. Friend in order to establish whether Peter Wright's version of events is fact, falsehood, fantasy, or a concoction of all three?

Mrs. Thatcher: If the right hon. Gentleman accepts the integrity and loyalty of the director-general of the service, he should accept his advice. There has never been such a detailed statement as I have made. I have tried always to make detailed statements, going further than any previous Prime Minister. When the previous Labour Prime Minister made a statement about the Security Service, he knew that he could rely upon the bipartisan support of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. I wish we could do so today.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that her very full statement will be warmly welcomed by Government Members, as will the decision? If in spite of my request in my speech on 28 July 1977 and, as the former Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Leeds, South and Morley (Mr. Rees) has asserted, the inquiry then conducted was narrow and went into the allegations of bugging only and not into the wider allegations, all of which are referred to, does not that show that there must have been incompetence, negligence or a cover-up by that Government?

Mrs. Thatcher: My right hon. Friend has heard the very detailed statement I have made. I have confidence in the director-general of the Security Service and in the Security Service. I believe that the majority of people have more confidence in the Security Service of this country than in some of the politicians in the Opposition who try to undermine the service.

Sir James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I am very grateful to the Prime Minister that the statement I issued this morning has given her the opportunity to tell us about the director-general's investigation. I ask her whether she would have told the House about that if I had not issued that statement. It is all very well for her to be convinced about these matters and for me to be convinced about them, but it is important also that the public should have confidence in the service.

What the right hon. Lady has said this afternoon will have gone some way to reassuring the public about what has happened. What I have said in my statement is quite clear: there is a direct conflict of evidence between what Mr. Peter Wright has said and what I was told by the director-general of the Security Service in 1977. I have my own view about whom I believe, and I have expressed that in my statement by saying that, strangely enough, Mr. Wright has offered no explanation for his failure to come forward in 1977 to tell the inquiry what he then knew, despite a public invitation that I issued to witnesses to do so. So I have my own view about the situation.

In my judgment, it would be much better to clear the matter out of the way so that there can be public confidence, and the Security Service may know that it has confidence. If there were to be an independent inquiry from outside the Security Service, I believe I know what conclusion would be reached. Because of that, and because I certainly have nothing to fear from such an inquiry, I believe that the right hon. Lady is missing a very good opportunity both to close an unhappy chapter and to open a fresh one.

I beg the right hon. Lady not to close her mind to that even now. If she does not do so, these allegations, and in some cases inventions, about the Security Service will carry on and the contents of the book will continue to be dribbled out in one country or another. Every time that happens there will be a fresh spate of allegations and charges. The Security Service and everybody else will still rest under those allegations. The right hon. Lady is stubborn in not yielding to the suggestion that an independent group should consider these matters objectively, and report to her and to the House.

I believe that my next suggestion will carry with me some Conservative Members who are chuntering: the Government should also consider for the future some oversight body which would review the work of the service, its targeting, its management, its structure and its staff counselling—and if anything was needed, goodness knows, that is. The right hon. Lady did not refer to that.

Is the right hon. Lady aware that she has given a partial reassurance by the statement she has made which was drawn out of her by my press comment this morning? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Yes. I ask the right hon. Lady once again to consider whether she cannot on some occasions be wrong. Would it not be better for her to accept some good natured and well intentioned advice that is offered to her?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for saying that, in his view, my statement goes, in his words, some way to reassure. I believe that for reasonable people it will go the whole way to reassure. Secondly, when the right hon. Gentleman was responsible for the security services, on that day 10 years ago when he appeared at this Dispatch Box and answered, he refused to institute an inquiry. He was right to refuse, and he knows that he was right to refuse. That is the tragedy of it. He knows that tradition has been for all Prime Ministers to refuse such requests. Let me quote Harold Macmillan:

> "It is dangerous and bad for our general national interest to discuss these matters. Otherwise we would risk destroying services which are of the utmost value to us."

[The Prime Minister]

That, I believe, is correct.

Ten years ago the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Sir J. Callaghan) made a much shorter statement than mine. He was right not to allow an inquiry then. If every Prime Minister says, "This is the result of my inquiry; I will not have a further inquiry," and 10 years later reopens the matter, there will be no assurance whatsoever in anything said from this Box.

Sir Humphrey Atkins (Spelthorne): Does my right hon. Friend accept that those hon. Members on both sides of the House who know the present director-general will agree with her and with the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Sir J. Callaghan) that he is a man of exceptional intelligence and integrity? Has she had any communication from the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth about whether, if the inquiry were held in private—I assume that that is what he wishes—those who share the Opposition Benches with him would accept the result of the inquiry?

The Prime Minister: Some people would never be satisfied and would go on raising matters again and again. Some people—I totally exclude the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Sir J. Callaghan) from this—wish to undermine the security services. This is their way of doing it. I have made it clear that I do not intend to institute a further inquiry. It is not necessary; it is not justified.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): If Parliament is to accept that the security services return to the previous situation when there were no questions and debates in the House, surely it has to be satisfied as to its objective scrutiny. Is not that the fundamental point? Will the Prime Minister at least look deeper into the more profound matter of parliamentary scrutiny of the security services? If she were to give a little ground over that matter, on which there is a great deal of bipartisan support, many of us—I can speak only personally—would accept the word and integrity of the present director-general. He does not come from the security services and, to that extent, is outside it. I personally accept his judgment on this particular, though narrow, issue.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for what he said about accepting the assurance of the director-general and, therefore, accepting what I have said from the Dispatch Box. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary dealt with the other matter from the Dispatch Box, in reply to a debate on security matters.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): Bearing in mind the contrast between the position taken by the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Sir J. Callaghan) when he had all the power and authority of a Prime Minister—I was content to accept that fact at the time—and his equivocal attitude now, does my right hon. Friend think that the only possible explanation is that he has unhappily been leaned on by a shadow Cabinet that is desperate for some political advantage?

The Prime Minister: I have said that I accept the advice that I have been given. I take the opportunity of reasserting total confidence in the Security Service. I have nothing further to add.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): The Prime Minister has reminded the House that, in July 1977, two articles appeared in The Observer and thus were public knowledge. They were mentioned on the Floor of the House by the right hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) and, I believe, two other hon. Members. The matters that were raised on the Floor of the House and were inquired into were public knowledge. If there is nothing new in Mr. Wright's book, why not let it be published?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is well aware that, if we did not contest the case of a former member of the service who, owing a lifelong duty of confidentiality to the Crown, wished to give an account of anything it suited him to say, there would be no security services left in the kingdom.

Sir Edward Gardner (Fylde): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that all the events that are the subject of the present allegations took place under a Labour Government and were inquired into by a Labour Prime Minister, and that all the personalities involved were either Labour supporters or even Ministers? Is it not a fact, therefore, that the Government have nothing to fear from having an inquiry? Are not the difficulties of an inquiry that, if it is to be a public inquiry, the interests of the Security Service will seriously be put at risk, and, if it is to be a private inquiry, it is unlikely to satisfy anybody and might be misunderstood as a cover-up?

The Prime Minister: I confirm that the events referred to took place before my time in office as Prime Minister. I therefore have no responsibility for them. I have responsibility for the morale of and confidence in the Security Service, and I gladly reassert that confidence. I had hoped that, in a bipartisan spirit, the whole House would do so, because we owe a great deal to those who work in those services.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I think that the Prime Minister is making a grave mistake in not responding to the appeal of my right hon. Friend, and I still hope that she will, in a few days, change her mind on this subject, as she has changed it already, but what will she and her Law Officers now do about the newspapers in this and other countries that continue to discuss the matter? Are we to have an endless series of prosecutions against three newspapers in this country which are determined to continue discussing the matter freely, as they have done over the past few weeks? Does she think that that will be a service to our security services?

The Prime Minister: There are those who wish to undermine the security services, and they will go on and on regardless of any inquiry. Their purpose is different from ours, which is to uphold the security services. The security and intelligence services deserve our recognition and gratitude.

I have made a longer statement about this matter, in more detail, than any previous Prime Minister. I ask the House to accept it with the bipartisan attitude that Ministers in the previous Labour Administration expected and received from us.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must have regard for the subsequent business of the House. The private notice question is an extension of Question Time, and we have now had over 25 minutes on it. I must have regard to the fact that we have before us a very important debate on Northern Ireland, and that there is a great demand from right hon. and hon. Members to take part in it. We must now move on.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot hear what is being said.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During your Speakership, you have always said that you are a champion of Back Benchers. Is it satisfactory that only Privy Councillors should ask questions on a subject such as this?

Mr. Speaker: Order. There will be other opportunities, even tomorrow, for Back Benchers to ask questions about the matter. I must have regard to other hon. Members. This is not the only important topic that hon. Members wish to discuss.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): You will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that the mood is very bitter over what is seen by some of my colleagues as an attempt at a cover-up. It seems an abuse to the House that many of the Back Benchers who have been most prominent in the investigations and inquiries which have led to today's statement have been denied the opportunity to ask supplementary questions. I think that you should reconsider your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The whole House knows that for private notice questions I normally allow no more than 15 minutes. This is an extension of Question Time. If it had been a statement, it would be a different matter. I have to have regard for all hon. Members in this House. I appreciate that this is a matter of much interest to many hon. Members, but there will be other opportunities to discuss it. The House may not have another opportunity for an Irish debate.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the point of order of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to place on record how much I regret the fact that today I was not allowed to ask the Prime Minister a question.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. For some weeks my hon. Friends and I have felt strongly that we have been gagged, though not by you, and that we have been unable to make the points that we wanted to make arising from the very serious allegations in Mr. Wright's book. It is a shame and a scandal that hon. Members are being gagged and that they cannot raise matters that should be raised as part of their parliamentary duty. The Prime Minister has made a statement today. It may be that she was most reluctant to make it, but not a single Member who was not a Privy Councillor was called from this side of the House. If serious allegations are being made — and they will continue to be made — surely Members of Parliament have the right to use every opportunity to question the Prime Minister. We are being gagged.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that he is not being gagged. There will be other opportunities, at Prime Minister's Question Time, to ask questions. If any right hon. or hon. Members feel that they are being gagged, it may be the Ulster Members, who have an equal right to the time of this House.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You have helpfully said that there will be oher opportunities to raise the matter. Would it be in order now for an hon. Member to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20 so that it may be dealt with as an urgent matter?

Mr. Speaker: I have had no application today for the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20. Questions are put to the Prime Minister twice every week. Arising out of her statement today, there will be plenty of opportunities for Back Benchers to ask further questions on the matter.

Mr. Dalyell: May I formally move, Mr. Speaker, the Adjournment of the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to have regard for every hon. Member, and I have to be fair to the whole House. This is a day on which we have an important Irish debate. The Ulster Members are back with us, and they have an equal claim to the time of this House.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I listened with respect, Mr. Speaker, to what you said. All hon. Members welcome back the Ulster Unionists. We never asked them to leave, but, as I say, we welcome them back.

There is a precedent which I call to your mind. When Lord Wilson was Prime Minister, we had a debate on the Crown Agents which arose from a statement that was made on the Floor of the House. There was no opportunity to make an application to the then Speaker, as would have been the practice. Mr. Speaker allowed the then Member of Parliament for Penistone, Mr. John Mendelson, to move his Standing Order No. 9, as it then was, so that the House could debate the statement that had been made. Because of that precedent, and in view of what you have said to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), I ask you at least to allow him to move his motion and then to reach your decision.

Mr. Speaker: I have received no application under Standing Order No. 20.

Mr. Foulkes: You have, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Where is it? [HON. MEMBERS: "Here it comes."] Application under Standing Order No. 20, the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell).

Mr. Dalyell: I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the refusal of the Prime Minister to initiate an independent inquiry."

I have first to persuade you, Mr. Speaker, that the matter is urgent. It is self-evident, from the attitude of the House, that this subject will not go away and that it will have to be discussed before the general election.

Secondly, I have to persuade you that it is important. The Prime Minister left a number of gaps in her statement. Some of us are very concerned about our former colleagues—for example, about the forged bank account of Lord Glenamara, who was Ted Short. The Prime Minister will not even refer that matter to the Security Commission. In the absence of a public inquiry, some of us would like to debate why these matters should not be referred to the Security Commission under the chairmanship of Lord Griffiths of Govilon. Furthermore, why is it that the cases of Colin Wallace and Fred Holroyd cannot be referred to the Security Commission?

It is very important that we should have a debate, because in public print the Prime Minister has been personally involved on account of the information that was acquired from Colin Wallace by Airey Neave in relation to "Clockwork Orange 2". There should be a parliamentary explanation of these matters. Perhaps there is an explanation. Our fellow citizens have been reading about the involvment of Airey Neave in all these matters. That is an added reason why there should be a public inquiry.

Finally, I have to persuade you, Mr. Speaker, that the matter is definite. We had to wait until this new information was winkled out of the Prime Minister—indeed, chiselled out of her—by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Sir J. Callaghan), who had every justification for saying that, until he made his statement, the House of Commons and the British people would have been told little about it. There is much new information. If, therefore, it is to be treated properly, Parliament ought to have a debate on the matter.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the refusal of the Prime Minister to initiate an independent inquiry."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Member has said, but I regret that I do not consider the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20. I cannot therefore submit his application to the House.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would you care to contemplate, Sir, why some hon. Members are less entitled to raise points of order than others? I was on my feet for 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is very frequently called on points of order.

BILL PRESENTED

Secretary of State for Education and Science (Qualifications for Office)

Mr. Barry Sheerman, supported by Mr. Terry Davis, Mr. Frank Dobson, Mr. Allan Roberts, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. Willie W. Hamilton, Mr. Dennis Canavan, Mr. Roland Boyes, Mr. George Park, Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse, Mr. Allen McKay and Mr. Allan Rogers, presented a Bill to provide that no person shall be appointed to the office of Secretary of State for Education and Science whose children are being, or have been, educated at private schools: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 May, and to be printed. Bill [151.]

Ordered,

That the draft Water (Fluoridation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Job Release Act 1977 (Continuation) Order 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Ryder.]

Freedom of Information

4.9 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to repeal section 2 of the Official Secrets Act and institute a right of access for citizens to information related to the workings and decisions of government, with certain specified exceptions; and for connected purposes.

It is, of course, peculiarly appropriate, in the light of the statement that we have just heard from the Prime Minister, that we should be discussing this issue today, of all days. We have been powerfully reminded this afternoon of the intensely secretive nature of the British governmental apparatus and the arrogance of power that has affected this Government above all others. We need to open up the workings of Government to the maximum legitimate public scrutiny. At present, the presumption is that everything is secret unless the Government graciously decide that the public should be allowed to know. That is the wrong way round. The assumption should be that everything is in the public domain unless there are genuine —I stress genuine—security reasons why it should not be. My Bill seeks to secure precisely that change.

Section 2 of the Official Secrets Act has become notorious. It is absurd that secretive legislation should cover every action and every item that crosses civil servants' desks. The catch-all absurdity of the legislation alone should ensure its repeal. However, the situation is, of course, much more dangerous than that, because section 2 can be, and has been, used by Governments of all political persuasions to cover up political embarrassment rather than for reasons connected with real national security issues. Why did this Government prosecute Sarah Tisdall and Clive Ponting? Why did they use section 2 to obtain warrants to ransack the offices of the New Statesman and the home of Duncan Campbell? Why have this Government made greater use of section 2 than any other Government in our history?

The 12 ordinary men and women who acquitted my constituent Clive Ponting two years ago threw the Government into considerable confusion. Effectively, the jury challenged the Government once and for all to draw the line between matters of political embarrassment or advantage and matters of genuine national importance. The Government have failed to draw that line, and today's statement by the Prime Minister has simply confirmed that fact.

My Bill, coming at the outset of what may be a general election campaign, seeks to challenge all parties in the House to state where they stand on this issue. Do they stand for over-secrecy, which is what we have at the moment, or for the fullest possible openness in Government? In a democracy, surely the answer must be crystal clear. Citizens must have the fullest possible access to information about what the Government and the governors are doing. The British people do not have anything approaching such access at present; they should have it. My Bill is a small step towards ensuring that that happens at long last.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chris Smith, Mr. Andrew F. Bennett, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. Robin Cook, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Tam Dalyell, Mr. Alfred Dubs, Mr. Tony Lloyd, Mr. Ian Mikardo, Mr. Peter Pike and Ms. Jo Richardson.

Freedom of Information

Mr. Chris Smith accordingly presented a Bill to repeal secion 2 of the Official Secrets Act and institute a right of access for citizens to information related to the workings and decisions of government, with certain specified exceptions; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 3 July, and to be printed. [Bill 150.]

Northern Ireland (Security)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Mr. Speaker: Before we commence the debate, I must tell the House that there is a long list of right hon. and hon. Members who wish to take part. I ask all hon. Members to be brief in their speeches so that as many as possible may be called.

4.17 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): I welcome the opportunity to initiate this debate on the security situation in Northern Ireland. Not least against the background of recent events, it is absolutely right that we should be having the debate today. I welcome the fact that right hon. and hon. Members from the Province will be participating. This matter is of great concern to the people of the Province and it is therefore right that it should be debated in Parliament. We know that strong views are held on this issue and that there will be strong disagreements on many of its aspects. That makes it all the more important that it should be discussed in the House of Commons.

In putting before the House the issues involved, it is my duty first to put the facts before the House and to help the House to reach a balanced and objective view of the security situation and of the progress that has been made in these difficult matters. Against the background of horror at one outrage or another — sadly, Northern Ireland has seen far too many outrages — it is understandable that emotions will dominate the debate. We owe it to all those who have suffered and all those in the security forces who have striven to serve their community, to look at the issues as clearly and fairly as we can. All of us who are familiar with the Province know that a series of successes by the security forces can lead to a sense of over-confidence about the early prospect of defeating terrorism. However, while it is a mistake to get too elated by a success, it is also wrong to get too downhearted by setbacks. We have a duty to examine the situation and to base our decisions on the fairest possible assessment.

In no sense do my remarks imply in any way that there is any such thing as an acceptable level of violence. Any murder is one too many, with all the human tragedy that it involves. I make it absolutely clear that our determination is to pursue our efforts until such time as terrorism is destroyed and real peace is restored to Northern Ireland and to the whole island of Ireland.

I begin by reminding the House of the background—the developments in the security situation and the tragic statistics — against which this debate takes place. To enable us to see just what have been the achievements of the security forces, of the steadfastness and resilience of the community and of the direction of security policy, we must consider the progress that has been achieved. Any hon. Member who studies the casualty figures will be struck immediately by the situation in 1972, the gravest year of all, when 467 people were killed—146 members of the security forces and 321 civilians. Last year, there were 24 deaths among the security forces. That is 24 too many, but by any standards it is a vast improvement on the situation some years earlier. The period to the end of March this year was the lowest first quarter for casualties in the security forces in any recent year, although I am the first to inform the House, as it well knows, that since then, sadly, there has been a serious deterioration, a serious level of casualties and clear evidence of a new ruthlessness in the campaign of violence that we face, including certain changes of tactics which we need to assess and to meet as effectively and speedily as we can.

It is right to set those achievements against the horrific level of violence in earlier years and to recognise how much the Province and, indeed, the whole country owe to the unstinting efforts, courage and determination of the security forces to whom we all owe the greatest debt. The problems and challenges that we face should not be considered only against the background of the terrible statistics of violence. We should also assess the progress and developments that have taken place as we sought to resist the campaign of terror launched principally by the IRA and the achievements of that organisation in pursuit of its objectives and the cause that it has sought to promote.

When the campaign was embarked on with all its evil intent, the IRA must have had certain objectives, and it is worth reflecting on the progress or otherwise that has been made towards those objectives. The most elementary initial objective was surely to undermine the morale of the RUC, to spread disaffection among the Army and to create reluctance and unwillingness to serve in Northern Ireland. Another objective was surely to attract ever-increasing support from the nationalist community as well as wider international support, particularly from the Government of the Irish Republic. Twenty years on in that evil campaign, we can see that in each if those objectives the IRA has completely failed.

The RUC undoubtedly faced problems and difficulties at the start of the campaign, but one can have only the greatest admiration for the way in which it has come through that time of trial to be recognised as an outstandingly competent, highly trained, well-motivated police force with high morale, widely respected for the stand that it has taken against terrorism and for its courage and professionalism—a force for which there is substantial support across the community and which has not the slightest difficulty in attracting more recruits to serve the community.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, as I am sure is every member of the RUC, for his tribute to that force. His words, which I am sure are sincere, would carry more weight if his office would occasionally listen to the views of members of the RUC who do the dying for us. He should also realise that he does not help RUC morale, which I know he wishes to maintain, if, as he will be doing later today, he fastens on the RUC discriminatory action which would not be acceptable to the police in England and Wales.

Mr. King: I am sorry that my hon. Friend put his intervention in that way. He will forgive me if I do not go into the second matter as it will be the subject of a second debate. I recall that the last time I discussed these matters with my hon. Friend was in the presence of deputation from the Police Federation which I was more than ready and willing to meet. Members and officers of the Police Federation know that I am always ready to meet them and to discuss problems of concern. Of course I am willing to meet people on issues of importance and of course I respect the role played by the RUC. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks in that respect. My support and commitment to the RUC are absolute—I wish to make that completely clear—and I am fully aware of the crucial role that it plays in the front line against terrorism.

The IRA's second objective was to develop a reluctance to serve in Northern Ireland — the "troops out" movement perhaps—and to create disaffection in the British Army. Anyone who has the slightest contact with the Regular Army and with the Ulster Defence Regiment knows, however, of the commitment and support that exists and of the high morale and enthusiastic response of the Army to the soldiering tasks that it so readily takes on in the province. One of the most encouraging developments has been the increasing professionalism as well as the notable courage shown by the UDR in its extremely tough role.

Thirdly, how well has the IRA done in seeking to spread disaffection among the nationalist community, to isolate the security forces from any support in that community and to have itself increasingly recognised as the voice of that community? Whatever levels of support it may have had in the past, I have the clearest impression that that support has diminished very greatly in the nationalist community. More and more people now see the IRA as offering just one guarantee to the people whose support it seeks — the guarantee of misery and continuing high unemployment. People are more and more aware of the unholy mismatch of a Mafia-type organisation operating rackets in drinking and gaming clubs and bogus protection firms with a Marxist terrorist group determined to impose its narrow views on people throughout the island of Ireland with complete indifference to the views of the majority.

It is worth remembering, when the IRA says that it has some right to speak for the people of Ireland, just how tiny a majority it represents not only in Northern Ireland but in the Irish Republic where it polled only 1.8 per cent. of the vote. To its humiliation, its total number of votes in the last elections in Northern Ireland — the district council elections — and in the vote for the Dail amounted to only 3 per cent. of the vote. The conceit, as the Irish Press said, of publishing a document called, "Scenario for Peace", which the Irish Press described correctly as an ultimatum for peace! The attitude of the IRA and Sinn Fein, is, "We do not care what you think; we will tell you what you should think and we will kill you until you think it." That is the proposition that it has the gall to put before the people, and that is why it will not succeed.

If we look at the background against which it has sought to enlist increasing international support, the reality is that the perception of it as an international Marxist revolutionary group is now, thank God, increasingly prevalent around the world. It may possibly have support from President Gaddafi; it may have associations with other groups around the world; but it does not enjoy the support of any decent, civilised country in the world.

The Anglo-Irish Agreement marks the complete repudiation of the IRA by the United Kingdom and the Government of the Irish Republic, and that has been underlined firmly by the new Government in the Irish Republic in recent weeks. It is a measure of that repudiation by the international community that the House will have noticed the increasing success that we have had in international co-operation. I am not referring just to the supplementary extradition treaty which was passed through the United States Senate with such an overwhelming majority. I am not referring to the new extraditions which have been achieved from the United States and Holland. The House will be aware of the support that we have had from police forces in the United States, France, Germany and Holland.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): The Secretary of State will be aware that one of the Government's objectives for the Anglo-Irish Agreement is an improvement in co-operation between security forces on both sides of the border. Can he point to any great improvement in that? Anecdotal evidence from members of the British security forces would suggest that, if anything, the situation has become worse rather than better.

Mr. King: My hon. Friend takes a close interest in this matter, but to suggest that the Anglo-Irish Agreement was to be a wand that would have an immediate impact of a major, significant early change—[Interruption.] There have been successes. I can point to a steady, growing, and encouraging list of Garda seizures of explosives and mortars which undoubtedly have resulted from increased co-operation. I rely on and respect the advice of the Chief Constable. He says—he is uniquely placed to make this judgment—that the present opportunity is the best that there has ever been for developing close co-operation, which is one of the ingredients which will help in the fight against terrorism.

Some hon. Members raise the issue of cross-border terrorism as though it was the sole source of terrorism and as though terrorism was not originating from within the Province. Anyone who is taking part in this debate knows only too well the problems that are faced in countering the skill, determination and fanaticism of the terrorists in routing them out, even from within the Province where we have complete responsibility in those respects.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): Of course there are incidents in Northern Ireland, but can the Secretary of State give the source of the explosives that are used in those incidents? They come from across the border.

Mr. King: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has made that suggestion, because it is not true. We believe that a significant amount of explosives come from across the border, but we also believe—the hon. Gentleman must be aware of this—that a significant amount are also produced in the Province. We and the RUC are determined to prevent that, but it is a mistake to believe that everything originates from across the border. It is more complicated than that.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East) rose——

Mr. King: I shall make some progress and then I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

In reviewing the present situation I have sought to assess the progress that the terrorists have made in pursuit of what must have been their original objective. I hope that the House will accept that their progress has been nil. Far from making progress, they have lost some of the ground that originally they might conceivably have held. In terms of political progress and inciting greater support in the South, it is difficult to see how much lower they could go than 1·8 per cent. of the vote, and that is assuming that all the people who voted for them supported the more violent ambitions of Sinn Fein. Trapped in the failure of its political initiatives and efforts, it has now reverted to what it knows best — violence and terrorism. The House should not under-estimate its evil cunning and skill. That is a clear warning, and something that many hon. Members appreciate.

What makes it such an evil and difficult enemy to fight is that it lacks any principles or scruples about how its violence might cause horrific casualties and tragedies. One can think of the complete lack of compunction that it showed that one of its mortar bombs might have hit the supermarket in Newry instead of the police station next door. Many will recall the quite horrific injuries that were caused to the small girl who was shopping there. We have seen the most recent confirmation that it has no such inhibitions as the charming and kind president of the Irish Girl Guides was murdered beside her husband, Lord Justice Gibson, at Killeen.

Faced with the humiliation that it has recently suffered in the Irish election campaign and the split in Sinn Fein between Provisional Sinn Fein and Republican Sinn Fein it is quite clear that it has embarked on a heightened level of violence. It is true to say that the level of incidents was rising quite significantly towards the end of last year, but the determined and courageous efforts of the security forces prevented a number of those incidents leading to casualties. Sadly, as we all know, there have been a number of attacks recently and some have led to serious casualties. The House will be very familiar with those attacks.

Against that background I want to explain to the House how we should respond to the present situation. First, I want to refer to security policy. The security policy followed by successive Governments has been to fight terrorism with all the appropriate resources under the rule of law. One of the terrorists' objectives has always been to destroy the courts and exploit the grievances that can arise in such a situation. Part of the reason for the strong international support for our fight against terrorism has been the recognition of our determination to maintain the highest possible standards of British justice when dealing with terrorist crime.

Of course that is not easy. Of course that poses tremendous problems for the security forces and the courts in which, if I may say so, the Northern Ireland judiciary has played such a courageous part. The background to this debate is the clearest reminder of the courage shown by the Northern Ireland judiciary. Of course there are always attractions to try to find some different route outside of the present law. However, we have a very heavy responsibility before we make changes, to be sure that what looks like a quick or more effective approach does not create bigger problems for the future.

An effective response is essential to adapt to the new situation. However, the wrong reaction could all too easily be counter-productive and play into the hands of the terrorist. That is why we are continuing to consider ways in which the work of the security forces can be helped to bring terrorists before the courts. While maintaining fair treatment under the law, we will ensure that if terrorists are found guilty, they are subject to the full rigour of the law. I do not propose to comment any further on those matters now. However, I hope that the House has listened carefully to what I have said and will be under no illusions about the seriousness with which I regard that aspect of the problem.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): The right hon. Gentleman has now been speaking for almost half an hour. Will he now get away from his exercise of rewriting history and making excuses for doing nothing about terrorism? Will he start from the premise that no deaths were caused by terrorism in Ulster before the Westminster Government took over full control of security and that the large death toll in 1972 to which he referred related to the fact that Westminster took over the entire administration of Northern Ireland? Will he stop hiding behind his compliments to the security forces, the judiciary and the various other people in Northern Ireland, who certainly deserve his compliments but who know that what he is saying is simply an excuse for doing nothing?

We came here to hear whether the right hon. Gentleman had any concrete proposals to deal with terrorism. He has said that terrorists will be brought before the courts. One hundred and forty-two out of 156 deaths in my constituency are still unsolved. That is a measure of the power of the courts at the moment. Will the right hon. Gentleman give the courts more power?

Mr. King: I think that the hon. Gentleman decided to intervene before he listened to my comments. This is an aspect——

Mr. Maginnis: The right hon. Gentleman has said nothing yet.

Mr. King: I understand that the hon. Gentleman is particularly interested in this matter. It is a pity that he did not listen to my comments. I do not honestly believe that the House will accept his version of history that this all started when this Parliament became involved.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I have listened with great care to the Secretary of State's comments. However, he will understand that there have been repeated reports, not least emanating from Mr. Colin Wallace and Mr. Fred Holroyd, that on odd occasions our security forces did not operate within the law. In particular, I refer the Secretary of State to The Sunday Times of 26 April. I would like to have the attention of the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. I. Paisley) because I will refer to him. That article refers to the fact that there was a forged bank account relating to the hon. Member for Antrim, North. That information has come into the possesion of some hon. Members. I cannot make a judgment one way or another and neither can other hon. Members. It is up to the Secretary of State to assure all of us today that the allegations made by Fred Holroyd, Colin Wallace and others—[Interruption.] It is all very well for some hon. Members to sneer. The allegations have been made and I am asking a question. If a public inquiry is not to be set up, can the Government assure the House on these matters during this debate, not least with regard to the forged bank account belonging to the hon. Member for Antrim, North?

Mr. King: The House is aware of the hon. Gentleman's tenacity on these matters. I would prefer to deal with the issues before the House. My hon. Friend the Minister of State may make an appropriate comment in his concluding remarks, if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I want to consider the background to certain other steps that we are taking. The fight against terrorism depends on sustaining pressure on a number of different fronts. One of the crucial areas is the interdiction of weapons and the inhibition of weapons supply. As I have said, we are very grateful for the international co-operation that has successfully obstructed shipments of arms from the United States, Holland and France. I am also very grateful for the efforts and co-operation of the Irish Government and the work of the Garda and the significant number of recoveries of weapons, arms and primed mortars that the Garda have identified. I can announce to the House that I was speaking only today again to the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Lenihan, and we discussed security matters. The security heads will meet again very shortly to carry their work further forward.

One of the key issues that we are also anxious to tackle relates to financial resources. Financial resources are the life blood of terrorism and we are taking a number of measures to reduce the funds that are reaching terrorists in various ways. The House will be aware of the recent successes of the racket busting squad set up by the RUC and the recent successful prosecutions of the tax exemption certificates fraud. That is an illustration of a route to funds that we have been anxious to obstruct. We have already introduced new controls on gaming machines. The Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill, which is in another place at the moment, will seek to bring in new arrangements to control bogus security firms, and we have published proposals for dealing with unlicensed drinking clubs. Everyone familiar with Northern Ireland will be aware of the ways in which paramilitary organisations have sought to use those different devices as ways of increasing funds.

I want to consider certain matters that have arisen after discussions that I have held with the Chief Constable and the GOC. I want to refer to a specific measure requested by my security advisers after my visit to inspect the A1 road at the scene of the appalling outrage of the murder of Lord Justice Sir Maurice Gibson. This morning I signed a vehicle control zone order for the road between the border and the checkpoint and that has come into effect forthwith. It is now not permitted to stop anywhere along that stretch and I am considering urgently whether such orders might be made in similar situations on border roads.

Mr. Begga: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. Will he tell the House how many members of the security forces accompanied him on his personal visit into no man's land, between the Irish Republic and Northern Ireland, following the horrific murders?

Mr. King: I do not have that figure available.

Mr. Maginnis: Over 300?

Mr. King: I thought that it was important to go and hope that the House thinks that it was right for me to go and to see properly for myself. Sadly, on every possible occasion, some hon. Members will seek—I can think of them now and have read their comments for long enough to know this—to score a political point, no matter how poor it may be. I would much prefer, and I think that the people of the Province would much prefer, that we deal with security issues seriously and that we do not always seek to score political points, but consider them objectively. I hope that I have the support of the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis)—

Mr. Maginnis: Not for a shabby political stunt.

Mr. King: I hope that I have the hon. Gentleman's support because although it is only one item, it is a sensible measure to take. It is taken at the request of the security forces and I believe that it was the right action to take over one aspect that was concerning them.

Turning now to resources, the House will be aware that, following a period of reduction in the number of battalions in Northern Ireland, two additional battalions were deployed to the Provice early in 1986. Force levels are kept constantly under review, but in view of the interest in this matter I can confirm that that level of Army support will remain for as long as it is needed.

I turn now to the UDR. In recent months we have increased the permanent cadre by 150 posts, increasing the number of soldiers available for operational duties. A new permanent cadre rifle company is already being formed. In addition, yesterday the GOC called part-time members of the UDR on to voluntary permanent duty for the next few weeks. That will provide a valuable immediate increase in the force levels in support of the RUC. The effect is that part-time soldiers, who are available only for a limited eight hours a day, will be available for operations at all times. That will give much greater flexibility for operations in support of the RUC.

The Chief Constable has requested a further significant recruitment of RUC full-time reservists. The police authority for Northern Ireland informed me earlier this afternoon that, in its view, there is a case for a significant increase in the number of the RUC full-time reserve. It has yet to reach a final view on the precise number, but has recommended to me that immediate steps should be taken to start recruitment of those additional policemen. I have given immediate approval for that and recruitment will start now.

In addition, I have had discussions with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence in respect of certain additional support that he has readily agreed to provide, as requested, that will help to combat more directly the present terrorist campaign. In addition, he will be making available additional helicopter resources to improve the deployment and mobility of the security forces.

These specific items are the clearest confirmation of the Government's determination to give all possible support to security forces and to the law-abiding people of the Province in their determined resistance to the evil of terrorism.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman inform the House when those recruits will be on the streets of Northern Ireland?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman knows that recruitment will start immediately. However, their appearance will depend on the speed at which the recruitment is carried through and on the length of training. It depends in part also on whether some of the recruits have already served, whether they need complete training or whether they are available at an earlier date. It is our concern to make sure that those extra resources are available at the earliest possible date. I give that confirmation to the hon. Gentleman.

Rev. Ian Paisley: It will take six months.

Mr. King: Recruitment starts immediately and I believe that the training period lasts eight weeks for the full-time reserve. Therefore, with effect from an early date, additional resources will be forthcoming.

I have given details of certain additional resources and support that the Government will give to the security forces, and to all the people of the Province in their resistance against the evil campaign of terrorism. Everybody in the Province, and in the United Kingdom, can play their part in this. At present, when it is clearly the determination of the terrorists to provoke the maximum reaction, I look to everybody, in any prominent position, and especially to those in the security forces, to take the fullest care and to be as vigilant as possible about their own personal security. Everyone can make that contribution.

This is also a time when everybody must recognise that the security forces serve the interests of the community as a whole. I look to everyone, to all parties, to give the fullest support, without equivocation or qualification, to the security forces in the vital work that they do on behalf of the community. There is no law-abiding person in Northern Ireland who, in the past year, has not seen for himself the way in which the RUC and the security forces have sought to provide protection, without fear or favour, to people of all communities in Northern Ireland. They deserve, and are entitled to expect, the support of all in the work that they do.

Of course, there is another way in which everybody can help. When the RUC faces the security and terrorist threats that it does, it is entitled to look for maximum support, and for the avoidance of additional problems in the area of public order. Every additional policeman, who has to become involved in public order duties, is one less policeman able to stand in the fight against terrorism. It is clear that one thing that terrorists will seek to do is to provoke public disorder, and it is the responsibility of us all to ensure that we do not give in to such provocation.

The Province has shown its ability to rise above the threats and the misery that the terrorists offer. The economic progress that has been made, in spite of the terrorists' attempts and attacks, is an inspiration to people in the Province. However, this is a time when the terrorists seek to frustrate the progress that has been made and to sow uncertainty, distrust and hatred. It is a time for steadfastness and for all responsible leaders to avoid the vacuum of creating an opportunity for doubt.

I repeat that in the current position it is important that we see not only resources coming forward, with the full support of the United Kingdom in the fight against terrorism, but we need constructive political dialogue at present so that people can see that there is a way forward, which is not the bullet and the bomb, but which is through discussion and dialogue.

This issue of security is of as great concern in this Parliament as it is in the Province of Northern Ireland, which has suffered so grievously. The duty that we owe this Parliament and our country is to discuss these issues constructively and effectively to see the best ways in which we may bring peace and prosperity to the Province.

Hon. Members: Disgusting! Disgraceful!

4.59 pm

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): This debate is a response by the House to a series of tragic events—the deaths in recent weeks of two members of the RUC and a member of the UDR, whose offence was carrying out the duties which we entrusted to them; the death of a distinguished judge and his wife, known to some of us for many years, who paid the price of their determination to live normal lives so far as possible in abnormal circumstances; and the deaths of and injuries to civilians who were not even part of the quarrel in which they were caught up.

One purpose of the debate is to enable the House to express unanimously its horror at those events and its sympathy with the families of the victims. There are times when it is important to demonstrate that our whole community is at one in its compassion for those who suffer and its condemnation of those who inflict the suffering. That is one reason, among others, why I welcome the return to the Chamber of right hon. and hon. Members of the Unionist parties. The debate will no doubt reveal differences among us, and that is what debates are for, but that should not mislead anybody into believing that those differences extend to our reactions to indiscriminate murder.

It is important that we use the occasion, not only to record our horror, but to discuss constructively how we can most effectively protect the people of Northern Ireland from what could be an endless trail of misery and death extending far into the future. It is right that we should express our emotions, and we make no apology for that, but we should not be forgiven if we did not also apply our minds.

We should look to see what lessons there are to learn about improving security. It is easy and tempting to make superficial allegations, to find someone to blame, to dig out the scapegoats and to do what we rightly condemn others for doing—to use the loss of human life as a peg on which to hang a propaganda sheet. We need to study at greater leisure some of the matters which the Secretary of State raised today. I add my tribute to what he said of the members of the RUC and security forces who have maintained their morale in difficult circumstances over a long period.

The police establishment may need to be increased, but that is largely a technical matter which some of us may be able to judge only when we have more detailed information. I hope that the Secretary of State will find it possible to broaden the potential recruiting base and that he will address his mind to how we can make it possible, to use an oft-repeated phrase, for a young nationalist to join the police force without being any less a nationalist.

Clearly, one matter which requires to be discussed is the obsession of the authorities North and South with the precise location of the border. No one who has taken the trouble to look at the record can doubt the commitment both of the political authorities and of the security forces in Northern Ireland and the Republic to protect all the people of Ireland from political violence. The new Taoiseach and Mr. Lenihan have made clear their position, and anyone who seeks to sow dissension and recrimination between the two Governments and between the two police forces is doing no service to the cause of security.

But there have been sensitivities about the exact position of the border which are not shared by the paramilitaries. The maintenance of a no man's land is perhaps not a model for international co-operation in the last two decades of the 20th century. I hoped to hear more from the Secretary of State about the arrangements made by the two police forces for their mutual co-operation. We have still not been told why someone known to be at risk was left by the Gardai escort on the border with no arrangements for him to be met by an RUC escort until he had travelled three quarters of a mile unescorted. There may be a reason, but that necessarily raises the question whether the demarcation procedures may not have assumed excessive importance in two forces engaged together in the same purpose.

Perhaps we should explore whether the operational units engaged in security work may be made responsible to a single directorate. I am not suggesting an all-Ireland police force, although that idea does not shock me; I am asking whether it is not possible for the two forces to work as one for a specific purpose on which the two Governments are at one.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that it is, if not conventional, at least frequently the case, that a car bringing a distinguished person from the South into no-man's land is met by another car coming from the North, that radio contact is established between the two before either car moves into the no-man's land and that the two cars line up alongside each other so that the distinguished person can step from one to the other in a split second? The pertinent question is why that did not happen for Judge Gibson.

Mr. Archer: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that that is a relevant question and one to which I hope we shall in due course have an answer.

That seems a more effective kind of question and perhaps a more effective proposal than one for directing more troops into Northern Ireland. The latter is an easy suggestion to make for anyone who wants to demonstrate concern, but I doubt whether it will commend itself to those who are at the sharp end of responsibility for law enforcement in Northern Ireland. For some years, there has been agreement that policing duties are best carried out by the police and that members of the armed forces should normally be held back in barracks unless they are needed for back-up. No one who has proposed sending more troops to Northern Ireland has said what they would do or what purpose would be served by having them simply waiting around in barracks.

There is another reason why that suggestion is not likely to be effective. British troops are not popular in many districts of Northern Ireland. We may argue about the reasons for that and the mistakes that may have been made in the past, but increasing the presence of military vehicles or adding to the areas where people looking out of their windows see a barracks is not likely to encourage public support for law enforcement.

Indeed, I had it put to me last weekend that, if the proper concern of members of the Unionist parties is to protect Protestant people from nationalist paramilitaries, no contribution is made to that objective by flooding nationalist areas with military vehicles.

Mr. Beggs: I should like the right hon. and learned Gentleman to understand that we are here as Unionists to ensure that security is improved for all people. We are not protesting about bad security to get better security for Protestants than for nationalists, but to improve security for all the people of Ulster.

Mr. Archer: I would not seek to dispute what the hon. Gentleman has said. I was only pointing out that if the purpose is to protect the people of one area, who, usually, unhappily, in many parts of Northern Ireland are of one community, from paramilitaries in the other community, no great purpose is served by flooding a different area with military vehicles. That was my point.

We should be exploring how more effectively we can improve security. Perhaps a degree of light in that respect is worth a great deal of heat.

The debate can serve a further purpose. It should not simply be a technical discussion about how to tighten security, still less a competition for nominating scapegoats. However we improve security, no-one will win. However many paramilitaries are detected, and convicted and imprisoned, quite properly, there will always be a reserve of young potential recruits, until we transform the world into which they are born, resolve the quarrels on which they are nurtured and deal with the grievances of the communities in which they live. If we are serious about ending the violence and offering families in Northern Ireland a secure existence, we cannot avoid addressing those wider questions.

I make no excuse for those who murder, and no one who knows me could believe that I would. I simply point out that they believe and seek to persuade those who are receptive that they are taking part in a war. If we respond with an analysis which accepts that what is happening is simply a physical struggle, we play directly into their hands. It is also a battle for hearts and minds, and we do not win hearts and minds by shouting slogans.

Last week the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon), in a wise and thoughtful intervention, pointed out that one important aim of the paramilitaries is to provoke the authorities into the sort of punitive reaction that would enable them to complain and to evoke a response among the communities on whose support they depend. What I believe was in the mind of the hon. Gentleman was that the security forces have to be told that there are certain measures which they cannot carry out with impunity because one cannot defend the rule of law by risking exceeding the fringes of the rule of law. I believe he is right.

This is not the occasion to develop that theme in detail. We discussed it in our debates on the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill. If we are to win the battle for hearts and minds, we have to persuade people, particularly young people, in Northern Ireland that it is possible to build without destroying. A simplistic analysis in terms of winning a war is not enough.

Some months ago I talked with some Protestant teenagers in Belfast, who told me three things. First, they said that they hated Catholics. When I asked on what experiences they based their antagonism, it transpired that not one of them had ever met a Catholic. They were segregated where they lived. They were segregated at school.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Nonsense.

Mr. Archer: The hon. Gentleman says, "Nonsense." I met them; he did not. If he does not believe that there are areas where that happens, he does not know Belfast, let alone the rest of Northern Ireland. I am not talking about just one side of the sectarian divide. I have had similar experiences on the other side. They were segregated where they lived; they were segregated at school; they were segregated in their leisure activities. They did not meet Catholics where they worked because they did not have any work. The word "Catholic" was simply a label.

Then, they told me that they were attracted to armed violence. When I asked them what they thought they had to gain by taking up the gun, they asked me what they had to lose. They said that they had no jobs, no future, that they were just hanging around in that dump and why should they not take up the gun. Anyone who does not believe that there are teenagers in Northern Ireland who take that view is simply not living in the real world.

I would like to try to answer their question, and I hope that it will go out as not just my answer but as the unanimous answer of this House. It is intended not just for those Protestant teenagers because, as I said, I have heard similar reactions from those on the other side of the divide. I say two things to those young people. First, if we have a dream to fight for, a dream of anything that is worthwhile, it must be of a future where neighbour can live alongside neighbour, where people build together for the good of everyone and where people's energies are directed to creating prosperity in which everyone will have a share. No other dream is worth having, still less fighting for.

There is no way in which that sort of future can be created by terrorising people, by destroying what others are trying to build, by driving away investment or by perpetuating quarrels. Exchanging grudge for grudge, or reprisal for revenge, into eternity cannot lead to the realisation of a dream; only to a nightmare. We do not create freedom by shooting those who disagree with us and we do not bring about justice by arrogating to ourselves the right to decide who should live and who should die.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): With no right of appeal.

Mr. Archer: With no right of appeal, as my right hon. Friend said. I am sure that anyone who knows Northern Ireland understands why the folk heroes of 50 years ago were prepared to take up the gun. But their guns have not created a dream world. Even in the Republic the feuds and the politics of the past still distort the politics of the present and frustrate the politics of the future. That is my first answer to those teenagers.

Secondly, I say to them that they do not have to resort to murder. It is possible to realise a dream through constitutional, democratic politics. Our generation may not have set a very encouraging example, but there is hope within the system. Simon Bolivar and Roger Debret may be romantic figures to some of the younger generation, though even they would tell us that there is nothing romantic about blood when we see it leaking out. But in Ireland in the 1980s there is more constructive work to be done by less romantic heroes and heroines working to build bridges, to heal wounds and to improve the quality of life in local communities, sometimes at great risk to themselves, and with little recognition.

I appeal to those who distribute the news. There is a feeling that if people give their time and energy to a resource centre or a community association no one notices, but if they lead a team of bombers their names are in the headlines. We all help to create the folklore which influences those hearts and minds that we have to win. We need to say that there are ways of redressing grievances within the system of constitutional politics. But if we are to say that with any persuasiveness, we need to demonstrate that grievances can be redressed through the democratic process.

We have to make it clear that massive, chronic unemployment is not built into the fabric of the universe. It can be changed. Life on the dole does not have to be dominated by massive electricity bills and the Payment for Debt Act. We may all need to make changes to the style and content of what we have said in the past. If there is to be new hope, we all have to contribute to a new style of politics. In particular, we can encourage the activities which have sprung from the needs and initiatives of local communities.

In the last few months I have visited a number of communities where people from the local area, who do not think of themselves as engaging in politics, give their time and energy to improving life and particularly to giving young people a sense of purpose and a sense of belonging. We should listen to those people. I do not suggest that we agree with every suggestion they make, but in some cases we can encourage what they are doing at very little cost. Some of them have had their funding withdrawn without being told what is alleged against them and they feel that they have been excluded from the consultative process. I have met some of them and I am sure that they genuinely do not know why that has happened.

If the Northern Ireland Office believes that it has reasons to cut funding, it could at least discuss them with those groups. I suggest that the Northern Ireland Office even consider visiting them to see what they are doing. I visited them and I do not believe that they deceived me as to their real purpose. I stopped and talked to people on doorsteps. I do not think that they had any political axes to grind. They wanted to show me the houses where they lived, in some cases because they were proud of them and in other cases because they had problems. They told me about the schools that their children attended, about provisions for the elderly and the handicapped, and about provisions for youth clubs.

The Secretary of State was right when he said that those people have no sympathy for the paramilitaries. There is no base of sympathy there at present, but some of those people were worried about the young. They felt that nobody who was in a position to take an effective decision wanted to listen to them. That is not the way to persuade people that constitutional politics works.

We can help those who are building bridges. We can consult them at all levels. If this debate is about how to combat what is evil, it should also be about how to encourage what is good. There are officials in the NIO who go out and meet people. They are on first-name terms with people in the resource centres and the youth clubs. But we must work at it if we do not want to add to the "us and them" of the sectarian divide an "us and them" of the communities and the Government. I am not arguing for work like that as a substitute for security measures because we require both, each reinforcing the other.

There are paramilitaries who may well enjoy the violence. They revel in the power to make decisions about life and death and bask in the importance that is denied to them in any lawful way of life. They have a vested interest in perpetuating the troubles, and their hearts and minds may be beyond our power to redeem. But they will be isolated if the genuine grievances on which they feed are removed, and if the sectarian quarrels that form their vocabulary are no longer the mainstay of political currency.

We are all part of that problem and we have to share in finding the solution. If we fail to achieve a solution, the blood of future victims will be on our hands too.

5.21 pm

Sir Humphrey Atkins (Spelthorne): We have been asked to be brief and I shall be, but I wish to say two or three things. First, many people will agree that this debate has a depressingly familiar ring. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is absolutely right to draw to our attention the fact that terrorist activity and its consequences in the Province are infinitely less than they were 50 years ago. However, they are still much too common. During the steady decline in the activities of terrorists over many years, there are periods when, for one reason or another, there is an upsurge. On such occasions we have general debates like this in the House.

I am certain that we shall hear from hon. Members representing the Province fearful tales of what is happening in their constituencies. They will tell us about the murder, the explosions and the mayhem and misery that is affecting their constituents. I do not blame them for that, because we cannot blame them. If that sort of thing were happening in my constituency I would do exactly the same. We shall hear about those things again in this debate and we shall pay attention to what those hon. Members say. Every hon. Member wants to try to find the sensible and best way forward, and it is about this that I want to speak.

I was glad to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State talking about the levels of the security forces. It is the easiest thing in the world to say that there are problems in Northern Ireland, that terrorist activity is increasing and that more troops are needed. Some people say that. The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) does not agree with that approach and I do not agree with it either.

I was pleased to hear my right hon. Friend say that he has the support of the Ministry of Defence for selective reinforcements. I note that he is to get more helicopters and specialised troops. That is good. It is no good just having a lot more soldiers about in Northern Ireland, for the reasons given by the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West. That is because law and order and the defeat of criminals—which is what terrorists are—is a matter for the police. It is upon the police that we rely for maintaining law and order, for deterring criminals and for catching them.

I was glad to hear my right hon. Friend say that the strength of the Royal Ulster Constabulary is being increased. It has been increased steadily over many years from the very low and unhappy period 15 years ago when it was almost disbanded. Any of us who know anything about the problems in Northern Ireland know that the RUC is a highly professional force and that no force in the world is more able and better skilled to deal with those problems. I have the highest possible admiration for the RUC. To hear that it is getting and will continue to get the moral and financial backing that it requested from my right hon. Friend is extremely good news.

Every policeman whom I have ever met, and I have met quite a few, tells me the same thing—that he can do his job efficiently and well only if he has the support of the public. The community hires men to put on uniforms and maintain the law, but unless we actively support them they cannot do the job properly. Every policeman knows that. In that area more could be done and more is being done.

I think that at least 99 per cent. of the people in Northern Ireland want nothing better than to live in peace and quiet and to feel safe and secure. Many people may say that I am exaggerating, but I do not think so. About 1·5 million people live in the Province and 1 per cent. of that is 15,000.

Rev William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): One hundred thousand voted for Sinn Fein.

Sir Humphrey Atkins: Does anybody seriously maintain that there are more than 15,000 people in the Province whose sole desire is to get their way by engaging in terrorist activity?

Rev William McCrea: Yes.

Sir H. Atkins: That is most interesting and represents a considerable change from what I was told when I was there by hon. Members who are now in the House. Do they say that there are more than 15,000 active terrorists in the Province?

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): No.

Sir Humphrey Atkins: That is what I am talking about and I do not believe that there are. There is a small number of active terrorists, a lot less than 15,000. Somebody with more knowledge than I have may be able to give a more accurate figure, but I do not think so.

The people who desire to get their way by shooting, causing explosions and killing, and who are trying to do that all the time form a small number. I have said that 99 per cent. of Northern Ireland's people want to live in peace, and any hon. Member who wants to may correct me on that. Anything that anybody can do to harness their good will and desires to the support, principally of the police but of course of any other security force, should do it. The more we or anybody attempts to do that, the better. Who can do that? I suspect that the people who can do it most effectively are the community leaders in Northern Ireland.

My right hon. Friend and his Ministers are not leaders of the community any more than I was when I was there. He is, as I was, the authority, the man with the power to say that this shall be done and that shall not be done. But neither he nor I nor any of our Ministers are community leaders because we are not of the community. As I said when I was there, that was one of the unhappy things about the way the Province was run. As hon. Members know, one of my dearest ambitions was to get rid of that responsibility.

Given that my right hon. Friend is not a leader of the community, who is? A number of people are. Perhaps one thinks instantly of church leaders. After all, almost everybody in Northern Ireland is a Christian, although the people practise their Christianity in different ways. Therefore, the leaders of Christianity are the leaders of the community. From what I now observe in all branches of the Christian religion, the leaders are now moving from the positions that some of them occupied to a position of great support and encouragement. In that context I think particularly of two Roman Catholic bishops that I know, both of whom are giving every good lead. They are to be encouraged in everything they do, and other church leaders must also be encouraged.

The House is principally concerned with Northern Ireland's political leaders who are here now. Therein lies the difficulty, because as everybody knows, in Northern Ireland there is one political question that stands miles above any other. Here in the House we argue about all manner of things all the time — about Government priorities, how money should be spent, what should be done here, there, and everywhere; but the political question that is supreme in Northern Ireland has nothing to do with such matters. It is about whether the Province should continue to belong to the United Kingdom or become part of the Republic — that is the dominating issue.

I suggest that the political leaders of the Province might consider putting that question on one side, for a moment. They should not abandon it, because it cannot be abandoned, but they should put it aside temporarily. Some hon. Members may disagree with me, but a change in the status of Northern Ireland — from being part of the United Kingdom to being part of the Republic — will not happen.

There are two reasons why such a change will not occur.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): It has happened already.

Sir Humphrey Atkins: My hon. Friend says that it has happened already, but I remind him that Northern Ireland is still a part of the United Kingdom.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: I should have thought that when a virtual condominium had been established over a Province of the United Kingdom there had been a change of status.

Sir Humphrey Atkins: If it had been, there would have been; but it has not.

There are two reasons why the change will not happen. First, it impresses me that all members of the Government have, for eight years now—including myself when I was a member of it — been firm in their belief that such a change would not happen. I still believe that; so does my right hon. Friend; and so do all Members of the Government. Some people may doubt that, so let us consider what the change would entail.

Even if the Government abandoned everything that they had said, there is no way in which the Republic of Ireland would welcome the Province as a part of it. Why? Because the Republic would acquire, as citizens, Members such as the hon. Members for Mid-Ulster (Rev. W. McCrea) and for Antrim, North (Rev. I. Paisley), who are dedicated opponents of it. I do not for one second believe that any Government of the Republic would want to add to the three million people that they already rule 1·5 million people, of whom one million do not want anything to do with it. So, it will not happen.

If the political leaders of the Province — from whatever side—could find it in their hearts to leave that issue on one side for the moment and address themselves to the matter that I am discussing, it would be possible to bring everyone together, to have a campaign against violence and in support of the security forces and to seek a better form of government, if that is what the people want. The terrorist cannot survive, let alone do damage, if he does not have the support of more than 1 per cent. of the population. That, to me, seems a possible way forward, if only people would agree to do it.

5.33 pm

Mr. James Molyneaux (Langan Valley): There might be something to be said for the point made by the right hon. Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins)—that we might examine the possibility of setting aside the contentious issue in Northern Ireland: that of which nation we want to belong to. As the right hon. Gentleman used the words "set aside", I hope that he will support me in suggesting that the most effective way of setting the issue aside would be to set aside the Anglo-Irish Agreement, which perpetuates it.

I am sure that most right hon. and hon. Members know by now that it is not in my nature to make bitter personal attacks on right hon. and hon. Members; but I have a duty to the House, to the Government and to the people whom we represent in Northern Ireland to be forthright and honest, in an attempt to ensure that the debate is somehow put on rails if it is to achieve anything in the way of safeguarding the lives of those who might yet be murdered in Northern Ireland.

That is why I must say, with great respect to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, that it would have been wiser for him not to have made his opening speech. It reflected all the confusion and contradictions of his Department — contradictions and confusion that have bedevilled the Northern Ireland Office since 1972. Since that time, the Department has blundered from one gross miscalculation to another. It has spawned one initiative after another, oblivious of reasoned advice to the contrary and to the inevitability of failure.

The real significance of the speech made by the Secretary of State is that his Department has perhaps finally realised that the latest and most disastrous of all the initiatives—the Anglo-Irish Agreement—is now coming apart at the seams. That should be seen in the context of the assertion made by Mr. Lenihan, the Irish Foreign Minister, when he returned to Dublin from his visit to Stormont and gave a press conference in which he said some interesting things. He said that a task force was going to be established to look at security co-operation because nothing had been done so far. Those were his horrifying words; and that is what many of us in the House suspected, but we did not expect confirmation from that quarter. However, that is what was meant by the Deputy Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland.

If the debate achieves nothing else, it may stimulate fresh and more realistic thinking, not only in the Northern Ireland office but in some other Departments of State that have intervened with utterly disastrous results in the affairs of Northern Ireland during the past 17 or 18 years. I hope and expect that those Departments will, after calm reflection, decide to wipe the slate clean and at long last be relieved of all those dreary clichés that were rehearsed by the Secretary of State, as they have been by practically all his predecessors during the past 15 years.

In the debate on the Anglo-Irish Agreement on 26 November, 1985, some ten days after the signing of the agreement in my constituency, I explained that my colleagues and I were opposed to the so-called accord.

That was a strange name for the agreement, because it will destroy any possibility of peace, stability and reconciliation—three words that I thought at that time had found their way by accident into the preamble of the accord. As an ex-printer, I assumed that their inclusion resulted from a printer's error, because it seemed incredible that any rational person could ever imagine for one moment that the Anglo-Irish accord, as drafted, would produce anything but the opposite of peace, stability and reconciliation — because the three are interdependent. There can be no reconciliation without stability and peace.

I am sorry that the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) gave what was, perhaps, unintentionally, a completely distorted picture of Northern Ireland and of young people there. I think that with hindsight he would have to admit that he would have to search diligently in Northern Ireland to find a group of people that would express themselves in the way in which the young people that he mentioned put their views to him. I admit that they could be found in tiny pockets, but they are by no means typical of the young people in Northern Ireland, of either community.

The reconciliation, political or private, between those who wish to belong to this nation and those who want to belong to another would be difficult enough in normal times, but reconciliation and political co-operation are utter impossibilities when the very status of those most involved has been altered without their consent.

In the debate on 26 November 1985, the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition quoted the then Prime Minister of the Irish Republic, Dr. FitzGerald, as saying:

"No sane person would wish to change the status of Northern Ireland without the consent of the majority of its people. That would be a recipe for disaster and could, I believe, lead only to a civil war that would be destructive of the life of people throughout our island."—[Official Report, 26 November 1985; Vol. 87, c. 753.]

The Leader of the Opposition agreed with those words, which were said in the Dail, and so did I. I agreed also with the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) who, when he gave evidence to the Grand Committee of the Northern Ireland Assembly, expressed the view that the status of the people of Northern Ireland had been changed by the agreement. I am not using that argument against the hon. Gentleman, because there is widespread agreement now that that is the position.

Believe it or not, after about 18 months, there is agreement in Northern Ireland on that issue. Nationalists claim and Unionists complain that the status of the people has been changed and that it is disingenuous to argue that in a fine technical sense the actual territory has not yet changed hands. The diktat, the accord, was designed to apply pressure, not to the territory, but to the population and its leaders, who were referred to by the right hon. Member for Spelthorne. The designers reckoned and reasoned that, as the thumb screws were tightened, the victims would give in. The designers should not derive too much comfort from the odd screech from the torture chamber. They must be told quietly but firmly—I am not speaking only for myself now — that those who really count in our community in Northern Ireland have not the slightest intention of giving in now or ever.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman could define more clearly what he means by "those who really count in Northern Ireland."

Mr. Molyneaux: I mean those who are charged with the awful responsibility of leadership. I mean those in whom the people of Northern Ireland, rightly or wrongly, have reposed their confidence. I am assuring those people through the medium of the House of Commons that those of us who have been given that responsibility will never betray the trust that has been placed in us.

It is not our determined opposition to it but the change in status that has made stability the second casualty of the agreement. So do not, please, blame the natives for the uncertainty. The same doubts exist in the minds of potential industrial investors from Great Britain and further afield. They listen politely to good reasons why their new factories should be built in Northern Ireland, then invariably pose the question, "To whom will the territory itself belong in five years time?"

Such has been the obliteration of reconciliation and stability, but uppermost in our minds is the often promised product of the agreement, that of peace. We have had 18 months of the agreement, but we have not peace but the sword. Was it not the promise of peace that persuaded 473 hon. Members to approve the agreement, or at least, to use that blessed phrase that was used so often by so many of them, to give it a try? That phrase has been applied so often to one initiative after another.

Perhaps it is because I am an older hand than my colleagues that I do not share all their views and am not downcast by the result of the vote that followed the signing of the agreement. Being older than any of my colleagues, I can remember the autumn of 1938, when there was a vote that showed that the House can sometimes get it slightly wrong. The first Viscount Simon describes in his memoirs the scene when Chamberlain went to the Commons with a message from Hitler inviting him to a third summit—they were having summits even then. He wrote:

"There followed a demonstration, the like of which I have never seen in the House of Commons . . . From all sides there was impetuous cheering, in which few failed to join, and we adjourned almost at once by general consent."

Later, Viscount Simon records that at the end of the debate following Chamberlain's return with the peace-in-our-time scrap of paper, the Munich agreement was approved by 369 votes to 150. Viscount Simon breaks down the 150 votes—the Opposition will be glad to hear this—and states that they consisted of 149 Labour votes plus the vote of Lloyd George.

Fleet street enthusiastically supported the decision, as did the dominions, and there was even a letter from the President of the United States of America. It is not clear whether he enclosed any dollars as a reward to the Czechs for being so positive, so constructive and so flexible and for saying yes when they might have said no.

The 149 Labour Members who opposed the Munich agreement, plus Lloyd George, were probably lectured on their duty to obey the sovereign will of Parliament, but they did not give in. They preserved their integrity, thus saving themselves the humiliation of the 369 men of Munich who, within six months, decided that the sovereign will of the same Parliament required them to stand on their heads. The lesson of all that would appear to be that if peace is to be established it will have to rest on something less fickle than a mere expression of parliamentary opinion.

Some hon. Members who represent constituencies in Great Britain can, if they wish, continue to regard Northern Ireland as a faraway province of which they know little and care even less. They may find it tempting to rush to the tape machine to check the latest cricket scores and to ignore the paragraph reporting the murder of two Ulster policemen. Nothing that I can say will alter their priorities. However, perhaps I might venture to remind them that they have a twofold duty to their constituents. First, they have a duty to all who reside within their constituency boundaries to ensure that their safety is not put at risk by hon. Members appearing to condoae the appeasement of terrorists, whose spokesmen have stated their conclusion that one bomb in England is worth 100 in Ulster. Terrorists are far more likely to put their theory to the test if Governments and those who sustain them have a track record of conceding their demands, even when they are loud in their empty protestations and futile condemnations.

Terrorists ignore these condemnations or treat them with contempt, secure in the knowledge that their violence achieved, for example, the abolition of Stormont. The then Prime Minister explained that the step had been taken to end the violence. Terrorists know also that the Anglo-Irish Agreement would not have been signed had it not been for the "do something" mood which prevailed after the Brighton bombing. They have not missed the significance of the words of the Prime Minister at the signing ceremony:

"I entered into this agreement because I was not prepared to tolerate the situation of continuing violence."

The recent limited spate of letter bombs was nothing more than a reminder that another concession is overdue.

The second duty of a Member of Parliament is to a rather more limited segment of his constituents, and by that I mean those who serve in the forces in Northern Ireland. Hon. Members are entitled to remind us of the sacrifices of those men, who share the same dangers as their comrades in our indigenous security forces, but every Member has an obligation to ensure that risks are not incurred and sacrifices not made in vain.

The wives, mothers and fathers of soldiers sent to Northern Ireland would be incensed if they knew that the lives of their loved ones are daily put at risk through endless restrictions and instructions which, translated into practice, always allow terrorists to fire the first shot and make the first kill. I wonder whether relatives know that even opening fire in self-defence will be branded as a shoot-to-kill policy. If a soldier who is trained at great expense to shoot with success does just that in Northern Ireland, he is likely to end up in the dock after a protracted investigation by pen pushers behind a desk in the office of the Director of Public Prosecutions, but in any other theatre of war he would earn a medal.

We all have a duty to the members of security forces to put an end to the scandalous practice of allowing them to be used as targets, deprived of the freedom to hit hard against killers on the rampage. Those feelings were recently expressed to me by a young English officer who said: "I don't want to go back. We are exported to Northern Ireland and used as tethered goats." Those are horrifying words. I hope that, whatever views hon. Members may have, they will at least agree that those men deserve better.

As we meet here today, there is speculation about an event which is of secondary importance to the people of Northern Ireland: some kind of general election. The see-saws of opinion polls seem irrelevant to Ulster, where the only figures which count are the number of citizens who will be murdered by terrorists before the new Parliament meets.

The Secretary of State today has given no indicaton of the real determination of the Government who will be in charge of affairs in Northern Ireland and responsible for our protection even after the dissolution of Parliament. From then until the new Parliament meets, a dozen people may be murdered, just as 13 people have been murdered since I wrote to the Prime Minister on 24 March asking her, on humanitarian grounds, to review and recast the Government's political and security strategies and to indicate how much longer she is—to use her words at the signing of the agreement—

"prepared to tolerate the situation of continuing violence."

Any limited increase in personnel or resources resulting from consultations between the Secretary of State and the security chiefs will be valueless unless the Government demonstrate the will to win. The Government must cancel that fatal signal transmitted by the Anglo-Irish Agreement. As long as that agreement is perceived by all sections of the community to be designed to lead to the embodiment of Northern Ireland in some form of an all-Ireland state, the terrorist organisations whose object that has always been will be encouraged to maintain and even redouble their efforts. We need concrete evidence that such a design has been set aside, before further lives are needlessly sacrificed.

5.53 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): The Protestant population of Northern Ireland do not really count with this House. I decided to open my speech with that sentence after listening to the disgraceful, deplorable, despicable and downright insulting speech of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, who said that the IRA's success had been nil. If he thinks that the people of Northern Ireland will listen to such insults from the Secretary of State in this House or elsewhere, he has another think coming. I invite him to come with me—not with 300 troops at his side, refusing to bring journalists with him, but taking a television crew to see his bold escapade on the road where the judge was murdered—to see the people who are suffering tonight. I would like to take him to the home in Pomeroy of the man whom he did not even have the decency to mention in his speech last Monday.

Mr. Tom King: Yes, I did.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Read Hansard.

I would like to take him to meet that man's wife and I would like him to tell her that the success of the IRA is nil. His speech will put a cold shiver up the spine of every Protestant. They will know that what I have been saying to them in the last months is true—that they will look in vain to the Government and the House for any defence or rescue from their appalling situation.

Hon. Members do not want to hear me say some things, but I will say them today. It is 18 months since I made a speech from this very place. We were told on that occasion by the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) that this was the only road. Let us examine that road. The road is crimsoned and bloodied by the lives of our people. It has to mark it not milestones but tombstones. It is a road where the elementary pieces of democracy and democratic principles have been trampled on and it is a road of confusion, confrontation, conflict and war. That is what has happened in the Province.

The hon. Member for Foyle said that this was the only road, but I say to the Government, "Don't try to push the majority any further down that road, for there is an end to the patience and tolerance of those who want to uphold the principles of democracy when those democratic principles are taken from them and they are told that they do not really apply to them."

Let us get a sense of realism into this debate. The Ministers at the Northern Ireland Office call in the media and tell them what the Unionists are thinking and what the Unionists really want. I speak in this House as a representative of the Unionists. I can claim that more than any other Member because I submitted myself to the whole of the people of Northern Ireland and got the largest vote ever recorded for any British politician. I know what those people are thinking. When I submitted myself to the electorate in the referendum by-election, I had the honour of achieving the largest vote of any Unionist who stood, so I can speak for the people who have voted for me and have given me a mandate to speak. Today I will speak for those people — an agonised, broken and bereaved people whose hearts and innermost souls are torn.

The Northern Ireland Office Ministers will say, "We have heard it all before. That is only Ian Paisley or Jim Molyneaux, the Unionists." I will tell the Secretary of State what a prominent clergyman has said. We heard about prominent clergymen from the right hon. Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins). He did not tell us some of the other things said by prominent clergymen. I want to tell him what was said by a former moderator of the largest Protestant church in Northern Ireland, the Irish Presbyterian Church. According to a newspaper report of the funeral of Mr. Graham, the UDR man so savagely murdered in front of his wife and child by the IRA on his little farm at Pomeroy:

"Dr. Dickinson told mourners in the Tyrone village's Presbyterian church, including Mr. Graham's widow Yvonne, that the fact that many members of the congregation live in constant danger made the courage of men like Mr. Graham all the more impressive. 'It also makes the more odious the political conspiracy and moral bankruptcy of those who neither respect the blood of their brave sacrifices or the cries of their brokenhearted wives and children,' he said."

Let the Secretary of State and the House take heed of that. That was said not by a politician but by an honoured ex-moderator of the largest Protestant church in Northern Ireland. He also said:

"The Government at Westminster and their newfound friends in Dublin are as guilty of these crimes as those who actually do the deed."

What makes a minister speak such language? He does so because he knows exactly what is happening. If a leader of, say, the United Reformed Church, which is the nearest thing in this country to Presbyterianism, were to make such remarks at a funeral, what a furore there would be in the House. These remarks are made because ministers are moving among their congregations and know exactly what is happening.

Dr. Dickinson continued:

"And yet again it makes a nonsense of the call of Government Ministers for the support of the whole community for the security forces."

We have heard that today. What more can the Protestant community do to help the security forces? They supply the security forces with the vast majority of their recruits; they carry the coffins and bury their dead. The Secretary of State ought to know that.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), a member of the Government party who, although not a Unionist, probably has Unionist sympathies, was reported in the press today as saying that many RUC officers have a lack of confidence in Ministers and in their own Chief Constable. That too, is a fact, as anyone who moves about in Northern Ireland knows. Apparently hon. Members do not want to listen to the Unionist representatives — it is a disadvantage if one speaks for people through the ballot box — but perhaps they will listen to others who come and go in Northern Ireland and who know exactly what is happening.

The sad fact is that in Northern Ireland today the majority of the people, the Protestant population, have no faith in the Government. They do not trust them because they have found them out in deceptions over and over again. When the people find out that they have continually been deceived, they will turn and utterly reject the Government.

Mr. Dalyell: On the question of deception, has the hon. Gentleman any comment on what was widely reported in the British press about a forged bank account relating to himself? I am certain that it was not he who was responsible. Has he any comment on that worrying matter?

Rev. Ian Paisley: I shall comment on that later because it comes into what I intend to say.

We were told in the House by the Secretary of State even before the Anglo-Irish Agreement was signed that there would be great co-operation between the Garda and the RUC. I think that colleagues on these Benches thought that that was what the Anglo-Irish Agreement would deliver; they thought that at long last there would be a complete coming together of the security forces on both sides of the border, that the fight against terrorism would enter a new phase and that there would be a glimmer of light at the end of a long and terrible road.

I have a confidential document of 3 June 1986, and I shall tell the House how I know that it is authentic. The Chief Constable and his divisional commanders had a special meeting. The commander of N division reported:

"There are many on-the-run terrorists in county Donegal, but no real assistance from the Garda at all."

This was a divisional officer reporting to his commander, the man in whom the Secretary of State puts all his faith, Sir John Hermon. The assistant chief constable for rural W division said:

"There is a shortage of manpower in some divisions; a shortage of cameras is hindering work also. The Garda promised much but delivered little. Border reclosures after illegal reopenings are much too slow in being processed."

The document also says:

"In the north-west of the Province, on-the-run terrorists are training and there are explosives but the Garda is feeding nothing back at all. The Chief Constable stated that it was evident that their capcity and contribution was small."

We are told that there is a great link between the two forces and that the Anglo-Irish Agreement has settled this matter.

The first reaction of the authorities was to deny it — I had just sat down and written the document and it was not authentic, like some of the other documents we hear so much about. The RUC office of the Chief Constable issued a statement that the document was fabricated, that there was not any truth in it and that it was just a figment of my imagination. Then two senior police officers arrived at my house and said, "We have evidence that you have committed a crime. You have a document that you ought not to have." I said, "Let me bring the newspaper to you and read out what your office said about this document, that it is a fabrication." The police officers demanded the document. I gave them a copy, but I held on to the document.

If the Secretary of State does not already know this, he had better learn quickly that he cannot go on deceiving the people of Northern Ireland by issuing statements that are false and misrepresent the true position. All this has caught up with the Government. It is not healthy for hon. Members to say things like that. Pressures will be put on them. My hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) said things about the Government. Why did they get at him? I find it repulsive for the Secretary of State to say today that the police will protect everybody. My hon. Friend said and did things that the Government did not like. The police went to his home and dismantled every bit of security in it. They even cut off the television system that enabled his wife to see who knocked on the door. Then they decided that he would no longer have any protection whatsoever, so they took it from him. They did that for three reasons: to embarrass him, to worry him, and to put an unbearable burden upon him.

The Achilles heel of any politician in Northern Ireland is his family. All of us in Northern Ireland worry about our families, no matter on what side of the House we sit. We do not worry about ourselves, we know what we can expect. It would be easier for certain undercover officers of MI5 to wipe out my hon. Friend when he had no police protection. I shall come to one or two conclusions.

Mr. Tom King: Leaving aside the total fabrication at the end of the hon. Member's remarks, there is not a word of truth in the serious allegation that he has chosen to make. I hope that he will accept from me that at no time have I made any comment about seeking to remove personal protection from any hon. Member or any other person who is in need of personal protection. The hon. Gentleman has made a serious allegation. There is not a word of truth in it. I hope that he will have the decency to withdraw it.

Rev. Ian Paisley: It is all right for the Secretary of State to stand at the Dispatch Box and pass the buck. He is responsible. My evidence is that his deputy, the Minister of State, who is sitting beside him, was involved in this matter.

If the Secretary of State wants to take me down this road, let me go a bit further. Do not let him tell me that Secretaries of State do not deal with the private security of individual hon. Members. I sat with a previous Secretary of State who made a decision concerning the security of a past leader of the Unionist party, Mr. Harry West, a former hon. Member. Let the right hon. Gentleman not say to the House today, by washing his hands in a Pilate-like fashion, that he has nothing to do with it. He has a responsibility to see that an hon. Member is protected. When his security is taken away, that hon. Member is entitled to know why. He does not know why even today.

Mr. King: The hon. Member does not improve the standing that he has in the House by making a totally untrue allegation and by refusing to accept my absolute assertion—obviously, I am concerned about my good name in the House—that at no stage did I make any comment about or proposal for the withdrawal of protection for the hon. Member. He does not improve his position by seeking then to transfer the allegation to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, about whom it is equally untrue. Of course, a Secretary of State, if matters came to him, would be concerned to ensure that hon. Members had proper protection, but the charge that he made, which he is now trying to dodge—he is not withdrawing—is that I sought the withdrawal of protection from his hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson). I tell the hon. Member categorically that his allegation is quite untrue. I hope that he will have the decency to withdraw it.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The Secretary of State should read Hansard tomorrow to see exactly what I said. I repeat that it is dangerous—[Interruption.] I do not care whether hon. Members are nittering. We in Northern Ireland walk a tightrope every day. We are not afraid of a few hecklers; we might be in our coffins tomorrow. We are not worried about that. We have made our decision on the matter. I have made a statement to the House. I am not dodging. I never dodge any statement. The Secretary of State knows that I stand by what I say in the House.

I shall go further. What about the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. W. McCrea)? Do hon. Members think that, after an IRA man has broken into his house, it is an appropriate time to withdraw security from him? Do hon. Members really think that it is appropriate for police to say to an hon. Member, who had a majority of only 70 over the Sinn Fein candidate, and who was a likely target for the IRA to shoot, "You will not get into a police car. You will walk the road from the place where you parked your car, almost a mile, to your home" when renovations were being done to his home for security purposes? The Secretary of State cannot get away from that responsibility. He can say what he likes about it.

Rev. William McCrea: Will my hon. Friend tell the House why it happened only to two Members of the Democratic Unionist party that immediate steps were taken to remove their security and that it was said that it would take two minutes to tell them that they were on their own, facing the IRA conspiracy throughout our constituencies?

Rev. Ian Paisley: All I can say is that truth will out. I made statements in the House some years ago. They were challenged by a Labour Front-Bench spokesman at the time. Hon. Members can read Hansard. The truth is now coming out. The Government and other Governments will be faced with their responsibilities. They are the risks that hon. Members have to take and are taking.

I find it strange that the secretariat at Maryfield has police escorts when hon. Members who are on the danger line are refused them. Is it not time that the Secretary of State investigated why that has happened and at least give us an answer? Why are members of the Civil Service in Dublin given police escorts when hon. Members whose lives are threatened and who have always had protection have had their protection removed or partly removed? The Secretary of State must face up to that and give hon.

Members an answer. I repeat that it makes it a lot easier for certain people to commit murder when an hon. Member is not under protection.

It has been said to me that if I do not do what the authorities want me to do, and if I do not please the police authorities, they will take security from me. They can take it. I told them that. They can take the whole lot; they are welcome to take it. They do not think that I should have protection. I never asked for it, it was given to me, and if they want to take it away, they can. None of us is pleading for this. We are exposing the hypocrisy of the whole business.

I find it amazing that a former Secretary of State should tell us that the southern Government had no intention of taking over our territory. The other day, speaking in Washington, Brian Lenihan—he is co-chairman with the Secretary of State of the new condominium, to which the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) referred—said:

"In the last analysis, there is no real solution to the Northern Ireland problem except in an all-Ireland context."

Unity was the sole aim of the Dublin deal. The right hon. Gentleman said that he did not understand the language, but that he was learning to translate; let him translate that.

Mr. Haughey, when he was opening the forum that the hon. Member for Foyle was involved in getting under way, said that the new Ireland could be achieved only by agreement and consent. That is very interesting. He made it clear, however, that Unionists would not be allowed to dissent.

We who come from Ulster know exactly what Republicanism is, but the House is ignorant of Irish Republicanism.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): It would have been very helpful if those pearls of wisdom had been dropped to us on a regular basis over the past 18 months. In the event of the hon. Gentleman's re-election, will he give an undertaking that he will bring his troops here on a regular basis to discuss the question of the Province, and of the kingdom as a whole?

Rev. Ian Paisley: It is very easy to say that. But if the hon. Gentleman's constituents were being murdered, as mine are—if he were following coffin after coffin, and if he had to lay his hand on the curly heads of children who will never have their father back — he might think differently if the House overwhelmingly rejected the views of Ulster Unionists on the agreement.

I have come to the House since I was elected. I have been as regular an attender as any hon. Member, and have taken part in all the debates on security. This is not the first time that I have spoken on the subject. I worked the Stormont Assembly. Some of my Unionist friends did not work it so hard, but I did. Even the Secretary of State could not deny that. I took part in the process, and what did I find? I found that our people — the Unionist majority — were thrown to one side, and behind their backs this condominium was spawned. Over us are now set the very men who spawned the Provisional IRA.

The Secretary of State should read the Hansard of the Dail. He should read what Neil Blaney said about Charlie Haughey and his cohorts. He admitted that they were in on the day that the Provisional IRA was spawned. Now my people and I are being asked to be ruled by an Anglo-Irish conference. The Secretary of State shakes his head, but I tell the House that the Police Order flows from that Anglo-Irish conference, as does that on public order.

How do I know that?—because we have been told over and over again that it is part of the process. We are moving in that direction, as have the Dublin authorities. We have enough sense to know that that is true, and it is no use the Secretary of State denying it.

What do people do when the Secretary of State and his hon. Friend the Minister say that they know the result of elections, and they tell us nothing? What do they do when they petition Her Majesty and it is dismissed as a useless exercise? What do they do when they ask for a reasonable way forward?

The right hon. Member for Spelthorne, who has now left the Chamber, asked whether we could put aside the question. It can be put aside when the Anglo-Irish Agreement is put aside. Let that be set aside; let Maryfield be closed. The police have enough to do without escorting around civil servants from Dublin. Let the Secretary of State call a round table conference of the elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland to find a replacement for this obnoxious agreement. That is the only way forward. If the Secretary of State is not prepared to do that, we shall have a very serious confrontation.

The people of Northern Ireland are in a sad and sorry state. There is a sense of depression abroad in the Province; a sense of frustration; a sense of doom and gloom. That percolates into the funerals, many of which I have attended. I see a different mood in Northern Ireland today from the mood that I saw five or six years ago. People are saying that the democratic process does not work, and that all their voting is not heeded. Anywhere else, the majority would be consulted. It should be remembered that we were not even consulted about the Anglo-Irish Agreement. I said in the House that I hoped that the House would ensure that fair play was given to those who used democratic principles, but fair play has not been given.

In the Ulster hall on 10 November last year, 2,000 well-heeled men met from across the Province. They came to the conclusion that the Government and the House had not the will to win the war, and that they would sell us down the river. I must tell the House today, whether the House likes to hear it or not, that I have come to the same conclusion, and I believe it more strongly after listening to the Secretary of State's speech today. If the right hon. Gentleman pushes us on down that crimson road, marked with tombstones instead of milestones and littered with democratic principles that should have been upheld, he will find that the Ulster people will not stand for it. There will be resistance unto the death.

If those are the only words that I ever have to speak again in the House, I will have delivered my soul of what the ordinary people of Northern Ireland are saying and thinking tonight. It is not a pleasant thing to say, but it has to be said. I trust that perhaps at this late hour the Government will have second thoughts, and that, instead of choosing confrontation, they will go for consultation and set aside this so-called accord. I hope that they will let us get round the table to try to find a way forward in the proper democratic manner rather than rejecting the largest section of the community and saying that those people will have no say in their future.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): One of the problems in speaking about security in the North of Ireland is that there is always the temptation to become very emotional. I shall try to resist that temptation, because emotionalism can become mawkish and, indeed, embarrassing when indulged in to that extent. I shall try to avoid detailed assessments of security, because, as a lay person, I am not competent to make them. However, I should like briefly to examine five of what I believe to be misconceptions about the security position, and to ask whether we can ever solve the problem, in the short or the long term, unless we get rid of those misconceptions.

The first misconception is that there is a security solution to the problem per se. I do not believe that there is any absolute security solution. If we do believe it, it poses certain questions. First, why has that solution not been found during the past 16 years? If it exists, it should have been found in that time. If it has not, we must come to certain conclusions, the first being that every Secretary of State since 1972 has been derelict in his duty; the second being that every GOC commanding troops in the North of Ireland has been incompetent; the third being that every chief constable of the police in the North of Ireland has been unable to make the proper decisions; and the fourth being that the House has not provided the proper legislation.

Those are the components that are singly, variably, and collectively necessary if we are to propose the theory that there is a solution based simply and solely on security. I do not believe that one can answer yes to any of those questions. Furthermore, there has been no dereliction of duty by any Secretary of State, or GOC, or RUC Chief Constable, or the House. However, the nature of the problem does not lend itself to a security solution. Security is part of the solution, but it cannot solve the problem.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): In so far as there may be dereliction of duty, does the hon. Gentleman agree that it was a dereliction of duty for elected representatives deliberately to have abstained from coming to this House when important matters were discussed over and over again?

Mr. Mallon: I shall leave hon. Members to draw their own conclusions about that.

The theory that there is a security solution to this problem must be put into its proper context. What has been the context of the last 16 years? There has been a very heavily armed Army presence throughout Northern Ireland — the biggest outside the NATO forces in Europe. There has also been a preponderance of Army bases, lookout posts and fortifications. In my constituency alone there is one for every 1,000 people. The SAS, MI5 and MI6 have also been used in Northern Ireland. A very much expanded police force has been backed up by a police reserve that is also expanding, and it is costing £1 million a day to service. Furthermore, there is the Ulster Defence Regiment. Does anybody seriously suggest that the resources to deal with the security problem have not been provided?

Against that background and in that context, it would be a great mistake to suggest that the Northern Ireland Office, the Army, the Royal Ulster Constabulary or this House has failed. The failure has been not properly to identify a political problem or to seek a political solution to it. We should not confuse a security solution with what is essentially a political problem.

Another misconception is that if one makes the law harsher and more punitive, the result will be to put an end to violence and to the commitment of violence. Put in context, the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978 is a substantial derogation from the normal practice throughout western Europe. There is also the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984. Courts decided cases without juries. Supergrass trials have been held. Interrogation techniques, at the request of this House, were examined by Lord Justice Bennett and condemned by him. There has been internment without trial. Certain areas have also been saturated, the main example being a curfew in the Falls road many years ago. When one examines the problem in that context, the legislation is there to deal with it. Indeed, it is much too harsh. One does not cure a commitment to violence by introducing more punitive legal remedies.

I listened very carefully to the Secretary of State's speech and to the words that he used. He should not tamper with the present laws or with the present court arrangements. Furthermore, he should not be tempted to tamper with the remission of sentences.

Mr. Maginnis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mallon: I noted what the Secretary of State said, and I am concerned about what he said. I hope that he does not go down that road.

Mr. Maginnis: Is the hon. Gentleman saying to the Secretary of State, "Be sure that you do not do anything about the legal process in Northern Ireland that would lead to the conviction of 142 out of the 156 unsolved murders in Fermanagh and South Tyrone, because it would not be in the interests of the SDLP that that should happen"?

Mr. Mallon: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has cheapened the discussion that way.

Mr. Maginnis: Answer.

Mr. Mallon: The hon. Gentleman knows what was said during the protracted discussions in the Standing Committee on the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act. He should not interpret my remarks in that way. To do so is to cheapen a very serious point.

We must have learnt some lessons in the last 16 years. One lesson is that those who are involved in paramilitary activities and who have committed themselves to violence can live with repression. They will also try to promote repression because it is their biggest single propaganda weapon. They cannot do without it, because they cannot live without that type of repression. In both propaganda and political terms, repression is their lifeblood. It would be a tragic mistake to provide them with that lifeblood.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): The hon. Gentleman says that punitive measures would encourage the IRA and ensure that it continued its battle, but its success depends to a great extent on the support that it receives in the border area and in many other areas. If that support were not forthcoming, many of the measures to which the hon. Gentleman has referred would be unnecessary. If, wholeheartedly, unequivocally and without any qualification, people gave their support to the RUC and the Army, they could deal with the terrorists, isolate them and put them in prison.

Mr. Mallon: The hon. Gentleman knows that I am suggesting that the IRA and the other paramilitary groupings, which are more numerous than the IRA, need repression. There are certain things that they cannot live with. They cannot live with justice. When they have to live with justice, their own basic injustice is shown up very clearly. They cannot live with equality. When they have to live with equality, their attempts to make other people unequal are shown up very clearly. Above all, they cannot live with the concept of reconciliation. That is their greatest single enemy. The Provisional IRA, the Ulster Defence Association and the Ulster Volunteer Force fear reconciliation most of all, because it goes to the root of their support in the community. Reconciliation tackles their theories about political development, and ultimately reconciliation will defeat them.

A security solution cannot be pursued absolutely and exclusively. To use what has become a glossary of terms in Northern Ireland, we can root out the terrorist. That phrase is used very glibly. We should try to find out exactly what it means. To root out the terrorist means to dispense with the proper regulations and the law and to lean on one section of the community, whichever section it may be in which paramilitary groupings are to be found.

Others would give the security forces a free hand. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) appeared to hint at that when he said that those in the Army felt like tethered goats. Translated, that means that we should dispense with the proper process of justice and involve ourselves in that which is outside the law, even to the extent of summary execution.

Again, some will say that we should strengthen legislation. Properly translated in Northern Ireland terms, that means that one either bends the law to get results, or acts outside it. Surely, given the long period for which we have been dealing with the problem, we know how counter-productive that can be.

If we—and by "we", I mean everyone in the North of Ireland, in the Republic and here—wish to see a solution to this problem that will bring peace, a peace that will bring stability and a peace and stability that will last, the last thing that we must do is start to play the terrorist game. We should never try to play by the law of the jungle. If we do that we shall destroy our chance of achieving the only real solution, which is a political solution. We shall destroy confidence and respect for law and the process of law in Northern Ireland. I have no doubt that if we do that we shall create circumstances in which repartition is almost inevitable.

Mr. Molyneaux: I am grateful for the opportunity to explain what I meant, and I think that the hon. Gentleman knows what I meant. I was not suggesting that the law should be bent to allow soldiers and policemen to go on the rampage. I was simply saying that they should be put on at least an equal footing with terrorists under the law. They should not be required by yellow cards or by any other device to wait until at least one them has been shot dead before they can act in self-defence.

Mr. Mallon: Is the right hon. Gentleman suggesting that there should be no regulations and no yellow card—ineffective though it is ? Is he saying that the security forces should not be constrained by the strict regulations that ought to apply to every person who is legally carrying arms?

Mr. Molyneaux: I am talking about restrictions imposed in the form of cautionary briefings. When soldiers—this applies to the RUC, too—go out on a task they are told, "Do your job. Go through the motions. But for God's sake don't be successful, or you will find yourself before a police inquiry."

Mr. Mallon: I do not want to prolong this duologue, but is the right hon. Gentleman saying that when a soldier goes out on a task he should be given carte blanche to do what he likes and to use his weapon in any way he likes? As I see it, that is the only explanation of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. But if he has a clearer explanation, I shall give way again.

Mr. Molyneaux: I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I do indeed have a clearer explanation. Time and again we have seen examples. When successful action has been taken by the Army against terrorists caught in the very act of terrorism — when the Army has acted effectively — soldiers have been brought back to Northern Ireland, after the Director of Public Prosecutions has tossed the papers around for a considerable time, and branded as common criminals. That is not British justice.

Mr. Mallon: I think that we have succeeded only in adding another weasel word to the list: "acting effectively" is shorthand for killing someone.

Another popular misconception that we should examine is that held by those who say that if only the people of Northern Ireland had control or charge of security the problem would come to an end. That is complete and utter nonsense. We saw what happened before 1972. Indeed, the people of Northern Ireland were in charge of security until March of that year, by which time 167 people were dead. I am loth to draw any conclusions from that statistic, but it must tell us something. The argument that the problem would be solved if the people in Northern Ireland were in charge of security is based on a faulty premise—and, I believe, a very dangerous premise indeed.

Almost as dangerous is the misconception that devolution would somehow end the violence in Northern Ireland; it would not. Indeed, it would add to the violence for a time, because devolution could be achieved only by reconciliation and those who are most afraid of reconciliation would attack it, as they have in the past, to ensure that devolution on a partnership basis simply could not work.

That brings us to the crunch for all of us, and particularly for the British Government. In those circumstances, would a British Government do what they did in 1974 and renege on a properly constituted Administration in the North of Ireland? Would they run away from the problem or would they see it through? We have had a bitter experience in the past. Some pontificate to us, implying that if only we would agree to devolution, we could start to solve the problem.

Irrespective of our political persuasions, we should all expect an answer to the question: if devolution comes and there are problems of violence and security, will the Government here renege as they did before, or will they have the courage to stand up and do what is right? That question can be answered only on the Floor of the House. That question should be addressed, too, to the political parties in the North of Ireland, because it poses a further question. Have we the will and the nerve to embark on a process of reconciliation and to see it through?

That is the challenge for us, the people of Northern Ireland. That challenge exists for both communities—Nationalist and Unionist, Catholic and Protestant, call them what you will. Will they embark on the long hard road to peace? Only by taking that long hard road will we find peace or an answer to the security problems. Will they work together for a new future, or will they stagnate, as they are doing now, in the bloody past? Those are the challenges. Every one of us here has to face that problem. There are no easy answers to those questions, but we shall not answer them unless we face up to them.

Another misconception is that the Anglo-Irish Agreement was a fiendish plot, hatched behind people's backs, to wean Unionists away from the Union with Britain. It is implied, too, that the SDLP—the party to which I am proud to belong, and which has two members present out of this great grouping—somehow hijacked two Governments and made them sign the agreement, perhaps against their will. I thank all concerned for the compliment and for the confidence that has been placed in us, but I assure them that it is not true.

It is time that the House faced up to the fact that the Anglo-Irish Agreement was signed not because the British Government have any great love for the Irish Government or for the nationalist community in the North of Ireland. Pragmatism lies at the root of almost everything that is done in politics. There is little generosity in politics. The Anglo-Irish Agreement was signed by two sovereign Governments because they were concerned about their own interests, which demanded that they take the only course whereby a solution to the problem could be found.

It is not just a Northern Ireland problem but an all-Ireland problem, and it is not just an Irish problem but one with British connotations. It was therefore logical that a solution should be based on agreements between two sovereign Governments because the problem affects both of them. The two Governments belatedly realised that if they were to solve the problem in political and security terms and eventually in socio-economic terms, they had to approach it in that way. That is why the Anglo-Irish Agreement was signed, and it is a very good reason because it is the only way in which a lasting solution can be found. If we are to deal honestly with the political concepts and with the concepts of security, we must get rid of the nonsense and misconceptions and look the problems straight in the face.

A final misconception goes to the root of the Irish problem. It has a historical dimension and it is still with us today. I refer to the fallacy that violence can ever solve anything in Ireland. In 1933, Eamon de Valera said:

> "There is no use in pretending we can solve it with mere words; we can not; nor can we ever solve it by force."

That was the realisation of a man who had engaged in force — a man who became Prime Minister and eventually President of the Republic of Ireland — and one who had the courage to say so. I ask the present Government and future Governments to reciprocate and to commit themselves to the view that the problem cannot be solved by repression or by force, by strengthening repressive legislation or by increasing the police or the Army. It will be solved only when we win the battle for the hearts and minds of the people in a political way.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): This debate arises partly from the request of the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and his colleagues and partly, I suspect, from the killing of Lord Justice Gibson. I regret his death very much indeed, although on the basis of the evidence to hand it may be that by his own carelessness the judge was almost an accessory to his own death. Be that as it may, it is extraordinary that the death of one distinguished judge should have played such a large part in bringing about this debate when the deaths of scores of Northern Ireland police officers have not brought about a debate.

I find the timing of the debate ironic. Today and tomorrow are the very days when a judicial review is taking place in Northern Ireland to see whether the Chief Constable is entitled to gag the chairman of the Police Federation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was good enough, rightly, to pay tribute to the men and women of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and he knows, as the House knows, the great importance of maintaining their morale, yet very few things have done so much damage to their morale as the attempt by the Chief Constable to gag the chairman of the statutory body set up by this House to represent the views of the men and women of the force.

The timing is odd for another reason. Following this debate, the only legislative action to be taken by the House today in respect of Northern Ireland will be a police order —I hope to speak in that debate in due course—part of which is designed to place on the men and women of the RUC discriminatory discipline arrangements which the House threw out when they were proposed for police forces in England and Wales.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will understand that, although I and, I am sure, all members of the RUC are grateful to Ministers for their assurances and words of confidence and support, it is by their actions that Ministers will be judged by the men and women who die on our behalf. It is the actions which have led Ministers in no way to seek to prevent the gagging of the chairman of the Police Federation and their actions tonight in discriminating against the RUC on discipline, that Ministers will be judged, not by all their fine words.

Mr. Maginnis: I did not interrupt the hon. Gentleman earlier as he was making an important point with which I entirely agree, but I believe that he will have annoyed a great number of people in suggesting that the deaths of Lord Justice Gibson and Lady Gibson were due to carelessness on the part of Lord Justice Gibson. I must stoutly defend Lord Justice Gibson. He had police protection and he would have been told time and again that the level of co-operation at the frontier made it a safer area now than it was 18 months ago, although many of us know that that is not true. It is absolutely wrong to suggest that the learned judge, who had served Ulster well, was a primary contributor to his own death and that of his wife. Many people will resent that suggestion.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I think that the House will prefer to leave the investigation to arrive at its own conclusion. I expressed an opinion based on the evidence that we have so far, but the evidence is incomplete and partial.

With regard to the substance of the debate, any English Member must feel very humble in saying anything about the security situation in Northern Ireland in the presence of colleagues in the House who, with their families, live with that situation daily. My remarks will therefore be directed to the only subject in Northern Ireland on which I can claim perhaps some small knowledge — the position of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. It must be said plainly from this House that the present security policies in Northern Ireland are not working, or at least not working effectively enough. They do not give protection to the citizens of our own country there. The Queen's peace is not being upheld.

The security policies that we have pursued rest on two main planks. One, I suppose, is the Anglo-Irish Agreement and the belief that it would lead to better co-operation between the two sides of the border. I supported that agreement. I continue to do so. But so far, the Irish Republic has not delivered its part of the bargain.

The second arm of our security policy is Ulsterisation —the belief that the Army could reduce its profile and that the primacy of the police, which I support, would be sufficient for the threat to security to be contained. I do not believe that the policy of Ulsterisation has worked.

Against this background of the failure of the Irish Republic to deliver the goods and the failure of Ulsterisation, the Royal Ulster Constabulary is placed in an all but impossible professional position. It is being asked and required to undertake not one job but four.

The first task of the RUC is ordinary policing. There is nothing unique about Northern Ireland; it has its share of crime, traffic problems and burglary, although perhaps a little less than many of our communities. Nevertheless, the RUC is faced with the basic task of policing, which should be its primary concern.

The second task that the RUC has been asked to undertake over the past year or so is to contain massive threats to public order. I do not want to go into the background of those threats, but I know from some personal observation that scenes not far removed from those that we saw during the miners' strike in this country have had to be faced by the RUC in Northern Ireland. During those threats to the Queen's peace, its members were placed in some terrible professional and personal dilemmas. For example, it is no good talking about policing by consent or community policing when the police do not have the consent of the majority community, as happened at particular times and places. Policemen also confronted some terrible personal dilemmas, including the fact that their homes were firebombed.

One of the greatest achievements of the RUC is that it has come through that period, with all its terrible personal and professional dilemmas, with the greatest credit. Its officers behaved, without leaning to the majority or minority constituencies, as truly professional British policemen, and I am proud of them; but let it never be forgotten that the continuing massive threat to public order strains the RUC's resources.

The third task that the RUC is asked to undertake is unlike that of any other British police force—to fight Europe's most difficult and prolonged counter-insurgency war. It is not in the Basque region of Spain or in Greece that the casualties of terrorism are at their highest; it is in the United Kingdom. The RUC is overstretched in dealing with that insurgency. The time has come for us to lighten its load.

The fourth task that the RUC uniquely is being required to perform is to guard an international frontier. In the tangled history of Northern Ireland, the RUC, to some extent, came into being as an armed force precisely because there was a frontier to guard. But the time has come when the RUC should not be expected to maintain the frontier between two countries. That function should rest primarily with the Army. One reason for that is that the RUC, when engaged in frontier duties, is confined to virtual fortresses, festooned with wire, from which it is often difficult for the police to move to and fro. They are prevented from doing their ordinary policing duties such as serving warrants and preventing crime. So in many of the border posts the RUC is not being used efficiently. Therefore, the time has come to raise the profile of the Army and to expect it to take on the primary task of policing the frontier. This would release some of the resources of the RUC to engage in counter-insurgency and its many other policing duties.

I turn from this analysis of the excessive load on the RUC to one or two suggestions about what we need to do about it.

First, as I said, we must lighten the load. In the first instance, that should be done by requiring the Army to take over primary responsibility for the border. Secondly, the RUC and its reserve need more resources and better equipment. I was glad to hear what the Secretary of State had to say, although he was pretty vague, about improving the manpower of the RUC. I hope that we will see more well-trained men in uniform on the streets before very long.

I have the benefit of the advice of the Police Federation for Northern Ireland, which has given a lot of thought to the issue of security. On 24 April 1987, it made a number of suggestions. To my surprise, this morning I discovered from the Minister of State that the Northern Ireland Office had no knowledge of these proposals. That would be par for the course since rarely is the Police Federation consulted by the Northern Ireland Office on anything except officials' own proposals.

The federation suggests a number of matters in the operational policing sector, one or two in the legal sector and one that deals with policy. As to operations, the federation suggests, first, that there needs to be "a complete review of the role of the Divisional Mobile Support Units."

I do not think that I need to develop that point because I think that the hon. Members who represent Ulster constituencies understand perfectly well what I mean. There is unease about the way in which the divisional mobile support units are deployed.

Secondly, the federation points out the difficulties that are experienced, particularly in the south Armagh area, with regard to helicopter flying hours. Imagine that—difficulties in Northern Ireland about the number of hours that helicopters may be flown! The federation proposes that the RUC should be authorised to purchase its own helicopters. I believe that that is right. I do not think that the police should have to depend on whether Army helicopters are available. The Metropolitan police has helicopters here; the RUC should have helicopters in Northern Ireland.

[Sir Eldon Griffiths]

The next proposal of the federation also relates to the operations. It says:

"In view of the technology available to terrorist groups, members of the police service should be provided with their own ECM equipment"— that is, electronic counter-measures. It is essential that the police have available the means of detecting some of the advanced mines and other dreadful devices that the IRA have available.

The federation goes on to say:

"In an effort to improve the security of personnel on and off duty," there should be an immediate issue of concealed body armour. I believe that this CBA should be made available to all ranks of the RUC. There has been a good deal of testing of this by the Metropolitan police and many forces in the United States. It can and does save lives, and it is high time that it was made available to officers of the RUC.

I now want to consider the federation's proposals in the legal area. They say the Secretary of State should now consider removing the right of silence under our anti-terrorist legislation. That matter was debated widely during the passage of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and numerous other Acts. I now make this point to the Secretary of State as a straight proposal from the federation. I have not finally made up my mind about it; however, I certainly believe that it should be considered.

The federation also believes, as many hon. Members believe, that the prosecution should be allowed to appeal against excessively lenient sentences. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be aware that this matter, too, is being considered in another place. It has been debated here, too, and the Home Secretary has by no means closed his mind to further action along those lines. However, within the particular circumstances in Northern Ireland, perhaps my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should run a little faster than Home Office Ministers.

Of the 14 proposals made by the federation, I want to refer to a difficult point, the belief of some federation members—not all—that the time has come for selective internment. I am well aware of the many objections to selective internment. We have had it before. There is the risk that it could alienate many people in the nationalist community. However, it cannot be doubted that men are now walking the streets of Belfast and Dublin who have killed, who will kill again, and who have been released. The police know that and the community knows it. There must be a better way of preventing some of those evil men from being prematurely released to kill again.

In addition to providing resources and lightening the RUC's load, it is vital to underpin the morale of the RUC. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was not in the Chamber when I made one or two observations on that point. However, I am sure that he will be good enough to read Hansard. The men and women of the RUC who have suffered so many casualties, who take so many risks and who have received so many compliments badly need very much more sensitive leadership and a better dialogue with the Northern Ireland Office and Ministers.

My instinct throughout my political life has always been to back the man on the job, particularly when we can hear the sound of gunfire. I want to say nothing today that would undermine the position of the Chief Constable. However, I believe that a time comes in the career of all senior police officers when perhaps that officer should contemplate retirement. There has been a series of actions within the force — arbitrary transfers, a refusal to employ women in the RUC reserve which led to vast expenditures of public money on abortive legal actions, the attempted gagging of Mr. Wright, squabbles with the previous commissioner in the Irish Republic, Mr. Wren —all of which add up to a worrying position.

Together with the Secretary of State, I pay tribute to the courage and leadership of Sir John Hermon. I wish him well in his job. However, following the next election there will be a time for new men and new measures. I hope that the Secretary of State, if he remains in his office, will not shrink from taking what may be for him a difficult decision.

I end with a request. We badly need an improved dialogue between the police — particularly the Police Federation—and the Northern Ireland Office. We shall have an opportunity later to debate the draft police order which, in my view, is an absolute model of how not to conduct a dialogue between a statutory body and the Northern Ireland Office.

Over the many years—the House may feel too many years—during which I have been associated with the police forces of this country, I have had the pleasure of dealing with nine Home Secretaries, from both the Labour and Conservative parties. I have been able to agree with some of them on police matters and I have disagreed with others. However, there has always been an opportunity for the statutory body set up by the House to enter discussions and achieve occasional changes to proposed legislation in the common interest. By contrast, during my negotiations over the past two or three years on virtually every subject that concerned the Police Federation with the Northern Ireland Office, there has been no give whatsoever. The Northern Ireland Office has always known best. However,

"By their fruits ye shall know them".

The evidence on the ground does not suggest to me that the Northern Ireland Office always knows best about policing and security. It would be wise to be more attentive and more conceding to the views of the Police Federation. That is the way to underpin the morale of what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State quite rightly described as the best counter-terrorist police force in the world.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker (Belfast, North): Right hon. and hon. Members should be aware that at the present time in Northern Ireland there is a great state of crisis. We have a daily round of death and destruction. It is a matter of the gravest concern that the IRA has been able to carry out its current murder campaign as easily as it has. However, the long-suffering people of the Province, although they are completely disillusioned, will not panic. They have endured such campaigns of terror for the past 15 years, 15 years of inefficient colonial rule. During that time, they have suffered about 2,500 deaths and another 29,000 injured in the process.

If such diabolical acts were carried out in any other part of the United Kingdom, the population would rise against the Government. However, over in Northern Ireland there is a belief that we are now considered to be second-class citizens. Nevertheless, those second-class citizens have the right to object to the continuing campaign of foul murder being perpetrated against them. They have earned that right through their sacrifice in the defence of their country which has now apparently deserted them. They — the ordinary people of Northern Ireland — no longer have any faith in repeated pledges from those in authority to tackle terrorism. Too often in the past those pledges have turned out to be empty gestures.

Those people interpret the platitudes from our Northern Ireland Ministers as expounding the need to shore up a tottering Anglo-Irish Agreement by attempting to portray that iniquitous imposition on them as contributing positively towards the creation of a near-normal situation in the Province. The people of Northern Ireland know that such normality does not exist.

I am here today to tell this House that the hypocritical statements that we have endured over the past week only further demonstrate the fundamental weakness in the present security policy — the absence of the political commitment required to defeat terrorism. The vast majority of the people in the Province are now convinced that the absence of any form of dedication permits what is now known as an acceptable level of violence. There now appears to be a policy of holding the ring in the hope that by some miracle the IRA will be encouraged to lay down its arms and fade into oblivion.

That optimism is not shared by the people who are holding the ring. They know that the IRA is a political terrorist group that seeks to have Northern Ireland expelled from the United Kingdom, against the wishes of the vast majority of its citizens. Its ability to wage war against the security forces and civilians in Northern Ireland and to recruit volunteers depends on the relative progress that is made towards the goal of a united Ireland. The Anglo-Irish Agreement and the diminution of British sovereignty that is implicit within it is clearly seen by the terrorists as proof of their ability to wring concessions from the Government towards that end. While they can do that, they will continue with their campaign with renewed vigour, and with new recruits.

Not until the political will is found to govern Northern Ireland as any other region of the United Kingdom, with the same rights and privileges, will the IRA cease to believe in its ability to achieve the ultimate victory over the citizens of Northern Ireland, and the British Government. In the meantime, responsibility for the appalling security must be laid at the door of our Secretary of State, who has failed in his duty to ensure that citizens are protected from the actions of terrorism.

It is sickening to listen to the sanctimonious utterings of Ministers, vainly trying to support a security policy that the IRA can appear to destroy with impunity. The Ulster people see evidence every day in the attacks by the IRA that there has been no improvement whatsoever in security in the Province. We were told that everything was being done to deny the IRA safe havens in the Republic. However, that is clearly not the case. The IRA does not kill Gardai officers, and the Gardai consequently have no great personal interest in security. It is not their friends, relatives or neighbours who are killed or maimed.

We hear again about more proposals to establish special groups to improve security co-operation, when we were told over a year ago that security was excellent. We are now to have more working committees and a so-called task force. However, in the light of experience, I am sure that I shall be forgiven if I say that such meetings between the Secretary of State and his advisers on this are seen in Northern Ireland to be only cosmetic exercises. It is a sad reflection on that that the community has lost confidence in promises of meaningful security measures. It is also sad that that impinges on those responsible for their formulation. Is it any wonder that people are now saying, "What do you expect when our Secretary of State is not accountable for what happens in Northern Ireland?" Unlike his colleagues in Scotland and Wales he does not come to the region where he exercises supreme power. His competence, or the lack of it, is unlikely to win or lose him any votes in the next election.

It is time for a reappraisal and, more importantly, for a complete commitment by the Government to defeat terrorism. Our police force is ready to make sacrifices, but a complete Ulsterisation policy which leaves primary responsibility for security with the RUC, is to be condemned. Ulsterisation has meant that people living in border areas have been asked to defend themselves. It has left part-time UDR and RUC personnel as soft targets as they go about their daily civilian tasks. It has certainly not weaned nationalist support away from the IRA. The anti-terrorist role that is carried out by the RUC is completely inappropriate to it. Only the fully trained and equipped British Army—our Army—can be expected properly to counter terrorism, especially on the border.

The existence of the Anglo-Irish Conference, enshrining as it does the Republic's refusal to recognise the legitimacy of the British Army in Northern Ireland, is a major obstacle to the full deployment of our Army in that role. That was evidenced earlier this week when the Republic's Defence Minister, Mr. Michael Noonan, while on a publicity tour on the frontier, deliberately snubbed a British Army officer in charge of his patrol. He said that there were certain procedures to go through before there could be informalities on both sides.

It is time to grasp the nettle and time that the Government realised that this shabby Dublin deal cannot possibly bring peace, order and good government to Northern Ireland. It should now be put aside as a costly experiment, which has not, and never will, work. Meaningful dialogue can then be entered into to put forward acceptable alternatives for the benefit of all the long-suffering people of the Province.

7.25 pm

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to speak in this House, bearing in mind that my constituents continue to grieve because of the continuing murders performed by the murderous hands of the IRA. At the commencement of my remarks, I should say that I am somewhat disappointed that the British public do not have the privilege of seeing this House televised because this is an important and major debate, especially when one considers the number of murders in Northern Ireland—a part of Her Majesty's domain. I have counted the hon. Members on the Government Benches, and they mustered 17 at the height of their presence. The Labour party could muster five——

Mr. Norman Hogg (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth): What a cheek. The hon. Gentleman is never here.

Rev. William McCrea: If the hon. Gentleman wants to intervene, I shall certainly be glad to give way.

The alliance has been able to muster only one spokesman for the occasion. Yet hon. Members lecture us and tell us how much we are listened to in this House and how often we should come. — [Interruption]. It is interesting to hear so many protests coming from Labour Members. I suppose that the hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg) is getting in his speech before a general election may remove him and would like to continue to speak for as long as possible.

However, I found it most telling to hear a conversation in a Corridor outside the Chamber. Two hon. Members were in discussion and were laughing together about why the House was so sparsely attended today. They said that there was "a difficult decision of priorities". They had to decide between Rolls-Royce shares and attending this debate. I quote those remarks made by two hon. Members in a Corridor of this House today because it typifies what many of my colleagues feel, that there is little interest among hon. Members across the water in the suffering and anguish of the people in Northern Ireland.

I listened with interest also to the right hon. Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins) when he said that this debate had "a familiar ring". How true those words are. I suppose that for some 18 years security debates have been held in this House, and what a duplicity of words has been uttered. It is true that faces will have changed on the Front Bench and that Ministers answering at the Dispatch Box will have changed. However, something has not changed. We have listened to a repeat of the same waffle and to the usual expressions of sympathy and the usual condemnations that are now a course that is taken by right hon. and hon. Members of this House. They took the usual course of using the phrase that they are sorry, they sympathise and understand the feelings of the people who are suffering the murder and destruction.

How do right hon. and hon. Members expect to understand? I should be interested to know from Front Bench Members how many widows they have visited, how many homes of the suffering they have attended and how many orphaned children they have spoken to in the past 18 years in order to understand how the people of Ulster feel. I shall gladly give way if any Front Bench Member wants to tell me. It is interesting to talk to other groups and the Front Benchers lecture us about what others are saying, but surely the people who are suffering in our Province have a right to be heard.

The Secretary of State said that it was the Government's "determination to pursue the campaign to eliminate the scourge of terrorism." — [Official Report, 16 December 1986; Vol. 107, c. 1084.]

In past debates the Minister of State has used the words "the eradication of terrorism." When the debate has finished and the words have died on the air, Ministers will congratulate themselves that the debate is over; but Ulster will be back to violence, murder and the destruction of my constituents. The feeling of frustration that few people care or want to care about the plight of our community will prevail.

I resent the much publicised reason from the Northern Ireland Office for this debate. It has linked the debate to the death of Lord Justice Gibson and his wife, and I resent that. I equally resent the fact that the Secretary of State should make a trip along the border surrounded by great numbers of security guards and the Army and then stand before a television camera and say, "This is to prove that this is not a no-go area." How ridiculous can one get? The only time members of the security forces can enter many areas of the Province is when they are speeding through in armoured cars. That is disgraceful, but it is factual.

If hon. Members do not believe that, I gladly invite them to come to my constituency and see the parts where there are no checkpoints and where members of the security forces are not permitted to patrol the roads—where, indeed, they cannot because of the continuing spiral of IRA violence threatening their safety.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is my hon. Friend aware that when the Minister with responsibility for health, the hon. Member for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham), visited the Royal Victoria hospital, 300 troops and policemen were employed for his security?

Rev. William McCrea: I thank my hon. Friend for that information. Indeed, when the Secretary of State slipped into my constituency to visit the RUC station at Newtownstewart after the IRA bombing during which a man took a heart attack and died, he could have visited the man's home — it was only 500 yards from the station, where the gentleman was lying in a coffin—to sympathise with the family, but he turned and went home. As a senior police officer pointed out to me, for the Secretary of State to make his jaunt into my constituency the security forces had to send RUC men at the dead of night to clear the roads. They resented that greatly because, to use their words, they were left to the wolves and the bombs under the roads. I resent that sort of so-called security policy, but we are supposed to live with that in the Province.

The Secretary of State well knows that Northern Ireland Members have been warned about wasting police time. I remind the House that when the Minister with responsibility for education, the hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney) visited Omagh he was surrounded by about 200 policemen and security men. The western educational board had contacted the Northern Ireland Office and advised the Minister not to come. The chief officer of the board told me that the Minister was asked not to come as his visit would not be helpful, yet he forced himself on the people, wasted RUC time and put the lives of RUC men at risk. I know it is hard for such facts to be accepted, but facts are stubborn and I shall certainly make them plain.

Mr. John David Taylor: The Minister with responsibility for education does not often accept invitations to go anywhere in Northern Ireland. Was he welcomed in Omagh?

Rev. William McCrea: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the advice from the spokesman of the western educational board was appropriate; the Minister was not welcome. Nevertheless, the Minister forced himself on the board and he was chased out of Omagh. It is disgraceful when a Minister is told that his visit is unhelpful and would waste police time, that he continues with it for petty personal reasons and Northern Ireland propaganda reasons, especially when that same constituency cannot get the forces to attack the IRA or to provide the appropriate security to ensure that the people there have the right to live. That is indeed deplorable.

The decision of Unionist Members to request an emergency debate was taken at the funeral of Mr. Harry Henry at the commencement of that week of terrible carnage and before the death of Lord Justice Gibson. We were not in any way forced to come to the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Antrim, North (Rev. I. Paisley) and the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) decided that the Unionists should make their views on security heard in the House.

The debate has been purposeful. Surely people will have heard from the statements of the Secretary of State and the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) that they are still devoid of any meaningful measures which will counter terrorism and bring it to an end. The debate has ensured that the general public in Northern Ireland will know that the Government have neither the will nor the determination to eradicate or crush the terrorist uprisings in our Province. That is a tragedy.

Last week my hon. Friends came to the House and submitted applications under Standing Order No. 20 to the Speaker's Office. The Secretary of State rushed to the House to make a statement to stop any debate, but we are delighted to have this opportunity to put certain matters on the record and we are certainly laying the facts clearly on the line for the House and the nation to see.

On 15 November 1986 an agreement was signed and we were told that its objective was threefold — peace, stability and reconciliation. The agreement cannot and never will achieve those three objectives. Lest I be accused of scaremongering, of not examining the facts or of dismissing achievements, perhaps it is appropriate for me to consider the achievements of the Anglo-Irish agreement.

The first achievement of the Anglo-Irish Agreement was the removal from the south of Garret FitzGerald, who had promised the Government of the United Kingdom a divorce Bill. He promised that the divorce Bill would liberalise society in the south of Ireland and attract Unionists to the South and to Dublin, who might find that it was not such a bad place after all. There was a referendum on the divorce Bill but there was also an election at which Garret FitzGerald was humiliated. He is now out of office. The Anglo-Irish Agreement resulted in what is termed in Northern Ireland a former gunman at the helm instead of Garret FitzGerald. Who would not want a former gunman or so-called terrorist at the helm of a democratic Government because that is a step forward? We should all agree that that is an achievement.

The second achievement was that the Anglo-Irish Agreement admitted that the South of Ireland is not able to provide adequate money to provide security forces to tackle the problem of terrorists even if it wanted to. It is a bankrupt society. One of the leading members of the Dail expected Her Majesty's Government to put up the money to pay for security along the border. He expected that this House should send funds to a foreign state that has harboured terrorists all these years. Our eyes are being opened by these revelations.

The third achievement of the Irish-Anglo Agreement was the isolation of the Unionist majority community by the Government. Where else in the United Kingdom do we have minority rule? At present it is not minority participation, it is minority rule. Today, when the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) was speaking, I saw the nods of approval from Ministers on the Front Bench because they thought that he was a new-found friend for the Conservative and Unionist party.

The Government have to look to the SDLP and Dublin for their friends, but they do so at the expense of the majority of the community because the whole reason behind the Anglo-Irish Agreement was to save the bacon of the SDLP. The SDLP could not face Sinn Fein on its own; it needed the electoral support of the Government of the United Kingdom. The principle of the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) was "United Ireland or nothing". Today, members of the SDLP are relying on British Ministers to ensure that they are re-elected. The SDLP is relying on concessions given to it.

We have seen a terrible abuse of innocent, long-suffering, hard-working Ulster Unionists who are British through and through, who are proud to be British and who have gladly given their sons and daughters in the defence of Her Majesty's domain, unlike the nationalists and the Republicans, who used every opportunity they could to stab Her Majesty's loyal subjects and this House in the back whenever it suited them. I assure Ministers that if it suits the SDLP to stab them in the back in the future, it will be happy to do that. The leopard has not changed its spots. It has covered them to suit the occasion, but the time will come when the spots will be shown again. The mask will come off and the Government will realise that they should not have begged and courted the friendship of the SDLP.

The fourth achievement of the Anglo-Irish Agreement was the continuation and intensification of a blood-curdling murder campaign by the IRA. The NIO seeks to tell us that the IRA campaign is in response to the Anglo-Irish Agreement, because the Sinn Feiners are afraid that the agreement will work. That is the most diabolical falsehood that could be ever thought up. We know why the agreement came about. Her Majesty's chief Minister, the Prime Minister, told us why it came about. She said that she made the agreement because she was not willing to allow the murders to continue. It was the murders that brought about the Anglo-Irish Agreement. But whose murders? It was the continuing murders by the IRA that brought about the agreement. I am sure that the Secretary of State does not doubt the wisdom of the learned words of the Prime Minister about how this agreement came about.

It is interesting that it is said that the Sinn Fein was ready to accept that agreement, because its members said that without their bombs there would never have been an agreement, that more violence and more murders means more concessions. That is the reality. The lives and blood of a long-suffering Ulster people is a high price to pay. They are paying the penalty. The police, the UDR, the reserves and our British Army are paying the price for this awful unholy mess that the Government have got into and which, because of their pride, they are unwilling to acknowledge and correct.

The measures we have heard today will mean—make no mistake—that those murders will continue. Nothing that the Secretary of State said today will stop the murders in the Province. What he said today reminds me very much of the young child who went to its wealthy mother and said, "I want to speak to you, I want you to listen," but the mother put her hand in her purse and threw a £10 note at her child and said, "I have not got the time, take the money and spend it." We are not looking for money to solve the problem. We are not even looking for additional men.

At one of the funerals a week ago a senior member of the RUC said to me, "My voice will not be heard. You go to the House of Commons and tell the Secretary of State that he can put 20,000 more troops into Northern Ireland, but if he does not change their orders he will only be setting them up as ducks to be shot down by the IRA." More troops are not the answer; it is how those troops are deployed. It is how effectively the troops and the RUC are allowed to deal with the problem. That is the cry of the men on the ground.

I was given further information by another senior member of the security forces. I cannot reveal his name because the Chief Constable would quickly move him on somewhere else. The Chief Constable would deal with him in the same way that he is dealing with the representative of the Police Federation—he would silence him instead of listening to his views. The senior officer said that the hands of the security forces are still tied. He asked me to tell the Secretary of State that, instead of lecturing Unionist politicians and those who support the security forces, it was about time the Government supported the security forces, listened to them and supported them, not just with weaponry, but with orders that would allow them to do their jobs.

Hon. Members do not realise that if a UDR patrol stops a well-known Sinn Fein finger man in our community, a man whom the security forces have identified as the godfather of the IRA, they will be insulted by that person until they call a police patrol because they are not even allowed to open the boot or the door of his car. They are hardly able to speak to him in case he claims that he has been assaulted, which would lead to them being reprimanded.

That well-known Provisional Sinn Fein person who has pinpointed members of the security forces in my constituency and in the constituency of the hon. Member for Londonderry, East sits there and makes a mockery of the whole of the law and the whole security situation in our Province. When a police car comes up, naturally he opens the door, because he has humiliated the rest of the security forces. These are what are called effective measures.

I was on the verge of the Secretary of State's constituency last night and this morning. When I spoke to folk there about the situation, I found that quite clearly there are people in that constituency who are not happy about what is termed security. They say that every time they listen to the news about an atrocity they hear that security is to be tightened. They said that I must have listened to that statement so often that by now the Province is nearly choked. The Government say that they will tighten and tighten security, but nothing is more false. There is no tightening of security in the Province. It is ridiculous that the murdering IRA scum can snub their noses at the security forces, because unless the security forces can bring a charge that will stick in court they have to take the insults as members of the IRA go past them.

The Government had better start supporting the security forces in the most effective way by allowing them to take effective measures which, in the words of the security forces, means to eliminate. I can assure the House that if a member of the Ulster Defence Regiment, the Royal Ulster Constabulary or the British Army were to eradicate an IRA terrorist he would find himself up on some charge, even though he had been effective in his duty. I say that because a sergeant in 6 Company of the UDR was promoted and recommended for his service, yet at the end of the month found himself in the unemployment list. Others were brought in to his place when he was removed. He was commended for his efficiency and then dumped. That seems to be an unusual way to carry out security policy.

On behalf of my constituents I have a right to ask that this nightmare is brought to an end. We want to live in peace but there are so many double standards and so much double-talk that no one can believe Ministers. We are told to sit back and remain calm, and are lectured about what we should do, but the Government will not listen to the wishes of the elected representatives of the people. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) speaks about inquiries into MI5. Bearing in mind the wealth of evidence, surely it is time that we demanded an inquiry into the way the Northern Ireland Office deals with the lives of Northern Ireland people. The Northern Ireland Office is selling a loyal part of Her Majesty's domain into the hands of her avowed enemies.

It might please the Secretary of State to stand with Mr. Lenihan and to be introduced to Charles Haughey. It would do him more good if he listened to the will of the people inside the Province instead of giving a major and substantial role in the day-to-day running of the affairs of Northern Ireland to a foreign Government. The Secretary of State shakes his head. Talk about a substantial and major role in the day-to-day running of the affairs of Northern Ireland was not some trumped-up charge by some twisted-minded Ulster Unionist. It was a statement by the former Justice Minister of the Irish Republic. That was the claim that he made when he went back to the South of Ireland.

Hon. Members are told that the Anglo-Irish Agreement is for the defence of the Union. The Dail is told that because of that agreement it has a major and substantial role to play in the day-to-day affairs of Northern Ireland. Whom do we believe? When will the Government stop this forked-tongue approach to Northern Ireland? It is our people that are dying, people that very few hon. Members, including the Secretary of State, come to Northern Ireland to see. My constituent Mr. Graham was only a UDR man and Mr. Henry was only a foreman in a job. The Secretary of State certainly did not attend Mr. Henry's funeral. Why was that? It was because he happened to be only an ordinary Ulsterman, fodder for the gunmen, a man who was left in the front line.

As elected representatives, we are supposed to take all this. We are supposed to follow the coffins, bury the dead, say nothing about it and act as nice little parliamentarians. I was elected to this House as a simple Ulsterman to speak in ordinary Ulster language about the realities of what is happening in Ulster. Even at this late hour, I appeal to the Government on behalf of the widows and orphans left and forgotten in our country finally to do what they promised to do—eradicate terrorism.

Rev. Ian Paisley: My hon. Friend is wasting his time.

Rev. William McCrea: I accept what my hon. Friend says, that I am wasting my time, but let it not be said that I did not try, even though there are those that sneer and think that there is something funny.

I should like to quote from a speech by the ex-moderator of the Irish Presbyterian Church, Dr. Dickinson. My hon. Friend the Member for Antrim, North also spoke about this. This is not a speech by a politician or by some hothead who makes his point with a sweep of the hand. Dr. Dickinson said:

"It would appear from the fact that these scandalous deeds have been allowed to go on for so long that Mrs. Thatcher, and those who, with her, are responsible for security in Northern Ireland, have neither concern nor compassion for you Mrs. Graham or for the many others who have suffered as you have done."

Dr. Dickinson said that the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister have neither concern nor compassion for Mrs. Graham and he looked down at the widow when he said that. That is true, because the only way to prove Dr. Dickinson wrong is to take effective security measures to stop this murder, mayhem and destruction that has cursed our country.

Instead of making an agreement that was a concession to the murderers, the Government should not allow the murders to continue. Effective measures need to be taken to bring terrorism to an end. The blood of Ulster's innocents lies not only on the hands of those perpetrators of the violence, cursed, depraved, wicked and hellish though they are, but also at the door of those who have it in their power to stop the murder and the mayhem.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): The hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea) must not assume that any hon. Member sneers at him or at any of the Ulster Members when they talk about the carnage in Northern Ireland. Nor can he claim a monopoly on compassion for those who experience the effects of murder and maiming, though he lives with it day by day and some of us do not. That is the difference between hon. Members, but it is not a lack of compassion and the hon. Gentleman is entitled to be heard. At the same time, he must accept that, if he tries to lay unfair motives at the doors of other hon. Members, he will lose the respect of the House and the patience of the British people.

If the television cameras to which the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster referred were here, they would do him and his case more harm than if they were not. The way in which the hon. Gentleman presented his arguments did nothing to win over people who might be concerned about some of the serious security issues that he raised tonight. I should have liked to hear more about the need for reconciliation, about his preparedness to listen to other points of view and about the need for justice in Northern Ireland rather than the claims that he made for recrimination and for taking an eye for an eye.

Sometimes, some deep soul-searching is needed by the hon. Members who speak for the constituencies of Northern Ireland. They must ask themselves whether they do not bear some of the responsibility for events there. Perhaps that takes the form of their failure to provide leadership in the House over the past 18 months.

I join the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) in welcoming back the hon. Members from Ulster today, and I hope that they will continue to put positive points to the House. The way to win arguments is not through abuse but by trying to take people with one.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) made a number of points with which I wish to deal. He suggested that the Chief Constable of the RUC should take early retirement, but that he did not intend to undermine the Chief Constable's position. In saying that, that is precisely what he did. I met Sir John Hermon two years ago and I was extremely impressed by him, and by his impartiality and determination to deal with terrorism. He told me and my colleagues on the delegation that in Northern Ireland there are Protestants, Catholics and the RUC.

The last 18 months have been a difficult period. It was bound to be one; anything that is likely to defeat terrorism will cause difficulties and, probably, an escalation of violence in the short term. During that period, the RUC has been caught in the crossfire. It has performed bravely and well, independently and objectively. Contrary to the call by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds for the Chief Constable's early retirement, he is entitled to our wholehearted support.

The RUC is also entitled to the wholehearted support of the Catholic community in Northern Ireland. That is why I have consistently said—for example, in the debate on the Anglo-Irish Agreement—to the hon. Members for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) that they must encourage people of the Catholic tradition to join the RUC and work with it. It is entitled to the full support of all Catholics in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds also said that he favoured the return of internment in Northern Ireland, at least on a partial basis. That would be a foolish move. We saw the effects of internment in Northern Ireland once before. It led to hunger strikes, more violence and greater alienation. That is not the way to proceed.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds also said that, although he voted for the Anglo-Irish Agreement, it has not delivered. The hon. Gentleman is not present now—having put his points on behalf of the RUC, he left the Chamber. He must ask himself what he expected the agreement to deliver in the first place. I refer him to the Belfast Telegraph of Thursday 23 April, in which Mr. Lenihan said that he envisaged "that under the new arrangement there would be a better exchange of information in regard to techniques and intelligence, and a dovetailing of operations, with greater liaison between policemen on both sides of the border. 'We believe there is substantial room for improvement of that kind and the thrust should be for achieving that sort of practical co-operation on the ground'".

The agreement was never going to bring a miracle cure, but if it brings statements such as that from the Republic, it is all to the good, and we should build upon it.

The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux), refuting something that was said by the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), said that Protestants do talk to Catholics in Northern Ireland. I agree. When I was last there, four weeks ago, I was fortunate enough to meet a group of people in Limavady. They came from Protestant and Catholic homes, and they talked about the need for reconciliation, and the need to support the RUC and to make something of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

I went to Derry and stayed in Columba house, where I met Father Neil Carlin and Neil McClosky. The latter went on hunger strike for 55 days and virtually came back from the dead. He has renounced violence, has seen its futility, and is working for reconciliation. Surely we should be supporting people such as him and organisations such as the Belfast Trust, which is working for integration in the schools. I was impressed by what I saw of the trust's work. The trust and groups such as the Corrymeela community and Maranatha are doing what is needed to bring the different traditions together. There is one community, not two.

[Mr. David Alton]

The right hon. Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins) mentioned the role of the churches, and in that context I listened carefully to what the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. I. Paisley). Northern Ireland is a scandal for Christianity. It needs moral leadership. If only the hon. Member for Antrim, North, who speaks with such passion and vigour and has such oratory at his disposal, would use his words to try to effect reconciliation in the island of Ireland, what a great contribution that would make. He must ask himself not only about the role of the British Government but about his own role.

If Protestants must talk to Catholics, Northern Ireland must talk to the people of Great Britain, too. This House is the place for such debates. I am glad to see the Unionists Members in their places, as the Belfast Telegraph and Presbyterian leaders urged them to be. Loyalty is a characteristic of the people of Northern Ireland. The greatest danger to the Union is the absence of Unionist Members from their places here. That would break the allegiance of ordinary British people to the Ulster community and would result in further tragedy. That is why I am glad to see them in their places tonight.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it does not sound well in Northern Ireland to hear lectures about participation from Conservative Members who come in for a moment and then leave, not willing to listen to the debates?

Mr. Alton: I agree. The right hon. Member for Spelthorne and others should have stayed for the debate, in which I should have liked to see more hon. Members take part.

I also agree with the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. M. Smyth), who has said on previous occasions that it would be better, instead of having Orders in Council, to return to the ordinary procedure with Bills. We could then fully debate issues in the way in which we debated the emergency provisions, and about which there was a great deal of agreement on both sides of the House. In that debate the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West and his party, the Unionist party, the SDLP and the Conservative party were able to make common cause. After the election we should find ways in which to provide more time and better procedures to deal with Northern Ireland matters in a more rational way. I want the establishment of a Committee like the Welsh and Scottish Grand Committees or a Select Committee to examine the issues rather than deal with them in the combative atmosphere that prevails far too often in our debates.

Eighteen months ago the House decided overwhelmingly to support the Anglo-Irish Agreement. Many of us believed at the time that it was merely a step forward and would not be a panacea or universal remedy, but a way of recognising that there was an Irish dimension to the problem of Northern Ireland. We had to bring in the alienated nationalist community and detach it from the IRA. The agreement is beginning to do that and we must persevere with it. The House must demonstrate that it will do so and not put the agreement to one side.

There might be an indeterminate majority after the next general election and my right hon. and hon. Friends would certainly stand four square behind the agreement. To do otherwise would be to offer the IRA the opportunity to undermine yet further the democratic process and to drive Republican opinion back into the hands of Sinn Fein. That would be very much against the interests of all people in Northern Ireland. We must build on the agreement, and that is why we are advocating the need for a permanent joint security commission. We want to see joint anti-terrorism legislation enacted simultaneously in the Dail and at Westminster.

One of the reasons for the debate this evening is the tragic events that led to the murder of Lord Justice Gibson and his wife. They were murdered, or assassinated, by the IRA. I ask the Secretary of State to say when he replies whether he will consider other ways in which those who travel from North to South or South to North can make the journey. They should not be asked to leave their vehicles in no man's land and to transfer to another vehicle. Instead, they should be able to make the journey to their destination with the protection of the RUC or that of the Garda. I had the extraordinary experience only four weeks ago of transferring vehicles at a border point in the middle of nowhere, and that process cannot be a very sensible way of going about matters. It could lead to further tragedies of the sort that we have seen in Northern Ireland so recently.

Lord Justice Gibson's assassination is the latest in a long series of tragic deaths in Northern Ireland. The RUC has said, quite properly, that there are times when perhaps we do not place as much significance on the deaths of members of the security forces as on spectacular events such as Lord Justice Gibson's assassination. It is right that we should be spending time today discussing the deaths of all people in Northern Ireland and recognising the serious situation there. We should be trying to devise other ways of ensuring that the long process of normalisation continues in the North. That is why I welcome the publication of the UDA document entitled "Common Sense" a few weeks ago. The ideas set out within it—for example, the need for a responsibility-sharing devolved assembly—were good ones. That assembly idea is also one to which we should return after the general election.

I do not have time to raise a number of the other issues that I wished to put before the House, so instead, I shall ponder for a moment on some of the options if we do not persevere with the agreement. Sinn Fein recently published a document which in some ways is obscenely entitled "The Scenario for Peace". In that document Mr. Gerry Adams, Sinn Fein's president, claimed, according to the Irish News, that if one of the mainline British political parties decided to fight the next general election on disengagement from Northern Ireland, that party would form the next Government. Mr. Adams is obviously trying to lure political parties which are represented in this place to support the arguments that he has long advanced. I do not believe that there is any support for that view in most quarters of the House. However, I think that Unionist Members should be aware that the more they oppose an agreement that the overwhelming majority of hon. Members have supported, the more likely it is that the British public will support the views that Mr. Adams has been advancing.

Secondly, Mr. Adams has talked about resettlement grants. That suggestion is as obscene as the others that he has expounded. It is an example of the sort of argument that creates further friction and division in Northern Ireland. It is the sort of suggestion that one expects to hear from people in South Africa rather than from those claiming to represent the republican tradition in Northern Ireland. I am pleased to hear that Dr. Joe Hendron of the SDLP vigorously spoke out against the proposal.

The third possibility is that the agreement might be abandoned. If that were to happen, it would, as I have already said, set back the cause of reconciliation. It would mean that the nationalist tradition in Northern Ireland would be further alienated. In abandoning the agreement, we would be playing into Sinn Fein's hands.

Fourthly, there is the possibility of sending in further troops and reintroducing internment. That, too, would be playing into Sinn Fein's hands.

Mr. Beggs: The hon. Gentleman is uttering the sort of claptrap that supporters of terrorism and the IRA continue to use. They do not want more British troops in Ulster, and that message has not got through yet. It is their way of blackmailing this Parliament to prevent the troops from being sent in and a proper job being done.

Mr. Alton: Surely the hon. Gentleman realises, 18 years after the troops were first sent into Northern Ireland, that the continued sending of troops will not solve the problems of Northern Ireland.

Rev. William McCrea: Allow them to do their job.

Mr. Alton: The troops should be allowed to do their job in Northern Ireland, but the sooner that they are put back into barracks and there is a normalisation of Northern Ireland's affairs, with the RUC dealing with everyday issues of law and order, the better it will be for everybody. I should have thought that that proposition would gain support from both sides of the House. Surely no hon. Member wants to see troops in the streets doing the job that the police should be doing. The best security that Northern Ireland can achieve is a strengthening of co-operation and a laying aside of old prejudices, bigotry and fears. Without a willingness to do that, the murders will continue.

8.17 pm

Mr. James Kilfedder (Antrim, North): I take exception to what the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) said about Northern Ireland people. He said that Northern Ireland is a scandal to Christianity. The majority of people in the Province, regardless of their religion—Presbyterians, Roman Catholics, Church of Ireland and so on—are charitable and deeply religious and could show a great deal to people in other parts of the United Kingdom. The people of Northern Ireland will be shocked when they learn what the hon. Gentleman has said about them. In youth organisations children are brought up to certain standards of life that should prevail in England. If similar standards applied in this country it would be the better for it.

The hon. Gentleman said that the troops should be withdrawn to barracks. That has been said by the IRA time after time. To say that is an open invitation to the IRA to redouble its efforts. I have a great regard for the hon. Gentleman but the two statements to which I have referred will cause great anger in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Alton: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kilfedder: No, I shall not give way. I am timing myself because I know that there are others who wish to contribute to the debate.

When I last spoke in the Chamber, which was before Easter, I anticipated that more people would be killed in Northern Ireland. I was proved right. The only thing that can be said about this debate is that anyone who says that more deaths will follow it will make a true statement. That may be the only true statement in the entire debate.

When I last addressed the House I took the opportunity—I wish to take it again—to pay tribute to the gallant members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, the UDR and of the Regular Army. They deserve the full, unequivocal and unqualified support of everyone in Northern Ireland, but sadly that support is not given by everyone. The opportunity to do so was missed by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon). Instead of saying that the police and the Army should be supported by the communities that he and his SDLP colleagues represent, he launched an attack on all measures taken by the security forces to defeat the Provisional IRA.

Anyone with any sense knows that the enemy of all decent people in Northern Ireland is the IRA or any other terrorist organisation. The enemy is not the police. The police and every other member of the security forces face death every day that they are on duty. They are dedicated men and deserve our unqualified and grateful thanks.

The atrocity at the border last week, and all the other incidents that have taken place along it, confirm the need for what I described many years ago in the House as a cordon sanitaire along the border. The Army would then be fully engaged in meeting, dealing with and defeating the Provisional IRA. It is not the duty of the police, which is a civil organisation, to engage in war with the IRA. What my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) said was absolutely right: the Army, not the police, should be used in such areas.

The murders of Lord Justice and Lady Gibson over a week ago were horrific offences. They were a kind, gentle and compassionate couple whose lives enriched the community which they served with great distinction. Lady Gibson was president of the Girl Guides Association. The fact that Lord Justice Gibson was the second most senior member of the Ulster judiciary created the tremendous publicity that his killing was given in the media. Had it been a policeman or a soldier, I regret to say that neither the Secretary of State nor any other Minister in the Northern Ireland Office would have made a statement in the House, yet there have been IRA killings time after time. It seems that there is an acceptable level of violence, no matter what the Government may say.

When I listened to the speech of the Secretary of State in opening this debate I wondered why we were all here today discussing security in Northern Ireland because, according to the Secretary of State, the Provisional IRA has only a few members and it has no support in either the Irish Republic or Northern Ireland. If the IRA has only a few members and is shunned and isolated, how can it operate with impunity and cause such devastation in much of Northern Ireland, particularly along the border?

The Secretary of State does not fully comprehend the situation in Northern Ireland. I am surprised that this is the first occasion since the present IRA terrorist campaign began 18 years ago that the Government have not responded with a massive show of strength to meet the horrendous IRA atrocities and satisfy the anger and frustration of the Ulster people.

The Prime Minister brought the Anglo-Eire Agreement back to the House, and most hon. Members from England, Scotland and Wales regarded it as a miracle cure for the problems of Northern Ireland. The House gave her a tremendous reception and every English Member believed the statement that the London-Dublin accord would bring peace and reconciliation in Northern Ireland.

Viscount Cranborne: No.

Mr. Kilfedder: I make an exception for the hon. Gentleman, but I was right in saying that most English Members believed that, with honourable exceptions such as the hon. Member for Dorset, South (Viscount Cranborne). I believe that the Prime Minister was misled by officials in the Foreign Office. There has been no peace and reconciliation; the opposite has happened. The number of killings this year is more than the number of killings in the first four months of 1986 and Northern Ireland is divided more than ever.

The Secretary of State declared today that the members of the IRA would, when caught, be subject to the full rigour of the law. In the first instance, they have to be caught. Many terrible atrocities have been committed for which no one has been brought to justice. My hon. Friend the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) intervened in the Secretary of State's speech to make that point. The murderers of my cousin on the border of Northern Ireland are free to roam around because the full rigour of the law has not been brought against them. There is no reason why those people should not be put out of circulation. Therefore, much against my better judgment, I agree with what my hon. Friend said: there should be some selective detention, since otherwise those people will be free to urge young people to commit murders.

Not only do they have to be caught but, once they are caught, they can make an admission which can be contested in court. They can say that they have been ill-treated while in custody. Almost as a matter of routine, those statements are thrown out by the judge. When they are convicted — only a few people are convicted, compared with the number who have been involved in terrorist crimes — they can obtain a special remission, which means that many IRA members who have been convicted of heinous offences are back on the streets training a new generation of young people to become involved in IRA terrorism.

The Secretary of State said, after the weekend killings, that the terrorists were showing themselves to be increasingly desperate. I do not know where the Secretary of State has been for the past 18 years, or indeed for the past two years. Does he not know that the doctrine of terrorism is to terrorise? The terrorists are not desperate; they are out to create the maximum havoc, to spread fear, to demoralise not only the security forces in Northern Ireland but members of the Government, and to make members of the English press feel that the Government should get out of Northern Ireland, clean their hands of the problem and leave it to others to deal with. We cannot get away from the fact that a war is being waged in Northern Ireland. The Provisional IRA's bombs and bullets kill, destroy and mutilate, but it seems to many people in Northern Ireland that the Secretary of State uses soft words and press statements issued from his redoubt at Stormont castle to slap the wrists of the IRA.

The decent people of Ulster, who are the potential victims of the Provisional IRA's largely sectarian campaign of slaughter, have been urged by the Secretary of State to show steadiness and remain quiet in the face of death. That really is the language of the abattoir — all right, be quiet, go on in, never mind the noise or the smell of blood, just stay quiet. But the Ulster people have had 18 years of that. They cannot see any determination by the Government to bring it to an end, as the citizens of any other part of the United Kingdom would expect. The will does not seem to be there and the IRA realises that. That is why the Government now, belated though it may be, must show that they are determined, by the use of troops and every sophisticated weapon, to search out and destroy the IRA.

I conclude on a political note with regard to the Anglo-Eire Agreement. I had never thought that it would be possible for the Conservative Government to alienate the Loyaltist majority of Northern Ireland. They have achieved that, but at what cost? They do not realise even now the deep hurt that the Ulster Loyalist community, which includes Roman Catholics as well as Protestants, feel at the betrayal by the British Government entering into an Anglo-Eire Agreement without consulting — that is all we wish to emphasise — the elected representatives of the Unionist majority. That was done after we had heard in this Chamber time after time from successive Governments that no action would be taken in Northern Ireland to create an Assembly with devolved power without having support across the religious divide. That assurance has been shamelessly broken.

There is still a will among many decent people in Northern Ireland, irrespective of their religion, to make political progress. It is almost impossible to have political progress when there is an awful campaign of terrorism resulting in slaughter, mutilation and destruction. We must not give up hope. I do not rely too much on the British Government helping to achieve political progress. The elected representatives of the constitutional parties in Northern Ireland must see whether there is a way forward. The Ulster people are resilient. They will never be subservient or capitulate to terror. They are determined to survive this war. In my judgment they will win through in the end.

8.30 pm

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): When I was preparing for the debate I acquired a large mass of facts and statistics. When I looked at them I realised that I had the perfect material for making the sort of speech that the Prime Minister used to make in the House. I assure my right hon. and hon. Friends that I rapidly went back to the drawing board.

Today we were confronted by the Secretary of State, who stood at the Dispatch Box and told us that he was there to put forward the facts. I have no objection to hard, cold facts, but I object to the wrong conclusions being drawn time after time and being presented as if they had come from the mouth of God himself, if I may put it that way in the presence of so many reverend gentlemen.

Getting the truth out of the available information may be difficult for the Secretary of State. He may not take time to do it himself but may rely on his officials to do it for him. One foolish suggestion that he put forward this afternoon was that Sinn Fein had been humiliated at the recent election in the Irish Republic because it got only 1·8 per cent. of the total vote. That is nonsense. The truth is that Sinn Fein fought only 60 per cent. of the constituencies; if it had fought them all its percentage of the vote would have been considerably higher.

The Secretary of State also forgot that in the Irish Republic the single transferable vote system of proportional representation is used in elections. What matters in that system is the quota, not the overall majority in any constituency. If the right hon. Gentleman looked at the figures, he would see that in Donegal, North-East, Sinn Fein got 32 per cent. of the quota. That is not a small proportion. When one considers that that is the constituency represented by Neil Blaney in the Dail, we must remember that Mr. Blaney was getting most of the IRA vote in that constituency.

In Donegal, South-West, Sinn Fein got only 16 per cent. of the quota, but the Workers party, to whom Sinn Fein electors freely transferred votes, got 31 per cent., so that is a total of 47 per cent. of the quota. In the Cavan-Monaghan constituency, between them they got 41·5 per cent. of the quota, in Cork, North Central they got 46 per cent. between them and in Dublin, Central between them they got 50 per cent. of the quota.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Would my hon. Friend care to comment on why Sinn Fein electors in many constituencies should give their first preference vote to Sinn Fein when they could go immediately to the patron of the Provisional IRA in Northern Ireland, Charles Haughey and Fianna Fail?

Mr. Ross: My hon. Friend was hasty; I am coming to that.

Another aspect of proportional representation is that votes are transferred within the political family or within the political segment to which electors perceive themselves as belonging. When Workers party and Sinn Fein electors finished transferring to each other, which they did freely, they then transferred to the party led by Mr. Haughey. Therefore, they consider themselves, as we would say brutally in Ulster, as being of one sow's litter. The House should take careful note of that simple fact of political life in Ireland.

The Secretary of State also talked about the security position in Northern Ireland. He gave us many selective statistics. If the right hon. Gentleman and the Minister of State were to go to Waterside in Londonderry, to the Protestant part of the city, they would see a large police station which has not had a brick laid on it for two years because the contractors were terrorised by the IRA to the point where they walked off the site and dare not come back. If they go to Strabane, they will see a place where there should be a police station, but it is not even started yet. That should tell the House and the country more about the strength and capability of the IRA than the statistics that are thrown across the House year after year.

The IRA has demonstrated its strength and its capability in every part of the Province. It killed two members of the RUC in Portrush in my constituency. It killed two more members of the RUC who were on duty in the constituency of Foyle but who lived in my constituency. It has killed at will throughout the length and breadth of Northern Ireland in the last few weeks. The IRA has a policy of murder which it is carrying through with ruthless and merciless efficiency.

The right hon. Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins) laughed when we talked about 100,000 votes for Sinn Fein. He said that it would be impossible to have 15,000 on the streets. It does not matter whether it is possible. The IRA does not need 15,000 gunmen. Grivas said that he never had more than 150 in Cyprus at any one time, yet he drove out the British. We should come down to the fact of what an IRA terrorist campaign is. It is a small number of murderers being active at any time. That is all that it takes.

There may be talk of police success, but let us consider where the police have not been successful. The so-called supergrass trials have almost collapsed. Quigley and Gilmore got immunity; 66 people went back on the streets. The case of Whoriskey was not proceeded with; 21 had been charged. That is a total of over 80 who went free. That is not counting those who came back from Donegal, never mind those who did not go on the run. So there are well over 100 terrorists or perhaps nearly 200 terrorists in the Londonderry city area alone.

When the Minister of State replies, perhaps he will not tell us about the police successes and about all the people who have been arrested; perhaps he will be able to tell me and the rest of the country how many Provisional IRA murders have been cleared in the constituency of Foyle, which I represented until 1983, and in Londonderry, East, which I now represent, since this Administration came to power. He should tell me and the people I represent how many people have been murdered by Republican terrorists in that area, how many have been made amenable, and how many of those crimes are still unsolved. I think the position is no better in Fermanagh and south Tyrone.

The IRA runs interrogation schools. Its members can stand up to interrogation and the police are in severe difficulty. Perhaps the Minister will also tell us how many people are on bail for hijacking, for petrol bombing and for membership of the IRA, for which 269 are serving sentences in the Irish Republic on the word of a Garda superintendent under a law which we do not have.

The Secretary of State told us that there is evidence that much of the explosive is manufactured in Northern Ireland. Perhaps the Minister will be more precise and will tell us exactly what proportion of the explosive captured and the explosive used in the last 18 months, or for as long a period as he cares to take us back, came from the Irish Republic. He should tell us how much came from Northern Ireland and what the police have done to stop its manufacture in Northern Ireland. We would all be interested in that information.

I have directed the attention of the, sadly, sparsely attended House to what I believe is the strength of the IRA. If the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister will inquire about it, no doubt they will be able to lay their hands on a transcript of the speech made in Londonderry on Easter Sunday by Martin McGuinness, who is well known for his IRA and Sinn Fein activity in Northern Ireland. They will find that that speech is a tremendous call to arms. He praised the women for their vital role in the active service units of the IRA. He said that he took pride in today's IRA volunteers. He said:

> "Irish freedom could only be achieved through the armed offensive of the IRA who were the guarantors of an achievable peace in Ireland. We are going to win. We will never be suppressed."

That was not the speech of a man who faced defeat or the slightest fear. It was the speech of a man who was sure of victory—a man who saw the winning post ahead, and he was out in front and racing for it. We have to change that attitude before we can talk about defeating the

[Mr. Ross]

IRA and getting back peace. This situation has not come about through anything other than Government policy or perhaps the policy the Government have carried through. It has been carried through because of pressure from murder. There was the murder of Airey Neave in the precincts of the House some years ago. The Government turned and ran from their 1979 election manifesto.

On 12 February this year, in answer to the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), the Secretary of State said that the present Home Secretary had as his first ambition the 1979 manifesto, but was unable to proceed. I remind the House that the present Home Secretary went to Northern Ireland on 11 September 1984. A bomb went off in Brighton on 12 October of that year. If it were not that which changed the Government's mind in 1984, perhaps the Secretary of State will tell us who the Government consulted and who advised them so that they were not able to proceed with the 1979 manifesto statement. To the people of Ulster—and I point out that they can also read Hansard, just in case people here think that they cannot—it seems that the Government broke and ran when Airey Neave was murdered in the car park of the House of Commons. They broke and ran again when the bomb went off in Brighton. That does not sit very well with people who have been bombed, shot or murdered for more years than most of us care to remember.

I could say more, but I should like to hear what other hon. Members have to say in the debate. I believe that only a total, fundamental change of Government policy will solve the problems of Ulster. I believe that we have fruitlessly and needlessly expended treasure and lives for many years. We hear a tremendous shout every time that the IRA goes through its sequence of one murder after another—that steady haemorrhage of ordinary people—that builds up to a peak when the IRA kills a prominent individual, and then stops, as it has done for the past week, and then starts again. There is a steady death after death, drip after drip, to try to wear us down. It has not managed to do so yet.

Every time that the IRA builds up to a peak there is a tremendous flurry. More troops are brought in, more changes are made in the RUC, all sorts of things are promised, but all that happens is that we temporarily disturb the bloody froth on top of the evil brew that is spawned by the IRA under the Government's policy. The policy that the Government have pursued has given the IRA hope of ultimate victory. It lies behind Martin McGuinness's speech and behind all the evil that we have suffered.

Mr Maginnis rose——

Mr. Ross: I should not want my hon. Friend to think that I was equating him with the gentleman in Londonderry. I know that he and the other fellow are poles apart.

I note that the Government also apply a strange standard of democracy to Northern Ireland. The Secretary of State—strangely enough, it appears on the same page of Hansard of 12 February; it has not been changed, even in the fortnightly volume—said:

"Democracy is not about the rule of the majority. It is about the position of and proper respect for the interests of the minority."—[Official Report, 12 February 1987, Vol. 108, c. 446.]

The Government have proceeded on that standard. It is no wonder that the minority have every right to believe that their interests, and theirs alone, are paramount and that, therefore, the Government are promoting a system of minority rule that found its fullest expression in the Anglo-Irish Agreement. Until the fundamental root and branch change of policy that I have called for takes place, there can be no hope of peace or progress towards stability or reconciliation in Ulster. Quite honestly, as long as the present Government Front Bench is responsible for Northern Ireland, there is no hope for us.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Several hon. Members have spoken of the position and importance of religious leaders in the Province. The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), who spoke from the Liberal Benches, and who also is a Roman Catholic, will agree that there have been times when we have been distressed at what appears to be Roman Catholic ambivalence towards terrorism in Northern Ireland. However, those who know a little about the Province know of the shining courage of a number of Catholic priests who have stood against the Provisionals and against other private armies. I can think of one who went to the rescue of a man who was being kneecapped. He found himself looking down the barrel of a gun, but managed to outface the terrorist behind it. On the other hand, there have been some who, led astray by a spurious liberation theology, perhaps, have even appeared to implicate themselves in support of the Provisionals.

I welcome—I believe the House welcomes it also—the statement made recently by the two Bishops Daly. I have a soft spot in my heart for Father Denis Faul of Dungannon. He went on the record as saying that if the British were to hold a secret referendum of Roman Catholics in Northern Ireland, only 20 per cent. would vote for a united Ireland. After the recent murder of Lord Justice Gibson and his wife, Father Faul said that it was "a mortal sin to be an active member of an organisation like the Provisional IRA."

He uttered those words on Radio Ulster. He went on to say:

"I hope the parents do say to their sons: 'It is a mortal sin to be an active participant in the Provisional IRA, and you must get out of it, not only for the good of the community, but for the good of your immortal soul'."

Father Faul said that the Roman Catholic Church had continually said that. Perhaps he was speaking of the earlier troubles of 1956-62 when a powerful influence was exerted by the archbishops and bishops of Ireland who, in the course of a statement, said:

"a civil war between the people of one nation causes greatest injury, and is most to be avoided . . . we declare that it is a mortal sin for a Catholic to become or remain a member of an organisation or society which arrogates to itself the right to bear arms and use them against its own or another State; that it is also sinful for a Catholic to co-operate with, express approval of, or otherwise assist, any such organisation or society, and that, if the co-operation or assistance be notable, the sin committed is mortal. With paternal insistence we warn young men to be on their guard against any such organisation or society, and not to be induced by false notions of patriotism to become members of it."

I also welcome certain statements that have come from the SDLP concerning the RUC. The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) is not present, but I understand that he now favours permission to be given to the RUC and the Garda Siochana to operate on both sides of the border. I have asked myself what kind of Anglo-Irish Agreement it is when indignation is expressed by the United Kingdom because an Irish Air Corps helicopter —presumably looking for terrorists; I hope so—crosses into United Kingdom air space, or when protests and amends have to be made because, for the protection of human life, a listening device is placed by British soldiers just across the border.

I wonder whether we would carry the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh with us if we were to propose, say a three-mile frontier zone on both sides of the line where joint forces or forces including personnel seconded from the other country could operate freely. A number of hon. Gentleman have referred to the capability, equipment and training of the Garda Siochana. If there is any help that we can give and that is required, I ask my hon. Friend the Minister, when he replies, to assure us that it will be given.

How long can we continue in this way? Either we make the border secure—and the place of the Army seems to me to be on the frontier, not in the streets — or the frontier should be sealed.

Soon after Lord Justice Gibson and his wife were killed by explosives, Terence Finbar McKenna blew himself up with explosives intended for others. He had been released from prison after serving 10 years out of 17 to which he had been sentenced for explosives and firearms offences. I think that it was the hon. Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder) who drew attention to the absurdity of those who are fighting against us in what are warlike conditions —although it is not a war— being freed to rejoin the ranks of the Provisional IRA, INLA or any private army that disgraces the title Loyalist.

As the House knows, all sentenced prisoners are granted remission of 50 per cent. of their sentences automatically, subject to certain conditions of behaviour. I have queried that with my hon. Friend the Minister of State by question and by letter. My hon. Friend argues against any type of parole on the ground that it is impracticable, but I seize upon certain words that he wrote to me:

> "The present arrangements are not set in concrete, but there are some major difficulties that would have to be overcome."

I would say that the sooner those difficulties are overcome the better; otherwise — and perhaps in any case — we should examine the new case for preventive detention put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), by the hon. Member for North Down and by other hon. Members who have spoken.

Of course, the instrument of internment was discredited because of the indiscriminate manner in which it was practised by the Northern Ireland Government of the time. However, the case seems to be there. It was always considered in the South to be a legitimate expedient in fighting terrorism. Indeed, it was decisive in earlier troubles. If it is to be considered, I believe that it should be considered jointly with Dublin.

Some of my constituents, and those of other hon. Members, were not born when the troubles began; now, they are voting. From time to time, they ask us when the troubles will end. The terrorists are encouraged to cling to a false hope that we may give up and give in by the repeated spectacle of British Ministers moving from one failed political initiative to another. The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux), in an impressive speech, said that it had been a repeated mistake for the Government to seek to be doing something for the sake of being seen to be doing something. As he said, the Anglo-Irish Agreement is the latest and the worst in a series of initiatives which have proved not only futile but lethal. They have substituted for the alienation of a minority — an alienation that has been exaggerated by Republican propaganda — the estrangement of the majority of the population. They have aroused new fears of a wave of sectarian murder. There have been recent terrible sectarian murders in the Province—I am glad to see that my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds has returned — and, at times, the RUC has been placed between two fires.

The agreement is a triumph of Irish diplomacy — I nearly added, "over British stupidity". But triumphs can be mistakes in diplomacy, and this is the second time that an Irish Government have made the mistake of asking too much and getting too much. That is why Sunningdale failed. Her Majesty's Government are impaled on the agreement. I suppose that they will say that it cannot be repudiated, but there is provision for review.

I should like to be constructive, rather than merely denouncing the agreement. My views on it are known. I feel that it could give way to a larger treaty—an equal treaty, based on reciprocity and co-operation.

It is said that the reaction of the Unionists, and of the overwhelming majority of people in the Province, has been unreasonable: they should not have behaved like that. But it was predictable, and predicted, that they would do so. It is no good saying that they should not have behaved like that, and that they should have seen it differently. We must deal with the state of the Province as it is. The Unionists believe that the Union has been endangered by the agreement. Although my right hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins) said that I was wrong, they believe it to be a form of condominium or joint authority which was rejected out of hand by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at the time of the New Ireland Forum. That was the view of Dr. Garret FitzGerald when justifying the agreement to the Dail Eireann.

How, then, do we remove the Unionists' fear that the Union is in danger? There is one sovereign way to do so. That is to govern Northern Ireland as though it were as much a part of the United Kingdom as is England, Wales or Scotland. Then the Unionists would feel free and safe to stretch out the hand of friendship to nationalist neighbours, and to the neighbour in the south.

8.57 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): It is always an honour in a debate on Northern Ireland to be called immediately after the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison), with his unbroken record of fidelity to the interests and rights of the people of Northern Ireland as an integral part of the United Kingdom. The speech that he has just delivered would bear careful examination by the Government, both for its points of detail on the matter of security, and for the observations that he made on the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

The Anglo-Irish Agreement 18 months ago was welcomed and approved by an overwhelming majority in the House. They were not, however, left without intimations of what its consequences would be. I quote from only one expression at the time about what those consequences would be:

[Mr. J. Enoch Powell]

"the continued sequence of terrorism, murder and death in Northern Ireland which this agreement will not prevent but will maintain and foment."—[Official Report, 27 November 1985; Vol. 87, c. 955.]

This debate is therefore an important opportunity for hon. Members representing seats in other parts of the United Kingdom to understand the relationship of cause and effect between the Anglo-Irish Agreement that they approved 18 months ago and security in Northern Ireland that is being debated this evening. It is not a matter on which it is necessary, in order that hon. Members may exercise their judgment, to have a detailed knowledge of the circumstances in Ireland or in Northern Ireland, or a detailed knowledge of every element in that remarkable document, the Anglo-Irish Agreement. Simple facts that are within the reach and verification of every hon. Member will bear out the proposition that I have just stated, that there is a relationship of cause and effect between that agreement and the escalation of murder and terrorism in the Provinces, which is the subject that concerns the House today.

I shall describe that agreement in minimal terms, unique though it is. It is an international agreement that accords to another country an institutionalised voice in the internal affairs of a part of the United Kingdom. Whether or not one cares to call that a condominium, whether or not one cares to describe under that title the Anglo-Irish Conference that operates within the terms of that agreement, is a matter of taste or of emphasis; but the facts about it are not open to dispute. It was to this House that in 1982 the Prime Minister said:

"no commitment exists for Her Majesty's Government to consult the Irish Government on matters affecting Northern Ireland. That has always been our position. We reiterate and emphasise it, so that everyone is clear about it."—[Official Report, 29 July 1982; Vol. 28, c. 1226.]

After the Anglo-Irish Agreement, the Prime Minister could no longer have used those words.

The external country with which this unique arrangement was made was not just any country. It was not an agreement with Taiwan or with Outer Mongolia. It was an agreement with a neighbouring state that claims as its own the territory of that part of the United Kingdom to which alone the Anglo-Irish Agreement relates. That claim is and remains enshrined in the constitution of the state that was the other party to this treaty. It is not a claim that is taken lightly or overlooked by the political representatives of the people of that country. Indeed, they were careful, when signing the Anglo-Irish Agreement, to sign a version that did not accord to this country its full title as the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

There is another important fact about the Irish Republic. Upon the Republic's territory is based a terrorist organisation whose purpose is to bring all Ireland within a single state and thus detach Northern Ireland from the rest of the United Kingdom to which it still belongs.

No one — friend or foe, British or Irish — could contemplate this unique arrangement into which Her Majesty's Government have entered without coming to the conclusion that the British Government had lent themselves to the proposition that the purpose which the IRA sets before itself, the purpose which is embodied in the constitution of the Irish Republic, is on its way to being attained. Furthermore, no one could fail to regard that agreement and its working as part of a progress towards the attainment of that end.

Let hon. Members consider the effects of such an act upon the terrorist organisation with which we are concerned. When a terrorist organisation perceives—it is merely necessary for this purpose that there should be perception—that it is moving towards the achievement of its objective, it comes under two kinds of pressure. It is immensely encouraged to step up its activity so that the achievement may redound to its own credit. Part of the creed of the Irish Republican Army, a creed that it has entertained throughout its existence, is that the object is not worth attaining unless it is attained by means of bloodshed and violence. I say that as a simple matter of fact which anyone can verify: the attainment of its aim by violence is part of the creed and faith of the IRA.

So the first consequence upon a terrorist organisation's being presented with the prospect of success and the attainment of its objective is to spur it to increased efforts. The second is this: that organisation must make sure that when the result is attained, it is attained by its own agency. The all-Ireland state which is the objective of the IRA has to be the sort of all-Ireland state at which that organisation is aiming. Thus, the IRA has not only to be in on the act; it has to get ahead of the rate at which the act is moving: The IRA must be "there on the night".

Nothing could therefore be more guaranteed to stimulate and ensure the continuance and escalation of IRA violence than an act of state such as the Anglo-Irish Agreement, which held out to the IRA the likelihood that two Governments, and possibly a third — the United States is not disinterested in the matter—look forward to the attainment of that which has always been the IRA's objective.

The agreement has another effect which is relevant to terrorism — the effect upon those on whom terrorism battens. As has been repeatedly stated in the debate, there is a large section of the Northern Ireland population who could be classified as Catholic, Republican or anti-Unionist but who have no wish whatever to subserve the purposes or the methods of the IRA. Yet the IRA depends for its ability to operate upon at any rate the passive acquiescence of a considerable section of that part of the population. Consider the effect upon that part of the population when it is told, more graphically than words can tell it, that the British Government, as well as the Government of the Irish Republic, believe events are developing towards the attainment of the purpose of the IRA—an all-Ireland state into which Northern Ireland will be embodied.

It is perfectly easy to understand the reaction of those people. "Why," they say, "should we expose ourselves to danger, why should we take risks, in order to sustain a state that is despaired of even by the Government of the country to which it belongs?" Nothing can better promote the circumstances that terrorists need to operate than to give an assurance to those who would otherwise oppose them that in doing so they are opposing an event that has been decreed and will be brought to maturity by the very Government of the country to which they belong. Thus, it is not only the IRA but also those on whom it depends who are materially affected by what has been done. It was perfectly predictable that the action which the House approved 18 months ago would have the effects that we see developing, by which the House and the country are dismayed.

However, hon. Members faced with the assertion that a direct relationship of cause and effect exists between the Anglo-Irish Agreement and the growth of terror, may say, "But surely the IRA was operating before the Anglo-Irish Agreement? Surely there is no novelty in the terrible events that we are asked to contemplate. Surely the 16 years since 1971 have been studded in Northern Ireland by deeds of terror and murder? How, then, can you say that there is a clear and definite causal connection between the Anglo-Irish Agreement of November 1985 and the problem with which the House and the United Kingdom are now confronted?"

To that objection, there is a simple and complete answer. The Anglo-Irish Agreement was, and was seen to be, only the culmination of a political process which—with intervals and with pauses — has been pressed forward by Her Majesty's Government ever since the end of the 1960s. There has been no time since 1969 when the observer watching the Government's policies towards Northern Ireland would not say, when the IRA would not say, when those among whom the IRA live would not say, "The British Government are engaged on a course of action designed to take us in the direction the IRA wish to travel."

That condition has been present since 1969. What we are seeing and debating now is but an intensification of its consequences, because of the peculiar clarity with which the unique event of the Anglo-Irish Agreement has emphasised and brought into the open the policy on which the British Government have been engaged for the past 16 or 17 years. So there is no contradiction.

In that observation lies the answer that we seek. This is a debate about security, and much of it has naturally been taken up with specific propositions as to the manner in which security could be increased, the security forces strengthened and the IRA more surely dealt with. Yet no measures of that kind—although such measures are no doubt necessary — can be of avail if they are being counteracted by the visible fact that there all the time is the Anglo-Irish Agreement and the settled policy of Her Majesty's Government, in collusion with other Governments, bent on bringing about exactly that which is the objective of the IRA.

There will be no answer to the agony of Northern Ireland unless and until the United Kingdom is seen decisively to have abandoned a course designed to lead to the separation of Ulster from the United Kingdom and its embodiment in some kind of all-Ireland state. Until it is seen that that course of events—which, through all its varieties, has flowed on since 1969 down to the present — has been deliberately broken off by the will of Government, Parliament and people, our soldiers will fight and die in vain, the RUC will make its sacrifices in vain, and the people of that part of the United Kingdom will despair and say, "We are betrayed by the country to which it is said that we belong."

The Government have it in their power to do so. We are not completely determined by whatever were the reasons—be their fears of terrorism or political reasons of a more esoteric character — which led the Government to sign that unique and unprecedented instrument in November 1985. We are still free agents. The Government of this country are still free to make or unmake the Anglo-Irish Agreement when it comes to be reviewed. They are still free to say that they will not have an agreement that is so one-sided and seen to be usable as a means for detaching a part of the United Kingdom and embodying it in another state.

There would be no mistaking that message, or the reaction, if the Government would only give it. There was a period—it did not last many weeks—early in 1985 when there seemed to be signs that the Prime Minister did intend to go no further along the path that was to lead to the Anglo-Irish Agreement. Those of us who represent Northern Ireland seats can testify what an incredible change in the general atmosphere was produced by the Prime Minister's "Out, out, out" declaration, when people in Northern Ireland of all parties and all policies, of all expectations and all aspirations, could say, "At last, after so many years, we know where we stand. We know where our future is to be. Our future is to be within the United Kingdom, enjoying, we hope, all the rights that the rest of the United Kingdom enjoy. In any case, we know where we stand. We know where, with whom and in what country we must live and work together."

The people of Northern Ireland, despite all the calumnies against them, will live and work together if they are enabled so to do and not continually prevented by the Government giving to their terrorist enemies the assurance, "Carry on in the same way; you need fear nothing; you will attain your end; it is pre-determined." The people of Northern Ireland are pastmasters at living together. Despite all their differences of religion, perception and background, they have done so with skill and success over the centuries. They ask this House and the United Kingdom to enable them to do so again in peace.

At the commencement of his speech the Secretary of State laid out a history which started with the casualty figures of 1972, 1973 and 1974. He pointed out that, with sufficiently gross averaging, one can say that there has been a gradual diminution since that time. So indeed there has, particularly in periods such as the later 1970s, when it seemed that the continual constitutional experimentation with Northern Ireland was about to be abandoned and that the change for which we call this evening had in fact come about. But the Secretary of State should have gone back before 1972. He should have gone back to the 1960s when an IRA campaign, which was virtually restricted to the border, was successfully dealt with between 1957 and 1962. He should have gone back to the years of peace which Northern Ireland enjoyed from the middle 1920s once the secession of the Irish Free State was accepted as part of political geography. Northern Ireland was a place of peace and security over those years. It was a country in which a single murder was an event of horror and astonishment.

We have it within our power to restore that condition to our fellow countrymen in Northern Ireland. The Government have it in their power, resting on this House, to say, "We will set aside and turn our backs upon anything which could give the IRA or anyone else the conviction that ahead lies the achievement of its purpose." That is the appeal addressed tonight through this House to the Government and the Prime Minister.

9.17 pm

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): I tell the Government that at least one Unionist Member will return to Northern Ireland tomorrow who has not been disappointed by the Secretary of State's speech. I never expected the Secretary of State for one moment to have the guts to take on the Provisional IRA. I never expected the Government to be prepared to take the necessary steps to defeat terrorism in Northern Ireland. I never thought for one moment that they would be prepared to grapple with the IRA in the only way that it can be defeated—by having the resolve and a resolute security policy against terrorism in Northern Ireland. As one would require an expectation before one could be disappointed, I will not be disappointed tonight.

I listened to the pathetic utterances of the Secretary of State as he told us, "The IRA has demonstrated a new ruthlessness." Clearly the Secretary of State is unaware of the events of the past decade or more. The ruthlessness of the IRA has been seen in shapes and forms in the past 17 years that the Secretary of State obviously has allowed to pass him by. There is nothing new in the IRA's ruthlessness. No event that the IRA has carried out over the past days or weeks has caused me the least shock about its tactics or the kind of campaign that it is prepared to carry out.

In the absence of the Secretary of State, I tell the Minister of State that the Government's present policy is a failed policy. No tinkering with that policy will ever produce success with regard to security. A root and branch change is required. There must be a new security policy and above that there must be a will to win and a will to defeat terrorism, which is sadly lacking in the Government at the moment. When the will to win exists and the right policy on defeating terrorism is present, the tactics, the deployment and the number of troops will all fall into place. I suspect that if the Secretary of State continues to adopt the present security policy, he will continue to watch the obituary columns in our newspapers as more Ulster people and, sadly, more people from this side of the water die as a result of his failure and incompetence.

It is about 18 months—526 days—since I last spoke in the House. I spoke as the result of an agreement that was signed to produce peace, stability and reconciliation. It has produced the opposite. Those of us who live in Northern Ireland have seen the increased violence. Twice as many people died in the first four months of this year as died in the first four months last year, and that figure was an increase on the previous year. Those of us who have witnessed the economic and political instability and the greater division in our community recognise, even if the Government have not yet recognised, that the Anglo-Irish Agreement has not worked and will never work in Northern Ireland.

I am as angry and bitter 526 days after the signing of the agreement as I was when I first heard about it. I will never accept the Anglo-Irish Agreement, no matter what propaganda the Minister of State or his office might try to pour out. If the Government have the remotest concern or care for the lives of the people in Northern Ireland who are their responsibility, they should face up to the reality that their policy is not working, will not work and cannot stick in Northern Ireland. Once they realise that, Unionists in Northern Ireland will be prepared to work with the Government. There are Unionists in Northern Ireland who want a reasonable alternative to the agreement and there are Unionists in Northern Ireland who are prepared to work towards a replacement of that agreement. We will be willing to work with the Government and other parties to achieve that reasonable alternative replacement to the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

I will conclude because I know that the Front Bench spokesmen want to reply. We were told that the Anglo-Irish Agreement was meant to be a balance. For the intrusion into the affairs of the United Kingdom, the Government were to receive a quid pro quo in the shape of extradition, cross-border security and the recognition of Northern Ireland status. Surely the Government must now realise that they have been conned. Surely, even if the Government do not want to admit it openly, they must recognise that they gave all and got nothing. Surely they must now be prepared to face that fact and prepare themselves for a new initiative in Northern Ireland which has the vital ingredient for success—the consent of the Unionist community.

There must be that consent, which unfortunately the Liberal party spokesman, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), was not prepared to consider. He concerned himself with the fact that the nationalist community might be alienated if the Anglo-Irish Agreement was done away with. He was not in the least concerned that the vast majority of the community in Northern Ireland are alienated. If the Government accept that that alienation will never be removed without an alternative to the agreement, perhaps we have moved one short step. However, I doubt it.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Everyone called by the Chair on the Opposition Benches had a better right to speak than I and I have no complaints about that. My point is that some of us would not like it to be thought in Northern Ireland that we are not interested. I want it registered for the record that we tried to speak and are concerned with these matters.

Mr. Speaker: At the beginning of the debate, I said that a large number of right hon. and hon. Members wanted to take part. I am sorry that nine of them have not been able to do so.

9.24 pm

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): In answer to the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson) whose speech I follow, may I say that it is a pleasure for us to see him in the House, as it is to see all those hon. Members from Northern Ireland.

Mr. Maginnis: That is patronising.

Mr. Bell: The hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis), who seeks to intervene from a sedentary position, should know better than to suggest that I am patronising those who are here for the first time in 18 months.

Mr. Maginnis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bell: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that Labour Members have warmly welcomed him back and have consistently said over a period of time that the proper place for those hon. Members is in this Chamber, in the forum of the nation, and that their cause would be better heard within our islands if they were here to make it. The variety of interventions that we have heard tonight will assist the Unionists in their cause.

Mr. Maginnis rose——

Rev. Martin Smyth rose——

Mr. Bell: If the Unionists have such a belief in their cause that they should be, and are, part of the United Kingdom, they would have no hesitation in entering into competition with the nationalists in Northern Ireland who seek an Irish nationalism and an Irish dimension.

If I can begin again, we welcome back those hon. Members. We welcome the intervention of the hon. Member for Belfast, East. The peace, stability and reconciliation in Northern Ireland, to which he referred, remains not only the dream, the hope and the aspiration of the Opposition, but the reality that we shall seek during the months ahead. Whatever the Prime Minister decides elsewhere on Monday, we are confident that, as a future Government, we shall govern Northern Ireland with competence, confidence and with possibly a better equilibrium than have the present Government.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. I. Paisley) made a lengthy speech earlier, in which there was one phrase that especially caught my attention, and that probably moved the House. He said that many of us have not put our hands on curly heads who would never see their fathers back. He was referring to those who had been assassinated by the IRA and by the other paramilitary organisations that have brought death and destruction to Northern Ireland. That phrase puts this debate into context. While we are able to discuss the issues of security and of the Anglo-Irish Agreement here, out there in the real world of Northern Ireland, people are losing their lives. The IRA was responsible not only for the assassination of Lord Justice Gibson, Lady Gibson and the police officers to whom the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) referred earlier, but regularly takes justice into its own hands in a series of knee cappings and in the rough justice that is odious to the House of Commons and to the British people.

My hon. Friends and I give a modest welcome to the proposals that the Secretary of State announced earlier. [SEVERAL HON. MEMBERS; "What proposals?"] As I understood those proposals—I shall repeat them for the benefit of some hon. Members on the Benches behind me—the Secretary of State said that the Ulster Defence Regiment will be increased by 150 posts, that there will be new dispositions in relation to part-time members of the UDR and that there will be further recruitment to the RUC. As I understood it, the Secretary of State did not give a figure for that recruitment. There will also be additional support, as requested, which will help combat, more directly, the present terrorist campaign, and there will be additional helicopter resources—[Interruption.] If I can refer again to the sedentary interventions made by hon. Members on the Benches behind me, I can well imagine the frustration of the hon. Members who have not been able to speak in the debate.

The Secretary of State referred to a new zonal order in the border area which, I imagine, is a first step in making that place safer for those who pass it. We hope that the creation of a control zone, to which the Secretary of State referred, will be extended to other areas, as he suggested, and that it will be part of the general tightening up of border security. However, in our view that cannot be enough. We shall look to see how co-operation develops with the Republic of Ireland during the next few weeks and months, to see whether it will result in better security on the border.

I apologise to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds for any discourtesy to him in my not being able to hear his full speech. However, I heard the salient points relating to the role of the RUC in ordinary policing, public order, counter-insurgency and the border. He referred to some acts in Northern Ireland which are as much a disgrace to our Northern Irish society as the acts of the IRA. According to the Chief Constable's report for 1986, there have been pernicious acts of intimidation, physical abuse, petrol bomb attacks on dwellings, criminal damage, arson attacks at places of religious worship and other turbulent acts of aggression directed against the nationalist community. The intimidation that we have seen can no more be the coinage of the realm than can the shootings and bombings of the IRA.

The hon. Gentleman referred to police families who were subjected to physical and verbal abuse and to the dilemma in which such families find themselves when their homes are attacked. The figure he did not give the House, but which I shall, is that there were a staggering 500 cases of such intimidation of police men and women and their families. That is not a credit to the Unionist community; however it may wish to express itself, and however it may wish to express its desire to remain part of the United Kingdom, intimidation is not of any great assistance.

Rev. Martin Smyth rose——

Mr. Bell: While we accept the marching season as part of the democratic right of people in Northern Ireland to express themselves and their desires, a severe strain is placed on the RUC as a consequence. That must hinder its attempts to limit the more serious difficulties in Northern Ireland which are caused by the IRA.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bell: I cannot give way. Limited time is available to me and it will not help if I give way now.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North and others referred to the attitude of the Government of the Republic of Ireland. That Government are as concerned about the activities of the IRA as are the people of the United Kingdom. They have every reason to be disturbed and perturbed by its activities since it is clear that the IRA stikes at the heart of the Republic and of democracy and is as anxious to overturn the Government of the Republic as it is to overturn the Government of Northern Ireland. Therefore, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the new Government of the Republic are as anxious as the Government of the United Kingdom to curtail violence in all its forms in Northern Ireland.

In his statement on the assassination of Lord Justice and Lady Gibson, the Taoiseach referred to cruelty, brutality and stupidity. It may be as well to place on record that the cost to the Irish Exchequer directly attributable to security in Northern Ireland was about IR£157 million in 1985. That represents more than 28 per cent. of security expenditure and is about four times per head of the population more than the equivalent cost to Britain.

Mr. Beggs: That is a load of blarney.

Mr. Bell: The blarney is left to the hon. Gentleman speaking from a sedentary position.

In recent months the Garda in the Republic have made several arrests and major arms finds. In January we saw a large haul of rockets, bomb-making equipment and explosives, and we saw two arrests in County Meath. In December we saw a large haul of explosives and bomb-making equipment in County Cavan. We are as anxious as anyone for border co-operation to be improved and enhanced and so long as the Government remain we shall continue to urge enhancement and the making of full statements to the House.

[Mr. Bell]

The hon. Member for Mossley Hill referred to the document which Sinn Fein issued recently called "A Scenario for Peace". We do not think that the document is a scenario for peace, but rather a scenario for war. In an article on 3 May, The Sunday Tribune called the document "rhetorical junk" and "anti-democratic claptrap". We associate ourselves with those views and say again, as we have said often in the past, that we do not propose to have any truck with Sinn Fein. We do not believe in the principle of the ballot paper in the one hand and the Armalite in the other. We again express to the House, to the country and to those who have ears to hear, our total and outright condemnation of the Sinn Fein and the IRA.

The hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneax), in a closely reasoned speech earlier this evening that was a pleasure to listen to, in contrast to the rhetoric we heard from other Unionist Members, referred to the speech I made to the Northern Ireland Assembly some 18 months ago relating to the status of the people of Northern Ireland. It might be as well to refer to the precise words I used in the debate on the Anglo-Irish Agreement. I said:

"The status of Northern Ireland within the United Kingdom is not affected. But there is an obvious ambiguity in the status of the governance of its people."—[Official Report, 27 November 1985; Vol 87, c. 960.]

The hon. Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) and the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) referred to a condominium over the affairs of Northern Ireland. I have often referred to the possibility of a consultative condominium through the Anglo-Irish Agreement and the Anglo-Irish intergovernmental conference. I said at the time that the Government probably ought to have made that ambiguity clearer to the people of Northern Ireland and sold harder the concept behind the Anglo-Irish Agreement. The first Anglo-Irish intergovernmental conference on 22 April 1987 between the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and Mr. Brian Lenihan, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of the Republic, shows that the Anglo-Irish Agreement remains actively in force notwithstanding the 18 months' boycott of this House by the right hon. and hon. Members from Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East referred to peace, stability and reconciliation in Northern Ireland. Those words were used by the Prime Minister when she introduced the Anglo-Irish Agreement and those words are as important today as they were at the time. We have heard a great deal about the Anglo-Irish Agreement and about security. While the Unionists are back in the House, it may well be that they will equally turn their attention to devolution. The future of Northern Ireland remains in their hands, as it always has over the past 18 months. The Anglo-Irish Agreement makes it clear that devolution is an avenue for them. They can return to their own Assembly if that is what they wish. They can return to systems of local government in Northern Ireland and they can return to systems——

Rev. Martin Smyth: The hon. Gentleman cannot continue to make such statements if he will not give way.

Mr. Bell: I give way.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman giving way. At times he does seem to have the wrong end of the stick. For example, on the media this morning he said that in Northern Ireland last year there were 2,000 parades against the Anglo-Irish Agreement. Tonight he is misleading either himself or the House by suggesting that, with the Anglo-Irish Agreement in place, we can return to a devolved Government if we want. He knows that it is circumscribed and that even if there was a devolved Government, the Anglo-Irish Conference would still continue, with a greater input into the affairs of Northern Ireland than this House.

Mr. Bell: The hon. Gentleman did not deny that there were 2,000 marches against the Anglo-Irish Agreement and that there were additional marches in the marching season, most of which went off peacefully. Devolution goes to the heart of the Anglo-Irish Agreement. I addressed the Northern Ireland Assembly 18 months ago and I made it very clear that the future of Northern Ireland was in the hands of its representatives. They could have had devolution and it is still available to them. the fact that they are back in the House for this important debate is an important step for democracy in Northern Ireland. That democracy can be further strengthened as time goes by and as they put their minds to forms of devolution that will give back to them the power to look after their own Northern Ireland in the way that they seek.

Sooner or later they must come to terms with the Anglo-Irish Agreement. That agreement has the support not only of the Government who brought it about but of the opposition parties which in this debate have repeated their support for the agreement. The Anglo-Irish Agreement will be as intact after the next election as it is now. We hope that the presence of the Unionists in this debate is an indication of a little more forward thinking and a more positive approach in the interests of the 1·5 million people who live in Northern Ireland. They look to their leaders for leadership that will meet their aspirations and they look to them to defend their corner in relation to the United Kingdom in a way that meets those aspirations. We welcome this debate and the hon. Members who have taken part. As I said earlier, we give a modest welcome to the Government's proposals on security in Northern Ireland.

9.40 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Nicholas Scott): We meet for this debate because of an upsurge in violence in Northern Ireland that has cost the lives of civilians, policemen, soldiers — including members of the UDR—and Northern Ireland's second most senior judge and his wife.

In expressing sympathy to those who have been bereaved and to those who have been injured in this upsurge in violence, I also clearly reiterate the determination and the will of the Government that those who are guilty of these outrages shall not succeed in their campaign.

In a not untypical contribution to the debates in this House, the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. I. Paisley) made a particularly disgraceful reference to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. The hon. Gentleman accused my right hon. Friend of making no reference at all in his statement of 27 April to the death of an Ulster Defence Regiment soldier during this upsurge in violence. I refer the House to Hansard for that date. My right hon. Friend said:

"The House will be aware of the recent serious increase in the number of casualties which have been caused by terrorist actions. In the last week in particular, two members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, one Ulster Defence Regiment soldier and three civilians have been murdered. The civilian deaths were of the foreman of a building company, and most recently the murder of Lord Justice Gibson and Lady Gibson."—[Official Report, 27 April, 1987; Vol. 115, c. 21.]

[Interruption.] I hope that the hon. Member for Antrim, North will have the good grace to withdraw the allegation that he made about my right hon. Friend.

Rev. Ian Paisley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is quite clear from that debate that the Secretary of State referred to the death of Lord Justice Gibson as the most recent one. His death was not the most recent. The Minister of State should not lie to the House.

Mr. Scott: The record of Hansard is a direct contradiction of what was said by the hon. Gentleman for Antrim, North and I am saddened but not surprised that he should have behaved in this fashion.

Rev. Ian Paisley: On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker. Let me make it clear to the House that when the Secretary of State took me up on a point I went and checked Hansard. I never said that which he attributed to me. Let him go up the stairs now and read it.

Rev. William McCrea: The Minister should withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This has been a good-tempered debate and I hope that it will continue in that way.

Mr. Scott: If the hon. Gentleman checks Hansard for himself, he will see that what I have said is absolutely accurate and I hope that in due course he will withdraw.

I shall now turn to the questions that were raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) and the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton). They asked about the circumstances that led to the murder of the Gibson family. Inquiries are still proceeding into the precise circumstances, and I am sure that the House will understand if I do not go into the security arrangements that are made for the reception and transfer of people at border areas, especially when such people are under great threat.

The experience described to the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) may occur on occasion but it is certainly not an established pattern.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: It happened to me.

Mr. Scott: It may have happened to my hon. Friend, but I hope that he will understand that the security forces on both sides of the border are at pains to ensure that a particular pattern is not allowed to develop—for the protection of the security forces themselves and for those within their charge. There has been much loose talk——

Mr. Maginnis: Will the Minister clarify for the House, once and for all, the statement that he has just made to the effect that he has not yet completed investigations into the murder of Lord Justice and Lady Gibson? Will he then tell us why the Northern Ireland Office has allowed—indeed, encouraged—the idea that Lord Justice Gibson was somehow, through his own carelessness, responsible for his own death? Will the Minister please clarify that, and stop adding insult to injury on that matter, which was a tragedy to that family and to all the people of Ulster?

Mr. Scott: I have said nothing about that and nor has the Northern Ireland Office. The investigations into the murder of Sir Maurice and Lady Gibson are being conducted by the RUC; and when it has completed its investigation it will inform us of the outcome. Of course, in the aftermath of an incident such as this, the Chief Constable has instituted an inquiry into security procedures for all VIPs who are escorted in the Province, particularly for those crossing the border, and especially for judges. A detailed inquiry is being carried out into the circumstances of that brutal murder. When it has been completed, any lessons that may need to be learned will, of course, be applied by the RUC. I would hesitate to leap to the sort of judgment that others have made until that time.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) made a point that my hon. Friends and I have not infrequently made. In Northern Ireland, there is an interaction between the three elements of the economic, the security and the political positions. By definition, it is almost impossible to act on one of those elements, or to fail to act on one of them, without having an impact on the other two. I take that for granted. That means that there can be no purely security solution to the position in Northern Ireland—because we have to act on all three aspects that confront us.

I was interested and depressed to hear from the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West about his conversations with young people in Northern Ireland. In this instance, I agreed with the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) that those to whom the right hon. and learned Member spoke were not typical of young people in Northern Ireland today. Many of them spend a great deal of their time and energy on bridging the divides in Northern Ireland, and on seeking to find ways—through leisure and academic activities, and so on—to co-operate with one another, in the hope that they will build a better future.

Mr. Archer: I wish to make it clear that I wholly endorse the Minister's last sentence. I did not suggest that the majority of young people in Northern Ireland are of the frame of mind of those people that I mentioned. For the purposes of the argument, it is enough if a minority of them are.

Mr. Scott: I was anxious that the impression should not go out that the people to whom the right hon. and learned Gentleman spoke were typical of young people in Northern Ireland. He also said that Ministers in Northern Ireland should listen to those in the local community. When I first became a Minister there, the tradition of open ministerial doors was borne in on me—of people being able to come in to see Ministers. I see that a former Minister in Stormont—the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor)—is in his place tonight. There is a tradition of Ministers being ready to receive deputations about matters that would never be raised with a Minister by members of the public here. Ministers in this Administration and in previous ones have sought to keep that tradition going in Northern Ireland. We are always ready to listen and I am sad only that there are some in the Province who have been unwilling to come to put their views to us in recent months.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Sir H. Atkins) made what conceivably could be his last speech in this place. I shall be sad if it turns out to be so. I have no knowledge of impending events other than that which is possessed by everyone else. My right hon. Friend has served in this place with great distinction for 33 years, including service on the Front Bench, in the Whips Office and as a member of the Cabinet. If he does not make another speech in this Chamber, I say as someone who is much his junior, that he can be proud of the contribution that he made to this debate, which was wise, statesmanlike and serious in tone. I am sure that we all wish my right hon. Friend well if it turns out to be his final speech. I hope especially that the appeal with which he ended it to the leaders of the Church and politics in Northern Ireland to play a constructive part in the future of Northern Ireland will not fall on deaf ears.

The right hon. Member for Lagan Valley spoke of the Anglo-Irish Agreement coming apart at the seams. Let me disappoint him by saying that nothing could be further from the truth. His description of the design and workings of the agreement bears no relation to reality. He and his hon. Friends have opted out of contact with the Government in Northern Ireland. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I know that solid progress has been made within the terms of the agreement, not least in the area of cross-border security co-operation, and we intend to contribute to it.

Mr. Beggs: Will the Minister give way? I wish to raise a matter that involves my constituents.

Mr. Scott: With respect, I shall not give way. I have given way a number of times already and the House knows that I always give way. I shall not do so on this occasion, however, because I have restricted my reply so as to allow other hon. Members to participate in the debate.

I have dealt already with one of the matters raised by the hon. Member for Antrim, North. He referred to remarks made by the Rev. Robert Dickinson, a former moderator of the Presbyterian Church in Northern Ireland. It was clear from the meeting which my right hon. Friend had with the present leader of the Presbyterian Church in Northern Ireland earlier this week and from their remarks afterwards on television that they take a much more constructive view of affairs in Northern Ireland than does Dr. Dickinson. I find it especially offensive that Dr. Dickinson should have accused my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister of being in some sort of conspiracy, and just as guilty as IRA members, when she was a victim of the IRA in the attack on the Grand hotel at Brighton. I hope that Dr. Dickinson will reconsider his remarks.

The hon. Member for Antrim, North found, of course, another confidential document to read out. He had a confidential document released to him after the last meeting of the Anglo-Irish intergovernmental conference, and I read it with great care. I think that there were seven points in it, and in not one of them was there a scintilla of truth that reflected the reality of what happened at that conference. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was seeking deliberately to mislead, but I cannot believe that that would be true. On the other hand, he may have been sold a pup by someone outside and he decided to repeat the words that had been given to him.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) referred in an intervention to the allegations that again are current, and which were made by Messrs Wallace and Holroyd, about the conduct of the security forces in Northern Ireland. These are matters for the Defence Ministers. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces has already given a substantive reply on these matters. Defence Ministers assure us that these allegations have been fully and carefully investigated and that there is not a shred of evidence to substantiate any of them. I am satisfied.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds outlined the tasks that fall to the RUC these days. It carries out ordinary policing and responds to public order threats which, in my view, places an additional and unnecessary burden on it in the fight against terrorism. I know that the whole House pays tribute to the RUC for the work that it does in that area. My hon. Friend mentioned also—this was taken up by the hon. Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder)—the guarding, as he put it, of an international border, and suggested that it is a task that would be better carried out by the Army.

Not infrequently, the RUC will ask the Army to operate on the border. Those who cross the border regularly will find quite often that the first security force presence that they encounter is that of a member of the Army. This is under the control of the RUC and it is for it to judge the best use of resources that are available to it, whether members of the RUC or members of the Army, in the tasks that have to be undertaken. It would be bad if as a matter of principle rather than a flexible practice the RUC were seen to be driven away from the border of the United Kingdom. That would be playing into the IRA's hands. The flexible response used by the RUC is very much better.

I thought my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds was a little unfair in accusing my right hon. Friend and me of not being willing to consult members of the Police Federation for Northern Ireland. He knows that if they wish to talk to me, he has just to pick up the telephone. I am prepared to talk to them, as is my right hon. Friend, if he is available, and to discuss proposals for legislation or any other matters. There is a distinction between us listening to them about general security matters, about which any deputation can talk to Ministers, and them seeking to involve Ministers in operational judgments and decisions, which must be made properly through the Royal Ulster Constabulary command to the Chief Constable and the normal management structures that exist for that purpose.

The hon. Gentleman for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) referred to the Waterside RUC station. There is no doubt —I have made it public on many occasions—that the IRA's campaign of intimidation against public contractors has had a significant effect on the police building programme, but most contracts are going ahead. With the assistance of the Royal Engineers, we are making substantial progress, and we are determined that this tactic will not succeed.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) referred to what I would call border sensitivity. Where security forces in both jurisdictions must operate right up against the border in pursuit of the common enemy, we must be understanding and not overly sensitive about incursions. Deliberate incursions and invasions of the sovereignty of a country are another matter. We must be sensitive to the needs of the security forces in seeking to defeat the common enemy, if there are incursions from one side of the border to the other.

Let us come back to the fundamentals. Not for the first time are we experiencing a resurgence of violence in Northern Ireland. My right hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne said that he had experienced that during his time as Secretary of State. I understand the frustration and anger of those who suffer, but the danger is that this House is driven into an emotional response and into taking action that it would not otherwise take. As the right hon. Member for Warley, West said, confronted with this situation we must apply our minds to the problem. The IRA is a dedicated, ruthless and cynical terrorist organisation, operating with no standards or rules. We must be equally professional, but we must not abandon the standards appropriate for a liberal democracy to protect itself against an onslaught by a terrorist organisation.

It is easy and understandable, but wrong, when things go well to imagine that we are on a winning streak that will last for ever. It is equally wrong, when things go badly, to imagine that the IRA is winning. I do not believe for one moment that it is. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in his opening speech that, measured against any of the targets which a terrorist organisation sets, the judgment must be that the IRA is not winning the campaign. It is able to sustain it for the moment, but it is not undermining the RUC, defeating the British Army or breaking the will of the House or the people of this country. I believe that our security strategy is right and should be pursued but, of course, we and the security forces will be anxious to consider any new tactics employed by the IRA and will be ready to take the steps necessary to defeat it.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Northern Ireland (Police)

10.11 pm

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are about to debate one of the two items of legislation that ought to have been brought before the House as Bills rather than by Order in Council. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) has a clear idea of the changes that would be required to put the RUC on the same footing as its counterparts in Great Britain, but the Government have deprived the House of any opportunity to debate separately, vote on and remove those offensive variations. For that reason, with great regret, we have to regard participation in this debate as a mere sham. Anything that we might say in the course of the debate would not alter one comma of the order. For that reason, we shall confine ourselves to voting against the motion at the end.

10.12 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I beg to move,

That the draft Police (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 16th December, be approved.

The purpose of the order is to introduce new procedures for dealing with complaints against the RUC which are broadly in line with those which apply in England and Wales, but supplemented by additional measures which take account of the particular sensitivities of policing in Northern Ireland.

In considering these measures, the House will recognise that the members of the RUC, with commendable spirit and dedication, continue to carry out their duties in a professional and impartial manner, and in a way that demonstrates their commitment to the maintenance of law and order and to the defeat of terrorism. They have also shown tremendous courage in the face of a vicious and continuing terrorist campaign. So far this year nine policemen have been murdered; the whole community owes them an immeasurable debt of gratitude, as it does to all the men and women of the RUC, particularly those who have lost their lives over the past 16 years. Of course, the House sympathises most sincerely with their families. The RUC is, and will remain, the linchpin of the Government's law and order and security policies.

However, the difficult circumstances of policing in Northern Ireland, the pressures faced by the RUC and the varying degrees of community tension, combine to strike at the basis of the relationship between the police and the public. As a result, there are many occasions on which that relationship faces greater strain than it would under more normal circumstances. Where that leads to disputes or disagreement, and where the conduct of police officers gives rise to legitimate cause for complaint, I believe it is vital, in the interests of all concerned, that complaints are properly investigated—and seen to be so—in a way with which both the police and the public can be satisfied.

Those of us who recall the debates about police complaints procedures that took place in this House during the passage of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 will no doubt also recall the principles upon which the complaints system for England and Wales is based, but I think that it would be appropriate at this stage briefly to remind the House of those principles, because they apply equally to the system that is to be introduced in Northern Ireland.

The Government remain convinced that the best way to deal with complaints against the police is through a procedure that can command support from the public and in which the police can have confidence. Above all, the procedure must not only be effective; it must be accountable. By that I mean that, while the responsibility for carrying out complaints investigations must remain with the police whose experience and training best fit them for the task, the conduct of the investigations must be subject to the control and direction of a public body, with effective and extensive supervisory powers, that is independent of both the police and the Government.

I believe that the procedure for handling complaints that is contained in this order and that is based on these principles will make a substantial contribution towards the development of effective policing in Northern Ireland. It will provide reassurance to the public that the investigation of complaints will be both thorough and effective; it will help to strengthen police morale by being impartial and fair; and, perhaps most important of all, I believe that it can enhance the relationship between the police and the public by helping to foster a climate of mutual co-operation in which the police can become better placed to serve and protect the interests of the whole community.

I turn now to the detailed provisions of the order, which are couched in terms with which Members of this House will already be familiar. However, while the proposed system for Northern Ireland closely resembles that which operates in England and Wales, it contains additional provisions that I will mention as they arise.

Article 2 deals with interpretation, and in particular provides that the order is to apply to the regular RUC, full-time members of the RUC reserve and, unlike the current arrangements, to the part-time RUC members as well. In Northern Ireland, the part-time reservists carry out a wide range of operational duties in support of the regular force. Indeed, the general public and terrorist organisations do not usually distinguish between one category of member and another. Therefore, I believe it right that all members of the RUC and its reserve should come within the scope of the new arrangements.

In line with the provisions in England and Wales, the order adopts the concept of "appropriate authority", which in Northern Ireland will be either the police authority or the Chief Constable, but it departs from the British procedures by allowing a complaint to be made by a third party on behalf of a member of the public without the complainant's written consent. Of course, the third party should have the complainant's verbal consent, but since the police will wish to interview the complainant himself early in the investigation they can test the veracity of his complaint at that time and need not proceed with the case if the complainant does not wish to substantiate it.

That is the current position in Northern Ireland, and the police, together with a number of interested parties who responded to our proposals are content to let it stand. Given that the police in England and Wales have been given discretion to act upon a complaint without checking whether or not the third party has obtained the complainant's written consent, I firmly believe that, on balance, it is more important for complaints to be recorded and investigated promptly rather than to protect the interests of a third party who might register a complaint on another's behalf.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Will my hon. Friend confirm that, when the question of allowing an aggrieved person to have a complaint made on his behalf without his written consent was considered by the Standing Committee on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, the Committee threw it out and that it is no longer part of the Act governing the police in England and Wales? Will he also confirm that thereby he is making an exception and departing from something that this House considered and rejected in respect of all other police forces?

Mr. Scott: I respond in two ways. First, the existing procedure in Northern Ireland is operated perfectly satisfactorily by the RUC. Secondly, Home Office guidance to the British forces specifically states:

"Discretion should be exercised before asking a third party for evidence of the original complainant's written consent to his passing on a complaint. In particular, where a solicitor indicates in forwarding a complaint that he is doing so on instructions from a client, the complaint should be treated without challenge as having been made by the client direct to the chief officer."

That is specific, and I repeat the first sentence:

"Discretion should be exercised before asking a third party for evidence of the original complainant's written consent to his passing on a complaint."

Of course, we consulted the RUC about this matter because we knew that it had been discussed in the House, and as a result the Deputy Chief Constable indicated that he agreed with our assessment of the current position. We consulted him in the following terms:

"In the light of various comments received on the Consultative paper, it has been concluded that the proposed requirement for written authorisation when making a complaint on behalf of another would be widely perceived as a retrograde step. No written consent is required at present in such circumstances and there is no evidence to suggest that this requirement would substantially reduce the number of malicious and frivolous complaints. The disadvantages in adding this requirement to the present system could well outweigh any hoped for advantages."

The Deputy Chief Constable agreed with our assessment of the current position and our intention to retain it. We were therefore right to introduce this modest difference in practice between what happens in Northern Ireland and in England and Wales.

Article 3 establishes the Independent Commission for Police Complaints for Northern Ireland and abolishes the Police Complaints Board for Northern Ireland and schedule 1 provides for the constitution, membership and administration of the commission.

Article 4 outlines the preliminary steps to be taken by the Chief Constable on receipt of a complaint and is in line with the procedures that apply in England and Wales. Article 5, which sets out the procedure for investigating complaints about the conduct of an officer of the rank of chief superintendent or below, is again in line with the procedures that exist here. However, because the order can apply only to the RUC, it cannot include a provision requiring a chief officer of another United Kingdom police force to comply with a request from the Chief Constable of the RUC to provide an officer to conduct a formal investigation. Nevertheless, since Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary has undertaken to arrange for the provision of investigating officers, in response to requests from the Chief Constable, I am confident that such appointments will be made as and when necessary.

Article 6 deals with the investigation of complaints against senior officers and, once again, is in line with the provisions that exist here. The "appropriate authority" for senior officers is the Police Authority for Northern Ireland.

Article 7 deals with the reference of complaints to the commission. Here we have supplemented the Great Britain procedures by providing that all complaints that require formal investigation must be referred to the commission within a period to be specified in regulations. The commission will therefore be able to exercise, at an early stage, its obligatory or discretionary powers of supervision. In addition, regulations will provide that copies of all complaints that have been resolved informally will be sent to the commission so that it will have a full and complete picture of the entire complaints process.

Article 8 deals with the reference of other matters to the commission — in particular, its involvement in "public interest" matters. Perhaps it would help the House if I explained these provisions and the purpose behind them in some detail. Article 8(1) allows the appropriate authority — either the Police Authority for Northern Ireland or the Chief Constables to refer a non-complaint matter to the commission if it considers that it ought to be referred because of its gravity or exceptional circumstances. Such matters will not be the subject of a specific complaint, but might concern allegations about the conduct of police officers coming to light through reports in the media, or as a result of internal police disciplinary inquiries. The provision is completely in line with that applying in England and Wales and gives the commission power to decide whether it should supervise the investigation. The benefits of this system have been highlighted by the Police Complaints Authority in Great Britain, which, in its first report, noted that on 72 occasions chief constables had invited it to supervise the investigation of matters into which the police themselves had initiated inquiries though under no obligation to refer them to the Police Complaints' Authority in the first instance.

However, article 8(2) is an important supplement to those powers and does not apply in England and Wales. It gives the Secretary of State, or the Police Authority, power to refer a non-complaint matter to the commission if they believe it is desirable in the public interest that the commission should supervise the investigation.

Again, the alleged misconduct of an officer will not be the subject of a formal complaint but may have occurred in circumstances which have aroused widespread public disquiet, sufficient to warrant the commission's involvement. But, unlike the previous provision, judgment about the seriousness of the matter and an assessment of the need to safeguard the interests of the public will rest with either the Secretary of State or the Police Authority and after consultation with the Chief Constable. The power will not be used solely in response to media pressure, and I would expect that even in the face of such pressure many cases would not warrant the use of the power. Good judgment will be essential and decisions to refer the matter to the commission will be taken only in the most exceptional cases and after a careful assessment of those factors which, in terms of seriousness or "public interest", not only warrant the commission's obligatory involvement but set the matter apart from those non-complaint cases which the Chief Constable would ordinarily have been expected to refer under article 8(1) and where the commission's involvement would have been discretionary.

The combined effect of the powers given by this article, together with those given to the commission by article 9 will, in my view, provide a much more effective alternative to the existing power given to the Chief Constable and the Police Authority by section 13 of the Police Act (Northern Ireland) 1970. That provides for the Chief Constable, at his own discretion, or at the direction of the Police Authority, to refer a specific complaint, affecting or appearing to affect the public interest, to a tribunal for consideration. However, the powers to convene a tribunal have been used only once, and the tribunal proved totally inadequate as a means of investigating a specific complaint. It had no power to subpoena witnesses, take evidence on oath or call for the production of documentary evidence, and was therefore unable to obtain evidence which would warrant criminal or disciplinary proceedings against the police officers concerned.

It was clear, therefore, that there was an overriding need to protect the interests of the public in complaint and, indeed, non-complaint matters. During the consultation period which followed publication of the proposals for reform the Government were urged to retain the section 13 tribunal and to strengthen its powers by providing that it could subpoena witnesses, call for the production of documentary evidence and take evidence on oath.

However, the Government rejected this course of action for two principal reasons. First, even in a strengthened form the section 13 tribunal would have remained no more than an inquisitorial tribunal which, to get at the truth, would have had to grant witnesses immunity from prosecution. Its findings would have been unlikely to have resulted in the prosecution of individual officers and its value as a means of reassuring the public would have been minimal.

Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, the Government took the view that the credibility and public standing of the new commission would be seriously undermined if more than one body was given powers in relation to complaints investigations. That is why those powers have been concentrated in the hands of the commission, which will be able to apply its extensive and effective surpervisory powers to the investigation of both formal complaints and non-complaints matters. I believe that these measures will serve to increase the effectiveness of police investigations into complaints and will, in turn, provide a greater opportunity not only to reassure the public that the truth has been discovered but to ensure that police officers who commit disciplinary or criminal offences will more readily be brought to book.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): Would an inquiry such as the Stalker inquiry be necessary in the future, or would the commission undertake that work if such a situation arose?

Mr. Scott: It is impossible to speculate about that, but I believe that in matters where general public concern is being expressed in Northern Ireland this would be one way of dealing with those matters, and perhaps the most effective way of dealing with them quickly and effectively. However, in the particular circumstances of any case it would be for the Government of the day to decide what action they thought was most appropriate.

Article 9 deals with the supervision of investigations by the commission and specifies the types of case in which the commission must exercise its supervisory powers and those in which it may do so at its discretion. The supervisory powers given to the commission are in line with those given to the Police Complaints Authority in England and Wales. The commission will be able to approve or disapprove the choice of investigating officer even when one has already been appointed. It will be able to keep in close touch with the investigation throughout its course. It may require the Chief Constable to provide additional resources to the investigation and, finally, it will be required to issue a statement saying whether it was satisfied with the conduct of the investigation. These powers are exactly the same as those given to the PCA here.

Article 10 specifies the steps that are to be taken after the investigation; and, again, the procedures are fully in line with those which exist here. As regards senior officers, the Police Authority has a duty to refer the report of an investigation to the Director of Public Prosecution, except where it is satisfied that no criminal offence has been committed. As in England and Wales, the power of the Chief Constable to decide whether a member should be charged will relate only to minor criminal offences. However, there is a safeguard in this to which I will refer in a moment.

Article 11 outlines the steps that are to be taken where the accused has admitted the charges. Article 12 deals with the powers of the commission to direct reference of reports to the DPP. Both are in line with the procedures adopted for England and Wales, the latter providing the safeguard which I mentioned earlier, where, if the Chief Constable decides that a member should not be charged with a minor criminal offence, the commission may overturn his decision and direct him to refer the matter to the DPP.

Articles 13 to 17 are in line with the arrangements for England and Wales and I will not go into them here.

Part III of the order begins with article 20, which amends section 26 of the Police Act (Northern Ireland) 1970 and provides powers to make discipline regulations for reserve constables. The Secretary of State already has powers under section 25 of the Police Act 1970 to make regulations governing disciplinary matters for the regular force and, therefore, the existing regulations will be amended to take account of the changes which have been adopted in England and Wales. The amendments will cover the procedures of disciplinary hearings and of appeals from such hearings, and will provide that punishment by dismissal, requirement to resign or reduction in rank will not be imposed on an officer of chief superintendent or below unless he has been afforded the opportunity to be legally represented. In addition, the appeals procedures will be statutorily regulated in line with Great Britain.

Since it is our intention to revise the discipline regulations, we have given careful consideration to the issue of discriminatory behaviour. As the House will recall, discrimination on the grounds of racial origin has been made a specific disciplinary offence in England and Wales. We thought it appropriate to introduce a similar offence in Northern Ireland, but that it should be broadened to take account of religious belief and political opinion. We addressed this issue in line with the extensive anti-discrimination measures which have applied across the board since the Northern Ireland Constitution Act was passed in 1973. This made it unlawful for all Northern Ireland Government Departments, any local body, a range of authorities, boards and public bodies to discriminate on religious or political grounds. In effect, therefore, rather than singling out the police, we are seeking to ensure that in the exercise of their duties the police are subject to the same constraints as the members and staff of other public service organisations in Northern Ireland. However, in response to representations from the Police Federation, we have agreed to give further thought to the wording of this offence and will consider it again when drafting the regulations in question.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I should like to get one matter clear. My hon. Friend is saying that it is part of the public law that all other civil servants in Northern Ireland should not discriminate. Of course, that is true. However, that law applies equally to the police no more and no less than to any other public servant. Why does my hon. Friend think that that should be extended, uniquely in the case of the police, in their discipline regulations?

Mr. Scott: Parliament, having decided on its approach to matters on this side of the water, decided to make discrimination on the gound of racial origin a specific disciplinary offence. Public opinion in Northern Ireland would have found it surprising if, in the particular circumstances of Northern Ireland, we did not include a similar offence in terms of religious or political discrimination which are more relevant to the situation in Northern Ireland. However, in response to representations from the Police Federation, we have agreed to give further thought to the wording of the offence and we will consider it again when drafting the regulations. There will be every opportunity for the Police Federation, and other interested bodies, to be involved in the consultative process on those regulations.

Article 21 of this order follows the procedures adopted in England and Wales and gives the constituent sections of the Police Association — which includes the Police Federation — specific representative rights at disciplinary proceedings, or on an appeal from such proceedings. Again, in line with the provisions that exist here, article 22 prevents a member who has been charged and either acquitted or convicted of a criminal offence from being charged with a disciplinary offence which is in substance the same. It also provides that no statement in the course of informal resolution of a complaint may be admissible in subsequent criminal, civil or disciplinary proceedings unless it consists of, or includes, an admission relating to a matter that falls to be resolved informally.

Article 23 follows the procedures adopted here by providing for the Secretary of State to issue guidance to the Chief Constable about the discharge of his functions under this order and otherwise in connection with discipline. It also requires the commission to have regard to any guidance given by the Secretary of State on matters affecting the preferring or withdrawing of disciplinary charges. The guidance we intend to issue will be similar to that issued by the Home Office.

Article 24 deals with the constitution and proceedings of the Police Association and allows the Secretary of State, after consultation with the association, to make regulations enabling the association or any of its sections, which includes the Police Federation, to make rules regarding its constitution and proceedings. Again, that is in line with the provisions that exist in England and Wales and follows the recommendations of Sir Edmund Davies in this respect.

Article 25 allows the Chief Constable to investigate complaints against traffic wardens and for the Police Authority to deal with such complaints. Articles 26 and 27 set out the various amendments and repeals. Schedule 1 deals with the constitution and membership of the new commission and schedule 2 with repeals.

In bringing forward this legislation, I am conscious of the considerable measure of support for the RUC which already exists within the law-abiding community in Northern Ireland, and that the RUC, by upholding the law in an impartial but effective manner, continues to strengthen its acceptability throughout the community. However, attitudes to policing, which have at times been coloured by events of the immediate or distant past, continue to be influenced by those who, for political purposes, would seek to create and exploit divisions in the community by bringing a political dimension to policing where none exists; and by lawless elements who wish to diminish and undermine the effectiveness of the RUC to create an unstable environment in which their own brand of subversion might flourish. Against that background, it is important for the whole community in Northern Ireland, and not least for the police themselves, for support for the police to be developed and strengthened in a responsive and positive manner.

However, it is also important to recognise that an effective procedure for handling complaints against the RUC will not, of itself, cure all the real or imagined ills that affect the relationship between the police and the public, and that no matter how effective the police investigation may be, nor how closely supervised, it must nevertheless operate within the constraints of the ordinary criminal law. Police officers suspected of committing criminal or disciplinary offences must have the same rights and privileges as members of the general public who may be suspected of breaking the law. As the Police Complaints Authority in England and Wales stated in its first report:

> "No one is the less a citizen for being a policeman and every police officer is entitled to a citizen's rights. These include being presumed innocent of crime or indiscipline until the contrary is proved. The standard of proof prescribed by law is the same for both criminal and disciplinary charges; they must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt".

Nevertheless, every citizen has a right to expect that those whose duty it is to uphold the law will do so in a way that reflects the considerable trust and responsibility that is placed upon them. While the vast majority of police officers already fulfil that expectation, those whose behaviour gives rise to legitimate cause for complaint must expect their conduct to be thoroughly but fairly investigated in order that appropriate remedial action can be taken. That is in the wider interest of the force itself. I firmly believe that these measures strike the correct balance between the need to protect the interests of the public and the need to safeguard the rights of the police, and I commend them to the House.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): In response to the Minister's comments about the order, I should like to say first that I agree absolutely with him that where there is a divided community, such as we have in Northern Ireland, where there is a problem with policing, if only people would face up to it, and where there is a historical dimension to that problem, it is essential from the policing and public points of view that there is a complaints procedure that will stand up to scrutiny and that will be seen by the entire community to be effective, fair and just. It should be effective, fair and just not only to the complainant, but to the person against whom the complaint is made.

I should like to preface my remarks by saying that I should not like my comments on this—I want to make several points—to be construed, in any way, as police bashing. They are certainly not that. Nor should I like them to be seen as a way of providing ourselves with the machinery for witch hunts. I certainly do not want that because I know how counter-productive that can be. I have seen it over the years. However, I have also seen the way in which a proper means to process complaints can eat into the attitude that exists in a community, which eventually will come to see policing as a problem—not in a political context, but in that of a divided community, where policing is essential for a stable and just society. That is the end towards which we must work, and this is one of the means of doing so.

I have criticisms of this procedure, but I shall not dwell on them for too long, because many of them are self-evident. First, I am neither happy nor convinced that the proper machinery for a police complaints procedure involves the investigation being performed by the police. It is essential, especially with the tensions and divisions that exist in the north of Ireland, to have an independent investigative body. That body should be independent of the police if it is to make the sort of investigations which, of necessity, must be made in most cases. At the end of the procedure, it must at least be said that there was an independent investigation. We should not have clouds hanging it over as has happened in the past, when the accusation has been made immediately, "How can one expect justice when the police are investigating the police?" That would be a fundamental flaw.

This order would be good for a normal society and it would certainly be an advance on the complaints procedure that exists. However, in a divided society and in one that has the problems of the north of Ireland, the order has a crucial and fundamental omission and one that, in the last analysis, will have a detrimental effect on the working of the entire procedure. It is a mistake to have eliminated altogether the section 13 tribunal, to which the Minister referred. A section 13 tribunal with judicial powers could cope with many of the problems much more satisfactorily, from a public point of view. However, it would also have the teeth and the ability to deal with certain circumstances affecting the public interest. I have my doubts about whether the new procedure will do that.

I should like to make a brief point about the means of making complaints. The first and obvious point relates to the place where the complaint is made. It may seem basic, but the vast majority of the complaints that are made against the police are made by people who are dealing with a reasonably small issue, not with the type of issue that will hit the headlines, not the Samuel Devenney type of issue or the John Stalker type of issue. It is a small issue which may revolve round personality clashes or something much more serious. But that person must go into a police station to make the complaint and I remind the House that police stations in Northern Ireland are not what they are here. In most circumstances they are almost fortified camps. The person is invariably young or from the other side of the tracks and he must enter what he will regard as an alien environment. He is then expected to place his hope and trust in the complaints procedure.

I have gone with young people to police stations to make complaints and it is no joke for such young people to go into an interrogation room and make a complaint. That does not lend itself to confidence in the process or begin to help a young person have confidence in the procedure. I ask the Minister to look into that as it is crucially important in making the complaint.

The Minister referred to complaints being made through a third party—either a public representative or a clergyman or solicitor. Unfortunately, the order implies that a complaint can be made only to the police. That is not written into the order, but is tucked away in the explanatory document on page four, section 16. A third party complaint system should be included in the order because it is crucial, especially in the north of Ireland where it is important that someone besides the aggrieved person can make a complaint.

In its letter to hon. Members the Police Federation for Northern Ireland states that a third-party complaint system is "probably the ultimate in mischievous busy-bodying."

I believe that it will work in the opposite direction. A responsible person advising an aggrieved person will at least be able to evaluate the position and may make a direct contact with the police outside the complaints procedure and iron out the problem. Therefore, far from being busy-bodying, the involvement of a third party may be a positive step and could greatly benefit all concerned.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument. Does he agree that the aggrieved party would have to consent to the intervention of the third party, whether a clergyman or some such person? How does he propose that that consent should be demonstrated—in writing or merely orally?

Mr. Mallon: Page four of the explanatory document does not require that consent, and for good reason. Often people coming to my clinics to complain say, "I do not want an official complaint because if I submit one, they will lean on me."

Sir Eldon Griffiths: That is the aggrieved person?

Mr. Mallon: Yes. A person wanting to make a complaint to the authorities feels vulnerable. I have seen that. Young people are especially vulnerable when they take complaints themselves. But if the complaint is made through a third person the aggrieved person's position is safeguarded.

I am not convinced that the Chief Constable should have such wide powers. Essentially, it is the Chief Constable who will decide how the complaint is to be processed. There is always a subjective element in human relationships and that subjective element could be to the disadvantage of the police officer or of the complainant. However, I have grave reservations about that.

I note that the new commission will have the power to investigate any complaint that it decides to investigate. I would like to see this amended because it seems to give an inordinate power to the Chief Constable, both in relation to complaints made against men in his force and in relation to the public.

The crucial element of the whole procedure is the supervisory powers. It is crucial that those supervisory powers are there. Having said that, I would like to see an independent body for investigative purposes, if there is not to be one the extensive powers to supervise and investigative complaints must exist. It must be supervision in the broadest sense of the word. It must not be a passive type of supervision. It must be supervision in a very active sense.

Members of the commission must be at liberty to monitor at close hand every stage of the investigation, to intervene if they see fit, and to direct the course which an investigation should take. There should be no bureaucratic or other obstacles placed in their path. Public confidence in the impartiality and effectiveness of the new procedure will suffer from any perception that the new commission has been prevented from carrying out its statutory role. People in the north of Ireland, from whatever part of society they come, will not take this new procedure seriously unless they are satisfied that it and the new commission will be empowered to scrutinise investigations in a way that has not existed before.

I am glad that some of the commission's powers are specified. Articles 9(5) and 9(6) empower the commission to approve or veto the appointment of an investigating officer. Subject to regulations made by the Secretary of State, it may impose requirements in respect of an investigation. However, while those two articles are welcome, the order is silent on the specifics of the supervisory role open to the commission. There is much to be said for allowing the commission to adopt its own flexibility and to create its own means of operation. But it would be undesirable if, in the absence of specific detail in this order, it was used later to attempt to justify attempted limitations of the commission's role.

I note the report of the British Police Complaints Authority and the implications made in it. I also note the scope of the investigations. I simply ask the Minister to confirm that an officer of the new complaints commission in the north of Ireland will have the same powers to accompany an investigating officer to interviews and to the scene of incidents and to attend interviews of the investigating officer with complainants and with other witnesses? The answer to that is either yes or no, but it is crucially important.

Will an officer of the commission be able to discuss with the investigating officer the plan of the investigation and to advise on the general lines of the inquiry? Will the officer be able to arrange that statements taken from witnesses or evidence collected are submitted for scrutiny? Will the officer be able to insist that the investigating officer will submit interim reports to the commission and to him? Will the officer be free to decide that witnesses should be reinterviewed or that witnesses who have not previously been interviewed by the officer charged with the investigation should be interviewed? Will the officer be free to decide what evidence should be collected that has not previously been collected or that a line of inquiry should be pursued that has not previously been pursued? Those are specific questions that arise directly from the report of the Police Complaints Board in Britain. We must have specific answers to those questions because they are crucial to confidence in this procedure and its workings.

When this order has been discussed and adopted, I hope that the community in the North of Ireland will have a clear and unequivocal statement of support for the new procedures from the chief constable of the RUC and from the Police Federation for Northern Ireland. I have always maintained that the resolution of the problem of policing and all its attendant problems depends on an honesty and a realism that are not just one-sided. Honesty and realism must apply across the board. The proposals in the order have no chance of working unless we get such an unequivocal statement from the chief constable of the RUC and the Police Federation for Northern Ireland. I ask them specifically when this order comes into effect to give such an unequivocal guarantee of support.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): I approach this order with feelings that are very close to despair. Throughout the debate and in their opening speeches my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office spoke about the need to support the Royal Ulster Constabulary. They paid tribute to the courage of the force and recognised the difficulties of the task in which it is engaged.

To put it plainly, the order is a kick in the teeth to the ordinary men and women in the Northern Ireland police service. They deeply resent it. Ministers have met me and the Police Federation for Northern Ireland on a number of occasions and we have exchanged inordinate numbers of letters. Throughout the months of long negotiations to which I have been a party, not by one comma or one scintilla have the Government sought to meet the genuine concerns expressed to them by the federation on behalf of the men and women of the force. The Government have been totally obdurate and their obduracy is deeply resented.

I have been involved in the matter of complaints against the police for a very long time. The legislation that touches upon it has been debated in the House on innumerable occasions. I do not wish to go over what happened in the distant past, but I must say that with some notable exceptions hon. Members representing Irish constituencies who took part in the earlier debate and who have decided on their own best judgment not to take part in this debate have a good point.

This order ought to be brought before the House as a Bill. There ought to be a Standing Committee to examine all the clauses in the Bill and to debate them and vote on each point. That Standing Committee should be able to examine those areas of the order that materially depart from the legislation agreed by the House for England and Wales.

This order is offensive in that, in significant ways, it changes the arrangements for the police in Northern Ireland in a fashion that the House rejected when it was sought to apply them to the police in England and Wales. No one knows that better than the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell).

The Police Federation of Northern Ireland wants the arrangements that affect its discipline and complaints procedures to be, as far as possible, analogous to those that apply to the other police forces in England, Wales and Scotland. That is as it should be. We expect the police in Northern Ireland to behave as a British police force should—impartially, and without regard to sectional interests. Broadly speaking, that is what they are doing.

Yet the Government are seeking to apply arrangements to the police forces of Northern Ireland that are different from those that the House is willing to accept for England and Wales. There should have been a Bill and Standing Committee, and the House should have been allowed to debate and vote on those matters in which the Government are departing from the legislation on which the order was founded.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): I do not intend to make a speech, but I share the hon. Gentleman's high regard for the RUC. I understand the depth of feeling with which we approach the subject. I have received a letter from the Police Federation for Northern Ireland, which raised three specific points; two of them have been satisfactorily answered by the Minister.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman, not untypically, is not in the picture. My hon. Friend the Minister has been helpful in saying that he is again considering whether to introduce a discipline regulation on the grounds of political or religious discrimination, but that is not contained in the order. That would have to be brought forward separately, as a separate change in the discipline regulations.

If the hon. Gentleman had done his homework, he would have known that his intervention was wrong-headed. He does not know what he is talking about. The matter that he has raised is not in the order.

Mr. Ross: That was the first complaint from the Police Federation, but three items were listed.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: That may be. The hon. Gentleman has been good enough to read the Police Federation's representations on that point, but he is mistaken. We are not debating that point; we shall debate it on another occasion.

I rest my case on the procedural point. It is wholly wrong for the House to be asked to take or leave an order of this type, parts of which clearly deviate from matters to which the House has agreed elsewhere. We have no choice: either we vote for the whole order, or we vote against it. I find that difficult, because I support some aspects of the order, and want to reject others. But because of this procedure, I have no opportunity to do so.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Is the hon. Gentleman sure that we shall have an opportunity to debate the regulations?

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I am by no means certain of that, but I live in hope. It would be perfectly scandalous if the Government tried to introduce a new regulation based on political and religious discrimination, which would be a major departure from police discipline regulations in the rest of the country, and tried to get it through without a debate or vote. That would be monstrous. I hope that the Opposition will ensure that that does not happen.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): The hon. Gentleman is right to state that the Secretary of State is not obliged to bring those regulations to the House. It might be appropriate for the Minister of State to say that he will do so.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: I am almost taking that for granted. As the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) raised the subject, I must say that the fundamental reason why it would be wrong to introduce into the discipline regulations of the police in Northern Ireland the notion that political discrimination shall henceforth be a discipline offence is that that would introduce politics into policing for the first time. It is clearly part of the present law, of the oath of office taken by every police officer, and of the present discipline code, that such officers should not discriminate on any grounds.

If we now introduce the adjectival type of discrimination that is called political, the inevitable consequence will be a demand for its introduction on this side of the water, too. For example, during incidents such as the miners' strike and the Wapping dispute, people would jump up and down and say that the police were using political discrimination because they had acted in a particular way towards one group or another. To try to police impartially on that basis would be nonsense. The Government are wrong-headed in this instance, and it is all part of their overall approach to the order. I apologise if I have wandered slightly from the substance of the debate.

When the issues that we are considering were first raised, I wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I did so as far back as October 1986, when I pressed upon him three main principles. First, I stressed the desirability in the order that would be made to release the federation as far as possible from the leading strings of the association. The association is dealt with in a couple of places in the order. I regret to say that my right hon. Friend has failed to do that. He has done a number of things that are objectionable to the police but he has failed to do that which they requested of him. For as long as the association is in place, there is no way in which the federation, which is a constituent part of it, will be able to run its own affairs. It will not be placed in the same position as the Police Federation for England and Wales. The opportunity that was provided by the order should not have been missed.

Secondly, I asked in my letter that there should be opportunities for the federation on occasion to deal directly with the Secretary of State. That is what happens on this side of the water. The opportunity has not been taken in the order to free the federation in Northern Ireland from the association, thereby enabling it to have the access that is enjoyed on this side of the water.

Mr. Scott: Article 24 deals with the constitution and proceedings of the association. It enables the association or any of its sections—that includes the federation as an individual body—to make rules "relating to its constitution and proceedings".

That is exactly in line with the procedures that apply in England and Wales. As for access to Ministers, my hon. Friend knows that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I are always ready to meet the federation.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: My hon. Friend continues to use that bromide. In the preceding debate I referred to a number of specific recommendations that the federation made in respect of body armour and helicopters, for example. My hon. Friend knew nothing about them and he did not refer to them in his reply. My hon. Friend does not become involved in real discussions with the federation. Instead, he goes through a stately pavan in which he appears to listen, but he takes no action. His sort of consultation amounts only to that. It is exactly the same as that of the Chief Constable, who had the effrontery to say recently that he did not consult the federation before making a gagging order on the chairman because he knew that it would not agree. That is his sort of consultation, and it is similar to that of my hon. Friend.

I shall turn to some of the provisions in the order that cause great offence. The allowing of complaints to be founded against police officers on behalf of third parties without the written consent of those parties is an issue that was debated carefully by the Committee which considered the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, as it then was. The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), who will speak from the Opposition Front Bench, will recall the debates that took place in Committee.

The Committee came to the conclusion that it would be unjust to a police officer to allow any third party who wished to move in on the act—a busybody, a prattler, a meddler—to pick up someone's alleged complaint and run it through the machinery of the police system without at least ensuring that the aggrieved person was sufficiently serious about his complaint at least to sign his name or make his X on a document authorising the third party to complain on his behalf. That elementary justice impressed both sides of the Committee, and I was grateful to Labour Members as well as to my Conservative colleagues for making the case and convincing my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The existing provision was washed out of the Bill before the measure, which applied to England and Wales, was enacted yet this is to be introduced in Northern Ireland.

My hon. Friend suggests that it is just a minor change. It is a fundamental change, because it will allow any third party who wishes to make a name for himself in the press, to show his community that he is vigorous on their behalf, to pick up any tittle-tattle, or a malicious or frivolous complaint that might have been made in the heat of the moment and then withdrawn. He can run that complaint on behalf of somebody else, even though that other party has, on cool reflection, decided not to pursue the complaint. The Police Complaints Board has found that approximately 70 per cent. of complaints made against police are withdrawn by the complainants because they have come to the conclusion, when they have cooled down a bit, that they have no complaint to make.

This will be a busybodies' charter, allowing third parties to complain against police officers. I remind the House that, once a complaint is made, police officers are suspended, they go on no courses, their pay can be cut and their wives and families are under a cloud for a considerable time; all on the undocumented, second-hand complaint of a person who does not have to get the written agreement of the person on whose behalf he is complaining. That is unjust and the Government should not introduce this.

If we had had a proper Committee stage of a Bill, I am sure that the result would have been exactly the same as it was in the case of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act: all parties, having examined the case, would have thrown it out and the Government would have agreed. But, unfortunately, the Northern Ireland Office runs what is in effect a dictatorship. It can take this House for granted, because it can make orders of this kind and there is no way that we can effectively debate and amend them. Consequently, my hon. Friend is getting away with an injustice to the police and none of his bland words will make any difference. He has succeeded in imposing this on Northern Ireland police because of their unique position, but he will not impose it on police in England, Wales and Scotland. They will go to the aid of their colleagues in Northern Ireland, through whatever lawful course is open to them, to resist this to the end. We will get it changed one way or the other, because it is unjust.

The second matter I raise is one which my hon. Friend slid over by saying again that it is not an important change. The chief officer, the new complaints authority or the Police Authority of Northern Ireland will be able to take up what are politely called non-complaint matters because there is public interest. I do not object to the Police Authority, the complaints authority, the commission or anybody else raising a matter of obvious public interest, but I am concerned that too often it is media-led.

Most of us have seen in recent weeks how the media have seized on a matter and made a great song and dance about it; therefore, pressure is created. My hon. Friend, in correspondence with me, has said that where there is pressure of this kind it will be appropriate under this new order that the matter should be looked into. The obnoxious phrase contained in the order is "any matter" affecting the conduct of a police officer.

Mr. Scott: That phrase is in article 8(1) as well, which is exactly in line with the provision for England and Wales. Does my hon. Friend object to it being in there.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: My hon. Friend knows perfectly well that I am objecting to article 8(2), which is the means by which it will be applied differently in Northern Ireland. The House must face the fact that a police officer is just as much a citizen as anybody else. My hon. Friend in his reply used some splendid words about police officers being treated no differently from anyone else. That is not the case. A police officer is always under discipline and he is always, theoretically at least, on duty.

The phrase "any matter" means in practice that the police commission, the complaints commission and the Chief Constable may deal with those issues which are the private business of police officers in their own homes. It is the universal encyclopaedic power of the Secretary of State and of the commission to deal with any matter that is an intrusion upon the civil liberties of police officers. We do not have that on this side of the water; we do under article 8(1) but not under article 8(2). My hon. Friend has not studied the order carefully. This will allow the commission to deal with the private lives of police officers in a fashion that I regard as intolerable.

There is much I could say, but the hour is late and other hon. Members wish to speak. I wish to remind the House of two things. My hon. Friend, who has been in his job for a long time—he may feel that it has been too long—is regarded as an expert on police matters. I am not, but I take a keen interest in them. I do not think that my hon. Friend has a clue about what discipline can be like for young police officers in the circumstances of Northern Ireland. A young police officer who is charged by the assistant commissioner and who is dealt with by the Chief Constable is the loneliest man on earth. He can be arbitrarily transferred, bullied or treated in a way of which my hon. Friend has no idea. My hon. Friend's notion that somehow or other fair is fair and it all works out in the end is rubbish.

I know as of now that at a closed meeting of the federation not long ago a young sergeant expressed himself about the agonies of the duties that he had to carry out. As a free man, he is entitled to express himself as a federation representative in a closed meeting. There was a leak of what he said. In fact, there was a tape. The Chief Constable found out about it. That man is now on a discipline charge because he said things in that closed meeting of the federation that the Chief Constable did not like. The Chief Constable used the ominous phrase "discreditable conduct". That can mean anything.

Police officers do go wrong. Sometimes they bully and sometimes they are guilty of using excessive force. We do not want those people in the police force. But the police are just as much bullied as bullying. There is injustice to police officers as well. What my hon. Friend is doing tonight is making that much more likely and much easier. It is deeply resented.

Some of the information that my hon. Friend has been passing to me and to the federation and some of the things that he has said tonight are misleading. He originally claimed that the Government had accepted Lord Scarman's amendment. The hon. Member for Middlesbrough knows that Lord Scarman's amendment on the racial offence, which he supported, was rejected by the Government on three-line Whips in Committee and on the Floor of the House. For my hon. Friend to have stated in writing that the Government accepted it is not the truth. At the end of the day, because we were up against the buffers in that we were rising for the last election, the Government had no choice but to scupper the whole Bill or accept what the House of Lords had done. To suggest that the justification for a political religious offence in Northern Ireland is that the Government had accepted Lord Scarman's amendment for England and Wales is wide of the truth.

I take these matters seriously and I study them carefully with the police. Perhaps the Minister knows what he is doing, or perhaps he does not, but he has signed letters to me that have been positively misleading. He has no business to have done so.

The order has some provisions which I cannot oppose, so I cannot vote against it. But it has many provisions which are deeply offensive to the police service and they make my hon. Friend's rhetoric about support for the police sound very hollow. Tonight he has done a disservice to the Royal Ulster Constabulary, and the men and women of that force will for a long time associate his name personally with the damage he has done to their lives.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Rightly or wrongly, I did not follow the advice of my party's Whips, and voted against the Anglo-Irish Agreement. In the time available tonight, I shall raise two specific matters relating to policing.

On 30 April, I asked the Prime Minister

"if she will refer to the Security Commission recent allegations relating to the conduct of the late Sir Maurice Oldfield."
—[Official Report, 30 April 1987; Vol. 115, c. 202.]

The Prime Minister referred me to the answer that she had given to the right hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker). The Prime Minister's answer was ambiguous. It asked more questions than it answered. I am certain that the friends and family of the late Sir Maurice Oldfield are distressed at the ambiguity.

There is rather more to the matter than meets the eye. MI5 has been circulating a so-called gay story—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I find it difficult to see what connection there is between the hon. Gentleman's remarks and the Police (Northern Ireland) Order 1987. I hope that he will address himself to the order.

Mr. Dalyell: It refers to the handling of complaints. We are discussing Northern Ireland policing, are we not, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

The story was commented on in Oldfield's biography by Richard Deacon, and it dismissed the Pincher story out of hand, as indeed does Sir Maurice Oldfield's biographer, Anthony Cavendish. When Oldfield was liaison officer——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is difficult to see any connection between the hon. Gentleman's speech and the order. If he cannot make the connection much more clear, I must ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Dalyell: I do not want to be out of order, but I thought that this was an order on Northern Ireland policing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The order's purpose is to establish a police complaints procedure in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Dalyell: In that case, I had better give way to the Minister.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I have some sympathy for my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). He was seeking to make points on complaints in Northern Ireland as they related to past incidents. He has made a point tonight, and it may be taken up elsewhere.

I shall refer briefly to the remarks of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths). Of course the hon. Member knows, as I know, that we sat together through 59 Standing Committee sittings on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill. When Mary Queen of Scots died, there was a certain name upon her heart. Possibly when we pass on, it will — [Interruption.] The right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) corrects me. It was Mary Tudor. He is perfectly right. That is what happens when one comments extemporaneously from a standing position.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): It is an interesting point. At that time, Calais was fully integrated with this country, sending two burgesses to the House.

Mr. Bell: The burgesses are still in the House. They are standing outside in Victoria Tower gardens as Rodin's "Burghers of Calais".

I shall relate the fact that the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds and I sat through 59 Standing Committee sittings on the Police and Criminal Evidence Bill, which became an Act of Parliament in 1984, to the intervention made by the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux). It is perfectly right that, in any other situation, the speech made by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds would have been of such persuasiveness that a Government would have had to re-examine the matter. His points were based on obvious knowledge of the case and would have persuaded enough Committee members, and certainly enough hon. Members, to urge the Government to examine it again. We are not in that situation. We are faced with a lengthy and complicated order dealing with complaints and discipline procedure. We are dealing with the objections of the Police Federation, which must be taken into account. As the hon. Gentleman said, they are on the sharp end, yet we have no way of discussing the issue in any great depth. The debate must terminate at 11.40 pm. I have some sympathy with the points that he made, and with his description of the order as a curate's egg. I must, therefore, bow to his judgment and his views on the matter, as an hon. Member who has studied it with great care.

However, we are all in the same position. There are no serried ranks here who could have been persuaded and could have overturned the Government's proposal. All that can be said in favour of the order is that it does not arise out of the Anglo-Irish Agreement—a point that was made by the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) in an earlier debate — but from a consultative document published in April 1985 at the behest of the former Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, who is now Home Secretary.

As the explanatory note makes clear, we are dealing with a police force that commands the support and confidence of the public whom it serves, and whose aim is the maintenance of law and order and the combating of crime. It was, I felt, rather unfortunate that the Unionist Members who were here earlier sought to intervene so often in my speech, and prevented me from making a number of points that I had wished to make about the chief constable's annual report on the police work that takes place in Northern Ireland. It is a very interesting and constructive document, and it shows many of the positive aspects of the work done by the police—not only in relation to law and order but in the combating of crime, and in seeking to bridge the gap created by the sectarian divide.

Let us now return to the context of the order, and its relationship to the laws of the United Kingdom. We have said before—and we say it again—that as long as the Northern Irish people wish, in their majority, to stay a part of the United Kingdom, they should be governed as far as possible in accordance with the laws of the United Kingdom as those laws apply to England, Scotland and Wales. At the same time, as the Minister of State said earlier, we must somehow deal with the sensitivities of Northern Ireland which are special to the Province. In dealing with these orders, we must always strike the balance between establishing whether they go far enough to conform satisfactorily with the laws of England, Scotland and Wales, and at the same time deciding whether they deal with the peculiarities of Northern Ireland and Northern Irish life as we know them. We must make a value judgment on whether the order meets our criteria.

I was minded to think that it might do so, but I am less minded following the intervention of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds. At some future time—not tonight, because of the shortage of time—there will have to be a lengthier explanation of what the order is about, how it will be applied and—this question was put earlier by the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) and was referred to by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds —how we shall deal with the regulations on discipline when they are forthcoming through the Secretary of State.

Let me end my short speech by saying that, while we have no intention of dividing the House on the issue, we must make a comment that has all-party support. It may be the last time that we can make it in these circumstances. In a new Parliament, whichever party wins the election, there must be a different way of debating Northern Irish business in the House and in Committee. In one sense, we are fortunate: in the original timetable for this week, we had another order to debate, on industrial relations in Northern Ireland. We should be thankful for small mercies. However, there must be changes in the procedures of the House to enable us to give proper credence and analysis to orders such as this.

Perhaps the Minister will be able to respond to the issue raised earlier, on whether the regulations that will be coming forward will be debated in the House, or at least debated as a statutory instrument, or whether there can be consultation on the matter that meets the requirements of those who have to enforce the law in Northern Ireland. As I said earlier, they are the people at the sharp end. They deserve our support, and they deserve not to feel any sense of injustice that may arise out of the order. All I ask the Minister to say is that after the general election there will be an opportunity for the House to deal with these matters in greater depth.

11.29 pm

Mr. Scott: This particular form of legislation for Northern Ireland is not my responsibility. In due course there will be discussions about it, but let me make clear the factual position regarding the regulations that in due course will be made under the order.

Any secondary legislation that is made under this Order in Council will be dealt with according to the negative resolution procedure, and it will be for the usual channels to determine whether or not there is to be a debate on the Floor of the House. There will be extensive consultations with all those who have an interest in the drafting of the regulations.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) recognises that in discussing the shape of the order we are referring to a balance between the interests of the police and the interests of the public. Anything that tilted too much in one direction or the other would not be an acceptable way of dealing with complaints. I recognise my hon. Friend's connection with the Police Federation, and I expect him to fight for his corner on the Floor of the House, but I have a responsibility towards the whole community in Northern Ireland, as well as the one that I seek to discharge as effectively as I can towards the men and women in the Royal Ulster Constabulary. I hope that any discussions that we have on the matter will be conducted on the basis of mutual respect and good will and not in the way that my hon. Friend dealt with his last few points.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) asked whether the Commission's powers of supervision are precisely the same as those that operate in England and Wales. I assure him that all the powers that are available on this side of the water will be made available to the Commission for supervising any investigations.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the places in Northern Ireland where people could register a complaint. They can complain by means of a citizens advice bureau, or a public representative—a Member of Parliament or a friend—or direct to the Commission, or to the Police Authority for Northern Ireland. It is not necessary for a complaint to be registered at a police station. That will be covered by guidance, and in due course it will be issued to the public in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the role of the Chief Constable. He was in error, in that there is no subjective element in his role. Any complaint must be the subject of formal investigation and referred to the Commission, where the conduct complained of would, if proved, warrant a criminal or a disciplinary charge. All formal investigations have to go to the Commission. That is covered by the order. If a complaint cannot be registered informally, it must in due course be made the subject of a formal investigation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds referred to this being a change. It is not a change. The order incorporates the practice that already exists in the Royal Ulster Constabulary. If a complaint is made by a third party, the police send an officer to interview the original complainant and ask him whether he wishes to stand by his complaint. If the complainant does not, that will be the end of the matter. Any statement made by the original complainant to the police would have to be signed, of course.

I think that my hon. Friend overestimates the difference between this arrangement for Northern Ireland and the practice in Great Britain. We have heard of one case today in which a Member of the House registered a complaint on behalf of a constituent. The force exercised its discretion, which is covered in the guidance, and did not check for written consent. A police officer then went to interview the original complainant, who did not wish to pursue the complaint. The police therefore took no further action in respect of that complaint. That is what happened with a British force and it is precisely what would happen in practice in Northern Ireland if such a step were taken.

The point of principle raised by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh is whether there should be a totally independent system of investigating complaints against the police in Northern Ireland. I know of no place in the world where such a system has operated successfully over a period. It was tried for a limited period in one force in Canada but was found to be unworkable in practice.

I believe that we have the balance right. To take away from skilled, trained detectives, able and practised in investigating complaints, assessing evidence, and so on, and to put it into the hands of a totally independent body in my view would not work in practice. The essential point is that those conducting the investigations should be accountable to a body that is independent both of the police force and of the Government. I believe that that is the right way to go ahead. To imagine that one could establish some totally independent body with totally separate training which could then investigate matters which are very much within the police family is, in my view, an unrealistic expectation.

I believe that it is right to leave the actual investigation in the hands of the police but to provide extensive supervisory powers—they were read out by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh in a series of questions, all of which I answered in the affirmative—to supervise the investigation, to decide the investigating officer, to ask for further evidence to be produced, and so on. I believe that that kind of control and accountability by those carrying out the investigation and those whose duty it is to supervise it will provide the best balance in the interests of both police and public in Northern Ireland. I very much hope that the police and the public in Northern Ireland will give the new legislation a fair wind as I believe that it can operate very clearly in the interests of both parties, and I hope that that is how it will be seen to operate in due course.

Mr. Dalyell: I wish to ask a question about a specific complaint by the friends of the late Sir Maurice Oldfield. They feel that the position has been made quite impossible. The dead have rights in these matters and the innuendo has been left that Sir Maurice had some kind of homosexual relationship at the Highwayman inn in the North, although it is incredible to suppose how he got there when he did not even have a driving licence. All that smear and innuendo surrounding the dead should be cleared up far more satisfactorily than has been done by the Prime Minister's statement.

If the idea is that something happened above the loft in his flat, it should be remembered that there was electronic surveillance operating there almost the whole time and evidence that has come to me from Sir Maurice's bodyguards makes it clear that there could have been no such goings on at the time when he had those very sensitive jobs. Surely we owe it to the dead to clear their names completely and not leave ambiguous statements. All I ask is that this particular complaint should be examined seriously by Ministers.

Mr. Scott: I admire the hon. Gentleman's ingenuity in introducing these matters into a debate on a police complaints order, but they are not within my competence or responsibility. I admire the dedication which led the hon. Gentleman to raise the subject on behalf of the family of Sir Maurice Oldfield and I am sure that those who have competence in these matters will read what the hon. Gentleman has said and will determine what action may be taken.

Resolved,

That the draft Police (Northern Ireland) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 16th December, be approved.

Glasgow Airport (Strip-search Procedures)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Portillo.]

11.49 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I sought this debate to bring to the attention of the House, and especially to the Minister, the scandalous strip-search procedures that are employed by Her Majesty's Customs at Glasgow airport and, I suspect, at other airports and seaports in Britain. Those procedures, and the physical facilities in which they are conducted, are a scandal and must be changed and improved.

First, I wish to say a word or two about the distressing and humiliating ordeal that was experienced recently by a young woman at Glasgow airport. Naturally, that young woman, a constituent of mine, must remain anonymous. At about 1600 hours on Monday 20 April, the young woman arrived at Glasgow airport on a flight from Amsterdam. After close questioning and a careful examination of her luggage, she was told to wait for a while. Approximately one hour later, after first being questioned, the young woman was led away for an intimate body search. Customs officials prefer to talk about "strip searches", whereas the police and prison officers talk, in my view more honestly, about "intimate body searches".

I shall now quote from the young woman's account of that humiliating experience. She came to see me at my surgery and I asked her to write out her account for me. This is part of her description:

"Then two women asked me to follow them. I was taken into this room and she locked the door. She"—— that is the Customs official——

"said, do you know this is a body search? I said, what is that? What do you want me to take off? She said, everything. I said I had a period. She said, are you wearing anything? I said, yes, a tampon. After I had taken all my clothes off, she asked me to put my arms out by my side. She checked there. Then she told me to bend over, and she checked my back passage. By this time I was so embarrassed and angry that they can do this to innocent people. Then the other woman handed her a paper hankie, and then she said could I remove my tampon. I said, do you not have a toilet? She said, you can see we don't have one here. I said to them, this is the most embarrassing thing to do . . . She said it was not very pleasant for them, they were only doing their job . . . So she handed me a paper hankie, and I had to remove my tampon and give it to her in the hankie . . . By this time I was just about crying. I asked her could I put my bra on. The other woman had my passport and asked me my name and address, and marked it down in a book. Then I finally got to put my clothes back on. Then I got taken back to where our luggage was lying.

I wasn't even allowed to go to a toilet and use a clean tampon, or wash my hands. My fiancé was there when I got out. I was so upset by this, we had to wait another 10-15 minutes. Then the man who checked our bags came out with another man. They gave us back our passports and said, thank you, that they were just only doing their job."

The young lady goes on to say:

"I feel so hurt by this, and I have never been so degraded in all of my life. I would never want to go through anything like that again."

The young woman, who is a fine, decent, law-abiding citizen, told me that she was naked for 10 to 15 minutes. Incidentally, even female prisoners in Scottish prisons are not treated so callously. In response to a question I tabled on intimate body searches in Scottish prisons, the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland said:

[Dr. Norman A. Godman]

"The procedures observed in Scottish penal establishments for the strip-searching of female prisoners by female staff are as follows:

> (a) When a female is being strip-searched she is required, after removing her outer garments, to remove or drop to the waist the underclothing of the upper half of her body; she is then provided with a sheet to wrap around herself before removing the underclothing from the lower half of her body for examination. In the interest of decency great care is taken by the examining officer to ensure the minimum exposure of the body at any given time." — [Official Report, 12 March 1986; Vol. 93, c. 486.]

I am sorry to say that my constituent was not treated with that civility.

I was so angry when I heard the complaint that I immediately decided to visit Glasgow airport and examine the facilities. At the airport I met Mr. David Waddell and Mr. Fitzcharles of HM Customs. Both officials were faultlessly courteous and co-operative. I was shown the facilities. In other words, I was shown into a scruffy little cell which contained a cheap table and chairs, all bolted to the floor for obvious reasons. There were no coat hangers or coat hooks. I was told that the nearest lavatory was some 30 yards away—not down a quiet corridor, but back through the customs hall.

In this case an innocent young woman who was menstruating and did not have a spare sanitary towel was 30 yards from the privacy of a cloak room. That is nothing short of disgraceful. The young woman did not object to a body search. Like the overwhelming majority of decent people, she abhors drug trafficking and accepts that occasionally innocent travellers must undergo intimate searches. But surely it should not be such a degrading experience.

I blame both Her Majesty's Customs and the British Airports Authority for the callous neglect of individual's needs. Once the search has taken place, preceded by the traveller being informed of his or her rights, immediate access to a wash room should be offered. Once the Customs officials are satisfied with the search, a door should be unlocked and access given to an adjoining cloak room which should contain a lavatory, a wash basin, a bidet, a shower and a supply of towels and sanitary towels. Prominently displayed on the wall of the search room should be a notice stating the rights of an individual caught up in those circumstances. None of those obtains in Glasgow airport and I suspect that that is the case at most airports north and south of the border.

Customs officials should wear plastic gloves when conducting intimate searches. No doctor or medical practitioner would conduct such an examination without plastic gloves. At all times they should be courteous to those they search. I regret to say that that was not so in this case. Nor is this an isolated incident. I have been informed that an Aberdeen student travelling to Glasgow airport two months ago, also menstruating at the time, was subjected to the same harrowing ordeal. She chose not to complain to her Member of Parliament, who is not the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow. The BBC television programme "That's Life" recently reported, I think on 5 April, about 14 or 15 cases rather similar to the Glasgow case.

Customs and Excise derives its power to search people entering seaports and airports from section 164 of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979. Subsection 164(2) outlines a person's rights. It states:

"A person who is to be searched in pursuance of this section may require to be taken before a Justice of the Peace or a superior of the officer or other person concerned, and the Justice or superior shall consider the grounds for suspicion and direct accordingly whether or not the search is to take place."

There is no statutory obligation to inform a passenger who is to be searched of this right, although I would hope that Customs officials would do so. I am informed that in the Glasgow case that information was withheld from the young woman concerned. Even though Customs officials are not bound under the Customs and Excise Management Act to produce a code of practice for intimate body searches, Customs has agreed to follow those practices that are required under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act.

I am deeply concerned about the code of practice since the number of body searches may be on the increase due to the evil of drug trafficking. It is an evil that regrettably continues to grow. Have these searches become a regular feature? Is there a monthly quota of strip searches set out for each airport and seaport? How many strip searches have taken place in each of the past five years? Are they on the increase?

The powers under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 to conduct searches and, therefore, the codes of practice do not apply to Scotland. Customs officials in Scotland conduct searches under departmental instructions that are not available to the public. Will the Minister or one of his Scottish ministerial colleagues place a copy of those departmental instructions in the Library? I would certainly like to look at them, and I am sure that many other people would, too.

It appears that those departmental instructions differ little from the English statutory code of practice. However, the Scottish instructions are not so binding as they would be in England and Wales, and they may not be adhered to as strictly as those south of the border. This is deeply worrying, because the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill, which I suspect will be returning here within a few days, proposes new powers of detention by Customs officers. Under clause 44 of the Bill, Customs officers would exercise the same powers of search that are available following an arrest. In the case of drugs, a suspect is required to submit to an intimate search, to be carried out by a registered medical practitioner, not by a Customs official.

I support wholeheartedly the often marvellous work performed by police officers and Customs officials to capture those evil wrongdoers, the drug traffickers. I have seen the dreadful evidence of their evil work in the west of Scotland. Despite my wholehearted support for the activities of Customs officials and police officers, the interests of innocent travellers must be protected at all times. That care must include both the provision of physical facilities, along the lines that I have outlined, and the fair application of codes of practice north and south of the border. The BBC television programme "That's Life" has documented cases that are as disturbing as the one that I have outlined about a young constituent of mine.

I want to hear from the Minister a positive response to my demand that the physical facilities in the search room at our airports will be improved. I also want an assurance that the codes of practice governing these intimate body searches will be adhered to in a fair, responsible and courteous way by the Customs officials involved.

12.5 am

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): I am most grateful to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) for bringing up this matter and for the manner in which he did so. Before I deal in detail with the points made by the hon. Gentleman, it might be helpful if I explained something about the search procedures operated by Customs and Excise.

The need for such procedures has been acknowledged by the hon. Gentleman and by others. Drugs smugglers have been found among almost every category of passenger. Couriers may include anyone from a baby to an old-age pensioner. There have been cases involving people who would normally elicit sympathy, for example an invalid confined to a wheelchair, and drugs are frequently imported concealed in or on the body.

The difficulties facing customs officers as they seek to intercept smuggled drugs and apprehend those responsible can be readily appreciated. Customs officers depend a great deal on the understanding and good will of the ordinary travelling public. The hon. Gentleman was generous in what he said on that subject.

There are particular problems where drugs are concealed internally or carried on the body, and this method of concealment gives rise to some very distasteful tasks which have to be performed by customs officers. None the less, officers are required to carry out the search procedures diligently. Customs and Excise realises that a personal search is not a pleasant experience and recourse to such measures is closely controlled by management, and officers are required to conduct all such examinations with tact and courtesy.

I readily acknowledge that it is regrettable that innocent passengers will, on occasion, be subject to search. However, Customs and Excise does not search people as a matter of routine or on a random basis. The law requires that there must be grounds for suspicion before a person can be searched. The procedures operated by Customs and Excise requires the examining officer first to explain the circumstances and then to obtain the permission of a senior officer, usually his line manager, before a search of a person can take place. A passenger, who is to be searched, may require to go before a justice of the peace —or a sheriff in Scotland—or a superior officer who will adjudicate and direct whether the proposed search should proceed.

A passenger may be searched only by an officer of the same sex. In most searches the passenger is not required to be completely naked at any one time. After outer clothing has been removed and examined, usually it will be possible for the top and bottom halves of the body to be unclothed and reclothed separately. As drugs are frequently concealed in body orifices, it may be necessary for women passengers to remove any sanitary protection.

If passengers are required to be without clothes other than very briefly, a blanket or other suitable covering will be provided. I understand from Customs and Excise that searches do not normally take very long and are usually completed in five or six minutes. If further sanitary protection is required after the search it will be provided.

While a search is in progress and, indeed, from the earliest moment at which the passenger is being interviewed, customs officers have to be extremely vigilant and observant to ensure that a smuggled item or other evidence is not moved from one concealment to another or is not disposed of. This explains much about the nature of the search procedure and why search rooms are sparsely furnished. For example, hand basins and flush toilets are not provided because they represent a most obvious means of disposal. If either of these facilities is required, portable equipment is held and will be brought to the search room.

In the particular circumstances in which drugs or other goods have been swallowed, the provision of portable or other non-plumbed facilities is important to allow officers to recover the evidence after it has passed through the body. These are extremely unpleasant duties, demanding much of the officers, as well as the careful following of prescribed procedures. We should all be grateful for the work that customs officers do on our behalf.

There are occasions when search procedures require more than visual examination of the passenger and an internal examination is required. Such circumstances are specifically provided for in law in England, and customs follows comparable procedures to those used by the police. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has broadly similar proposals before the House at this time. Internal examinations may only be carried out by a qualified medical practitioner, and any examinations of that kind would normally take place in the doctor's surgery. If it seems likely that such an examination will be required, the officer must first—in law—obtain the express permission of the appropriate grade of officer—in customs terms, a senior executive officer.

I have dealt at some length with the practical aspects of search of person, touching, as appropriate, on the legal provisions. The hon. Gentleman expressed disquiet about the premises that are available for search at Glasgow airport, and, in particular, he has expressed concern about the absence of ordinary toilet facilities in or adjacent to the search room. I have explained why search rooms are of necessity purely functional, to prevent the concealment or disposal of drugs or other goods or evidence. I am advised by customs that the search rooms and other accommodation provided for use by the public for the purposes of customs examination at Glasgow airport are considered satisfactory. A toilet is available some 20 yd or so from the search room. However, having seen the plans of the airport building, I freely acknowledge that, depending on which search room is being used, and on whether a male or female toilet is being used, the toilets are 20 to 30 yd from the search rooms, and in the opposite direction in terms of traffic flow. Those facilities are not provided by customs, but by the British Airports Authority, which owns and operates the airport.

It may help if I explain that Customs and Excise airports are approved by the Secretary of State for Transport in conjunction with the commissioners of Customs and Excise. However, airport operators cannot provide for international services without the appropriate parts of their premises being approved by customs for the handling of passengers or freight, as the case may be. By such means, international traffic is canalised so that customs procedures can be effectively and economically administered.

[The Minister of State, Treasury]

A balance must be struck between commercial and official requirements. Clearly, there must be sufficient public accommodation embracing facilities for immigration and customs purposes. Public accommodation in this context means all that is required for official procedures and used by the ordinary travelling public, including baggage hall, search and interview rooms and associated areas. Customs makes known its essential requirements for the application of the relevant customs controls, but the provision of the facilities is the operator's responsibility. Generally, the development of facilities for trade and official purposes proceeds harmoniously, and I have no reason to believe that there is any shortfall in the facilities provided by the British Airports Authority at Glasgow airport.

As I did not know precisely what the hon. Gentleman was going to say before he embarked on his speech, I want to respond more informally to some of the specific points that he raised.

It is important, in terms of the management of the process, to recognise the distinction between strip searches, which are essentially visual, and intimate searches, which are essentially of a tactile nature. The latter require medical supervision and the use of gloves. Visual search does not involve touch. The tampon that was removed was placed in a plastic glove for disposal. That explains why the equipment may be different.

The hon. Gentleman said that his constituent was naked for 10 to 15 minutes. One's judgment in such instances may necessarily be somewhat subjective; one may think that a disagreeable experience is continuing for longer than it actually is. Customs information, which obviously has to be recorded in an annotated form so that there is a record of the event, shows that the search lasted from 1700 hours to 1705. I recognise that there is a give or take of several minutes.

I have sought to respond generally to what has been said about the facilities at Glasgow. Both Customs and the British Airports Authority will be able to read the report of the debate and follow closely the hon. Gentleman's submissions. I shall make certain that the BAA, which does not fall within my responsibility, has its attention drawn to the hon. Gentleman's comments.

The hon. Gentleman has asked about the number of searches that are conducted. There were 46,000 searches of all sorts conducted last year by customs, which means about one in every 1,000 inward passengers. Of the 46,000, 840 were intimate searches. As will have been apparent from my earlier observations and from the description of the search that took place during the incident that we are discussing, we are not dealing with an intimate search as defined in legislation, that is of the tactile nature that I have mentioned. Of the 840 intimate searches, 224 revealed drugs being carried internally by those who were being searched. There were 32 searches at Glasgow and 10 of them produced drugs. One of the 10 involved internal concealment. There is no quota of any sort, for the reason that I have given already. There must be clear and specific suspicion before a passenger can be searched.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether it was possible to provide specific instructions. The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 provides specific instructions in a code of practice on what must be done in the carrying out of intimate searches. I think that he asked also whether there might be similar instructions and a pattern of behaviour for more general searches, including strip searches.

Historically it has been left to the good judgment of officers to decide precisely what they should say to passengers about the procedures and their rights. There is a management problem in being too specific and too formal about rights. If an officer is asking someone only to take off his jacket, and he informs him that he has the right to go before a sheriff or a justice of the peace, he will read much more into the event than that which is intended. As a result of recent cases and current concern, it is now, under training procedure, standard practice for officers to inform those who are being searched of the nature of the procedure and that certain rights exist. This is an oral transmission of information on the ground that a written one would run the risk of going over the top into formality, which runs the risk of losing the co-operation of passengers, on which fundamentally all good customs work is based.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether departmental instructions could be put in the Library. It is not Customs and Excise policy to put such departmental instructions in the Library. Operational matters are regarded as confidential within Customs, but matters related to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act and the code of practice are incorporated in the instructions. I give that assurance to the hon. Gentleman.

I recognise that Scotland will pose a problem until we have greater formalisation. Nevertheless, Customs seeks to interpret it within the spirit of the prevailing legislation. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for having brought up the case in the manner that he did. On his opening remark, that the searches were scandalously insensitive, I understand—

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sentencing Policy

1. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department has taken to monitor the effect on the pattern of sentencing of the operation of the Lord Chief Justice's guidelines; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Sentencing trends are constantly monitored and we have carefully examined the effects of recent Court of Appeal guideline judgments. As I would expect, they have a real impact on sentencing.

Dr. Clark: Is my right hon. Friend satisfied that the long sentences available are being used for serious crimes? Does he believe that there is sufficient differentiation in sentencing between those found guilty of medium-ranking crimes against property and those found guilty of serious crimes against people, especially children?

Mr. Hurd: That differentiation is something that everybody would like to see. The guidelines have an effect in the direction that my hon. Friend advocates. For example, the rape guideline in the Bilham case in 1985 has been followed by an increase in the proportion of those received into prison with sentences of more than five years from 20 to 45 per cent. There has been a similar increase following the Boswell guideline on causing death by reckless driving.

Mr. Lawrence: In view of my right hon. Friend's apparent satisfaction with the operation of the important guidelines, would he consider dropping clause 29 from the new edition of the Criminal Justice Bill, which, by general consent of Bar and Bench, is manifestly and palpably absurd?

Mr. Hurd: I have observed that clause 29 has been criticised in another place, as here, with equal force both by those who say that it goes too far and by those who say that it does not go far enough. We should wait and see how we get on next week.

Crime Prevention

2. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what new initiatives he will take to promote crime prevention.

Mr. Hurd: We are planning to launch a new national crime prevention campaign, with an enhanced publicity budget, later this year. We have made provision to sustain this campaign over the next two years. The emphasis will be on showing how all those who are concerned about rising crime can make their own contribution to preventing it.

Mr. Shepherd: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that response. As 96 per cent. of crime involves property and 25 per cent. of that proportion involves cars, is it not absolutely essential that the public be involved in the protection of their own property? In his crime prevention programme, what attention will be given to specific schemes such as neighbourhood watch, which has a very good track record of success? Will he promote that scheme, among others?

Mr. Hurd: We shall certainly do that. It is amazing and encouraging that there are 29,500 neighbourhood watch schemes in England and Wales, whereas three years ago there were only about 1,000. This is a real outburst of energy by the citizen in co-operation with the police, and we warmly welcome it.

Mr. Wheeler: I welcome my right hon. Friend's excellent news. Referring specifically to the Metropolitan police district, does he welcome also the 7,000 neighbourhood watch schemes that exist in the district and recognise the excellent contribution that they are making to community-based crime prevention? Will he hazard a comment on the quite extraordinary behaviour of the nine Labour London borough councils which persistently attack the police and refuse to co-operate with crime prevention measures both in their districts and in the inner London schools? How does this sit with the extraordinary claim by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) that he is in favour of crime prevention based in the community?

Mr. Hurd: I do not know where the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) is, but my hon. Friend has certainly put his finger on the reason why the Labour party's campaign on law and order has completely failed to get off the ground. Part of its document asks me to do things that I have been doing for some time already, and the rest asks me to do things that no one in his right senses would think of doing, such as handing over responsibility of policing policies, priorities and methods to elected Labour authorities, particularly in London.

Mr. Soley: Leaving aside the party political propaganda that we have just heard, let us concentrate on the facts. In view of the Secretary of State's answer, which suggests a welcome shift in opinion in the Conservative party and the Government, and bearing in mind the answer that the Under-Secretary of State gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) on 23 April, which again suggested a shift in Government thinking, can he tell us whether the Government are to fund crime prevention in the way in which we are recommending in our document? If so, do they intend to announce that prior to the general election, in the same way as for nurses pay and school education?

Mr. Hurd: There is ample funding of crime prevention from a wide variety of sources—publicity by the Home Office and a mass of schemes financed partly by the urban programme and partly by local authorities. The hon. Gentleman is unfair. When I came to the Home Office for the first time in 1983 I found that the then Home Secretary, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), had already begun to put massive emphasis on crime prevention, and that has been intensified and developed ever since. I am delighted that the Labour party is clambering on board and hope that it will manage to bring with it all those boroughs which are still obstructing the scheme.

Mr. Sims: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the increasing number of crimes involving knives, particularly in south-east London, and of the concern in the community about them? Is he aware of the extent of frustration among police officers caused by the rules imposed upon them under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which limits the extent to which they can stop and search people suspected of carrying knives? Will my right hon. Friend consider reviewing the way in which this part of the Act is working and, meanwhile, perhaps introduce legislation to prevent the sale of some of the horrifying weapons that are at present freely available in the shops?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right about knives, but not right in what he said about the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which does not limit the power of the police in that respect. It simply requires them to make, when they can, a record of what occurred and why. I do not think that that is unreasonable. We are looking at my hon. Friend's final point about sale and possession. Of course, there are many wholly innocent reasons why people should carry knives from time to time, and that creates a problem about legislation. However, if we can find ways of strengthening the law to deal with offensive weapons, such as my hon. Friend suggests, we will take it.

Exeter Prison

3. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners Exeter prison is designed to accommodate; how many were there on the last day of January, February and March; how many cells have more than the intended number of occupants; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Mellor): Since Exeter comprises three separate units, a local prison, a remand centre and a long-term youth custody centre, each with its own certified normal accommodation and population, I will, with permission circulate in the Official Report the information requested.

Mr. Speller: I cannot anticipate the information that my hon. and learned Friend will provide, but may I ask whether he knows, for example, how many hours per day the average prisoner is locked up in Exeter prison? How many of the cells have even the most fundamental forms of running water and sanitation? Is he satisfied that, when so much money is being spent by the Government on improving and rebuilding prisons, Exeter, which serves the few criminals in north Devon, is not being left behind in the race?

Mr. Mellor: Work is going on at Exeter. One wing is out of commission for work at the moment. As my hon. Friend has rightly said, we have embarked on the biggest programme of any Government this century to improve the condition in the old prisons. I shall certainly bear in mind what my hon. Friend said about Exeter. We are aware that it is currently overcrowded. We are aware also that on some days prisoners are locked up for 23 hours, but sometimes it is as little as nine hours. Plainly, the situation is not satisfactory, and it is entirely in accordance with my hon. Friend's concern for his area that he should raise the matter with me.

Mr. Hannam: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware of the stresses and strains suffered by prison officers as a result of overcrowding at Exeter prison, which, as he said, is a remand prison? When does he envisage a proper complement of prison officers being reached at that prison?

Mr. Mellor: Perhaps I could write to my hon. Friend about the details. As he knows, we have recruited a large number of additional prison officers over the years. Indeed, the ratio of prison officers to inmates is running well ahead of any increase in the prison population. I shall certainly ensure that the needs of Exeter are not overlooked.

Mrs. Renée Short: To my knowledge—which goes back to 1964—the question of overcrowding in our old prisons and the appalling conditions in which we keep prisoners has been raised again and again, and we have received exactly the same replies. That is scandalous. Is the Minister aware that the conditions in which we keep men in prison, three to a cell and with no sanitary provision except for a chamber pot, is not conducive to good remedial prison practice? When will the Minister change that?

Mr. Mellor: Of course, what the hon. Lady says is right——

Mrs. Renée Short: Not excuses again?

Mr. Mellor: No, it is not excuses. It is a sign of the impotence of the hon. Lady and others who, like her, felt that they were utterly incapable of persuading the Government that they supported slavishly over the years to spend any money on prisons. Since 1979 we have embarked on the largest prison building and improvements programme, but we cannot overturn the neglect of decades in just a few years. Matters are a great deal better now than they were when the hon. Lady was on the Government Benches.

Mr. Mark Carlisle: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the real and main cause of prison overcrowding is that the Labour party, when it came to power in 1974, cancelled, as a deliberate policy decision, the prison building programme that it had inherited from the previous Conservative Government?

Mr. Mellor: Yes. I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend. If anyone could be bothered to consult the record, I dare say that it would be found that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Short) voted in favour of that decision.

Mr. Soley: The implication of the Minister's remarks is completely unacceptable. We all know that the crime rate, the number in prison and the number of young people incarcerated have rocketed under this Government. Is it not disgraceful, and an insult to the electorate, to make excuses citing the past? The Government must accept that their law and order and prison policies have failed. They included in the Criminal Justice Act 1982 a provision to enable the Home Secretary to release the prisoners that they wanted to release, and they are not doing so only because they are scared of the electoral consequences.

Mr. Mellor: The hon. Gentleman's celebrated impression of a 78 rpm record stuck in the groove is no more impressive this week than it has been for the many weeks during which we have had to put up with it.

Following is the information:

The Certified Normal Accommodation (CNA) and population figures are as follows:

	CNA	Population
		31 January 1987	28 February 1987	31 March 1987
Remand Centre	53	56	70	68
Local Prison	209	336	363	343
Youth Custody Centre	41	39	39	39

The number of prisoners sharing cells is only recorded centrally once a month. Recent figures are:

	Remand Centre	Local Prison	YC Centre
8 February 1987
Number of inmates held two to a cell	26	162	No sharing
Number of inmates held three to a cell	9	129	No sharing
Number of cells overcrowded	13	124	No sharing
8 March 1987
Number of inmates held two to a cell	36	176	No sharing
Number of inmates held three to a cell	3	105	No sharing
Number of cells overcrowded	19	123	No sharing
12 April 1987
Number of inmates held two to a cell	30	186	No sharing
Number of inmates held three to a cell	15	102	No sharing
Number of cells overcrowded	20	127	No sharing

Inquests

5. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to seek to change the length of time taken by coroners in dealing with inquests.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): We are satisfied that coroners accept the need to avoid unnecessary delay. We do not consider that there is a general problem which calls for any special action on the part of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Dormand: Is the Minister aware that that is a very unsatisfactory and complacent reply? He really must consider urgently the appointment of more coroners. Is he aware that some of the implications are not immediately noticeable — for example, the delay in receiving insurance and possible compensation, to say nothing of the distress caused to the bereaved who, in some cases, have to wait months? Will he apply his mind rather more urgently to the problem beyond what he said in his original reply?

Mr. Waddington: I appreciate the importance of the matter. Coroners are aware of the additional distress that can be caused to relatives if there is delay in completing an inquest. However, sometimes investigations take a long time.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State has written to the hon. Gentleman about a particular case that he raised. It is not right for me to comment further, except to say that there has always been a part-time coroner in the district concerned and that, during the whole of the coroner's nine years in office, he has been supported by two coroner's officers. There is no question of the case being affected by a cut in resources, as has been suggested. Indeed, the number of inquests has actually fallen recently.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has a general responsibility for the law, but has no power over the way in which coroners carry out their duties in a particular case. They are independent judicial officers. It is wrong to imply that in this case the coroner behaved improperly or was starved of the normal resources given to coroners.

Mr. William Powell: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that most coroners' inquests have wide public support and are carried out with little difficulty? Nevertheless, a very small number each year cause great difficulties of fact and law, and it often takes a substantial period for the inquest to be carried out. Is my right hon. and learned Friend prepared to consider again whether it is possible or practicable to appoint special coroners from among senior members of the judiciary to carry out the inquests in that very small number of cases that cause public anxiety and difficulty?

Mr. Waddington: Obviously, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will bear in mind my hon. Friend's point. I repeat that my right hon. Friend has a general responsibility for the law, but he has no power over the way in which coroners carry out their duties in a particular case. I do not think that the public take the view that in the vast majority of cases coroners do other than carry out their duties responsibly and properly.

Zircon

6. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the progress of his investigations into the Zircon affair; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: No, Sir.

Mr. Dalyell: Is it not 13 weeks and four days since executives and staff of the BBC were unceremoniously hauled out of their beds at 3 am on a February Sabbath? Is it not also a fact that, of course, the police got hold of no leakers, for the simple reason that there were no leaks? Did not Duncan Campbell put this programme together out of published information, then have it confirmed by those from the stratosphere of Whitehall, such as Sir Ronald Mason and Sir Frank Cooper? Is it not time that this police wasting of time came to an end and the Government admitted their folly?

Mr. Hurd: I am not calling for a report on this matter from the commissioner because, as the hon. Gentleman knows, the commissioner reports direct to the Director of Public Prosecutions. I understand that the commissioner's report on this matter has now been received by the director.

Prisons

9. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to reduce prison overcrowding.

Mr. Hurd: We are proceeding with measures to make the best possible use of existing accommodation. The building programme, including refurbishment of existing prisons and new prisons, will produce 17,200 places by the mid-1990s. This includes five new prisons opening in the next 12 months. We continue to encourage the courts to use non-custodial sentences in suitable cases.

Mr. Fisher: I welcome those new places, but will the Home Secretary confirm that our prison population is the second highest in Europe, second only to Turkey? How many people are in our prisons for offences that are of no danger to the public? For instance, how many debt defaulters are in prison? What steps will the right hon. Gentleman take to resolve that problem?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman welcomes the provision of new places, but the Labour party's official policy is to halt the prison building programme. Among many zany undertakings, that is perhaps the most irresponsible. I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's general point. We have a high prison population in comparison with the total population. I think that Austria has a higher proportion than us. I agree with the hon. Gentleman, but the answer is not for politicians to step in and tell the courts who they are and who they are not to send to prison, but to ensure that the courts in the kind of lesser cases to which the hon. Gentleman referred have before them persuasively argued, tough and practical alternatives to custody. We are pursuing that course through our investment in the probation service, the training of the service and the encouragement of such measures as community service orders, the application of which has almost trebled in recent years.

Sir Edward Gardner: Yesterday the report of the Home Affairs Select Committee on prisons recommended that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary should consider whether the American practice of using private contractors to build, refurbish and manage prisons could be used here to overcome the problem of chronic overcrowding. Will he confirm that he intends to send a Minister to America to look at such prisons? Will he further confirm that the Prisons Officers Association has nothing to fear from the report's recommendation?

Mr. Hurd: I am glad that my hon. and learned Friend has raised that last point. Privatisation is not an accurate description of what he or I have in mind. We are not talking about selling-off existing prisons and putting them under private management. We are talking about whether, by using the private sector and its techniques more intensively, and perhaps at an earlier stage, we can accelerate the provision of prison places and thus ease as rapidly as possible the overcrowding with which we are concerned. I am asking my noble Friend Lord Caithness to go to the United States to follow up the research that was undertaken by the Select Committee.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Is the Minister aware that I entirely agree with him that under his Government the major growth industry in Britain has been the prison building programme?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is falling below his level. The fact of the matter — this has already been mentioned during these exchanges — is that under the Government whom he supported crime and the prison population grew sharply and nothing was done about it. They continue to grow, which I regret, but the difference is that we are, and have been over the past six or seven years, doing a great deal about it.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is wrong that alcoholics and rate defaulters should be sent to prison? Does he agree that the Government could reduce the overcrowding of our prisons by stopping the closure of psychiatric hospitals? Is he aware that during our inquiries into the prison medical service the Select Committee for Social Services found several hundred people in our prisons who more correctly should have been in a psychiatric hospital or asylum undergoing treatment rather than being in prison?

Mr. Hurd: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, and one of the matters on which we have worked hard and successfully is the reduction of the number of inadequates who are sent to prison because no one can think of anywhere else to send them. The pressures that my hon. Friend and others have brought to bear have been effective.

With regard to fine defaulters, my hon. Friend has raised a difficult point, because, in the last resort, when all other measures have failed, it is hard to imagine how one can proceed except with the use of prison. I was interested to note that in the Standing Committee the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) endorsed that point of view.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Home Secretary accept and recognise that many people will feel repelled by the proposal that our prisons should be privatised or run by private companies, because people who are in prison are supposed to be there because they have committed crimes against society, so it should be society's—that means the Government's — responsibility to administer those prisons? I suspect that this will be the last time that the Home Secretary will be at the Dispatch Box, because undoubtedly my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) will be Home Secretary at the next Home Office questions. However, does today's Home Secretary agree that we need a long period of consultation before we move over to the privatisation of our prisons?

Mr. Hurd: It is because I thought that there might be that kind of mischievous supplementary that I said that privatisation is not what my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fylde (Sir E. Gardner) and his Select Committee or I have in mind. We are not thinking of handing over existing prisons to private management. If, by using the private sector and private sector techniques, we can accelerate and improve the provision of prison places, it would be stupid not to try to do so. The hon. Member said that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) will take my place in the next Parliament. He has not bothered to come here today. It is notable that, on this matter, on which the Labour party is purporting to campaign, there are now 10 Labour Members on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to clarify the point that nobody is in prison for debt, but, rather, for contempt of court?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, indeed. That is why I referred to the last resort.

Mr. Dubs: The Home Secretary said that politicians should not interfere. Has he forgotten that his Government's Criminal Justice Act 1982 contained a provision for the executive release of prisoners? Why does he not read his own legislation?

Mr. Hurd: I have read the debate on the legislation often enough. We have discussed it in the House. The provision, which the hon. Member correctly said is in the 1982 Act, is clearly designed for use in an emergency. We are not in an emergency.

Electoral Law

12. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to introduce legislation further to amend electoral law; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: During the next Parliament we intend, after the usual consultations, to bring forward legislation to extend the period during which British citizens may live overseas and continue to register as overseas electors.

Mr. Knox: Will my right hon. and learned Friend consider issuing advice about the legality of direct mail letters that are targeted to particular constituencies during election campaigns? Is he aware that, according to The Guardian, the Conservative and alliance parties have received legal advice that such practice is illegal, and that they do not propose to use it during an election campaign, but that the Labour party proposes to do so? Would it not be a good idea to clarify the matter beyond any doubt?

Mr. Waddington: We should be grateful to my hon. Friend for raising what is obviously an important point. I am sure that the public would expect fair play and a reasonable understanding between the parties as to what is allowed by law. The public would not look kindly on a party that they thought had cheated.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister's views on electoral reform have been publicised. We know that he is in favour of it. Is it too much to hope for that, in the next few days, he can put through a Bill to conduct an election on a system of proportional representation? Given that the Government are often critical of extreme militants on local authority councils, does he accept that one way of controlling them is to have fair representation on local authority councils to ensure that extremism does not have its head in a minority of votes.

Mr. Waddington: There will certainly be no extremism when the Government are returned at the next general election. The Government believe that the simple majority system is the best system. It is well established, it is easily understood and it is most likely to produce Governments for whose policies the electorate has voted.

Mr. Stanbrook: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware of the dissatisfaction that has been expressed over the forms available for absent voters to be able to record their votes? Will he urgently consider the form and determine whether it could be simplified and made clearer in time for any possible early election?

Mr. Waddington: I am told that the form was designed on advice from electoral registration officers. Obviously, I shall discuss the matter with my right hon. Friend.

Violence (London)

13. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to deal with the rise in acts of violence against the person in the Metropolitan police area.

Mr. Hurd: The number of recorded crimes of violence against the person in the Metropolitan police area in 1986 was about the same as in 1985. Operational decisions about the investigation of specific offences are a matter for the commissioner; but I strongly support his decision, recorded in his strategy statement for 1987, to place particular emphasis upon the safety of the citizen.

Mr. Smith: Have not crimes of violence against the person in the Metropolitan area risen by 43 per cent. since the Government came to office, and is there not one such crime every 26 minutes in our capital city? Is not the best way of preventing crimes of violence against the person to make sure that our streets are better lit and that there are no dark corners offering ample scope for lurking muggers? Why, then, have the Government reduced rate support grant, imposed penalties on local authorities, rate-capped London boroughs, and taken away from them, by so doing, the means with which to light our streets better?

Mr. Hurd: Crimes of violence generally have risen more slowly under this Government than under the Labour Government, although I do not make a great point of that. The hon. Gentleman is perfectly right about street lighting, but wrong in supposing that the way to improvement is merely to shell out more money to local authorities. I visited the constituency of my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, and the Labour wards in the Rochampton part of that constituency the other day. A great deal is being done there by the Wandsworth borough council to improve the street lighting, precisely with a view to crime prevention, and it has managed to keep the rates at a steady, reasonable level as compared to its neighbours.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. friend join me in welcoming the Government's present initiative in putting a large amount of money into improving street lighting in London boroughs, and advise boroughs such as Islington, which do not know about that, to find out about it? Does my right hon. Friend agree that Labour boroughs such as Ealing, which are financing expensive campaigns to ask people to complain against the police, would be better advised to put the money used for that into extra policing to overcome the violence of which they complain?

Mr. Hurd: It is certainly true — even in London, where the boroughs have no police responsibility whatever — as the example of Wandsworth bears out, that a borough that is well disposed to working with the police to improve the security of its citizens can give a lead and manage to contrive ample ingenious schemes of crime prevention without new expenditure.

Mr. Forman: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that dealing with crimes of violence against the person is regarded as the highest possible priority of the Government's law and order policy, and of the commissioner and his senior officers in the Metropolitan police? In that context, will he give his support to further measures of encouraging more police on to the beat and more crime prevention techniques?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, indeed. As far as London is concerned, last month I further increased the establishment limits of the Metropolitan police. It is now for them to recruit up to those limits, and the commissioner's reorganisation, as my hon. Friend knows, has, by itself, put over 218 more officers on the beat.

Mr. Tony Banks: Why does the Home Secretary say that no London boroughs have responsibility for policing? Does he not know that the City of London, which is one of London's boroughs, is a police authority? Is that not an anachronism that should be ended? When will the Home Secretary come forward with proposals for elected police authorities in London such as those that exist elsewhere in the country?

Mr. Hurd: I am not going to come forward with proposals that would put the priorities for the policing of London under the control of people such as Mr. Bernie Grant.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Does my right hon. Friend think that efforts to reduce violent crime would be helped or hindered, by Opposition policies to extend political control over police tactics and operational strategy?

Mr. Hurd: That would be lunatic. I do not know what candidates the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) is supporting today, but if he is supporting candidates of the Manchester city council Labour party, they are precisely the same type of leaders as those in the half dozen or more boroughs in London in which Labour leaders such as Bernie Grant — unlike Miss Atkin, who was got rid of overnight — continue in full favour with the Labour leadership — despite the fact that the things that Mr. Grant said were much more offensive to the British people than what Miss Atkin said.

Autocrime

16. Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the steps he is taking to reduce the level of crimes which involve cars.

24. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of overall crime involves cars; and what plans he has to seek to reduce this level.

Mr. Mellor: We regularly receive correspondence from right hon. and hon. Members as well as from members of the public about various aspects of autocrime. Theft of or from cars accounts for about 25 per cent. of all recorded crime. Most such offences are committed by opportunist criminals preying on cars which are intrinsically insecure, and car owners who fail to make the best use of security devices. Accordingly, efforts to reduce autocrime concentrate on preventive measures. Crime prevention publicity seeks to make motorists more security-conscious; car security advice leaflets are being distributed with licence reminders; and the new highway code also contains suitable advice. Manufacturers are being encouraged to improve the security aspects of new cars and the advice on car security which they give to car owners.

Mr. Stewart: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for that most helpful reply. Does he agree that a crucial consideration in the level of crime involving cars is police manpower? Is he aware that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) recently visited my constituency to talk about law and order without, apparently, knowing that the major problem is that the Labour group of the Strathclyde regional council, uniquely in Scotland, keeps its police numbers below authorised establishment as a matter of policy? The resultant swing to the Conservatives in Eastwood and the fact that the right hon. Member for Gorton made an ass of himself are not matters of regret, but is it not important that the public throughout Great Britain know of the importance of proper levels of police manpower to deal with crimes involving cars as well as other crimes?

Mr. Mellor: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Townsend: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the high level of autocrime distorts to some extent overall criminal statistics? Secondly, does not the answer lie in far more electronic gadgetry being installed by motor car manufacturers? It is absurd how easy cars are made for the criminal to break into.

Mr. Mellor: My hon. Friend has touched on two crucial issues. Autocrime is one of the great growth crimes, and has been for the past 20 years. The reason is that it is easily carried out. Too many car owners are slack in the manner in which they leave their cars, and one in five is still left unlocked. Secondly, perhaps too little attention has been focused in the past on the need for good car security as a selling point for a car, and I am glad to say that a new British standard of vehicle security has been launched. We are getting co-operation from motor manufacturers. I hope that car security will improve, that the public will be aware of the improvement and that they will make use of improved security measures.

Mr. Beith: What has happened to our education system if it leads Ministers to come out with expressions such as autocrime, which, if it means anything, means crime against the self? Does the Minister realise that many crimes involving cars involve drink as well? Instead of being sympathetic to the progress of the Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), will he recognise that we should tackle the problem of drink and driving if we are to make changes to our licensing laws?

Mr. Mellor: It took about half an hour for an alliance representative to appear in the Chamber for questions. I am glad that when one did he was able to ask such a bright-eyed-and-bushy-tailed supplementary question. Of course drink-driving offences are important. The Department of Transport has a committee under the chairmanship of Dr. North that is considering whether the present laws and penalties are adequate, and it will be reporting shortly.

Crimes of Violence

17. Sir Anthony Kershaw asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received seeking steps to increase sentences for crimes of violence; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: We receive many letters suggesting that sentence levels for crimes of violence are too low. In fact, they are increasing. Individual sentences are a matter for the courts, but the Government understand the strength of public concern about alleged over-leniency and have responded to it with clause 29 of the Criminal Justice Bill.

Sir Anthony Kershaw: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the judges appear to take no notice of the guidelines that are set out? Are they not losing the public's confidence, and what more can be done?

Mr. Mellor: When a well-publicised sentence appears to be over lenient, there should be a mechanism to deal with it. That is why we introduced clause 29. It is right to recognise that there has been a considerable response by the judiciary to the need to pass appropriate penalties for those convicted of violent crime. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that during the six months after the Billam judgment the proportion of rapists sentenced to over five years has almost doubled. Similarly, since 1980 the number of offenders sent to prison for robbery for more than five years has almost doubled. I am sure that my hon. Friend will welcome that as a step in the right direction.

Crime (Public Assistance)

18. Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further plans he has to involve the general public in the fight against crime; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd) earlier.

Mr. Page: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. The House is only too well aware of the good work done by the Government in improving our laws and strengthening the police force. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is the responsibility of the individual to obey the law and, if the individual breaks the law, it is not the Government's fault, it is the individual's fault? What would my right hon. Friend suggest should be done to bring home to the parents of individuals who break the law their responsibility for teaching their children the difference between right and wrong and producing a better citizen?

Mr. Hurd: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. A heavy responsibility falls on parents and teachers in a society where one third of crime is committed by juveniles. The courts are enabled to fine parents for the misdemeanours of their children. My hon. Friend will have followed the steps put forward by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science about the nature of the curriculum.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Colvin asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Colvin: Will my right hon. Friend find time today to read the new Department of Health and Social Security study published in the May issue of the Employment Gazette, which confirms that under her premiership pensioners' incomes have risen at twice the rate they did in the 1970s and that pensioners are not only spending more but saving more than they have ever done? Is this not yet another real vindication of the Government's economic policies?

The Prime Minister: The article referred to received quite wide publicity in the press this morning. The Government have honoured their pledge to pensioners about the basic pension for 1 million more pensioners than there were in 1979. As the article shows, the net income, taking the total income of pensioners as a group—[Interruption.]—Yes, as a group—has gone up far more than the income of the population as a whole. That means that more people are retiring with occupational pensions and other income, so that prosperity is extending to all pensioners, which is exactly what we wish. I commend the article not only to Government Members but especially to Opposition Members.

Mr. Kinnock: Does the Prime Minister not find it fascinating that those figures for pensioners' incomes include SERPS, which she is intent on abolishing? Has the Prime Minister seen today's reports that 4 million children live in deep poverty and are more subject to serious illness, early death and low achievement than children of comparable age who are not in poor families? As these numbers are nearly double what they were in 1979 when she came to office, does not that record of increased poverty and deprivation among the most vulnerable group in our society fill her with shame?

The Prime Minister: First, the right hon. Gentleman is wrong in saying that we will abolish SERPS. He knows full well that we will not and that it was announced that we will not. As usual, he is utterly wrong. I thought he would have been pleased that more people are retiring with an occupational pension. It has been part of our policy that all people who retire should have two pensions—their basic pension plus either an occupational pension or a fall back on SERPS. That is good. I cannot think why he thinks it is bad.

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman implied that the higher figure of people on supplementary benefit means that more people are in poverty. Those figures refer not only to supplementary benefit but to incomes which are 140 per cent. of supplementary benefit, which would be an income of about £167 a week. With all due respect, that is not poverty and it is absolutely absurd to say that it is.

Mr. Kinnock: Does the Prime Minister, in a very selective view of statistics, want to go on avoiding the truth about the immense spread of child poverty in our country? Does she really think that the £10-odd a week that is provided under DHSS regulations for young children is anything like enough to bring them up on when all evidence shows that £35 a week would be a bare minimum? Does she not agree that, with such an immense spread of poverty, her record over eight years is one of unmitigated shame?

The Prime Minister: I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the report to which he refers defines poverty as incomes that are 140 per cent. of supplementary benefit. When the report first came out, or a similar report was first published, even The Guardian described such a definition as running counter to common sense—I am sorry, it was the New Society that called it running counter to common sense. The Guardian, which I have here, merely described it as perverse. I could not have chosen a better word myself. The right hon. Gentleman is aware that the Government's record on social security is excellent in every way.

Mr. Kinnock: If the Prime Minister takes her own Government's figures of numbers of children on the supplementary benefit bare rate, there are a million more children in this country now on that bare rate than there were when she came into office. In addition, the Government have cut child benefit. Is that what she is proud of?

The Prime Minister: What the right hon. Gentleman is saying is that if we had not put up the supplementary benefit rate as much as we have there would be fewer people in poverty because the definition would be different. That is absolutely ridiculous. I remind him that supplementary benefit rates for children under five and aged 11 to 12 have increased by about 29 per cent. after inflation has been taken into account.

Mr. William Powell: Will my right hon. Friend have the opportunity today to study the latest unemployment statistics from the parliamentary constituency of Corby, in which she will notice that the year-on-year decline from 1986 to 1987 of those out of work and claiming benifit is no less than 22 per cent., and in the wards where unemployment has been highest it is up to 30 per cent.? Will my right hon. Friend recognise that the single most important reason why that has been possible is the combination of Government policies applied to an area of high unemployment?

The Prime Minister: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving the House such an excellent record.

Mr. Donald Stewart: As the Secretary of State for the Environment has withdrawn the threat to dump nuclear waste on sites in England, will the Prime Minister give her guarantee that there will be no dumping of such waste in Scotland?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, there was a report that it would be no more expensive to store low-level nuclear waste with medium-level nuclear waste and we shall consider, along with NIREX, the best place to do so.

Q2. Mr. Churchill asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Churchill: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Government's Green Paper proposing further reforms of the trade unions and giving additional rights to their members has been widely welcomed by rank and file trade unionists? Is she further aware that, according to the Labour party's general secretary, Mr. Larry Whitty, basing himself on Labour party research, a majority of rank and file trade unionists no longer vote Labour? Is that any wonder, given the determination of the Labour party to scrap my right hon. Friend's popular policies in that area?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. I hope that an increasing number of trade unionists will continue to vote Conservative, and that more and more will do so. We have done more than any other Government, for rank and file trade unionists, not only in giving more powers back to them, but because real take-home pay for the man on average earnings has risen by more than 21 per cent. during the lifetime of Conservative Governments. In addition, an increasing number of employees share in the success of their companies, either through profit-sharing or share-ownership schemes, which, again, are part of our policy for extending property ever more widely among our people.

Mr. Dalyell: Was it by design, or by error, that the Prime Minister yesterday failed to read that part of the text that she had given to the press about MI5 and using information in a way that it ought not to be used?

The Prime Minister: The part of the text, which some members of the press must have given to the hon. Gentleman, was excluded because it added nothing whatever to the statement. As he has seen it, he should know.

Mr. Shersby: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to study the proposals of the London strategic policy unit for transferring the powers and responsibities for policing the Metropolis to an assembly of London councillors? Does she agree that it would be most undesirable to change the present arrangements for policing the Metropolis, and that the proposal is just one more example of the loony Left undermining the police?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. It would be absolutely disastrous for impartial policing to hand over the policing of the Metropolis in the way that my hon. Friend has said that the Opposition intend to do.

Dr. Owen: In view of the Irangate inquiry now proceeding in Congress, will the Prime Minister give an assurance about whether representations were made to representatives of the British Government by those of the United States Government to provide Iran or the Contras with weapons or support? Will she give a categorical assurance that no such weapons or support were supplied either to Iran or to the Contras?

The Prime Minister: As a former Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Gentleman knows full well that we never reveal communications between Governments. He operated that policy while he was Foreign Secretary.

I have made our position on Iran clear. It is exactly the same as my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary indicated in October 1984. I have also made it clear that the British Government have not authorised the supply of Blowpipe to the Contras. Our actions have been entirely consistent with our support for a political rather than a military settlement of the problems of Central America.

Q4. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Clarke: Does the Prime Minister recall that she has twice done me the courtesy of meeting me when there have been major closures in my constituency, at Gartcosh and Martin and Black? Will she bear in mind that this week MacKinnons Knitwear in Scotland issued close on 1,000 redundancy notices, yet the Secretary of State for Scotland refuses to meet me, referring me instead to a junior Minister, whom I have already met? Given that unemployment in Scotland has risen by 2,300 each month since the Prime Minister took office, will she use the opportunity in her speech in Perth next week to apologise to the Scottish people, not least for the intransigence and insensitivity of the present Secretary of State for Scotland?

The Prime Minister: The present Secretary of State for Scotland does an excellent job, as did his predecessor.

With regard to Dawson International's proposed closure of its subsidiary MacKinnons, that is a commercial decision for the company to make. Officials of the Industry Department for Scotland are in contact with the company and will help in any way possible to try to find a buyer for the business.

Mr. Powley: May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention — especially as this is the day of the local elections — to the fact that the Labour-controlled Norwich city council has kept empty a house that it owns worth £100,000 for the past five and a half years? Does she agree that that is disgraceful, and that the sole solution to the problem of homelessness lies in ensuring that properties are occupied, not in keeping them empty for five and a half years?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that keeping property or land empty or unused for a very long time is a very bad use of assets. I agree with him, too, that I should be delighted if the natural consequences of voting against any council that did that were to follow.

Q5. Mr. Livsey asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Livsey: Will the Prime Minister assure me that adequate funding will be made available by the Secretary of State for Wales to keep open the Lucas Industries factory at Ystradgynlais and save 700 jobs there? The Prime Minister knows that Lucas has lost orders because Honda has given instrumentation contracts to Nippon Seiki and that this is an insidious penetration of the British car market. Austin Rover has also given a contract to it. Will the Prime Minister assure me that adequate funding will be made available so that those workers can continue to work at that factory for the forseeable future?

The Prime Minister: No, and the hon. Gentleman is quite aware that the answer must be no. If funding were given automatically to every company that had the misfortune to close, money would be piled into companies that were unable to compete and far less money would then be available for building new businesses, of which Wales has many, to create the work of the future. Of course I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman about the redundancies at Lucas and I understand his concern for his constituents, but the sourcing of individual components, whether by Austin Rover or by Honda, must be their decision. If Japanese component companies are set up in this country, we set limits on the number of components that must be purchased from this country, but they must be of excellent quality and price competitive. I understand that a Lucas subsidiary hopes to establish an expansion project at Ystradgynlais. That would safeguard employment at the site, and all concerned are doing everything possible to ensure that the development proceeds.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dalyell: On a genuine point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take all genuine points of order after business questions.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dalyell: My point of order arises out of Questions to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman was called at Prime Minister's Question Time. I shall take all genuine points of order immediately after business questions, in their usual place.

Business of the House

3.32 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to tell us the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 11 MAY—Private Members' motions.

Debate on nuclear power and the Government's decision on the CEGB's application to construct the Sizewell B power station, on a Government motion.

Motion on the Industrial Relations (Northern Ireland) Order.

Motion on the Representation of the People (Variation of Limits of Candidates' Election Expenses) Order.

TUESDAY 12 MAY—Second Reading of the Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill.

Motions on the Parliamentary Constituencies (England) (Miscellaneous Changes) (No. 2) and (No. 3) Orders.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

WEDNESDAY 13 MAY — Consideration of Lords amendents to the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Bill.

Remaining stages of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Bill [Lords].

Motion on the Lord Chancellor's salary order.

THURSDAY 14 MAY—Remaining stages of the Local Government Bill.

FRIDAY 15 MAY—Debate on small firms on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

MONDAY 18 MAY — Opposition Day (13th Allotted Day). Subject for debate to be announced.

The House will wish to know, Mr. Speaker, that, subject to the progress of business, it will be proposed that the House should rise for the Spring Adjournment on Friday 22 May until Tuesday 2 June.

Mr. Kinnock: I can see that some of the business for next week is making even the right hon. Gentleman's hair stand on end.

The first matter that I should like to raise with him relates to next Wednesday's business—consideration of Lords amendments to the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Bill. This legislation, which would introduce a poll tax in Scotland, is widely opposed even by, as the Leader of the House knows, members of his own party. In view of that and the fact that the Government want to levy the poll tax on even the poorest in the community and would like to extend it, if they had the chance, to the rest of Britain, does not the Leader of the House think that it is wrong to guillotine debate on this legislation in the way that is proposed?

I asked the right hon. Gentleman on 9 April for a debate on the important issue of launch aid for the A330 and A340 airbus. Will he press the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make a statement about the need to give appropriate aid to enable British Aerospace to participate in this project? Even a pre-election statement of commitment would be preferable to further slothful delay by the Government.

Will the Leader of the House ensure that the House shortly gets an opportunity to debate today's report from the Commission for Racial Equality which records the fact that black graduates experience much greater difficulty in obtaining work for which they are qualified than do white graduates? Since this very disturbing factor clearly depresses motivation as well as neglecting qualified talent, does not the right hon. Gentleman think that it would be a worthy subject for discussion in Government time?

Finally, could the Leader of the House ensure that the House is given some time to debate the statement in a written answer given by the Secretary of State for Education and Science earlier this week relating to small schools in rural areas? Since in that statement the Secretary of State gave absolutely no undertaking that schools with fewer than three teachers would not be closed and absolutely no assurance of any extra funding that might become necessary if such schools were kept open on educational grounds, I am sure that the Secretary of State would want to correct any impression that he was being helpful to small rural schools and the communities which depend on them since that obviously would not be true. Could the Leader of the House, who I know has an interest in small rural schools, see that the Secretary of State gets that redemptive opportunity?

Mr. Biffen: Taking the points of the right hon. Gentleman in the order in which they were presented, both he and I might be fairly disposed to abstinence in our rhetoric instead of using the analogy of hair standing on end.

As to the right hon. Gentleman's second point, I note what he says about the possible use of the timetable facilities for the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Bill. The right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that the main timetable motion provided for a supplementary motion to deal with Lords amendments, and I can see no reason why this cannot be introduced.

As to the question of launch aid, the Government's discussions with British Aerospace have reached an advanced stage and my right hon. Friend hopes to make an announcement to the House soon.

I note the suggestion that we might have a debate on employment opportunities for black graduates in the context of the recent report of the Commission for Racial Equality. I think that might be pursued through the usual channels.

Finally, I note what the right hon. Gentleman said about the excellent statement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science on schools in rural areas. He was generous enough to concede that I have a lively and constituency interest in this matter. I am perfectly satisfied with it and I invite the right hon. Gentleman to follow my example.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Next Wednesday we shall debate almost exclusively Scottish business. Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Scottish Conservative party conference is also beginning on that day, and the arrangement of business will make life extremely difficult for some of us who would like to be there?

Mr. Biffen: I have always thought that, if Parliament were to be sitting during the Conservative party conference, it would be a wonderful excuse to be here and not there. However, we all have our appetites and inhibitions. I take account of what my hon. Friend says, and I will look at the matter.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The Leader of the House has intimated that he sees no reason why the guillotine or the timetable procedure should not be used for Lords amendments on the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Bill. Given that there have been very few constuctive amendments in the other place and that this Session has considerable time to run, I do not find that his reason is particularly convincing and wish to hear him amplify it.

Given the cascade of Government announcements of recent weeks—perhaps with an eye to the electorate—and given the fact that we will not be here from the week beginning 25 May, can the Leader of the House anticipate any Government statements that he might have been thinking of bringing forward during that week and give the House an opportunity to discuss them before then?

Mr. Biffen: On the second point, the hon. Gentleman will have to accept the good news as it comes.

As to the first point, of course there will be a debate, possibly preparatory to the supplementary motion. The sound arguments will be made then.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Has my right hon. Friend noted that a candidate for the SDP at the last election, who was once a Member of the House, has recently spoken on a Government party platform, asking people to vote Conservative in the coming election? Will my right hon. Friend arrange to issue blanket information to Opposition Members, asking them all to come into our little ring so as to make it bigger?

Mr. Biffen: I am not sure how that arises on next week's business, except that it will provide an opportunity for initial repentance on the part of Social Democratic Members if they start voting with the Government next week instead of with the Opposition.

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): May I make a special appeal to the Leader of the House? I refer him to early-day motion 860 on the future of the West Yorkshire county hall in Wakefield.

[That this House, recognising that the purpose-built County Hall, Wood Street, Wakefield has been in existence since 1898, was built and paid for and maintained by the ratepayers of the West Riding of Yorkshire and the ratepayers of the West Yorkshire Metropolitan County Council, and that it contains very valuable and unique furnishings, a marvellously panelled council chamber and all the requirements for local government and other public bodies, calls on Her Majesty's Government to instruct the West Yorkshire Residuary Body to suspend the consideration of tenders for the said County Hall and to negotiate a sale of the same to the Wakefield Metropolitan District Council and to the West Yorkshire Police Authority for their joint use.]

I have raised this issue on many occasions. I refer the Leader of the House to page 1397 of the Order Paper. There we have 152 hon. Members supporting the motion in my name. I have only one opponent; there is only one amendment. I cannot identify the constituency of my opponent because he is so unknown to me; it says that he is Mr. Gary Waller. [HON. MEMBERS: "Who?"] Mr. Gary Waller. Have hon. Members heard of him?

Does not the Leader of the House think that I should be given an opportunity next week, or possibly on the Opposition day on 18 May—here I appeal to my hon. Friends—to discuss the future of West Yorkshire county hall which is to be privatised? I appeal to the Leader of the House to give me the opportunity for a debate next week or on 18 May, the Opposition day.

Mr. Biffen: Knowing the formidable characteristics of the right hon. Gentleman as I do, I am lost in admiration for my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) that he alone can thwart the ambitions of the right hon. Gentleman. Of course I will look into the matter. I understand that it is essentially a matter for the residual body, which is a rather demeaning concept, but none the less I will consider how it might be debated.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): I welcome the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition that we should debate at an early opportunity village schools in rural areas. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition has shown by his question that he does not understand how they are financed, perhaps because his party has little to do with or cares little for people in rural areas. May I point out to my right hon. Friend that it would be good to debate the announcement made by the Secretary of State for Education and Science about his attitude to village schools in rural areas because of the important part they play in the community and the importance they have for the education of children in those villages?

Mr. Biffen: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I only wish that with a song in my heart I could guarantee a debate on this topic in Government time, but I must have a prudent sense of responsibility on how I mortgage that time for the weeks ahead.

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): May I refer the Leader of the House to the business for next Thursday, the Local Government Bill? On 5 February the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction, in the course of a fairly lengthy statement, announced that as from midnight that day it would be illegal for local authorities, among other things, to guarantee private finance for a host of housing initiatives worth, effectively, about £500 million. That was because there was going to be this Bill, which would take retrospective powers back to 5 February to make it a legal requirement to ask permission of the Ministry to proceed with such guarantees, among other things. Should the Bill fall, in the eventuality about which we are all speculating, would it be possible for the Minister, who will be before the House on Thursday, to indicate — this is an important point — that local authorities would not be acting illegally were they to give such financial guarantees for private finance to provide housing to the extent of about £500 million throughout the country in critical areas of shortage? Would the Leader of the House undertake to get the Minister to make it perfectly clear that, should the Bill fall because of the possibility of a general election, they could go ahead and give that financial guarantee so that we could get that private capital into the housing that is needed in many parts of the country?

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman very fairly conceded that he was making an important but none the less hypothetical point. However, I will most certainly see that it is drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend so that he may take account of it.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): The House is probably at its best when there is ground common to both sides. I therefore support the Leader of the Opposition and my hon. Friend the Member for Dorset, North (Mr. Baker) in making a further request for a debate on rural schools. I say this because the small Church of England school in the village of Wincle, in the hill country to the west of my constituency, has just been the subject of an inspector's report which praises it for the role which it plays and for the quality and scope of education which it provides. So that in every sense bigger is not necessarily best. As many rural schools are under threat and could well be closed by unsympathetic local education authorities, may we have a debate?

I also support the Leader of the Opposition in his call for a debate on the aerospace industry, with particular reference to launch aid for the A330 and A340 airbus. This concerns the future of our vital aerospace industry and we must match the Germans and the French in seeking to ensure its survival. I believe that the House and constituencies such as mine which have a vested interest in the future of aerospace — and I refer to British Aerospace, Woodford — want my right hon. Friend to try to find time for a debate on this critical and important issue.

Mr. Biffen: I always enjoy these Thursday tours of the Macclesfield constituency. I feel that I know it intimately and could never get lost in it. I am fascinated by my hon. Friend's commitment to consensus politics, and I am sure that we shall hear more of that in the next Parliament.

As for a debate on village schools, I assure my hon. Friend that I entirely accept the force of his arguments. It cannot be arranged for next week, but I am sure that debate will take place both indoors and out of doors, as it were.

With regard to the airbus, I am sure that if my hon. Friend reflects further on what I said to the Leader of the Opposition he will draw some encouragement from that.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): I wonder whether the Leader of the House will join me in expressing pleasure that, following a small number of fairly moderate speeches by my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) and myself, the sponsor of the Obscene Publications Bill drew stumps and surrendered last night. Will he comment on the attempt that was made to ram this Bill through by bringing in a sittings motion which would have had us meeting all night, if hon. Members had had the guts for it, and all day in order to have the Bill brought forward for its Report stage with only 12 hours in between? Will he give his views on that and, above all, rejoice with us that such a depressing, reactionary, ill-formed measure has been dropped and, we hope, will not appear again?

Mr. Biffen: It is quite out of character for the hon. Gentleman not to have done his homework. If he had, he would have discovered that I voted for the Second Reading of the Bill. As to the subsequent arrangements for the passage of the Bill, that is a matter for the private sector. I represent the public sector. Therefore, I cannot sensibly and honourably comment upon what happened.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): May we have a statement next week from the Attorney-General, and possibly from the Secretary of State or the Solicitor-General for Scotland, on the electoral law relating to direct mailing to targeted constituencies? During Home Office questions earlier I was not clear whether my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in answer to the supplementary question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox), covered the situation in Scotland. The Secretary of State certainly did not refer to the Scottish National party and any legal advice it may have received. I make no allegations about the Scottish National party, but this is an important matter on which the House should be clear.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend referred to exchanges that took place earlier during questions to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. In truth, I cannot add anything to those exchanges, but I will most certainly see that his question to me is referred to the Law Officers.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the Leader of the House take into account the fact that the Prime Minister's statement, which she might wish to amplify next week, has given great pain to the family and friends, such as Anthony Cavendish, of the late Sir Maurice Oldfield? I see Conservative Members nodding their heads in support. Could not people such as George Young have their questions answered about this because great pain, and possibly misunderstanding, has been created? Will the right hon. Gentleman convey to the Prime Minister the fact that I did not receive something from the press that I should not have. I read it in the press. Some of us are surprised that a statement about the possible misuse of information gained by MI5 is a matter of little consequence, adding nothing to the statement. Would she think about that?

Finally, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to be given an opportunity to explain why Barrie Penrose and Roger Courtiour, two BBC journalists, interviewed Harold Wilson on the question of dirty tricks by MI5, and why the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, along with the right hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) and the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Onslow), and the late Airey Neave interrogated the journalists? Could some statement be made by the Chancellor?

Mr. Biffen: I note what the hon. Gentleman says. On his first point, I will convey his request to No. 10. As to his second point, I will inquire of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster about the matter that has been raised, and doubtless he will be in touch with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): Looking to the future, I give notice to my right hon. Friend that, unless I hear sooner, in the forthcoming debate on the Loyal Address I shall be raising with great force the future of the village schools of Easton Royal and East Grafton in my constituency, about whose future I have been trying to extract decisions from the Department of Education and Science ever since the beginning of December.

Mr. Biffen: All these exchanges show that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science is blessed with the twin characteristics of sound political judgment and progressive educational instincts. I will ensure that the point is passed to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): Is the Leader of the House aware that once again the future of Fulham football club has been thrown into doubt and jeopardy as a result of the irresponsible actions of Marler Estates, a company which has on a number of occasions reneged on undertakings and agreements? On this occasion a further failure to honour an agreement is causing the difficulty.

Will the right hon. Gentleman urge the Minister with responsibility for sport to come to the House next week and make a statement on the steps that the Government will take to safeguard football clubs against the actions of predatory property speculators? Will he also speak to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who as yet has not responded to a question that I raised some time ago about the possibility of there having been improper insider dealing in the shares of Marler Estates earlier this year?

Mr. Biffen: There must be scope for a private Member's Bill to convert the Fulham football club technically into a village school. That, it seems to me, is the most immediate helpful prospect of its preservation. Having once lived under its shadow, I understand that it is a matter of great seriousness in London. I will refer the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised to my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Trade and Industry respectively.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Will my right hon. Friend accept that my admiration for his judgment has been nudged a little by the reply he gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) when he suggested that it was preferable to be anywhere in this kingdom, for whatever reason, even a party conference, than at Perth? Since that is the place from which the Government were launched, succeeded and relaunched, and will no doubt be relaunched again, will he use his influence with the Welsh section of the Labour party to persuade it to use its thirteenth allotted day to initiate a debate on the north-south divide in order to remind the House of the immeasurable benefits of living north of the border, thanks to the Government?

Mr. Biffen: I am always anxious to make the most ample common cause with my hon. and learned Friend, so let me say that I have the utmost devotion to Perth, particularly when it is unblemished by over-zealous political activity. My hon. and learned Friend's point is one of great seriousness, and I am sure that through the usual channels we will be able to accommodate his point.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Is the Leader of the House aware of two major financial question marks over British financing of the EEC? First, there is the court case relating to the extension of VAT to house building and construction and, secondly, there is the Delors package, which has been presented and is in the Vote Office—Com. 87/101—which takes apart the whole of the current EEC financing structure and dismantles the much trumpeted Fontainebleau agreement obtained by the Government. As it is almost certainly to be referred for debate by the Select Committee on European Legislation, will he assure the House that when the package is debated in the Council of Ministers on 25 and 26 May next, if a debate has not for some reason taken place in the House by then, Her Majesty's Ministers will give no commitment whatsoever on the grounds of the resolution of the House of which he is aware?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman raises a point that is substantial in its economic implication and constitutional consequences. He knows perfectly well that I can give no guarantee about the behaviour of Ministers at the council of Ministers. However, I shall certainly see that the matter is referred to my right hon. and hon. Friends.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend bring forward the traditional time for announcing rate capping for councils from July to next week, bearing in mind the extreme difficulties of people in Ealing, Waltham Forest and other areas? Will he bear in mind that I have had packed meetings throughout my constituency of hundreds of people objecting to the Ealing rate rise of 65 per cent. for domestic ratepayers and 57 per cent. for industrialists? A total of 3,500 people came on a march to Ealing town hall on the wettest day of the year when the Grand National was being shown on television, as well as the Calcutta cup. There is strong feeling and people need reassurance that wicked councils such as Ealing and others will be stopped in their tracks as soon as possible. Will he bear in mind the fact that pensioners and many others have been to my surgery and met me in the street and are deeply upset to the point of tears in facing rate bills that they know they cannot pay?

Mr. Biffen: I do not doubt for one moment the very strong feeling that has been generated by the rates issue in many parts of the country, particularly in Labour authorities which have had high spending policies. I note the request for the rate-capping announcement to be advanced somewhat dramatically to next week. My heart is with the proposition, but holding a responsibility for the management of Government business, I must say that I cannot easily see how it can be accommodated. However, I shall be in touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): Is the Leader of the House aware that in my area the Conservative party is posing quite disingenuously as the champion of the ratepayers, yet the Government have stolen £40 million in rate support grant cuts and penalties since the Prime Minister came to office? If the Conservative party is really the champion of the ratepayer, will the right hon. Gentleman find time to give back that £40 million?

Mr. Biffen: The search for an equitable distribution of the rate support grant is one of the eternal and fascinating aspects of our national politics, and I have no doubt that it will continue.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, if he agreed to the call of the Leader of the Opposition and of my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) for a debate next week about the future of small village schools, I could point out that the Government have been fairly consistent in their policy? For example, seven or eight weeks ago they saved such a school at Mugginton in my constituency, which was under threat of closure from a Labour county council.

Mr. Biffen: I thank my hon. Friend for his contribution, which reinforces the powerful case for an early debate on the educational and social significance of village schools in the shires, and the signal duty that has been undertaken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science in that regard. Although I cannot immediately offer such a debate, we shall certainly have one, either here or in another place.

[Mr. Biffen]

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is the Leader of the House aware of reports circulating in American newspapers today to the effect that pressure has been put by the British Prime Minister on the United States President in the event of the zero—zero option being finally agreed to define Europe as mainland Europe? Britain would therefore be excluded, and all the B52s and cruise missiles would thus be located in this country. Would the right hon. Gentleman comment on the story that is circulating in the United States? More important, will he guarantee that if an announcement is made today or tomorrow, we shall have an emergency debate on the matter in Government time?

Mr. Biffen: I have always feared that the hon. Gentleman was, at heart, a trendy internationalist. I share the prejudices of his hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) in that I do not regard this country as part of mainland Europe, and I shall go to the grave thinking that it is not part of mainland Europe. As to the hon. Gentleman's other points, I certainly have no responsibility for the speculations of American newspapers, and I therefore cannot help him.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Leader of the House take another look at the business for next Wednesday and change it a little? First, will he give the Scottish people a reprieve by not having the debate on the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Bill so that the poll tax is not imposed on them? Secondly, will he ask the Lord Chancellor if he can get along on £78,000 a year for just a little longer? Instead would the right hon. Gentleman allow the House a full debate on the parliamentary control of the security services and the Government's action to prevent Peter Wright's book from being published in Australia so that the public can see exactly who controls the security services and what threat they may have been to previous Governments? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that this a matter of great importance and that it is in the public interest that there be such a debate?

Mr. Biffen: I would not want to be the first, or last, person to suggest that the business for next week is fixed irrevocably and cannot be altered. However, it would be altered only after the most profound consideration and deep argument and with the utmost conviction. Therefore, I am disposed to stand firmly by the business announced for Wednesday and to disappoint the hon. Gentleman.

BILLS PRESENTED

Data Protection Act 1984 (Amendment)

Mr. Harry Cohen presented a Bill to amend the Data Protection Act 1984: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 3 July and to be printed. [Bill 153.]

Political Opinion Polls (Regulation)

Mr. George Foulkes, supported by Mr. Ernie Ross, Dr. Norman A. Godman, Mr. John Maxton, Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Tom Clarke, Mr. Willie W. Hamilton and Mr. Harry Cohen, presented a bill to regulate the carrying out and publication of results of public opinion polling and to set up a Supervisory Commission to oversee all aspects of political polls and their publication: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 12 June and to be printed. [Bill 154.]

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I will put together the three motions relating to statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Charities (Northern Ireland) Order 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Companies (Mergers and Divisions) Regulations 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Urban Development Corporations (Financial Limits) Order 1987 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

Orders of the Day

Banking Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 1

FUNCTIONS AND DUTIES OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 2, line 2, after first "or" insert

"who is, or is acting as,"

4.4 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This is a technical amendment to put it beyond doubt that the immunity in clause 1(4) extends to those members of the Bank's staff who are seconded to the Bank rather than being its permanent employees. Although not directly employed by the Bank, they act essentially as employees, and it is important that they are able to act firmly and confidentially in their supervisory duties.

As this is the first of the Lords amendments, I shall say a general word about the coming into force of the Bill's provisions. We intend that the bulk of the Bill's main provisions will come into force on 1 October this year. However, there will be an exception in the case of the large exposures reporting regime, for which a target of 1 January 1988 has been set to give the banks time to prepare their systems for compliance with the requirements. We propose, too, that the provisions on the disclosure of information should be implemented two months after the Bill receives Royal Assent to enable the Bank of England to co-operate more fully with other supervisory authorities as soon as practicable.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 21

NOTIFICATION OF NEW OR INCREASED CONTROL

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 16, line 6, leave out "which is a body corporate".

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This is a drafting amendment which simply removes some unnecessary words to make for consistency with similar references elsewhere in the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 22

OBJECTION TO NEW OR INCREASED CONTROL

Lords amendment: No. 3, in page 17, line 25, leave out subsection (4).

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 4.

Mr. Stewart: The amendments correct the procedural provisions for the giving of notices of objection by the Bank of England. As drafted, the clause did not take account of the period allowed for representations to be made by a person who has acquired a controlling shareholding without clearance and is subsequently served with a preliminary notice of objection by the Bank of England. The Bank might therefore run short of time to consider the case, given that the final notice must be served with an overall time limit of three months. The purpose of the amendments is to take account of that passage of time and also to clarify the Bank's authority to require information and documents in such cases.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 4 agreed to.

Clause 26

RESTRICTIONS ON AND SALE OF SHARES

Lords amendment: No. 5, in page 20, leave out lines 10 and 11.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 7.

Mr. Stewart: The amendments are designed to ensure that copies of notices of restriction made under clause 26 are sent to all those affected by the notice, which may include a number of people acting as associates. Earlier drafts of the Bill did not adequately deal with such cases and the amendments are designed to meet that question.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 6, in page 20, line 16, at end insert

"in a case where the notice of objection was served under section 22 or 24 above".

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

This is a technical and drafting amendment and represents a correction consequential on the introduction in this House of clause 23. The decision to object on grounds of reciprocity is a matter for the Government and is not subject to appeal to the tribunal constituted under the Bill. The existing reference to allowing time for an appeal in clause 26(4) does not, therefore, apply to action under clause 23.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 7 agreed to.

Clause 37

NOTIFICATION OF ACQUISITION OF SIGNIFICANT SHAREHOLDING

Lords amendment: No. 8, in page 28, line 21, after "institution" insert

"incorporated in the United Kingdom".

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment relates to clause 37 which deals with notification of significant shareholdings which was a measure introduced during the Bill's passage on which we had extensive debate. The clause requires shareholdings of between 5 and 15 per cent. in an authorised institution to be notified to the supervisors. Such "significant shareholders", as they are defined, are then subject to the powers to require information and to mount investigations, which appear later in the Bill. However, in the same way as the Bill's requirements for shareholder controllers apply only to United Kingdom incorporated banks, which is clearly the matter of concern, the provisions of the clause were also intended to apply only to significant shareholders in United Kingdom incorporated banks. The amendment is designed to achieve that effect.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): I do not wish to disagree with the amendment, but it provides a useful hook on which to hang some points of public interest. One concerns the link of the Bank of England to the £26 million Morgan Grenfell sale. According to press reports, the bankers refused to comply with a request to name a major shareholder. Given that the bank is now committed to more open disclosure of nominee shareholders to prevent abuses of the takeover code, I should like the Minister to comment on these interesting mystery shareholder stakes wherein someone has used a nominee company owned by the Bank of England to build up a stake, apparently of nearly 5 per cent., in Morgan Grenfell during the past few months. One should know exactly how and why this is happening.

To strengthen the Minister's hand and his resolve—of course, I am relying on press reports and do not necessarily have the latest information—I remind him that the Government no longer owe anything to Morgan Grenfell. More recent press reports make it clear that Morgan Grenfell will no longer countenance political payments without the prior agreement of shareholders. Last year, it funded the Tories to the tune of £25,000. No doubt, Central Office will be particularly interested in that report. Even when the former Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins), sat on Morgan Grenfell's board, the annual payment to Conservative funds was "stolidly maintained", to quote from a press report. That only confirms the deepest suspicions of Labour Members that the right hon. Gentleman and his party are much more closely aligned with Conservative Members than with anyone else. I think that the Minister is now in a position to come clean about Morgan Grenfell and the Bank of England and exactly what is going on. I am sure that the House—it is not exactly full—will be delighted to hear what the Minister has to say.

4.15 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): As we are rattling along fairly well, I should like to make a few comments because I was a member of the Standing Committee and important questions have arisen in relation to significant shareholdings. Recently, I heard from the acceptance houses committee, a most distinguished body, which would like to make certain comments. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister will give me a reply, if not immediately, then shortly after, and in writing, if necessary.

Discussion in the other place drew attention to a number of defects that were thought to exist in the Bill and could have great significance in certain circumstances. The Bill has received a great deal of support from the banking industry and there has been a great deal of helpful consultation throughout its passage.

One concern is the action that the Bank of England may take when an unwelcome shareholder announces that he has 5 per cent. of the voting capital in an authorised institution. When such a shareholder increases his holding to 15 per cent., he has to seek the approval of the Bank of England before going further. If the Bank does not consider him fit and proper, it can take quite drastic action under the Bill to prevent him from doing damage to the bank in which he holds shares.

Unfortunately, the Bill does not make it clear that the Bank of England can do anything before the 15 per cent. point is reached, even if it has already formed the view that the shareholder is not fit and proper. It seems somewhat illogical that an undesirable shareholder should be allowed to play around between 5 and 15 per cent. without interference by the central bank charged with the maintenance of the stability of the banking system. However, a number of assurances have been given in another place by Ministers that the Bank of England would not be powerless in such circumstances and would be able to warn an undesirable off the course. The important point is that there should be a proper warning system to ensure that the results that I am sure we all want —including the Government—are produced.

There is another difficulty in that the Bill does little to resolve the interaction between itself and the Financial Services Act 1986. I served on the Standing Committee on the Financial Services Bill and have viewed this matter with some interest over the past 18 months or so. The main point is that, since the passage of that legislation, it has become clear that two sets of regulations will apply in certain circumstances, which I have described, coming from two different regulatory authorities. That will cause considerable burdens for the banking system. It is hoped that the securities regulators are able to accept the Bank of England as——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member. I allowed the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) to go fairly wide, but the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) is going very much wider than the Lords amendment. We are dealing with Lords amendments and remarks must be addressed to them. I am sure that the hon. Member will bring his remarks into order.

Mr. Cash: The point that I wish to make—I think that I can make it briefly—is that the Bill could have contained a provision to enable the banking supervision used by the Bank of England to be equivalent to the system used by the securities regulators. It would be helpful to know how the current talks are progressing. We want to be sure that the banking system as envisaged by the amendment tabled in the Lords ensures that banking supervision operates in a way that would not be needlessly undermined by different securities regulators. I think that my hon. Friend the Minister knows the point that I am making. It has been made a number of times, so there is no need to dwell on the subject.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald), drew attention to some comments that had appeared in the press about a shareholding in Morgan Grenfell and asked about the implications of that and of nominee shareholdings. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), also on significant shareholdings in banks, pointed to the situation which applies where an individual or company owns between 5 and 15 per cent. of the share capital of the bank.

I will begin by dealing with the point that was made by the hon. Member for Thurrock about a report in the press. I suspect that that report is the same one as I saw on 29 April, which was not entirely accurate, so it may help, therefore, if I explain the provisions with regard to holdings in companies and banks in particular.

As to nominee shareholdings, under the Companies Act a company has a right to know the identity of its shareholders who are registered through nominee companies. There is an exception to that in section 216(5) which applies to certain categories of shareholders, notably Governments and Heads of State. It provides that a person is not obliged to comply with a notice to reveal identity if he is exempted under that section. That only applies up to the figure of 5 per cent., which is the same figure as applies for the purposes of the Banking Bill in relation to significant shareholders.

Until recently 5 per cent. was the figure required for disclosure in the case of a bid for a company under the rules of the Takeover Panel. That figure has been reduced to 1 per cent., but it applies under those circumstances only once a bid has been announced. For this purpose it is not relevant to the case that the hon. Member for Thurrock has raised.

The nominee position runs out when a shareholding reaches 5 per cent., so at that point there is no further protection on anonymity and, at the same time, any holding of 5 per cent. or more would trigger the provisions that we have included in the Banking Bill. The Bank of England, as supervisor, would have to be notified of a holding to be able to keep a check on significant shareholdings in authorised institutions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford repeated some comments that he had made in the earlier stages of the progress of the Bill. He said that there was little of effect that could be done if a shareholding lay between 5 and 15 per cent. In practice, that is not a fair description of the position, because any undesirable shareholders, to be able to own and take advantage of a shareholding of 15 per cent. or more, would have to satisfy, at that stage, the Bank of England as supervisor that they were fit and proper to be controlling shareholders of an authorised banking institution. That would mean that their conduct as a shareholder of an amount of the capital of that bank that is lower than 15 per cent. but above 5 per cent. would be directly relevant. We have included provisions in the Bill for the Bank of England to be able to obtain relevant information from such a significant shareholder.

To use a phrase that I used earlier in the proceedings of the Bill, the strengthening of the 15 per cent. hurdle, which we accomplished by making it apply not just at the time of acquisition of the 15 per cent. but continuously thereafter, casts its shadow back to the time before the shareholder reaches the figure of 15 per cent. That gives an effective preliminary opportunity for the Bank of England to monitor the conduct and behaviour of a shareholder who may aspire to become a controlling shareholder.

It would be wrong to set a figure lower than 15 per cent. for the strong measures that are in the Bill. After all, they enable voting rights, or even ownership, to be divested, which are very powerful measures. If one had a figure significantly lower than 15 per cent. one could only accompany it by rather weaker measures, and I would not be in favour of that.

Mr. Cash: Will my hon. Friend look into the question that has been raised that the securities regulators do not seem to be able to accept the Bank of England's method of consolidated supervision under which the capital of the banking conglomerate stands behind its engagements. It appears that it is insisting on a surfeit allocation of capital to each separate business that is undertaken. Talks are occuring on this question, but perhaps my hon. Friend will drop me a note about it.

Mr. Stewart: I will certainly look into that. It is a separate point from the one that we have been discussing, but since it has been raised I will comment on it.

I know that there is the question of capital adequacy calculations under the different supervisory regimes, but I am anxious that a sensible solution should be found to this. Any institutions which are affected or potentially affected by the different regimes and are concerned about it should not hesitate to make their views known and put their comments to the supervisors concerned. I hope that by so doing they will enable a reasonable and workable basis to be found between the two.

Clause 39

POWER TO OBTAIN INFORMATION AND REQUIRE PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS

Lords amendment: No. 9, in page 31, line 39, leave out "or subsidiary" and insert ", subsidiary or related company".

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 10, 12 to 17 and 55.

Mr. Stewart: These amendments slightly widen the power under clause 39 for obtaining information by including "a related company" among the connected companies from which information and documents can be obtained. A "related company" is defined in the Companies Act as a company in which the authorised institutions hold 20 per cent. or more of the nominal value of the shares in the company.

The amendments widen the reach of the powers of investigators appointed under clause 41 to include companies in which the authorised institution or its shareholder controllers have a 20 per cent. or more stake, rather than just 50 per cent. as is the case in the Bill as it stands. These amendments were originally put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) on Third Reading.

The amendments reflect suggestions that have been made by the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. The Government undertook to consider them and subsequently concluded that a widening along the lines of these amendments would be desirable. Therefore, such amendments were able to be included in the proceedings of the Bill in another place.

Dr. McDonald: The Minister will know that we welcomed these amendments when they were moved in the other place, but we note that they go pretty wide. It is proper that an investigation should be thoroughly carried out and should include related companies as well. The Minister will know that companies may, for one reason or another, find themselves over 20 per cent. owned by an authorised institution, perhaps as a result of underwriting.

The amendment is a wide one, but nevertheless the Opposition accepted these amendments in the other place and realised that investigations must be able to be carried out as thoroughly as possible.

Lords amendment: No. 11, in page 32, line 19, after "information" insert "or documents"

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

It alters subsection (9) of the clause by empowering the Bank of England to require the provision of documents as well as information from a director, controller of manager to assist it to determine whether that person is fit and proper. This brings the subsection in the clause into line with the other provisions in the Bill relating to the obtaining of information and to investigations, all of which include powers to require the furnishing of documents.

INVESTIGATIONS ON BEHALF OF THE BANK

Lords amendment: No. 18, in page 34, line 4, after "every" insert

"person who is or was a".

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 19.

4.30 pm

Mr. Stewart: The amendments correct omissions from the Bill as originally drafted. They relate to clause 41, which deals with investigations into the affairs of authorised institutions by inspectors appointed for the task by the Bank of England when it believes that an investigation is necessary in the interests of depositors. Subsection (5) imposes a duty on the directors, managers and controllers of an institution under investigation and on others closely connected with its business to co-operate with the inspectors. The analogous provision, section 17 of the 1979 Act, applied that duty also to people who were in such positions as well as to those who continued to be in such positions but were no longer at the time that the investigation took place. The drafting of the replacement provision in clause 41 did not include that, and we have taken this opportunity of correcting it.

Clause 43

POWERS OF ENTRY IN CASES OF SUSPECTED CONTRAVENTIONS

Lords amendment: No. 20, in page 36, line 44, after "to" insert "laying an".

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 21, 37 and 52.

Mr. Stewart: The amendments are technical drafting ones that improve the Bill in its application to Northern Ireland. I am advised that in clause 43, to which the amendments relate, the correct usage is to refer to laying information and making a complaint. Amendments Nos. 20 and 21 reflect that usage. In clause 79, the reference to Article 296 of the Companies (Northern Ireland) Order 1986 should, to be more exact, be Article 296(2). In clause 89, the reference to that order should have included the word "arrangement". Amendments Nos. 37 and 52 respectively correct those points of drafting.

Clause 45

AUDITED ACCOUNTS TO BE OPEN TO INSPECTION

"( ) In the case of an institution incorporated in the United Kingdom the accounts referred to in subsection (1) above include the auditors' report on the accounts and, in the case of any other institution whose accounts are audited, the report of the auditors."

Mr. Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Amendment No. 22 relates to clause 45 and requires an authorised institution to keep at each of its offices in the United Kingdom at which it holds itself out as accepting deposits not only its audited accounts but the auditors' report on the accounts. The amendment was suggested by the Opposition in Committee in another place, and I am glad to confirm that it is an acceptable improvement to the Bill.

Clause 47

COMMUNICATION BY AUDITOR ETC. WITH THE BANK

Lords amendment: No. 23, in page 38, line 41, leave out "shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either"

and insert

"no such regulations shall be made unless a draft of them has been laid before and approved by a resolution of each"

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Amendment No. 23 fulfills an undertaking that I gave on Report. At the time, I agreed that, if the Government wished to introduce rules specifying the circumstances in which the auditors of authorised institutions should communicate information to supervisors, as the hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) suggested, it would be more appropriately dealt with by affirmative resolution of both Houses of Parliament. Again, I am happy to agree to that. I am glad that the provision has been able to be included in the Bill.

Dr. McDonald: My remarks will be even briefer on amendment No. 23. I thank the Economic Secretary for ensuring that the amendment that I proposed in Committee has been put forward in the other place and is now part of the Bill.

Clause 58

COMPENSATION PAYMENTS TO DEPOSITORS

Lords amendment: No. 24, in page 44, line 7, leave out "end of the deposit's original term to maturity"
and insert
"deposit is or becomes due and payable under the terms on which it was made".

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 25, 26, and 28 to 34.

Mr. Stewart: The amendments relate to clauses 58 and 60, dealing with technical aspects of the administrator procedure. That procedure was introduced by the Insolvency Act 1985. It has recently come into force for the generality of companies, but as yet does not apply to banks. It will do so in due course when secondary legislation under the Insolvency Act is laid.

The Bill, with a view to that order being made in due course, provides for the deposit protection arrangements to apply in respect of deposits with an institution, subject to an administration order. The amendments relate to the way in which calculations are made with regard to deposits and the amount of compensation payable in an administered institution. The amendments were accepted unopposed in another place. They are a useful piece of forward planning in relation to the application of the Insolvency Act provisions and the administration procedure in the case of banks.

MEANING OF INSOLVENCY

Lords amendment: No. 27, in page 46, line 5, at end insert
"or on the making of a winding-up order against it by virtue of section 90 below".

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

It is designed to remedy a gap in the circumstances in which the deposit protection fund is brought into play when a Scottish partnership is wound up. It ensures that the deposit protection fund is triggered when an institution that is a Scottish partnership is wound up by the court on the petition of the Bank of England under clause 90. At present, the drafting is defective in that respect. The position of partnerships in the rest of the United Kingdom is already covered, but for the sake of completeness it is wise to make provision for what I hope will be an exceedingly rare occasion, if it ever arises at all.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should inform the House that the amendment involves privilege.

Mr. Stewart: After that ominous warning I must tell the House that the amendment was proposed, for the sake of clarification, by the Opposition in another place. It is designed to make clear that contributions to the deposit protection fund could be deducted from taxable profits. Although I was advised that clause 66 did not need amendment, there is no harm in the amendment. If it could conceivably assist in the avoidance of doubt, I am happy for it to be included in the Bill.

Clause 74

MEANING OF "OVERSEAS INSTITUTION" AND "REPRESENTATIVE OFFICE"

Lords amendment: No. 36, in page 59, line 13, at end insert
"; and 'establishment', in relation to such an office, includes the making of any arrangements by virtue of which such activities are promoted or assisted from it."

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Under the Bill, an overseas bank proposing to establish a representative office in the United Kingdom is required to give not less than two months' notice to the Bank of England. As the Bill stood, an overseas bank would not clearly be required to give such notice if it entered into an arrangement with an agent that had already established premises here for the purpose of conducting representative activities through that agent. Therefore, the amendment closes a potential loophole in the requirement to report establishment of a representative office. It is not a loophole which, under current circumstances, is likely to be exploited, but it is wise to close it now because it may well be that, in future, further arrangements will need to be made with regard to representative offices, and it would be unfortunate if the Act, as it would then be, did not cover that point.

Clause 84

DISCLOSURE FOR FACILITATING DISCHARGE OF FUNCTIONS BY OTHER SUPERVISORY AUTHORITIES

Lords amendment: No. 38, in page 63, line 4, column 2, leave out "section 431, 432, 442, 446, 447 or 448" and insert "Part XIV".

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendments Nos. 39, 40, 41, 42 and 43.

Mr. Stewart: Amendments Nos. 38, 39, 42 and 43 extend the purposes for which the Bank of England can disclose supervisory information to the Secretary of State for the purpose of investigations under the Companies Act 1985. As presently drafted, clause 84(1) allows disclosure by the Bank to the Secretary of State only to assist him with some of his powers under part XIV of the Companies Act, which deals with investigation of companies and their affairs. While it is unlikely that disclosure will be necessary in many of the remaining cases, it is not impossible. The amendments therefore replace the references to specific sections of part XIV of the Companies Act and the equivalent Northern Ireland order, with reference to the whole of part XIV and its Northern Ireland equivalent.

Amendment No. 40 adds to the list of supervisory persons to whom the information may be disclosed a person appointed by the Secretary of State to obtain a company's books or papers under section 44 of the Insurance Companies Act 1982.

Amendment No. 41 arises as a consequence of the approach adopted by the draftsmen in the Building Societies Act 1986.

As a whole, these are a rather miscellaneous list of technical tidyings-up of clause 84 on disclosure to other supervisors, and while I would not try to exaggerate their importance, they tidy up an important clause in the Bill.

New Clause

ELECTRONIC TRANSFER OF FUNDS

Lords amendment: No. 51, after clause 88, insert the following new clause—

"—. After section 187(3) of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 (arrangements to be disregarded in determining whether a consumer credit agreement is to be treated as entered into in accordance with prior or in contemplation of future arrangements between creditor and supplier) there shall be inserted—

'(3A) Arrangements shall also be disregarded for the purposes of subsections (1) and (2) if they are arrangements for the electronic transfer of funds from a current account at a bank within the meaning of the Bankers' Books Evidence Act 1879.'"

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment involves a new clause that is designed to clarify the existing law as it affects banking transactions carried out with the latest technology. Without the amendment, there would have been some uncertainty about the position under the Consumer Credit Act of electronic transactions on a current account by means of a plastic card. It can be difficult for the law to keep pace with such changes, and the amendment, which is designed to remove a possible constraint on the development of an important project in electronic banking — electronic funds transfer at point of sale—was and is welcome, and I am glad that it has been incorporated in the Bill. It is one item to which the banks attach considerable importance in planning their developments in the area, and for that reason it has been taken ahead of other matters that have been referred to the review of banking services law in general.

Dr. McDonald: I do not wish to oppose the amendment. Nevertheless, it is somewhat surprising to find legal obstacles to the introduction of EFTPOS being dealt with at this stage of the Bill, and, as the hon. Gentleman has just said, in advance of a full review of banking services. He will no doubt be aware that consumer associations and consumers in general may have certain anxieties about the way in which such systems may operate, and may be concerned about whether their interests are properly protected. I want to put on record the fact that the Opposition, while not opposing the amendment, express doubts about the wisdom of removing legal obstacles without ensuring that sufficient consumer protection has been built into the legislation. I should be interested to know what thought has been given to that matter.

I understand that the banks wish to move ahead with EFTPOS, and that this is an opportunity to remove any possible legal obstacles, doubts or misgivings, but the Government have not paid sufficient regard to consumer protection in this case.

Mr. Stewart: I note what the hon. Lady has said. I am glad that she did not oppose the provision, which was discussed in the Government's original White Paper and has therefore had a wider currency than other matters relating to the law as it affects the relationship between banks and their customers.

As far as I am aware, there is no decisive reason on grounds of consumer protection why we should not go ahead with the provision now, particularly because if we do not plans for the arrangements would be put back, possibly for an indefinite period. The review of the banking services law will examine the whole area and now that the provision has been incorporated in the Bill the banks will be able to take that into account in considering other related matters concerning the transfer of funds and the interests of consumers. However, I take the hon. Lady's point.

New Clause

POWERS FOR SECURING RECIPROCAL FACILITIES FOR BANKING AND OTHER FINANCIAL BUSINESS

Lords amendment: No. 53, after clause 89, insert—

"For the avoidance of doubt it is hereby declared that a notice under section 183 of the Financial Services Act 1986 (disqualification or restriction of persons connected with overseas countries which do not afford reciprocal facilities for financial business) may be served on any person connected with the country in question who is carrying on or appears to the Secretary of State or the Treasury to intend to carry on in, or in relation to, the United Kingdom business of any of the descriptions specified in subsection (1) of that section whether or not it is of the same description as that affected by the less favourable terms which are the occasion for the service of the notice."

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we shall discuss Lords amendment No. 56.

Mr. Stewart: The amendments relate to a point raised by my noble Friend Lord Elton during debate on Report in another place. The question which then arose was whether the drafting of section 183 of the Financial Services Act 1986 was sufficiently clear. That section deals with reciprocity and provides the Government with reserve powers, the purpose being to secure reciprocal access for British firms in overseas markets. It allows for the refusal, the restriction or the removal of authorisation to carry on banking, investment or insurance business in the United Kingdom if the country of origin of the institution concerned does not allow reciprocal access in those areas to British institutions.

The intention has always been that these powers should operate in such a way that action could be taken against, for example, a banking institution on the grounds of lack of access to investment or insurance markets, or vice versa. This is known as a cross-functional approach, and it gives the necessary degree of flexibility for the powers to achieve their objective.

It was considered that the present wording of the provision is ambiguous and that it is insufficiently clear whether cross functionality would apply if challenged, and the new clause was introduced to put the matter beyond doubt. The related amendment to clause 108, No. 56, ensures that as the new clause is a clarification of existing legislation it will come into effect immediately following the Bill's enactment.

Mr. Cash: I am glad to note that the new clause begins "For the avoidance of doubt".

This is a matter upon which there should be no doubt, and the provision goes to the centre of gravity of the "playing field". I refer to the way in which reciprocity between nations—I have in mind specially Japan and the United States — operates in the international securities and banking markets. It is essential that we have such a provision, and I greatly welcome it. I think that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury will recall that I tabled a series of amendments in Committee, which provoked a certain amount of comment in the press and elsewhere at the time which argued strongly for adequate reciprocity. I am delighted that the Government have taken the steps that they have and that my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry went recently to Japan to discuss these very matters with those responsible in that country.

There is also the general question of the GATT round and the manner in which bilateral arrangements and agreements are entered into. We cannot work on the basis that the Japanese, or other countries that have enormous capitalisation at their disposal, are in a position to do a Monty Python on our banking system. It is essential that the amendment should be agreed to. I welcome the fact that my right hon. Friend has adopted it.

Mr. Stewart: I welcome the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash). It is important that we have in place provisions that will be seen to be able to work if they need to be brought into play. If there were any legal doubt that they could be implemented, they would fail in much of their purpose, which is to encourage the countries in which British financial institutions may want to operate to offer the same access to our banks and insurance companies, for example, as we offer them by way of a welcome to the City. Doubt had been cast upon that and we want to make it clear that we have relevant provisions in the Bill and in the Financial Services Act, and that such provisions, if they had to be brought into force, would be effective and would enable us to take appropriate action.

As I have said during earlier stages in our consideration of the Bill, we hope that we shall not have to implement these provisions. Our purpose is to open up foreign financial markets rather than to close the City, or British financial markets, to foreign institutions. It is clearly right that the relevant provisions in our legislation by way of reserve powers should be effective if ever they have to be used. Although the new clause is designed for the avoidance of doubt, it adds strength to our commitment and will make it clear to all outside that we want to have provisions of this sort and that we want them to be right, so that if they have to be used they will be effective in practice.

Clause 103

MEANING OF "DIRECTOR", "CONTROLLER" "MANAGER", AND "ASSOCIATE"

Lords amendment: No. 54, in page 76, line 45, leave out from "has" to "that" in line 48 and insert

"with any other person an agreement or arrangement with respect to the acquisition, holding or disposal of shares or other interests in that body corporate or under which they undertake to act together in exercising their voting power in relation to it".

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment is designed to tidy up the definition of an associate for the purposes of identifying controllers and significant shareholders. It follows on changes made on Report in this place, especially the introduction of a requirement for notification to the Bank of England by persons who become significant shareholders—that is to say, shareholders with 5 per cent. but less than 15 per cent. of the voting power of an institution in the United Kingdom or of another institution of which it is a subsidiary.

This addition to the Bill has resulted in the Bank of England being required to pay more attention to persons who may be acting in concert for the purpose of acquiring shares, even though they may not be seeking to control the institution through the joint exercise of voting power. The effect of the amendment is to include within the definition of associate for the purpose of grouping persons who are, in effect, concert parties, those who agree or arrange to buy shares together or to dispose of them together. The subsection had already provided that associates included those who exercised their voting power together, and that provision is retained.

Schedule 1

THE BOARD OF BANKING SUPERVISION

Lords amendment: No. 57, in page 79, line 29, at end insert

"provided always that there shall be a majority of independent members on the Board."

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

It has always been the Government's intention that the independent members of the Board of Banking Supervision should be in a majority, and that is accepted by the Bank of England. The provision that is set out in paragraph 3 of the schedule gives a degree of flexibility to change the total number of board members if it proved desirable to do so in future. That is subject to the baseline of six independents and three ex-officio members, which is set out in clause 2. That flexibility was never intended to undermine the policy of retaining a majority of independent members. In the other place an Opposition amendment was tabled, which was accepted by the Government, to make clear on the face of the Bill that there would always be a majority of independent members of the Board of Banking Supervision, notwithstanding any future changes in the number of board members.

I am happy to report back to the House that the provision has been included in the amendments to the Bill. As I have said, it was our intention, on the ground of policy, that that should be so. Having it spelt out in the Bill will make that doubly clear.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): I welcome the opportunity to support this amendment. Modest though it is, it is regarded by most people who have followed this Bill as implicit in the previous provisions. I ask my hon. Friend whether, during the passage of this Bill or when it left the House after the Third Reading, there have been any further discussions to which he has been privy within the Bank of England or with the Governor about the role, composition and activities of the Board of Banking Supervision. My hon. Friend will recall that the composition of the independent ex officio board, the way in which the members' activities will evolve and the influence they could bring to bear on the Governor were matters of deep concern to the Members who took an interest in the passage of this Bill. One would like to feel that the tenor of what we said about the opportunity that has arisen to evolve their practices has had some impact since the matter was debated previously. Can my hon. Friend add anything to that?

Mr. Stewart: I am happy to acknowledge that there were valuable debates in Committee, on Report and on Second Reading about the role of the independent members of the Board of Banking Supervision. My hon. Friend has asked me whether further thought has been given to this. Certainly it has. As he will know, we have introduced amendments to provide that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and the Governor of the Bank of England will have joint responsibility, which each of them recognises, to ensure that people appointed to the Board of Banking Supervision are effectively able to carry out the job which the Bill entrusts to them. Further thought has been given and will continue to be given to this as the supervisory framework of financial institutions emerges and becomes clearer.

The passage of time — every month that goes past brings more experience — shows that, although the process of supervision of financial institutions is complex, it will have to be very closely co-ordinated between supervisers in banking and other parts of the financial sector.

The Board of Banking Supervision will not come into force as a legal entity until the provisions of the Bill are enacted and become operative later this year. In the meantime, it has been found useful that the Board of Banking Supervision, in escrow as it were, is operating, bringing experience and making a critical assessment of what is needed in the changing circumstances of the financial sector for the benefit of the supervisors in the Bank of England.

I assure my hon. Friend that the debates on the Bill have been noted, both by the Bank of England as the supervisory authority and by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor who is responsible for the legislation under which it is established and who will, under the amended provisions of the Bill, have joint responsibility with the Governor for making such appointments.

MINOR AND CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

5 pm

Lords amendment: No. 58, in page 91, line 2, at end insert—

"The Finance Act 1986

In Schedule 7 to the Finance Act 1986—

(a) in paragraphs 8(1) and 11(1)(c) for the words 'a recognised bank or licensed institution (within the meaning of the Banking Act 1979)' there shall be substituted the words 'an institution authorised under the Banking Act 1987';

(b) in paragraph 8(2) for the words 'recognised bank or licensed institution' there shall be substituted the words 'authorised institution'."

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

It remedies an omission dealing with consequential amendments to other legislation. It substitutes references to institutions authorised under the Bill for references to recognise banks or licensed institutions. That was the terminology used in the Banking Act 1979, which this Bill will supersede. The latter definitions will no longer be relevant once this Bill becomes operative.

Lords amendment No. 58 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 59, in page 91, line 27, after "54(4)" insert "and (5)".

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this we will discuss amendment No. 60.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Amendments 59 and 60 relate to schedules 6 and 7. They have the effect of deleting clause 54(5) of the Building Societies Act 1986 which, together with subsection (4), made provision for disclosure of banking supervisory information to the Building Societies Commission by the Bank of England pending the coming into force of the relevant provisions of this Bill. As soon as this Bill is enacted and comes into force, those provisions of the Building Societies Act 1986 will be superseded, and amendments 59 and 60 deal with that.

Title

Lords amendment: No. 61, in line 4, after "descriptions" insert

"to amend section 187 of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 in relation to arrangements for the electronic transfer of funds; to clarify the powers conferred by section 183 of the Financial Services Act 1986;"

Mr. Ian Stewart: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment is to the long title of the Bill and is consequential upon amendments 51, 53 and 56, which have been dealt with.

The proceedings on the Bill at all stages in this House and in another place have been carried through constructively. I thank all my hon. Friends who were members of the Standing Committee and the hon. Lady the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) and her hon. Friends who took part in the Committee for the way in which they have approached this important legislation. It is far from being the most contentious of Bills which has been before the House this Session, but it is neccessary, along with the Building Societies Act 1986 and the Financial Services Act, to provide the basis for modernising and updating the supervisory arrangements for the financial sector. It is an important advance on the Banking Act 1979.

I hope that, having had the opportunity of observing and operating the Banking Act for the past seven or eight years, we have been able to take account of lessons learned and have made provision for a rapidly changing financial sector. It is of great importance to the economy, but it must be properly regulated and supervised. This Bill is designed to do that. I thank all those in this House and in another place who have contributed constructively to its passage.

Dr. McDonald: I rise, not to comment on the amendment, but to thank the Minister for his remarks and to say that Opposition Members, both here and in another place, have been glad of the opportunity to improve the legislation. Members of all parties have an interest in seeing that banks are properly supervised, and the legislation which will shortly be on the statute book provides much of the necessary framework for that.

The main point now, as the Minister well knows, will be how the Bank of England uses the powers conferred on it by this legislation. We trust that the Bank will keep a close watch on banking institutions. It has already looked into the conduct of some banks, notably the investigation currently under way into the Standard Chartered Bank, which we hope the Bank of England will be able to bring to a conclusion successfully once this legislation is fully operative.

Fire Safety and Safety of Places of Sport Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.
[SIR PAUL DEAN in the Chair.]

New Clause 1

ENTERTAINMENT LICENCES: REMOVAL OF CERTAIN EXEMPTIONS

'The following premises, namely—
(a) the Theatre Royal Haymarket, and
(b) the Royal Albert Hall, shall cease to be exempt from the requirement for a public entertainment licence under paragraph 1 of Schedule 12 to the London Government Act 1963.'—[Mr. Douglas Hogg.]
Brought up, and read the First time.

5.8 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 3.

Mr. Hogg: The new clause, incomprehensible as it sounds on the face of it, is an important and interesting piece of legislation which owes its appearance largely to the enterprise and enthusiasm of my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan). I am, therefore, particularly pleased to see him in his place and I hope that he will speak to the new clause which, as I say, owes much to his work.

It might be helpful if I were to tell the House something about the purpose, effect and background of the legislation, because it must be admitted that it is rather bizarre.

The new clause and the amendment relate to the exemptions from the licensing requirements of paragraph 1 of schedule 12 to the London Government Act 1963, which, as the House will know, is the public entertainments licensing code for London. Paragraph 1(1) of schedule 12 requires the licensing by London borough councils — formerly the GLC — of premises used for public dancing or music and any other public entertainment of the like kind. Paragraph 1(6) provides exemptions from the licensing requirements for the Theatre Royal Drury Lane, Covent Garden Opera House, the Theatre Royal Haymarket and the Royal Albert Hall and for any entertainment lawfully held by virtue of letters patent or licence of the Crown. The new clause provides for the removal of the exemption for, first, the Royal Albert Hall, and to require it, for the first time, to be licensed for public music and dancing; and, secondly, the Theatre Royal Haymarket, which, despite the specific exemption, holds a music and dancing licence.

Amendment No. 3 is a consequential amendment of schedule 4, the repeals schedule, to repeal the references to the Theatre Royal Haymarket and the Royal Albert Hall in paragraph 1(6) of schedule 12 to the 1963 Act.

I agreed in Committee to consider an amendment which would have the effect of requiring the Royal Albert Hall, for the first time, to conform to the music and dancing requirements contained in schedule 12 to the London Government Act 1963. That is why we have brought the new clause and the amendment forward.

The Bill as it stands, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East so rightly pointed out, creates an anomaly. Clause 42 introduces new licensing requirements for indoor sports premises in London. The Royal Albert Hall is not to be exempted from licensing under clause 42 and it will be subject to licensing controls for all indoor sports entertainments to which the public are invited as spectators. Because of the exemption for the Albert Hall in the 1963 Act licensing code for music and dancing entertainments, the result is that a tennis tournament or boxing match at the hall will be subject to licensing requirements whereas the last night of the Proms, or any other concert, will not. That is bizarre, paradoxical and unjustifiable, and my hon. Friend and, to be fair, the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), objected. I agreed with them and said that I would explore the legal position with a view to bringing forward an amendment.

The public are right to expect such premises to satisfy standards on a musical occasion as much as on a sporting occasion. The purpose, and, I hope, the effect, of the new clause and the amendment is to correct the anomaly.

5.15 pm

As I have already said, the Royal Albert Hall is not the only premises exempt from the music and dancing licensing controls. Others are the Theatre Royal Drury Lane, the Royal Covent Garden Opera House, the Theatre Royal Haymarket and any entertainment lawfully held by virtue of letters patent or licence of the Crown. The exemption for the Theatre Royal Haymarket appears to be derived from an 18th century exemption in respect of the Old King's Theatre in the Haymarket, but the present Theatre Royal does, in fact, hold an entertainments licence. So the opportunity is taken here to amend the licensing exemption in order to bring the law into line with the facts.

As I said I would in Committee, we have also looked at the possibility of removing the other exemptions in respect of any entertainment lawfully held by virtue of letters patent or licence of the Crown. In the course of our inquiries we discovered at least one bizarre fact—that nobody knows what meaning is to be given to the phrase "licence of the Crown". Despite the most assiduous research by my officials, for which I am extremely grateful, the phrase "licence of the Crown" appears to have no very certain meaning. Indeed, it is just possible that it has no meaning at all, in which case it will not be unique if that piece of legislation is meaningless in any statutory sense. However, there it is. We have explored it and we do not know what it means, for which we are all sorry. There is also the question of letters patent.

We have had to come to the conclusion that, for a variety of reasons, it is not possible for us to remove the general exemptions in the legislation. It may be possible to bring the premises, which are within the general exemptions, under statutory control when used for public music and dancing entertainment, but it has not proved possible to do so in this statute, although it is not for lack of wanting to do so. Therefore, we shall be exploring whether more suitable opportunity can be found.

However, there is good news. The House should note that as theatres both the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane and Covent Garden are subject to conditions imposed by Westminster city council which are designed to ensure the safety of the public. The formal requirements of a theatre licence do not apply, as they are treated as special cases under the Theatres Act 1968 by virtue of their letters patent. That may be a curious situation, but the fact is that if and when those theatres are used for public music and dancing entertainments, as opposed to theatrical performances, no conditions apply. In the unlikely event that either the Theatre Royal Drury Lane or the Royal Opera House Covent Garden staged a public indoor sport event—the mind boggles at the prospect—the premises would be subject to the licensing controls that have hitherto applied under the 1963 Act licensing code.

There is an anomaly, and we must confess that it cannot be justified. However, there is no reason to believe that any of the premises now exempt from entertainment licensing pose any hazard to the public. My officials—to whom, again, I am grateful—have carried out inquiries of the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority, and have been assured that the standard of fire precautions at the exempted premises is satisfactory.

While it is extremely difficult to justify this absurd anomaly, I believe that the House and the general public are extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East, who first pointed out the problem during the Committee stage of the Bill. We should undoubtedly try to correct it. If the House approves the new clause and the amendment, we shall be able to correct the anomaly in relation to the Theatre Royal Haymarket and the Royal Albert Hall, and I hope that the House will decide to accept them. On the other hand, I fear that it will not be possible, at least on this occasion, to correct it in respect of the Theatre Royal Drury Lane or the Royal Opera House Covent Garden. I hope that we shall revert to the matter on a subsequent occasion.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): I know that this subject has created a good deal of interest. Indeed, after the outstanding presentation by my hon. Friend the Minister, there are now twice as many hon. Members in the Chamber. That is because of the importance of the new clause, the concern that is felt about this remarkable anomaly and the need to address in some detail—as I hope we shall do—the revelation that no one knows what "licence of the Crown" means. The matter is extremely serious. I realise that it will need further examination, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will re-examine it outside the ambit and remit of the Bill. In view of the considerable expertise available to him both here and in his Department, I am certain that he will be able to consider the matter in detail and come up with some historic assessment and analysis carried out with penetrating wisdom, and that he will write to me in due course with his findings about those three aspects of it. I hope that that will be possible in the not too distant future, so that during the next Parliament we shall have the opportunity to address the question further, look again at those two important historical venues and possibly amend current legislation there and then to rectify the remarkable misunderstanding over the phrase "licence of the Crown".

Having said that, and having reinforced my gratitude for the lucid explanation of the new clause by my hon. Friend the Minister, I feel that it would be timely to assess in detail the background reasons for my having drawn this important issue to the attention of the Front Bench and the House in general, both in Committee and here. Many hon. Members are very concerned about the implication of the new clause, not least because of the importance that it has for sporting promotions in the Royal Albert Hall. It is well known that my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) is a lover of sport: indeed, he has spent many an enjoyable evening at the Albert Hall watching first-rate promotions. Like other hon. Members, he will be very surprised to hear that the law perceives boxing to be more in need of tougher fire controls than a completely full house for, say, the last night of the Proms — although that involves far more serious problems associated with access and exit routes and the possible reaction of large numbers of people to a fire breaking out.

Until my hon. Friend so wisely re-examined the matter, completely different criteria were placed on the same venues in regard to events when far fewer persons were present. A clear anomaly would have been created about the fire risk in a specific venue, which is intrinsic to the venue, not to the sporting performance or entertainment taking place there. That is why, during the Committee stage, I moved an amendment to paragraph 2 of schedule 3, which relates to music and dancing licences. I suggested that after the words "paragraph 1" the following words should be inserted:

"in subparagraph (6) the words 'or the Royal Albert Hall' shall be omitted".—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 23 April 1987; c. 41.]

I intended in the first instance to welcome the removal of the exemption for boxing and wrestling licences for the Royal Albert Hall. I am sure that all hon. Members welcome that, because we all know that it will improve the safety requirements and provision affecting members of the public attending any promotion. Any measure that puts public safety first must surely be supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

However, in welcoming the removal of the exemption, the Committee recognised that an anomaly would be created, in that the premises would still not require a licence for music and dancing. Indeed, if the Bill had been enacted in its original form, it would have meant premises requiring a licence for a tennis match, when the hall might be half empty, but not for the last night of the Proms, when it might be packed to capacity. It seemed to me, and to other hon. Members on both sides of the House, that the drafting of the Bill as it stood, and the fact that we had not faced up to the requirement for the amendment and the new clause, would make nonsense of the legislation.

It was suggested that the Royal Albert Hall should also lose its exemption for the need for a music and dancing licence, and that important issue formed the second part of the amendments that I tabled in Committee. Theatre and entertainment licences ensure that safety regulations are brought up to scratch. It is therefore important for us to address the reason for four major cultural venues in London being exempt from such licences, and thus, implicitly, from the options of ensuring, through the local authorities, that the regulations for fire and safety were not up to scratch. I am glad to say that the point has now been addressed in respect of two of those four venues.

The new clause covers the Theatre Royal Haymarket and the Royal Albert Hall, but I am very worried that the new clause does not cover the Theatre Royal Drury Lane and the Royal Opera House Covent Garden. It is important to consider why they have not been included in the Bill. No major sporting occasions have been held in the Theatre Royal Drury Lane or in the Royal Opera House Covent Garden. Indeed, pitch and putt competitions at the Royal Opera House Covent Garden are unlikely in the foreseeable future.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Shame.

5.30 pm

Mr. Moynihan: The hon. Gentleman says, "Shame". Other hon. Members will probably support him, because they believe that there should be sporting functions at the Theatre Royal Drury Lane and at the Royal Opera House Covent Garden. Those two venues have been excluded because the Bill is first and foremost about safety at sporting venues, and we have yet to see sporting events at the Theatre Royal Drury Lane and at the Royal Opera House Covent Garden.

Nevertheless, the House must consider why those four venues do not, for historical reasons and because of letters patent, come within the law. The safety of these venues is of paramount importance, and an accurate interpretation of the phrase "licence of the Crown" should recognise that safety must come first at any venue. Nobody would argue that because of historical precedent or letters patent safety should not come first, yet for historical reasons four very important buildings in London do not have to adhere to the rigorous licensing requirements for all other venues.

The Government were wise to introduce the new clause and to consider the point in depth. I said earlier that I should have been hard pushed to vote for that part of the Bill that allowed this exemption to continue if the Government had not recognised the need for substantial changes and if they had not taken the wise advice that they have sought since the proceedings in Standing Committee to rectify this anomaly.

The Westminster city council devoted a great deal of time and energy to considering the implications of the new clause. The council has been outstanding in its promotion of the safety interests of everyone who goes to sporting, musical and entertainment venues in the Westminster area. I am delighted that it has had the wisdom and the perception to support the initiative that I introduced in the Standing Committee, and that my hon. Friend the Minister has so generously and appreciatively considered.

My hon. Friend raised various points when he introduced the new clause. Coupled with the new clause is amendment No. 3. My hon. Friend seeks to include the words in schedule 4 to the Bill. The Local Government Act 1963 will have to be amended. That led hon. Members to pay close attention to the need for a new clause to sort out the problems concerning the wording of the Local Government Act and the anomalies caused by the historical precedents at these four venues.

I hope that the exemptions will go further and that we shall not ignore the implications for theatregoers at the Theatre Royal Drury Lane and the Royal Opera House Covent Garden. If a theatre is exempted, for historical reasons, from the need to have a theatre licence or an entertainments licence, nobody suggests that the management of the Royal Opera House Covent Garden or the Theatre Royal Drury Lane do not impose the required safety standards. It would be quite wrong for anybody to interpret our remarks as being critical of the safety standards that are imposed by the management of those outstanding places of entertainment. Nevertheless, that anomaly must be sorted out in law to ensure that the standards that are required to obtain a theatre licence or an entertainments licence are adhered to both in the spirit —as they are at the Royal Opera House Covent Garden and at the Theatre Royal Drury Lane—and in the letter of the law. That was the reason for my original amendment.

My hon. Friend's answer covered some aspects of this point. It is difficult to tackle the problems associated with letters patent and then to legislate to cover the phrase "licence of the Crown". Despite those difficulties, suitable legislation must be drafted to ensure that both the spirit and the letter of the law are followed in all four venues that are exempted by the 1963 Act.

I was interested to hear of the historical reasons why one of these venues was exempt and why, according to the Minister, it appears no longer to be exempt. I am delighted that detailed historical research has led my hon. Friend to come before the House to remedy the problem regarding the Theatre Royal Haymarket. However, I am not convinced that that goes far enough.

I am completely satisfied that the new clause is acceptable, according to the terms and objectives of the Fire Safety and Safety of Places of Sport Bill. That is precisely what my hon. Friend was trying to achieve. If so, he has achieved it in a masterly fashion. However, I would have hoped that my hon. Friend, with his genius, intellectual tenacity and capacity for seeing through a mass of historical data, literary footnotes and references, and with his way of going straight to the heart of an argument, would have gone further and tackled the problems that he recognises as being exceptionally difficult, the problems of letters patent, historical status and, above all, the interpretation of "licence of the Crown." Only that held him back from going further in moving new clause 1. Nevertheless, that can be remedied, and I hope that it will be.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) intervened on the issue of sporting events in the two other important and significant cultural and artistic centres. I understand the hon. Gentleman's strength of feeling and I am pleased that there was all-party recognition in this House that we need to consider going one step further.

The whole essence and character of the handling of this clause and the way the House is addressing it shows how we can get together and tackle problems that might otherwise separate us in Committee for party political reasons. In this new clause we put the interests of the public and of public safety first, both in Committee and in this House, thus enabling it to pass so successfully and without problems or divisions that might otherwise harry our proceedings in the Palace of Westminster.

I thank my hon. Friend for responding to the removal of certain exemptions and the implications of the removal. The new clause goes a long way towards tackling the overall problem and completely deals with the immediate problem in the Fire Safety and Safety of Places of Sport Bill. For that reason I welcome it. I hope that other hon. Members will speak on this new clause. I can see the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) on the edge of his seat, willing to make a contribution for the Labour party so that we can have complete unanimity on this issue. I hope that he will lend his support. I would not want to push him because there are other important amendments that the House will be considering later this evening. I am even more delighted to see the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland seeking to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in order to support me in supporting the Minister in moving the new clause.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I welcome this new clause.

Mr. Wallace: I wish to ensure that this new clause has all-party support and I add my welcome to it.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have seldom heard supporting remarks from the Opposition Benches that have been so lucid or so much to the point. We are grateful for their support, but at the end of the day the credit for what has been achieved goes to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan). Had he not raised this matter in Committee, the amendment and the new clause would not be before the House now. My hon. Friend said some kind things about me and I propose to study Hansard because my opening remarks in my election address will be based very much on what he said.

The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) laughs, but I note that he was nodding agreement when my hon. Friend was making those kind remarks. I heard what my hon. Friend said, that we have not gone far enough. I regret that it has not been possible to remove the exemptions for entertainment lawfully held by virtue of letters patent or licence of the Crown. We have had about two weeks to look into this issue. The concept of "licence of the Crown" is not readily comprehensible. Letters patent involve issues of constitutional importance, notably the status of letters patent and the prerogative of the Crown.

It would not be right to legislate after an interval of two weeks without full consultation, and that is why we have not addressed those two exemptions in the course of this Bill, but should a suitable statutory vehicle emerge it will be our intention to look again at them.

5.45 pm

My hon. Friend said that in premises which are used for important purposes of entertainment it is essential that proper provision should be made for fire safety. He emphasised, as I do, that despite the exemptions, to which he drew our attention, the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority is wholly satisfied as to the adequacy of the arrangements at Drury Lane and Covent Garden. I hope that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whatever I or my hon. Friend may have said in the course of this debate, will not go away with the impression that there is any anxiety about safety at those premises, because there is not. I hope that this new clause, together with the amendment, will attract the support of this House and will thus become law.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Clause 1

POWER TO EXEMPT FROM REQUIREMENT TO HAVE FIRE CERTIFICATE

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, leave out lines 39 to 41 and insert—

'( ) The fire authority shall not grant exemption under this section for any premises without causing an inspection to be carried out under subsection (4) above unless they have caused the premises to be inspected (under that or any other power) within the preceding twelve months.'.

This is quite an important amendment which was introduced in response to what the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) said in Committee. It is a credit to him that this issue was raised. To understand this amendment one must have an understanding of the statutory background to clause 1. The main statute with which we are concerned is the Fire Precautions Act 1971, which is aimed at protecting life from the risk of fire. The central feature of that Act is the requirement that occupiers of premises which are put to a use which is designated by order made by the Secretary of State should obtain a fire certificate from the local fire authority.

Before the local fire authority issues the relevant certificate, it is required to satisfy itself as to the adequacy of fire safety on the premises, including the means of escape, the means for fighting fire and the means for giving warning to people on the premises. When the measures are not found to be satisfactory, the fire authority has the statutory power to acquire appropriate improvements. In addition, the fire certificate can impose any requirements that the fire authority considers necessary, including maintenance conditions and the requirement for training staff and keeping records.

That is the statute on which the subsequent delegated legislation was founded and to which this Act refers. In 1972 the Secretary of State designated hotels and boarding houses providing sleeping accommodation for six or more persons or for any number of persons above the first floor or below the ground floor as being premises which required a fire certificate.

In 1976 the certification process was taken yet further in that under the fire certification requirements under the 1971 Act provision was made to extend the process to factories, offices, shops and railway premises which were previously subject to certification under the Factories Act 1961 and the Offices, Shops and Railway Premises Act 1963. Under the designation order such premises in which more than 20 persons are employed to work, or more than 10 persons are employed to work other than on the ground floor, are required to be certificated.

Further changes were made in that factories in which explosives or highly flammable substances are stored or used also need a certificate, regardless of the number of employees. Thus, in general terms, fire certificates are needed for all but the smallest hotels and boarding houses and for many places of work.

Naturally, since the certification provision of the 1971 Act came into force fire authorities have carried out extensive programmes to certificate premises in the categories which I have described. The 1971 Act, together with the delegated legislation which followed, has led to a substantial improvement in fire safety.

However, as you will be the first to appreciate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, such legislation requires constant scrutiny and updating. That is precisely what has been happening. A process of review was undertaken which culminated in proposals produced within the framework of the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council which includes representatives of fire authorities and the fire service. A consultative document based on these proposals was published in 1985. As a result of the comments received, a further consultative document was issued last year. The consultative process led to the substantial provisions that are to be found in part I of the Bill.

In substance, it has been thought right under the clause to enable the Secretary of State to specify in an order made under section 1 of the Fire Precautions Act 1971 descriptions of premises which a fire authority may exempt from the requirement to have a fire certificate, even though they are being put to a designated use under section 1 of the 1971 Act and are not otherwise exempted. In other words, clause 1 says that the Secretary of State may by provision exempt certain classes of premises which are, on the face of it, designated premises, but he can do so only by giving to the local authority a discretion to make that exemption, the local authority being the fire authority for these purposes.

The point that exercised the minds of hon. Members in Committee was that it was right and proper that before an exemption order was made by the fire authority it should have carried out an inspection. That is precisely what the amendment is seeking to achieve. It provides:

"The fire authority shall not grant exemption under this section for any premises without causing an inspection to be carried out under subsection (4) above unless they have caused the premises to be inspected (under that or any other power) within the preceding twelve months."

It thus follows that an inspection within the relevant period is a condition precedent to the power of exemption arising.

The amendment has been introduced because of an undertaking that I gave in Committee to the hon. Member for Battersea. Because of that undertaking, he withdrew the amendment which he had moved in Committee. I hope that my amendment meets completely the undertaking that I gave and that it will satisfy the hon. Gentleman.

The amendment will allow fire authorities to avoid needless duplication of inspections so that they can exempt premises on the basis of knowledge gained on a recent inspection, but it sets a reasonable limit to that discretion and ensures that an inspection has taken place within the previous 12 months. Of course, even if the fire authority had inspected within the previous 12 months, it can, if it wishes, require a further inspection, if that is thought necessary, before issuing the certificate of exemption. We have given the fire authority a wide discretion but we have also fettered it in the way set out in the amendment.

I very much hope that this approach will commend itself to the hon. Member for Battersea and to my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), who played such a prominent part in the discussion in Committee.

Mr. Dubs: I welcome the amendment. As the Minister said, it reflects precisely the amendment that I moved in Committee which the Minister said he would like to consider and get drafted to Home Office standards. I understand that the amendment will achieve what I intended: that if more than 12 months have gone by there will be an inspection by the fire authority. As the Bill was drafted originally, such an inspection was not necessary. This small improvement will add to the fire safety standards, and I welcome it.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8

DUTIES AS REGARDS SAFETY PENDING DETERMINATION OF APPLICATIONS FOR FIRE CERTIFICATES

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 10, line 3, leave out 'and' and insert—

'(aa) the means for fighting fire with which the premises are provided are maintained in efficient working order; and'.

This is another important amendment. Its main purpose is again to meet an undertaking that I gave in Committee on an amendment moved by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs). Because of that undertaking, the hon. Gentleman felt able to withdraw his amendment. I hope that he will support the amendment I am moving. It might be helpful if I were to give the House an indication of what the amendment is designed to achieve because I know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home Office has a particular interest in it.

Clause 8 imposes a duty on the applicant for a fire certificate to secure that, pending the disposal of the application, the means of escape with which the premises are provided can be safely and effectively used, and that employees receive instruction or training on what to do in the case of fire. The amendment adds the further requirement that any means for fighting fire with which the premises are provided shall be maintained in good and efficient working order.

I should like to describe the amendment which the hon. Member for Battersea moved in Committee. It was intended to extend to means for fighting fire the interim duty which applied under clause 8 to premises subject to certification in order to cover the period between the date of the application and the date of certification, or, for that matter, the granting of exemption. What he had in mind was to include means for fighting fire amongst the measures that the occupier was required to secure.

There were problems about his amendment. First, there is no fire-fighting appliance that can properly be prescribed for all ills. We might find ourselves providing a statutory requirement which involved an occupier in obtaining fire-fighting appliances which were either wholly inappropriate or positively dangerous. The Committee found that a compelling argument and the hon. Member for Battersea was good enough not to proceed with his amendment.

However, a point which required consideration was whether we should impose on the occupier a statutory obligation to maintain the means for fighting fire which exist at the time of the making of the application. That seems to be a sensible thing to do and is consistent with the approach that we have more generally adopted in the Bill. That is reflected in the amendment now before the House and I very much hope that it will command hon. Members' approval.

Mr. Dubs: I wish to welcome this amendment, too, which reflects very closely my intention in Standing Committee. There are already two conditions which have to be met when an application for a fire certificate has been made. One is that a means of escape in case of fire is provided, and the second is that persons employed to work on the premises are trained in what to do in case of fire. This amendment adds a third condition—that the means for fighting fire with which the premises are provided shall be maintained in efficient working order.

This may seem, on the face of it, to be a small amendment, but we know that there are premises which could suffer from fire and which present hazards should a fire break out. By having adequate means for fighting fires, both the premises and lives could be saved. Therefore, I believe that this amendment will be an important addition to fire safety.

We are referring, of course, to a variety of premises, as the Minister made clear. I have in mind, for example, small workshops in the clothing trade. Unfortunately, there have been some rather tragic fires in such premises, particularly in the east end of London. I believe that this amendment will lessen the risks of a dangerous fire occurring in premises of that kind and in other premises covered by this provision.

Mr. Walter Harrison (Wakefield): The words of the amendment are to me very important:

"the means for fighting fire with which the premises are provided are maintained in efficient working order; and".

I am concerned indeed when we use words of this nature. What do we mean when we say "the means for fighting fire"? How far should it extend? Does it mean that one must be able to indicate that there is a fire? Does it mean that one's alarm and communications systems must be correct? Does it mean that the warning system must be efficient? Does it mean that the provision for sustaining the responsibility for communication and dealing with a fire must be adequate?

"The means for fighting fire" implies that the communication services are totally alerted. It means that when someone presses the privatised British Telecom 999 button it will operate. Are we sure of that? Are we assured that when one presses the 999 button to call the police, the fire service or the hospital service there will be a response without a question being asked by British Telecom about who will pay for it and who will accept the responsibility for it?

I wish to be assured that when the 999 button is pressed the full communications system will come into play for fighting the fire. Ratepayers and taxpayers should be totally covered by the system. When one presses the 999 button, one should be fully protected.

The word "and" at the end of the amendment worries me. I want to know, and I hope that the Minister will spell it out to me, that when someone presses the 999 button British Telecom will not ask the ambulance service or the fire service if he can pay for the call. Will the 999 service be maintained and will the full fire service be called upon irrespective of who presses the button and asks for full fire service coverage?

I am very pleased that our fire communications service in the Palace of Westminster has recently been brought up to date. The fire service has been enlarged, it is able to cope and there is no 999 problem. I hope that when this clause is established with this amendment the 999 system will be totally applied and there will be no restriction whatsoever, so that it is possible to maintain the fire services in efficient working order.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: As one would expect, the right hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Harrison) has raised an important point which deserves a careful answer. I am sure that he appreciates that clause 8, in particular, is meant to deal with the interim position between the time when the certificate is applied for and the time when the fire authority either grants a safety certificate or decides to grant an exemption. Therefore, it is intended to cover a fairly narrow period. In effect, clause 8 provides that the systems which are within the premises for fire escape and for fighting fire shall be maintained in good and efficient working order.

The right hon. Member asked, very fairly, what was meant by the phrase "means for fighting fire." The phrase has a narrow meaning and is intended to extend only to fire-fighting appliances rather than to the more general considerations which he mentioned. But of course some of the wider points that he has brought to the attention of the House would feature in the safety certificate, which could be issued once the fire authority had determined the application.

I hope that the right hon. Member will bear in mind that this amendment is intended to cover a fairly narrow period, but I am very grateful to him for raising what is clearly an important point.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 4

REPEALS

Amendment made: No. 3, in page 41, line 15, column 3, after '12', insert

', in paragraph 1(6), the words "the Theatre Royal Haymarket or the Royal Albert Hall",'. — [Mr. Douglas Hogg.]

Schedule 4, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Queen's Consent and Prince of Wales's Consent signified.]

6.8 pm

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I appreciate that it is the desire of the House to move to other business. Therefore, I will make my comments very brief.

I should like to thank the members of the Committee, notably my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moyniham) and, if I may, the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), for the very constructive way in which the Committee proceedings were conducted. Their co-operation made it possible to improve the Bill, and I am grateful for that.

We have today extended and altered the Bill. We have restricted the discretion of the fire authority to exempt without an inspection for the purpose. We have extended the interim duty to include means for fighting fire and we have made various other important changes, such as the removal of the exemption of the Royal Albert Hall and the Theatre Royal. The Bill overall improves the safety afforded to the public both in respect of hazards posed by fire and hazards posed at sports grounds, mainly with regard to regulated stands. The Bill represents a valuable addition to public safety, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Dubs: Were this not local government election day, I am quite certain that many hon. Members would be here to take part in the debate. I refer in particular to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), who has a long-standing commitment to the cause of sport and who has expressed regret to me that he is not able to be here to take part in the final stages of the legislation.

I have expressed one regret about the Bill. The Minister will be aware of what I am referring to because I tried to move an amendment in Committee. For the first time there will be charges imposed in connection with fire safety. That is a retrograde step. I have made my position and that of my colleagues clear in Committee and I continue to say that it is a bad step. I appreciate that the charges will be relatively small, as the Minister pointed out.

[Mr. Dubs]

Nevertheless, we are establishing a precedent. My fear is that, having established such a precedent, future Governments may decide to increase the charges for fire safety. That is a bad decision because it may mean that, because some owners of premises cannot afford those charges or wish to avoid them, standards of fire safety will be that much less.

One other difficulty is in the part of the Bill concerning sport and safety at sports grounds. In Committee we discussed the difficulties facing small clubs. At the risk of breaching the harmony of today's occasion, I quote from a letter sent to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde from the secretary of the Vauxhall-Opel league, a worthy league but one that does not have the benefit of large attendances. In Committee the Minister said that clubs had been slow in coming forward with protests or evidence about the possible hardship for them of some of the provisions in the Bill. The Minister went on to suggest, in an uncharacteristic manner, that that showed acquiescence on their part. The letter said:

"I believe it merely shows ignorance of the proposals."

In other words, the smaller clubs were not fully aware of the provision. However, I am sure that the larger clubs were. There is concern that some of the financial burdens imposed upon small clubs may be unduly onerous. I moved an amendment in Committee that was accepted that will make it possible for a Minister to extend the provisions regarding the size of stands below the present level of 500. I am aware that that may add to the burden on small clubs, which point is referred to in the letter, but because of the way that amendment was couched, it will be future Ministers who decide how to bring that into being. It is perfectly clear that any Minister ought to have in mind the financial burdens on small clubs. In a sense that point has been taken in hand and I am sure that future Ministers of any party will be aware of what the Committee discussed and considered. Nevertheless, I think it is important to place on the record the concerns of small clubs because, although we wish to protect the safety of spectators at sports grounds, we do not wish to do anything that may drive those clubs into more serious financial difficulties. I will not go through the other details in the letter except to say that some of those clubs have small attendances and may well find themselves unable to meet some of the obligations in the legislation.

With the two reservations I have expressed, this is an extremely welcome measure. It has been warmly supported on all sides. I know that the Fire Brigades Union welcomes it, that the National Union of Tailors and Garment Workers believes that it will protect its members better than before and that all fire services believe that the Bill contains important provisions, which they welcome.

Throughout our approach we have been anxious that the Bill should get on to the statute book as soon as possible. We are all aware that there is a remote possibility that there will be a general election before too long. As we have done our best to get the Bill through the House as quickly as possible I hope that, if a general election should by some chance be announced before too long, the Bill will get on to the statute book before Parliament is dissolved. The Minister is nodding his head, I presume in agreement. The Bill represents an advance in fire safety and, therefore, is to be welcomed.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Financial Services

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that the three orders be taken together?

6.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): I believe that it is.

I beg to move,

That the draft Financial Services Act 1986 (Delegation) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 22nd April 1987, be approved.

As the House has agreed, we are also discussing motions 4 and 5.

That the draft Financial Services (Transfer of Functions Relating to Friendly Societies) Order (Northern Ireland) 1987, which was laid before this House on 22nd April, be approved.

That the draft Financial Services (Transfer of Functions Relating to Friendly Societies) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 22nd April, be approved.

It is almost exactly two years since the House debated the financial services White Paper. The Financial Services Bill, which was based on that White Paper, was subsequently introduced in the House in December 1985 and received long and careful consideration before receiving Royal Assent in November last year. In parallel with this parliamentary consideration, the Securities and Investments Board and the prospective self-regulation organisations were working to develop the rules and institutions which will regulate investment business under the Act. The orders we are now debating represent the single most significant parliamentary step in setting up the new regulatory system envisaged in the Act.

The Financial Services Act embodies our belief that, to achieve effective regulation of the financial services sector, it is necessary to combine two elements. The first element is strong statutory backing for the regulatory system. The Act will make it a criminal offence to carry on investment business without authorisation. It will provide for rules to be made governing the way in which authorised businesses carry on investment business and it will provide legal sanctions, including civil suits, injunctions, restitution orders and withdrawal of authorisation, if the rules are broken.

The second element is practitioner-based administration of those statutory powers. The Government believe that, if they are given the right powers, practitioner-based bodies have the best prospects of effectively regulating investment businesses and protecting the interests of investors. Accordingly, the Act has, from its introduction, provided for the majority of powers it confers on the Secretary of State to be transferred to a designated agency whose governing body would include both practitioners in the financial services sector and non-practitioners who have the knowledge and expertise to ensure that investors' interests are properly looked after.

The Act lays down a number of criteria which must, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, be satisfied before powers can be transferred to a designated agency. The agency must be able and willing to exercise the powers that are to be transferred. It must have a balanced governing body whose members are appointed by the Secretary of State and the Governor of the Bank of England. In this respect I should mention that, while the SIB has always had a strong independent element on its board, we have been mindful of the comments expressed during the passage of the Bill, and the recently announced appointments will further reinforce that non-practitioner element. The agency must have satisfactory monitoring, enforcement and decision-making arrangements. It must have effective arrangements for the investigation of complaints, which must provide, in appropriate cases, for investigations to be carried out independently. It must be able and willing to provide high standards in the conduct of investment business and to co-operate with other financial regulators. The Act also provides that, provided it meets those criteria, the body to which the initial transfer of functions shall be made must be the Securities and Investments Board Limited—the SIB.

I should add that the Act also provides for the transfer to a transferee body of certain powers relating to friendly societies. The conditions that have to be satisfied before these powers can be transferred are broadly the same as those to which I have just referred.

The purpose of these draft orders is, therefore, to transfer to the SIB the bulk of the transferable powers under the Act. The package represents a considerable range of powers which will establish the SIB as the keystone in the new regulatory framework. It is intended that the SIB should have the ultimate responsibility for establishing the standards which firms will have to meet in order to be regarded as fit and proper to carry on investment business. This will result both from the SIB's power to grant direct authorisation to businesses and from its function of recognising self-regulating organisations and professional bodies, membership of which will confer authorisation.

The SIB will also draw up the rules and regulations which will set the standards for behaviour by investment businesses. In some cases this will be because the SIB's own rules are directly applicable. In other cases, the rules of recognised self-regulating organisations and professional bodies will apply: but those rules will have to afford protection to investors at least equivalent to that afforded by the SIB's rule book. Finally, the SIB will be responsible for enforcement, having at its disposal a wide range of investigation powers and sanctions, including the power to initiate prosecutions for some offences.

The principal order is the Financial Services (Delegation) Order, which concerns functions other than those relating exclusively to friendly societies. The other two orders transfer functions relating to friendly societies in Great Britain and in Northern Ireland.

There are a certain number of transferable powers not covered by the orders. The most significant are the powers in chapter VIII of the Act relating to collective investment schemes. These represent a largely self-contained area which can be dealt with independently of the recognition of SROs and RPBs and the authorisation of businesses which must begin as soon as possible if the basic framework of the Act is to be introduced at an early date. Other powers which are retained concern various international matters; the powers to make indemnity rules, where the SIB has decided not to make proposals, opting instead for a widely drawn compensation scheme; certain powers relating to persons who are not authorised persons; and the function of revoking recognition of an SRO on certain grounds related to insurance since my Department remains primarily responsible for the regulation of insurance companies.

Before laying the draft delegation orders my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the two registrars for friendly societies are required by the Act to satisfy themselves that the SIB meets the criteria to which I have already referred. They must also be satisfied that the rules and regulations which it proposes to make afford an adequate level of protection for investors and, where appropriate, comply with the principles set out in schedule 8 to the Act.

Schedule 8 provides that the rules must promote high standards of integrity and fair dealing in the conduct of investment business. They must require an authorised person to exercise due diligence in providing investment services. They must require an authorised person to subordinate his own interests to those of his clients and to act fairly between his clients. They must require an authorised person to have regard to his clients' circumstances and to disclose his interest in any transaction, including commissions and other inducements. They must require an authorised person to disclose the capacity in which he acts and to give sufficient information for a potential investor to make an informed decision. They must provide for adequate warnings to be given to investors when the price of an investment is stabilised and they must provide for the protection of property held by an authorised person.

The rules on compensation must make the best provision that can reasonably be made. The rules must require the keeping of proper records and make provision for their inspection when appropriate. Finally, the rules must take account of the fact that different classes of investors warrant different levels of protection.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is also required to satisfy himself as to the acceptability of the rules in competition terms. On 10 February we received the SIB's formal request for transfer of powers, together with its proposed rules and regulations entitled "Regulation of Investment Business" and a document entitled "SIB's Approach to its Regulator Responsibilities", copies of both of which have been made available in the Table Office. We subsequently received reports on these documents from the Director General of Fair Trading and further amendments proposed by the SIB, on which the director general has also reported. Copies of all these documents have been placed in the Library. We have also received a large number of comments both from representative bodies and individual practitioners.

Having considered all the material submitted, it has been decided that the SIB and the rules it proposes to make fulfil the conditions and requirements laid down in the Act for a transfer of the powers referred to in the draft orders. The House will recognise that the SIB's rule book covers a large range of topics. I propose to refer specifically to the two issues which provoked considerably more comments than any other, both in the Director General's report and in the comments made by interested parties. These were the costs to small independent insurance intermediaries of complying with the new requirements and the issue which has come to be known as polarisation.

It would be pointless to pretend—and we have never done so—that improvements in investor protection can be achieved without cost and without placing some new requirements on firms. To mention just two of the characteristics of the new system, regular monitoring arrangements and an adequate compensation scheme are bound to cost money. Having said that, I should say also that I think some of the estimates of compliance costs which I have heard have been considerable overestimates. Some of the estimates, for example, have assumed elaborate new compliance procedures whereas in fact many of the SIB requirements reflect current best practice and will require little if any change in practice in reputable businesses. Furthermore, the SIB has made considerable efforts to keep costs at an acceptable level. Indeed, in March amendments to the rule book were proposed which were designed to reduce the costs of compliance for small investment businesses which do not handle clients' money. Having considered all the evidence, my right hon. Friend is satisfied, as required by the terms of the Financial Services Act 1986, that the SIB's proposals will not significantly restrict, distort or prevent competition on this account.

The polarisation debate has in some ways been the other side of the coin, in the sense that very many of those most worried about the costs which they believed the SIB's rules implied were equally strong in their support of the polarisation rules. These rules have evoked very strong support on both sides of the House. Indeed, more than 60 members supported early-day motion 814 backing polarisation. Most hon. Members will be aware that polarisation is the requirement that all those who sell life assurance and unit trusts should act either as fully independent intermediaries or as company representatives selling only the product of a single company or group. The SIB has argued, and we accept, that this is an important safeguard for investors. Some have argued that it will have an anti-competitive effect. We take the contrary view. Polarisation will clarify the status of investment advisers and will therefore promote transparency in the market. It will therefore enhance rather than restrict competition.

The Director General of Fair Trading did not find the polarisation rules on their own anti-competitive. Indeed, he, like us, considered them in isolation to be conducive to competition. But he was concerned about the implications of polarisation when combined with the costs of compliance for small intermediaries. This concern arose from the director general's assessment that the number of of independent intermediaries would be significantly reduced; that the rules would lead to a reduction in independent advice from banks and building societies; and that the overall result was therefore likely to be an increase in the influence of company representatives.

We have considered the director general's arguments carefully but we canot accept his conclusions. First, as I have said, I do not believe that the costs of compliance will be as high as some have suggested. Moreover, polarisation will ensure that the independence of genuinely independent advisers is perceived as a real advantage. So I believe that there will continue to be a substantial body of independent intermediaries. Indeed, I expect the rules to be of positive benefit to the genuinely independent intermediary, with the result that the availability of independent advice will be safeguarded. This reinforces the view that polarisation is in itself conducive to competition. Secondly, I believe that the banks and building societies will be able to adjust to the new regime without radical change, and that the availability of independent advice from banks and building societies will not be significantly reduced since these will be able to continue to operate, if they wish, broadly as they do now. For those reasons we have come to the conclusion that the rules will not have a significantly anti-competitive effect.

In seeking approval for the draft orders, we are recommending transfer powers to the SIB on the basis of the rules it has submitted.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): My hon. and learned Friend said that in his view there would be a substantial number of independent intermediaries. I think that those were his words. As Sir Gordon Borrie raised the important point as to what the number would be and was not too sure about that, will my hon. and learned Friend say what he means and what number he has in mind?

Mr. Howard: I cannot give any really sensible numerical estimate, but I would not expect any substantial decrease in the number of independent intermediaries or in the availability of independent advice on these matters.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Further to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), am I not right in thinking that Sir Gordon Borrie's expression of concern was delivered before the initiative taken by the SIB materially to reduce the costs to small intermediaries, provided that they did not handle clients' money? Is it not now much less likely, therefore, that Sir Gordon Borrie's fears will materialise?

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is right to the extent that the original reservations that the director general expressed came before the modification of the SIB's rules on costs. The director general was required to comment on the modification, and I fear that it was not sufficient to alter his original view, so it would be rash to claim that that view was wholly invalidated—at least for him—by the modification.

In seeking approval for these draft orders, we are therefore recommending transfer of powers to the SIB on the basis of the rules that it has submitted, as modified by amendments that it proposed during our consideration. This is an appropriate point to pay tribute to the work that the SIB and its staff have put into the draft rules and the setting up of the framework described in its document. No one should underestimate the difficulties of producing a new body of regulation essentially from scratch. The SIB has worked hard to enable this next step in improving investor protection to be taken, and I am sure that, once the powers are transferred, it will apply itself with equal vigour to the tasks that Parliament has given it. I ask the House to approve the draft orders.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): Having expected this debate for a couple of months, as a major set piece debate on the City and its regulations, I find it odd that such a central proposal is being smuggled through when the rest of the country, and much of the rest of the House, have their minds elsewhere. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where are Labour Members?"] My people have decided on a sensible division of labour, whereby I shall put our case at the Dispatch Box tonight and they will pave the way for the election outside. We shall meet tomorrow and find out which of us has been more successful. Therefore, I am happy to say that Labour Members do not intend to divide the House on this order, and I shall not be requesting an adjournment to consult my supporters on their attitude to the order.

Having made that statement, for obvious reasons, it does not mean that our doubts about the SIB have been removed by the rule book, the events of the past two months or the Minister's speech. We remain opposed to the measure, not because we do not believe that the City requires supervision—it patently does—or because we do not believe that the SIB could be made into an appropriate vehicle for that supervision, but because we would be opposed to designating the SIB in its present form. First, the SIB is not a public body, and remains in a curious constitutional position, being a private company limited by guarantee. Secondly, it is not a publicly funded body. I have been entertained by some of the letters that I have received in recent weeks from modest financial intermediaries complaining about the cost of the structure. I hope that they will take the advantage of voting Labour at the forthcoming general election, thus relieving themselves of that burden.

Thirdly, we oppose the designation of the SIB in its present form because, as the Minister is well aware from our previous criticisms, it contains a clear majority of practitioners in the City. That means that there is a danger of the SIB confusing its two roles—as the body that supervises the City, and as the body that speaks for the City. It could thus become a sort of Law Society of the financial institutions. The Minister came near to recognising that point when he emphasised that the costs of meeting the SIB's rules has been exaggerated by some of the companies that have complained. He pointed out that the SIB had gone to great trouble to minimise the cost of meeting its rules. That is perfectly true, but the other side of the coin is that some of the rules have been criticised because, rather than changing existing practice, they seek to codify it. That applies in particular to the requirements for disclosure, which are no more onerous than the requirements met at present by most companies.

Of the 18 members of the SIB, only one could be described as representing the interest of the wider consuming public — the many private investors — attracted into the market by the present Government. There are, to be sure, half a dozen other representatives of consumers of financial services, but they are representatives of the major institutions, which are well placed to make their voices heard by those who operate on their behalf.

Finally, we are opposed to the designation of the SIB in its present form because it does not include coverage of Lloyd's insurance market or of the work of the Takeover Panel. Those two omissions are curious as it is in those areas that the worst financial scandals have occurred over the past three years. The omission of the Takeover Panel is particularly odd. Over the past year, it has become clear that if there has been a weakness of self-regulation it has rested with the Takeover Panel and that, if there is a case for providing greater powers of investigation and subsequently of sanctions, it rests in the area that the panel supervises. For those reasons, we believe that the SIB is inadequate to the task.

To be fair to the Government, I think that, if they had their time again and were introducing a Financial Services Bill now in the light of the events of the past 12 months, they would not be proposing the measure that the House passed 18 months ago and that they are obliged to defend tonight. Nevertheless, the Minister is obliged to lay the order designating the SIB, and I am obliged to note the order in its present form.

I have three comments on the rule book as laid by the SIB. First, I have enormous sympathy with the point made by Sir Gordon Borrie about the impenetrability of the rules. It is regrettable that we are confronted with a set of semi-statutes of such length, language and complexity. I take the point made eloquently — and by comparison with the rule book with great lucidity — by the stock exchange in its circular to members. The SROs are placed in greater difficulty when they are at a tertiary level of the process — following the Financial Services Act and the SIB rule book — and are then obliged to devise their own rules to meet the registration requirements of the SIB on the basis of SIB draft rules which are impenetrable, complex and lengthy.

Secondly, it is regrettable that there is not a greater thrust in the SIB rules to tackle some of the cartels that still exist. I draw the Minister's attention to recent comment in the financial press concerning the commissions charged by the unit trusts. It is noticeable that since big bang there has been a sharp reduction in the cost of trading by the unit trusts. Their fees have gone down by about 50 per cent. and stamp duty has been halved, yet the spread being charged by the unit trusts has remained constant and, in one or two celebrated cases, has actually expanded.

A body that supervises the City — not only by preventing fraud but by ensuring that the City provides a fair return for and decent access to the small investor — should turn its mind to that development which is enabling the unit trust to take advantage and to pocket the gains of big bang rather than turning them over to the many small investors who put their money into unit trusts.

Thirdly, I must confess that I have mixed views on polarisation, partly, no doubt, because of the impenetrability of the problem. On the whole, I incline to the view taken by the Under-Secretary of State and by the SIB. But, regardless of which view one takes on the merits of polarisation, it was vital that the SIB won that debate and obtained the backing of the Minister and the House. If, at this early stage of the SIB's existence, it had lost this, its first battle with the major forces in the City, thereafter its standing, prestige and status would have suffered a major blow from which it might never have recovered. Therefore, whether or not the SIB were right in the first instance — I believe that, on balance, it was — it is vital that the House backs it in this matter and makes it clear that the SIB has our confidence.

The designation of the SIB in the order will be judged by history in the light of results. That, effectively, brings us to the resources available to the SIB compared with those available to other regulatory bodies, most notably the Securities and Exchange Commission. Those resources appear dangerously thin on the ground. The SEC has an annual budget of $40 million for surveillance alone. There are no comparable resources available to the SIB, which is faced with a major task.

The extent to which there is a churning of shares in the market at present is alarming. I looked at the figures only the other week when I received the stock exchange's latest fact sheet. Trading in December last year was on a turnover of £57 billion, which was double the figure for December 1985. Total turnover for March was £165 billion — three times the turnover figure in December and six times the figure for December 1985. That level of churning in turnover, especially in the gilts market, cannot be healthy. Inevitably, it will pose major questions of supervision, of regulation and of the prevention of fraud.

Other evidence has been made available to us by the latest issue of Acquisitions Monthly, which has updated its survey of share price movements in the context of takeover bids and which points out that the increase in the price of the share of the target company in the period preceding the announcement of a bid continues to rise inexplicably and disturbingly. Acquisitions Monthly found that, of the 100 such bids that it monitored in the last six months of 1986, on average, the share price of the target company rose by 11 per cent. before the bid went public, in a quarter of the cases it rose by more than 20 per cent. and in one tenth of the cases it rose by more than 30 per cent. No doubt, in most of those cases there is an innocent explanation. But it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that in some there is a less innocent explanation which reflects people taking an opportunity in the market on information which they had obtained in a professional or perhaps rather unprofessional manner. That poses a major task for the SIB. I wish it well. I hope that it proves adequate to the task.

I am confident on one point — current events in the City will force themselves upon the consciousness of the House in the near future and we shall have another opportunity to debate this matter, perhaps when the attention of the House is focused in the Chamber rather than on the ballot box outside. On that occasion, I promise the Minister a more testing time in the debate.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I have not taken part in these debates before but, because I have been in touch with people in the City who have registered some concern to me, I want to ask my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State some questions about the orders. I should like to declare an interest in that I am a non-executive director of a small financial institution, although it is largely unaffected by the orders.

No one would disagree with the principle of regulation, which has been warmly welcomed. I know that my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State has had an extremely difficult job, which he has discharged with great vigour and skill. He will be aware that there are those — as there always are — in such cases who do not necessarily agree with his conclusions, but that is inevitable. These arguments are at the margin because the Government have decided the road down which they wish to go. Despite the fact that I think that it is a pity that some of these matters have not been more fully debated, as the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) said, we are now at a stage when the order for the delegation of authority has been laid before the House and we can comment only in the most general terms.

Will my hon. and learned Friend the Minister agree not to stick or to urge the SIB to stick too firmly to any particular timetable? Some quarters feel that it will take time from delegation to get the systems up and running effectively and efficiently. These are important and weighty matters, and the most detailed and careful consideration will need to be given before any conclusions are reached. I understand that the clearing banks have received legal advice that the decision by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on polarisation is in breach of the treaty of Rome.

It is vital that, when the new framework is operative, it should be as good and as effective as possible. There is a danger that, by trying to stick to some kind of arbitrary timetable, or by laying down a timetable in a way that would be difficult or politically embarrassing to turn from, the system could come into effect when the proposed rules and requirements of financial organisations have not been thought through properly and current doubts and disagreements resolved. There are, therefore, strong grounds, although, of course, I welcome the new era of regulation in principle and in fact, for urging my hon. and learned Friend the Minister not to seek to have the machine up and running by a certain date if, by then, the vehicle is not ready or has been constructed in such a way that it will either seize up or cause potential users to go elsewhere for their financial advice and activities.

At the moment, as the House knows, there are significant disagreements and discussions, some or all involving the Department of Trade and Industry, the Bank of England, the SIB, SROs and potential members of SROs—on such matters as segregation of capital, the scope and rules of SROs and proposals for complaints and compensation, to mention but a few. The SIB has not yet produced all its draft rules—for example, those relating only to collective investment schemes have not yet appeared. There are important and weighty decisions which have not yet been taken which will need time to be examined carefully and thoughtfully and which I hope my hon. and learned Friend the Minister agrees are worthy of being given further time and consideration.

It has been suggested that for the operation of the system to be fully in place by 1 January 1988 firms seeking authorisation will have to have applied for membership to the relevant SRO by 1 November 1987. It seems highly unlikely that the matters to which reference has been made will have been resolved in time for the necessary decisions and preparations to be taken by the end of October. There is no particular magic, it has been suggested to me, in either date. Even if there were, it is surely right to suggest that the great importance of regulating the scheme correctly and workably is greater than the desirability of announcing that a series of decisions and acts will have been carried out by a certain fixed date, especially when so many of these decisions depend on unresolved issues.

The House will very much appreciate the great care taken by my hon. and learned Friend the Minister on this legislation. I ask him to agree that it is vital that we do not rush the last fence. I hope that he will further consider the matters that I have mentioned.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): If any hon. Member present at the beginning of the debate had thought that the absence of Opposition Members showed that they were largely in agreement with the orders, the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) disabused him of it. As the hon. Gentleman said, his troops will reappear, perhaps on another occasion — no doubt, on the Opposition Benches.

We have got this legislation right. The premise that the hon. Member for Livingston put forward that we should have a full statutory, bureaucratic system such as the American one is a mistake. The Government are right to put the emphasis on the regulatory authority being practitioner based so that it is more likely to be able to regulate the City in an effective way. It is a false premise to try to suggest that there is an argument as between a practitioner-based regulation and a full statutory system. With this legislation, we have managed to get the best of all worlds. We have full statutory backing and the country outside, the City and people who deal in financial services outside the City will have seen that the Government are taking regulation and industrial protection very seriously. If there is any wrong-doing it will be brought to book very quickly.

Enforcement is the key. If there were hon. Members on the Opposition Benches, I am sure that they would agree that this legislation must be toughly enforced. The three-tier approach that we have with the SROs, the SIB and the Government standing behind them is a system that will bring wrong-doers to book very quickly.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my hon. Friend agree, that, in addition to the structure that he has described, the heart of the matter is whether there will be independent watchdogs on these organisations that will ensure that the system works effectively? It is not sufficient to have the structure; we must also have within it people who will be independent and who will exercise those powers with courage and integrity.

Mr. Grylls: I agree with my hon. Friend, and we must see how that develops.

If people say, "What is the evidence that it is being treated seriously?", one can point out that some of the rules of giving evidence and such matters have been changed and that they are tougher in this legislation than in any other part of the criminal law. We have got that right and people should understand that. One example of that is compelling people to appear before the SIB or SROs as well as their auditors and bankers. That shows that the Government are taking this matter seriously. My hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) was right on that point.

I want to move on to some of the aspects that affect some of the small practitioners. My hon. and learned Friend the Minister knows that many hon. Members were deeply concerned about the impact of the bureaucratic compliance and how its cost was to impinge on some of the small practitioners in the financial, insurance and other sectors. The chairman of the SIB has responded reasonably to that concern and has done something that many of us in respect of other parts of policy have been pressing on the Government. He has instigated a two-tier regulatory system. What is reasonable for a giant firm such as Prudential Assurance or Pearl Assurance to comply with is not reasonable for a two, three or 10-man firm. I am glad that Sir Kenneth Berrill has agreed to that and that there will be two-tier regulations, especially for those firms that are not handling clients' money.

Mr. Soames: My hon. Friend knows a great deal about these matters, but does he agree that, because of the fundamental nature and importance of the next stage of this legislation, it is vital that it is not rushed, since if it is not right there could be a lack of confidence in the market and regulations which may lead to business going elsewhere, which would be a very unhappy state of affairs?

Mr. Grylls: I agree with that. If we had made this regulatory system too burdensome it would be a very strange thing if the Government, who have done so much over the last eight years to encourage the growth of small firms, were to find that they had passed legislation that was forcing small firms to join together and become larger firms.

[Mr. Grylls]

I welcome the flexibility that Sir Kenneth Berrill has shown and the reduction in the charges. For example, a three-man firm that previously had to pay an application fee of £1,150 would now be required to pay £900. The periodic fee for the same size of firm would fall by 33 per cent. from £2,250 to £1,500. There would be a similar reduction for a 10-man firm. That shows that Sir Kenneth Berrill has applied his mind to this matter and that what I feared at one time would happen—that it would force firms to join together—will not happen, because these charges are not unreasonable.

The overriding responsibilities of Sir Kenneth Berrill and the members of the SIB are to protect the investor. It is a tricky task to carry out the onerous duty that the Act has laid on the SIB and to balance it without putting too much of a cost or bureaucratic burden on the smaller firms, which at the end of the day costs money.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Does my hon. Friend agree that by removing the insistence for carrying professional indemnity the SIB has further reduced costs that would have been quite a burden on the small firm and are a burden on all firms? Therefore, the firms that feel that they should take professional indemnity will be able to apply for it, but it will not be an obligation for trading in this market.

Mr. Grylls: I agree with my hon. Friend.

I am glad that the need for two-tier regulation and two-tier cost structures has been recognised by Sir Kenneth Berrill. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister will continue to keep this aspect of regulatory framework in mind, and that he will agree that we are not in the business of forcing firms to join together; we are in the business of effective and tough investor regulation. As I believe that Sir Kenneth Berrill has shown by his changes that were announced some weeks ago, it is possible to combine the best of both worlds—a degree of flexibility and two-tier regulation—with the need to have that essential and effective industrial protection.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): This is a somewhat invidious point at which to launch on to a debate as I suspect that the affairs of the City of London may shortly be punctuated by the affairs of the City of Westminster.

Perhaps I can start what I trust will be a brief, although punctuated, intervention by saying how much I welcome the orders that have been made by my hon. and learned Friend the Minister. I look forward to the SIB taking up its new responsibilities for regulation of the investment markets.

My hon. and learned Friend the Minister, who has played such a conspicuous and able part in the passage of the Bill through the House, will admit that during the lengthy Committee stage a contribution of some note was made about enhancing the status and powers of the SIB, a move which, in retrospect, has been increasingly welcomed in the City and by commentators. It was vindicated by subsequent events. By the sensitive way in which he has consulted about the rules and evolved not only the personnel but the activities of the board, Sir Kenneth Berrill has displayed a competence and an ability that have already gained the respect of investment markets and, indeed, investors not only in this country but beyond.

The order is important. For the first time, it transfers significant powers from the hands of the Secretary of State to an independent, powerful body that is recognised and identified by law and that, for the first time, will have a significant ability to take to task the fraudsters—

It being Seven o'clock, and there being private business set down by THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS under Standing Order No. 16 (Time for taking private business), further proceeding stood postponed.

City of Westminster Bill (By Order)

Order for Second Reading read.

7 pm

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The city that I have the honour to represent is not only the centre of London but the heart of Britain's capital and the seat of national government. It is, or should be, the nation's showpiece to British citizens and the world. Ninety-nine per cent. of all tourists to Britain visit Westminster. It now sees 10 million foreign tourists yearly, plus a further 13 million from within the United Kingdom. But the city—it is not unique in this respect—has the problem of litter, up to 90 tonnes daily during the tourist season. That is enough to fill the Chamber every month.

Few people could say that they were not at fault at some time in dropping litter. Some people are anti-social and take pleasure in defiling other people's environment. But the central fact facing the city is that occasional human lapses, multiplied by the number of people living in and passing through the city — 180,000 residents, 750,000 commuters, and many visitors — mean that Westminster's fate is to experience a growing volume of litter dropped by the tides of humanity to which the city is witness every day of the week, both in the day and during the night. The volume grows year by year because of the increasing amount of packaging and the expansion of fast food shops.

Westminster city council is not complacent. Indeed, it has been foremost among British councils in endeavouring to tackle the problem. It initiated the cleaner city pilot scheme in 1979. It was specifically adopted throughout the council's 220 miles of roads and 390 miles of footways. The council has installed 6,000 litter bins, together with 500 sponsored litter bins. Educational leaflets are provided for schools. There is close co-operation and frequent liaison between Westminster's cleansing services department and local community groups, residents' associations and businesses. Agreements are being reached with fast food outlets for their staff to conduct litter patrols of nearby areas. Westminster has launched a quality of life campaign to increase public awareness of the value of a cleaner city and to obtain further improvements in conditions on the streets. But the city council faces a high cost in achieving that aim. Despite major improvements in the efficiency of the council's cleansing services department in recent years, major street cleansing in central London costs up to £600,000—the yearly cost for Oxford street alone. The average figure for Westminster streets was £26,700 per mile in 1986-87. The net cost of the street cleansing service in Westminster, excluding refuse collection, will be £6,450,000 in 1987-88. Most of that is the cost of sweeping up litter.

Against that background, the city council has considered it to be quite realistic to budget for major increases in cleansing department manpower. Even then, it would not be possible to guarantee wholly clean streets, for such a policy fails to tackle the causes of litter. They have to do with human forgetfulness, human lapses and, sometimes, a failure to care for others' environment. The council has also given careful consideration to use of the existing litter laws, notably the Litter Act 1983. The chief failing of the Act is its requirement for criminal proceedings to be undertaken, with all that that implies in administrative procedures and the undue involvement of police, Crown prosecution and court time for an offence that is essentially anti-social rather than criminal.

The need for improved legislation pre-dates the Litter Act 1983 that basically consolidated pre-existing Acts of Parliament. For example, the March 1981 official report of Westminster city council's cleaner city pilot scheme stated that current legislation was "particularly unsatisfactory. In theory, individuals can be prosecuted for dropping litter."

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): What the hon. Gentleman said is correct; the legislation is unsatisfactory. But Westminster is a wealthy and powerful local authority. Would it not have been a salutary lesson to all potential litter louts to have seen Westminster pursuing through the courts a number of well-publicised cases? That would undoubtedly have been a major deterrent.

Mr. Wheeler: Westminster is indeed the heart of London and gives the appearance of being wealthy, but among its 180,000 residents are many people who draw housing benefit. Business, too, expects to pay a fair rate, not an excessive rate. Wealth is subject to qualification. As to prosecution, I shall refer in a moment or two to the developing role of the city and its plans for its enforcement service. If the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) will allow me to proceed, I may reach that interesting point.

The council report went on to state:

"In practice, prosecutions are very difficult to bring about and the low level of fines often imposed makes it unviable to do so."

The city council has proposed the Bill that is intended, as the preamble states,

"To make further provision for the enforcement of the Litter Act 1983 in the City of Westminster."

The core of the Bill is the proposal for a fixed penalty ticket to be issued when an authorised officer of the city council has reason to believe that a person is dropping litter or has just committed that offence. The Bill does not create a new offence of littering; it already exists in the Litter Act 1983. It merely adds to the Act by making it possible for a fixed penalty ticket to be issued for offences within the city of Westminster. Fixed penalty tickets have been established for more than 20 years as a recognised and practical method of improving enforcement of laws relating to a variety of offences, particularly minor motoring transgressions that are regarded by the public as less serious than major criminal acts. Their uses, along with their public acceptability, have grown.

The Bill does not adopt an on-the-spot fine system. That was considered and rejected by the council following early discussions with the Metropolitan police. Instead, any person handed a fixed penalty ticket will have the opportunity to pay a fine within 14 days, in which case no criminal proceedings will be taken against him. If the fine is not paid, the normal provisions of the Litter Act for criminal proceedings will be enforced.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I am sure that my hon. Friend will come to this point later, but how will one be able to identify the individual to whom a fixed penalty ticket is given, as we do not carry identity cards, which are common in many European states?

Mr. Wheeler: My hon. Friend touches on an interesting point. He is quite right to say that, in the United Kingdom, we do not as yet have identity cards; and in the enforcement of minor law, the constable or other enforcement agent has the delicate and somewhat difficult task of identifying the individual. We seem to overcome that difficulty by a mixture of bluff, common sense and good humour.

I said that a fixed penalty ticket could be issued, but the city council does not envisage tickets being issued on every occasion. That might lead to more littering of the streets. The council's policy is that its officers will ask the litterer to retrieve his presumed litter before any thought is given to issuing a fixed penalty ticket. The council sees no reason why responsible people will not do that, provided that they are asked courteously. The council is to give extensive training to its officers. No doubt it will take into account the thoughts of my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) on how to go about that.

There will be about 60 officers, comprising some members of the cleansing department staff, plus 41 members of the multi-purpose inspectorate, many of whom are already in post and employed by the city council for the enforcement of various laws, including street trading and planning regulations.

Mr. Tony Banks: I apologise for intervening again, but the hon. Gentleman will understand that as he is the hon. Member responsible for steering the measure through the House he must be prepared to answer whatever questions we ask him. Does what he has said mean that there has been an increase in the number of staff employed to carry out these duties? Secondly, what consultation has there been with the recognised trade unions? Did they agree to the proposals?

Mr. Wheeler: I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's questions precisely because, as he knows, I am not a member of the city council and thus not privy to its every activity. However, I can tell him that the city council prides itself on close discussions with its employees, provides them with news letters, is in constant contact with its staff and will have discussed its objectives with its employees at all levels, as that is its normal practice.

As to the number of staff, I have said that the existing cleansing department staff will be employed, in addition to the 41 members of a new multi-purpose inspectorate. I have no doubt that, with the passage of time, others will be employed as appropriate to enforce the legislation—if the House approves it—and many other matters that concern the city council.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): The hon. Gentleman has referred to 60 staff, who will enforce the provisions. Will he explain how any member of the public will know that he is dealing with a city council official who is trying to enforce the provisions and not someone else? How will they be recognised?

Mr. Wheeler: I shall come to the hon. Gentleman's point in a moment.

The council will be guided by experience on the best way in which to deploy its staff. The multi-purpose inspectorate will undertake litter enforcement duties as part of its various roving tasks, and wardens from the cleansing department may be employed in specific locations, such as Oxford street and Trafalgar square. That is the point about which the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) was concerned. All of those employees will have clear means of identification.

Mr. Dubs: The hon. Gentleman refers to "clear means of identification". It is important to know the nature of an individual who tries to enforce the law. What is the hon. Gentleman talking about?

Mr. Wheeler: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that anyone seeking to enforce the law must be able to show the citizen in the street that he is authorised to do so and that he is a proper and accountable person. As I have already said, the employees of the council will receive appropriate training for their duties. They will also be equipped with a proper means of identification. What will that be? It might, as my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes suggested, be a form of identity card—it almost certainly will be. The employees might even wear an appropriate form of clothing that identifies them as being from the Westminster city council, bearing in mind that that clothing should not allow them to be mistaken for members of the police force. I am sure that the city council will be pursuing those matters.

The city council has had detailed discussions with the Home Office, the Department of the Environment and the Metropolitan police about the provisions of the Bill, at council officer level and Civil Service level. It has also held discussions at political levels, including some with the Home Secretary, the Metropolitan police Commissioner, the Commissioner-designate and the leader of Westminster city council. With their agreement, the council proposes to make three substantive amendments to the Bill at Committee stage, together with consequential drafting stages.

First, the Metropolitan police and the Home Office's police department have said that they believe that the provisions of the Litter Act are adequate for the few occasions — generally serious events — on which their officers are likely to be involved in enforcement of litter laws, although they fully understand the council's desire for fixed penalty tickets to be available for routine enforcement. So fixed penalty powers will not now be made available to the police. Secondly, the council has agreed to withdraw the provision making it an offence not to give a name and address to the authorised officer issuing the fixed penalty notice. That is to minimise potential calls on police time and criminal justice proceedings. The deletion of that provision brings the Bill into line with most of the enforcement carried out by local councils, in which there is no obligation to give a name and address.

Opposition Members will, I am sure, agree that the proposed offence would have steered too close to the former sus law, which I and other hon. Members had a hand in removing. The Westminster city council is satisfied that careful staff training will help to ensure that most people will comply on a voluntary basis with the request for a name and address. Many members of the council's inspectorate are former police officers who understand how to handle these situations. The experience of other organisations that also require names and addresses—for example, London Underground and bus ticket inspectors — is that the great majority of the public provide their identity and address voluntarily.

The third change is one that the council—I shall be frank—is reluctant to concede. It is proposed in the Bill that the fines levied by way of fixed penalty tickets should be paid ultimately to the city treasurer and directed to a specific fund to offset enforcement costs, and that the surplus should be used to improve further the city's environment. The Home Office has stated that that would be contrary to the national policy on the direction of all fines, which, as the House knows, are due to the Crown. The city council believes that this national policy handicaps many local authorities in effectively implementing enforcement legislation for a range of lesser offences because there is little chance of enforcement being self-financing or of the polluter paying directly for the alleviation of his wrongdoing.

The result of an independent opinion poll conducted for the city council by the Oxford Research Agency was that 77 per cent. of all those interviewed agreed with the council's proposal that the fines be directed to the city treasurer and then to the environmental fund. The council considers that in due course the national policy will have to be changed as part of improvements to local enforcement procedures throughout the country.

In the interim, the council accepts the Home Office request and will propose in Committee that fines enforced by the scheme should be paid into the central funds. A ways and means resolution has been tabled today to enable this action to be taken.

The withdrawal of the three provisions to which I have referred has been the subject of some adverse press comments in recent weeks, with the conjecture that there is profound disagreement among the council, the Home Office and the Metropolitan police. I must inform the House that the media's interpretation is inaccurate. The council is grateful for the personal support of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary for the broad objectives of the Bill and for the Commissioner-designate's expectation that there will be a close working relationship between the multi-purpose inspectorate and the local Metropolitan police. The scale of fines has been discussed with the Home Office, which is in agreement with the proposal that the fixed penalty be equal to one tenth of level 2 of the standard scale, which is currently equivalent to £10.

Support for the Bill is widespread. Public statements of support have been received from organisations as diverse as Friends of the Earth, UK 2000, the Keep Britain Tidy group and the London Tourist Board. For example, Friends of the Earth has stated that the Bill

"should benefit all Londoners and visitors by significantly improving our urban environment."

Three seminars held for residents and business associations within Westminster demonstrated clear support for the proposal. The public opinion poll showed a sample of 81 per cent. of residents in Westminster, 77 per cent. of commuters, 84 per cent. of British tourists and 80 per cent. of foreign tourists to be in favour of the proposals. Similar percentages stated that they would be "very pleased" or "quite pleased" if the fixed penalty scheme were introduced. The £10 penalty was thought to be about right by 64 per cent. Only 9 per cent. considered the present method of enforcement to be effective.

Mr. Tony Banks: The hon. Gentleman has statistics that I do not have, and I ask him to tell me whether the 20 per cent. or so who were not in favour of the proposal were unable to support it because they did not like the extension of the law in terms of the Bill's provisions or because they included litter louts. It would be interesting to know whether the city council analysed why 20 per cent. did not approve of the proposed legislation.

Mr. Wheeler: That information is not in my possession. I do not know whether the analysis went that far. We might presume that the proverbial litter lout would not be in favour of the proposition. I do not know, but I presume that that would be the position.

All local city, borough and district councils in England and Wales were advised by Westminster city council of its proposed Bill. The council has received 274 replies, all expressing interest, with 112 expressing support in principle, or unqualified support. Support has been offered by officers and councillors representing councils of all political dispositions, including many authorities controlled by the Labour party, such as Bristol, Barnsley and Bolton. There has been support also from authorities controlled by the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party, or a combination of the two.

Mr. Dubs: Is there not all the difference in the world between agreeing in principle to support a measure that is against litter and agreeing in detail to the precise proposals that will be before the House when amendments to the Bill are introduced? To ask whether we are against litter is rather like asking whether we are against sin. It is the detail of how to tackle sin that causes disagreement and dissension. I suggest that many of the authorities that agree in principle will not necessarily agree with the detailed approach.

Mr. Wheeler: The Bill is a simple measure, and in its discussions with other local authorities the city council has had no difficulty in conveying to them the provisions in the Bill in its current form. The concessions that I have offered to the House on behalf of the city council make the Bill in some respects a softer vehicle. It diminishes to a degree perhaps its intention and presumed effectiveness. There can be no doubt that 112 councils which were approached by the city council expressed support for the Bill as presented to the House. That shows the degree of support that the council has throughout the country for this measure, and to that extent it is something of a legislative acorn. It is to be hoped that its objectives and principles will grow, should the House see fit to pass the Bill.

Many councils have stated that if Westminster city council's Bill is successful they will seek similar powers or press for similar national legislation. I think that that deals with the point that the hon. Member for Battersea put rather well. That is surely the central issue for the House to bear in mind this evening. Westminster has taken the imaginative step of proposing a Bill that offers better scope for the enforcement of the Litter Act 1983. It is a valuable initiative which I hope will be monitored closely by the city council, by other local authorities, the Home Office, the Metropolitan police, the Department of the Environment and by other agencies such as Keep Britain Tidy. It offers a practical addition to legislation in an area where action is sorely needed.

The Bill's proponents do not pretend that it is perfect, and it is rare to hear that said in the Chamber. My remarks about the destination of the fines will have been noted especially, but I believe that the House should consider favourably the principles and proposals that are set out in the Bill, which may prove to be widely adopted by other authorities in due course.

7.29 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I blocked this Bill when the House was first asked to give it a Second Reading. I do not think that I did Westminster city council any disservice, because it was only on 29 April that the council was able to secure a confirmatory resolution. I believe that the council has played ducks and drakes with the House in the past about this legislation. It has not been sufficiently aware of the needs of its internal practices or of the wishes and requirements of the House in bringing forward this legislation.

In blocking the Bill I was able to secure a debate on Second Reading, because several important principles should be debated. I accept that I am not gazing on packed Benches and therefore most hon. Members are not so concerned about the principles as I and a few of my colleagues are, but we should have an opportunity to discuss the principles before the Bill goes into Committee.

We shall all be saying tonight that the object of the Bill, to reduce the amount of litter deposited on the streets, must be supported by all Members. It is unfortunate that Londoners seem to be among the worst litter louts in the country. That is not easy for a London Member of Parliament to say, but I will go further and say that I am distressed by the amount of litter deposited on the streets in my borough of Newham.

I take issue with the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) and say that the City's centre of gravity is to the east, rather than in the city of Westminster. I know that not many tourists yet come to Newham, despite the attractions we have to offer them, so the litter on our streets is deposited by the residents. I live in my constituency and, when I go around the corner in the morning to get my newspaper from near the Princess Alice, I am often confronted by the ugly eyesore of litter on the streets. Many people stop me and say, "What will the council do about this?" It is a problem for councils. I have as much regard for Westminster's problems as I do for the problems of the London borough of Newham. I point out to those people that it is not the councillors who go around dropping litter on the streets. The habits of the people who live in the area should be looked at, rather than the policies of the local authority.

I have always advocated to my colleagues, while I was both in and out of local government, that if councils can collect the refuse on time, ensure that the streets are clean and the street lights are on, they are most of the way to getting the total support of the population. The population will let councils have as many sub-committees as they want, as long as they provide the basic services, because people form their impressions of local authorities on the basis of the refuse collection service and the state of the streets, even though it is unfair to blame the local authority for the state of the streets.

I accept that Westminster has a problem with the large number of tourists, visitors and people who work within its boundaries, including Members of Parliament. If I saw a Member of Parliament dropping litter on the street, I would be the first to see that he got a fixed penalty, once that measure is introduced.

Mr. Wheeler: Before the hon. Gentleman issued the fixed penalty, he would perhaps invite the hon. Member to recover the litter, so that only at the end of a discussion would he feel that he would have to proceed to a fixed penalty.

Mr. Banks: That is one of the things which bothers me about this Bill. Some people drop litter in the streets because they are forgetful, but the anti-social nature of people who drop litter extends to other aspects of their personality, including sticking one on somebody who says, "Would you mind picking that up?" I confess that I am a devout coward and when I see someone dropping litter in the street I make a fairly quick mental assessment about whether or not I could ask the person to pick up the litter without fear of danger to myself. I have often decided that discretion is the better part of valour and I have allowed the paper to stay there or I have picked it up as I tut-tutted.

Some people who drop litter can be fairly objectionable when someone points out to them that they have just done something wrong. Many people get stroppy when they know they have done something wrong and someone points it out to them. That is one of the reasons why I asked the hon. Member for Westminster, North whether the relevant trade unions had been consulted and were in agreement with this legislation. I imagine that if I were still a union official I would be asking the employer questions such as "How many times do you have to ask the person?", "What if the person offers violence?" and "Will my members be given additional security support; for example, two-way radios?". The hon. Member did not raise that matter, but it is something on which the Committee can decide. There is a security aspect because there is a potential threat to the safety of the employee who will have to ask litter louts to pick up the litter. That must be taken into consideration by the promoters.

The Government, having recognised that dropping litter is a social problem, should have been prepared to have introduced wider national campaigns to try to get the message through at an earlier stage. For example, it should be a continual feature of education in schools. Littering affects our way of life; it is not just an accident in which one is involved.

People live in a chuck-away society. The hon. Member for Westminster, North mentioned that companies promote their goods with more and more packaging, and are thereby encouraging litter louts. Manufacturers who use packaging should be asked to make some form of reparation to the state for the amount of ammunition they place in the hands of litter louts. The Minister may care to reflect on the need for more national and local campaigns and more education in schools about litter. He may care also to take up the point raised by his hon. Friend as to whether there are any proposals to enforce and change the current litter legislation and the penalties incurred by those who drop litter. I would argue for a coherent national strategy, which I am sure would be welcomed by all hon. Members.

I have a number of objections to the Bill. First, I object to the manner in which this Bill has been promoted—not in the House, because the hon. Member for Westminster, North has done a very good job. He and I have had discussions, since the Bill first appeared on the Order Paper, about the provisions, how the debate would go and what we were trying to achieve.

I object to the way that the Bill has been promoted outside the House. We have had a plethora of litter in the form of press releases from the city of Westminster's press office. The latest one, dated 1 May, entitled "Litter Bill takes another step forward", points out that the special resolution passed by the council on 29 April meant that the council's "much-publicised Litter Bill took a major step towards becoming law last night . . . when the Council passed a Motion which will enable the House of Commons to give it a second reading."

Whether the House of Commons consents to give it a Second Reading is something for the House of Commons to decide. I ask the Minister whether the press release is an accurate reflection of the Government's policy. It says:

"The Bill, which is supported by the Government, will get its second reading on May 7."

That is fairly optimistic. It goes on:

"Hitting at reports that Home Office amendments would emasculate the proposed legislation, Lady Porter, Leader of the Council, said: 'The Home Office, which have expressed total support for the Bill, believe that it would not be practical for the Police to give litter offenders a fixed penalty ticket. We are quite happy to accept that advice.'".

There is some straining of the truth in that press release. The Government clearly did not support the Bill as it was proposed. The hon. Member for Westminster, North has already told us about the discussions that took place between the leader of the Westminster city council and the Home Secretary, or officials of her council and the Home Office, on the amendments which the promoters are now prepared to accept. I do not know whether the Minister is happy with that description.

As for the Home Office expressing full support for the Bill, again that is rather straining at the truth. As my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) said in an intervention, we are all against litter being dropped. Clearly, every Department of State or local authority that might have written to Westminster city council would, on being asked their opinion about the dropping of litter, express their support for measures which seek to eliminate such litter dropping. However, Westminster has gone heavy on the publicity on this without having checked to see that its claims are accurate.

In a way, the Bill is very much a piece of private enterprise by the leader of Westminster city council. Many of us know that she takes a highly individualistic approach to local government. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East, (Mr. Atkinson) says, "Very good." Whether one thinks that the estimable Shirley Porter is someone that one can go along with depends on the hue of one's politics. It will not surprise hon. Members or the good lady herself to hear that I find her politics anathema. I have some regard for her, but I cannot say that it stretches to affection.

However, I shall not make a personal issue out of this, despite her highly irresponsible attitude towards strategic local government in London. She was one of those Tory town hall toadies who put party politics before the needs of London in respect of the abolition of the GLC. Nevertheless, I do not want any hon. Member to think that this colours my feelings towards Westminster city council or the Bill.

There has been little if any consultation with the other London local authorities, either Labour or Tory, on the Bill. I understand that the London Boroughs Association, the Tory association in London, has reservations about the Bill. I know the views of the Association of London Authorities, the Labour grouping in the capital. In response to a request from me for the ALA's opinion, the secretary, Derek Prentice, said:

"What is of more concern however is that the London Coordinating Committee agreed that the promotion of such Bills should be handled by the two London Local Authority Associations in order that a comprehensive approach to such issues could be adopted. Clearly in this case Westminster has decided to go it alone and therefore the contents of the Bill have not benefited from a London-wide discussion and input."

That is a serious point because other local authorities, and, indeed, the House, are in danger of being railroaded by the leader of Westminster city council.

As we all know, if such a proposal had surfaced in the past it would probably have been part of a general powers Bill sponsored by the GLC which would have come after a great deal of consultation within London. We have not had such consultation over this Bill.

My second objection is one of principle, not to stopping people dropping litter, but to the Bill's proposals for the power to levy fixed penalties to be extended to council officers. I do not favour a further extension of fixed penalty powers beyond those that already exist within the capital. I certainly do not approve of them being extended to local authority officers.

One of the things that bothers me is that the power might not stop at local authority officers. It could involve another group of people. Westminster city council is, as one would expect under the leadership of Lady Porter, keen on privatising as many of its services as it possibly can. One knows that waste disposal services in Westminster are being examined as a potential candidate for privatisation. Can the hon. Member for Westminster, North tell me what will happen if Westminster privatises the services where council officers are charged with handing out fixed penalty tickets? Will that be part of the privatisation proposal? It is bad enough council officers being given these powers, but the thought that the powers might be handed over to Securicor or to an enforcement branch of a private cleansing company would raise more objections about the principles within the Bill.

Mr. Wheeler: The Bill, which the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to study later, says:

"'authorised officer' means an officer of the council authorised by the council in writing to act in relation to the provisions of this Act".

I think that the hon. Gentleman will agree that that makes the matter clear. It is to be an authorised officer of the council. Finally, there is nothing novel in a citizen seeking to enforce the law of the United Kingdom. Such rights exist for us all.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman does me a disservice by suggesting that I have not read the Bill. I have underlined the part that he has just quoted because I wondered how comprehensive it would be in a new situation.

On Second Reading one is supposed to stick to principles, but I am not likely to find myself on the Opposed Bill Committee, much as I should like that. Therefore, can the hon. Gentleman tell me whether, if Westminster city council privatised the services, an authorised officer could be someone who was part of a service that was carrying out official duties on behalf of the authority but was acting as an agent of the council but employed by another organisation? That is one of the points I am worried about.

Of course, we all have the power to make a citizen's arrest but we do not all have the ability to go round issuing fixed penalty tickets when we see people doing things wrong. If I were allowed to do so, I could think of a range of things for which, in my eccentric way, I would like to give people fixed penalty tickets. However, I doubt whether the House would give me such powers and so I shall quickly move on.

Let me return to waste disposal in Westminster, which is the central part of the Bill. Westminster city council is not above and beyond criticism. It likes to make great play of its efficiency, but I noticed recently that the district auditor ruled that the council had acted improperly in failing to charge for trade refuse collection, something that the council conceded. I should like to know why the district auditor did not recommend that Lady Porter should be surcharged for that. After all, there was clearly a failure to carry out fiduciary duties on behalf of ratepayers. Having been in a number of altercations with the district auditor about surcharge, I must say I think he missed a trick on that occasion.

The hon. Gentleman must know—because he is a Westminster Member, and no doubt he lives in his constituency—that Westminster's cleansing department consistently out-performs those of many other London councils. I doubt whether it out-performs the refuse collection department in the London borough of Newham, but it certainly out-performs many others. Yet, as I understand it—this returns me to my earlier point—Westminster is paying consultants £25,000 in fees to plan the privatisation of refuse collection in the borough. I should like to know—the matter will no doubt need to be pushed in cross-examination in the Opposed Bill Committee — what will happen to that aspect of Westminster's refuse responsibilities in the Bill if the House is minded to grant the powers sought.

I gather that Westminster has earmarked 13 services for competitive tendering. Clearly, the function of issuing fixed penalties for litter dropping is one that the council's Tory leadership will wish to privatise at a later date, unless the House specifically precludes it in the Committee stage. I hope that, when hon. Members get round to reading this debate, they will think carefully about imposing such a condition.

Let me deal now with the objections of the police. We have heard some of them this evening. I feel that it would have been far better if, before the Bill was brought forward, Westminster had consulted in some depth not only the London boroughs but the Home Office and its Ministers. After all, there is considerable political affinity between the Home Office Ministers and the leadership of Westminster city council. Besides, it is not as if the distance between their headquarters was very great.

It seems rather strange that the Home Office has recommended, in such a way as not to be refused or gainsaid, suggestions for amendments at the Committee stage. I asked the Parliamentary Under-Secretary a question on Wednesday 6 May, to which he replied making it clear that discussions had taken place between the Home Office and Westminster, and that a series of amendments that would effectively knock a chunk out of the middle of the Bill were being proposed by the Home Office and accepted by the Bill's promoters. It is a pity that Westminster had not done that beforehand; a great deal of time could have been saved.

I also wrote to the police to find out what objections they had to the Bill. Although amendments have now been made, I should like to read into the record the letter that I received from Assistant Commissioner G. D. McLean of New Scotland Yard. It reads:

"I am replying to your letter of 30 March to the Commissioner about the City of Westminster Bill. Our formal observations on the Bill were conveyed to the Home Office by letters dated 19 January and 20 March."

That is very late in the passage of a piece of private legislation for the Home Office to be consulting the police—or, indeed, for the police to be asked by the Home Office. I think that that reinforces the point that I made earlier.

The letter continues:

"Briefly, we support in principle Westminster City Council's initiatives to deal with the litter problem but we have reservations about the way in which those initiatives are proposed to be implemented by way of this Bill. In particular, we would not wish to see any active police involvement in the issue of 'fixed penalty notices' for litter offences and we would be concerned about the possibility of involvement by police at a secondary level in dealing with disputes between the City Council's authorised officer and the alleged offender to whom a fixed penalty notice was issued.

Naturally we do not relish the prospect of this involvement at a time when our initiatives are being directed at more serious matters and the utilisation of resources are under continuing close scrutiny."

It is clear that, if the police had been asked earlier, they would have told Westminster council officers what provisions should be put into the Bill to make it acceptable to the Metropolitan police and, in turn, to the Home Office.

The hon. Member for Westminster, North said that amendments proposed by the Home Office were being accepted. I understand that the Minister is prepared to accept that assurance, and that the House will not be asked to issue any directions to the Opposed Bill Committee. I trust that the members of that Committee will pay some heed to what was said on Second Reading, and will ensure that that happens.

To sum up my remarks about my second objection, I believe that the police should have been consulted considerably earlier, and certainly before the Bill was published.

I cannot escape the thought that, although the Bill has a good central intention, it has been used very much as an ego trip by the leader of Westminster city council. As I have said, Westminster is a wealthy borough, but the hon. Member for Westminster, North correctly pointed out that there is a good deal of poverty within it. It is a pity that Westminster city corporation does not direct its attention to doing more to alleviate that poverty.

Mr. Wheeler: It does.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman says that it does. However, I understand that Westminster has spent well over £40,000 on campaigning in relation to the Bill. It had good lobbyists. I know them well, and they have done a good job with fairly poor material. But I remember the time when the leader of the council bitterly attacked the Greater London council for spending ratepayers' money on what she considered to be propaganda.

There is an element of double standards here. I understand that Westminster is now spending over £1 million on public relations: that is a great deal of money to be spent by a borough which, as the hon. Gentleman suggested, has many problems. Many Conservative Members would call the things that Westminster is doing propaganda on the rates if they were being done by a Labour council. However, in a Tory authority they are considered a proper and fitting use of ratepayers' money, although I do not think that that is necessarily true. Westminster is now spending a higher percentage of its budget on public relations than the GLC did on a London-wide basis. It is no wonder that the leader of Westminster city council has been referred to, somewhat unflatteringly, as Ken Livingstone in drag.

While we know that Westminster's litter problem is fairly acute, I feel that the Bill shows that its priorities are wrong. Surely a council that has underspent by some £11 million in the past two years on housing and housing repairs could use its great promotional ability to do something about the level of poverty within its boundaries, and campaign for more resources from central Government so that something could be done about the scandal of bed-and-breakfast accommodation from which Westminster tends to suffer. As well as those within its boundaries, it has to take in a large number of people from other boroughs. My own borough of Newham, for example, has been forced to send people to bed-and-breakfast accommodation in boroughs such as Westminster.

Rather than bringing forward this Bill, we should like Westminster to do something about the 10,000 on its waiting lists and its 6,000 homeless families. We should like it to do rather more than build nine council houses, as it did last year, or proposes to do this year. It is pathetic, and shows that the Tory leadership of Westminster city council has a perverse set of priorities.

How effective will the Bill be? I understand that in some of its propaganda Westminster claims that its ratepayers will save a great deal of money. I should like to know how much Westminster ratepayers will save. If everybody stopped dropping litter, it would save the council a very great deal of money but we should like the savings that Westminster intends to secure by this legislation, if it is passed, to be quantified.

Earlier I asked the hon. Member for Westminster, North why Westminster has only brought one prosecution in the last three years for the dropping of litter in its streets. Westminster already has the power to prosecute. Through its public relations department, which seems to be growing larger and larger under the leadership of Lady Porter, it has made a great deal of fuss about people dropping litter, and it could have prosecuted them in the courts, using the existing legislation. That would have had a great impact on potential litter louts.

I accept that the existing legislation is unsatisfactory, but Westminster could have used its great influence in the Conservative party to persuade Ministers to introduce legislation to cover the whole country, not just Westminster. I hope that the Minister will give us his views about further legislation.

I should also like to know how many additional staff Westminster proposes to employ, if this legislation is passed. I can probably answer that question myself. It is a big zilch. The council will employ no additional staff. And if Westminster is granted these powers, I wonder how effective its policing of the legislation will be. I should also like to know what negotiations there have been with the unions and whether they agree with these proposals.

The Bill is designed to deal with people who make a mess. The Bill is a complete mess, and it has not been assisted by the Government's amendments. It owes much more to Westminster city council's obsessional desire for publicity than it does to a serious attempt to deal with a serious problem in Westminster and throughout this capital city. The Bill is decidedly bedraggled and it will undoubtedly be further amended in the Opposed Bill Committee.

It is not my intention to force a Division, but I suggest that the promoters should quietly drop it, in so far as Westminster city council is capable of doing anything quietly, and wait for a coherent attempt to deal with litter louts who affect not only Westminster but our capital city and many other cities.

8.2 pm

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): I offer a warm welcome to this long overdue Bill and congratulate Westminster city council on its initiative. My colleague, the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), has asked me to associate him with these remarks.

The Bill has the enthusiastic support of my council, the Bournemouth borough council. Like Westminster, Bournemouth is very much in the business of tourism and welcomes many thousands of visitors from home and abroad every year. Our new international conference centre—the Labour party enjoyed it the year before last and my party enjoyed it last year—and the growing number of all-year-round, all-weather leisure facilities will, we hope, attract even more visitors.

As with Westminster, litter is a seemingly uncontrollable problem. It has grown with the number of take-away food shops, although the fault does not lie with them. They are usually very co-operative in providing bins and in appealing to their customers to be tidy. However, we in Bournemouth cannot ignore the fact that the borough receives letters of complaint from visitors, including letters from abroad — I have had them myself — that demonstrate that they find the litter on our streets and beaches and in our parks and gardens wholly incompatible with the clean, attractive and elegant resort which, of course, Bournemouth is. It is putting them off returning to us.

A recent tourism study of Bournemouth and south-east Dorset has shown that, while the town is highly favoured as a holiday resort, a major criticism of it is the amount of litter on its streets. But, like Westminster, until now we have been powerless and frustrated in dealing with this problem. For several years now we have been urging that there should be legislation of this kind to provide local authorities with the power to impose on-the-spot fines on those found dropping litter. That would act as an effective deterrent. Apparently, it works in other European countries.

Representations have been made through the Association of District Councils and, through me, to successive Governments. However, the last Labour Government concluded that such powers would be undesirable—that legislation of that kind would impair relations between the police, who would have the responsibility for implementing the powers, and the public. It was understood that the police were opposed to being placed in this position. In any case, it was felt that they were better occupied in fighting crime. We can all sympathise with that.

There has, therefore, been a singular lack of prosecutions under the Litter Act 1983, as my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) has already said. Governments continue to resort to education and persuasion and there is no doubt that the Keep Britain Tidy group is doing an excellent job. But the problem remains, and it is growing. If the Bill is passed, undoubtedly a great many local authorities such as mine will seek similar powers. Indeed, instead of wasting parliamentary time on private Bills of this nature, perhaps there ought to be a Government Bill to deal with the problem. I look forward to hearing the views of my hon. Friend the Minister on that point.

Turning to the Bill itself, at first sight the prospect of authorised municipal officers roaming the streets to nab and fine may be regarded as more characteristic of Eastern Europe, but that is not what the Bill proposes. The precedent for what it proposes has long been set by traffic wardens and fixed penalties. I understand that Westminster city council already has officers who are authorised to control street markets and to deal with other planning considerations. Henceforth, they will have the power to approach those whom they see drop litter—not to impose a fine but to ask that it be picked up. Only a refusal will lead to a fixed penalty which I should have thought was wholly reasonable.

Once the public get to know the form in this way, the problem will be overcome. My only reservation is that I hope that these officers will always try to avoid fining visitors from abroad. I foresee headlines in foreign newspapers that will wholly distort the picture. It will create an unjustified image here that will not be at all helpful to our tourist prospects.

I hope that the whole House will applaud Westminster city council on its initiative and, indeed, on its entire cleaner city experiment. We in Bournemouth will be closely following the passage of the Bill and will seek to introduce our own as soon as possible.

8.8 pm

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): The hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) graphically described the litter problem in the city of Westminster. All hon. Members understand that the problem is at its most severe in the city of Westminster because of the vast body of visitors, commuters and tourists who throng its streets.

The problem is getting worse almost daily. Westminster city council states that the volume of litter taken from its streets has increased by about 20 per cent. in the last three years. The rapid increase in littering means that we cannot hang around waiting for a perfect solution to arrive from central Government. The Westminster initiative may not be perfect and may have to be refined, but at least Westminster is having a go at the problem, and that is welcomed.

Over the years much effort has been directed to solving this problem. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) referred to the Westminster city council's cleaner city campaign, a very interesting initiative that was followed up by a number of other local authorities in sponsoring litter bins and so on. That campaign, despite all the effort that went into it, did not slow down littering in our streets, which in London has been aggravated by the rise in the number of visitors over recent years.

In 1976 there were 7¼ million visitors to London from overseas and about 11 million from other parts of the United Kingdom, a total of a little over 18¼ million. By 1985 that had shot up to more than 9 million overseas visitors and 14 million visitors from other parts of the United Kingdom, a total of over 23 million people visiting London in one year—a 26 per cent. increase over a nine-year period.

I do not suggest that we should blame the litter problem on those who visit our city. There is some evidence to suggest that visitors are more concerned about litter and in general have a better performance in that respect than some of the inhabitants of London. But the sheer number of visitors means that there is more litter even if the percentage of visitors doing the littering is comparatively small.

Other hon. Members referred to the need for an education campaign, which I support, but we have been trying that. I have sponsored many of the Keep Britain Tidy group efforts to undertake sensible initiatives in our schools to try to get this message across to young people before they reach maturity. Perhaps these initiatives did not have sufficient resources behind them, but they really have not been able to struggle against and have been overwhelmed by the sheer momentum of the increase in litter.

In my own borough of Greenwich, which is another very important tourist area of London, virtually all our shopping centres are a sea of litter by the end of a shopping day, with the rubbish blowing everywhere in the wind. The fast food chains have a lot to answer for in generating litter. A number of them—McDonalds are probably the foremost among them—go to great lengths to try to tackle the problem even to the extent of having a litter patrol to collect some of the refuse from their own operations. Away from the shopping centres, residential streets which are probably swept once a week become a sea of accumulated paper and piles of bottles and tins. Many residential streets in areas like the one in which I live are disfigured in this way.

There is the problem of public open spaces. My local authority provides very pleasant small parks and garden areas which ought to be a delight for people to enjoy; but they are not, because flower beds and grassed areas are spoiled by bottles, cans, ice-cream wrappers, cigarette wrappers and the whole plethora of rubbish dumped by insensitive and unfeeling people.

The wooded areas, of which there is a vast expanse in my area, come in for very heavy and systematic dumping of large black sacks of accumulated refuse, furniture and other things. It is not necessary to dump in the woods because my authority, like many others, operates a very effective and efficient recycling depot which can collect and take in that sort of rubbish.

Mr. Tony Banks: Who constructed it?

Mr. Cartwright: Indeed, it was a recycling depot that we inherited from the Greater London Council—one of the forward looking steps of the GLC, and I am in favour of that recycling approach to litter—but we have not got across to people that they do not need to take rubbish into the woods but can take it to the recycling depot.

One of the most depressing things that I see when driving in and out from my home to this House is the car or lorry driver in front who winds down the window and throws out accumulated litter in the cab—cigarette ends, cigarette packets, apple cores, or whatever. It all goes out of the vehicle and on to the road.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West said that these people are anti-social. I accept that some of them are, but many of them are downright thoughtless. The saddest aspect of the public attitude to litter is that we are beginning to learn to live with it. People have stopped complaining about it, because they say, "What is the good of complaining?" Nobody cares, and the problem continues to grow and get worse; the more we become accustomed to lower standards, the worse our environment comes.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether there is any alliance policy on the problem of litter, particularly in terms of requiring manufacturers to spend a proportion of their profits on finding ways of making their packaging biodegradable.

Mr. Cartwright: We follow the same policy in the alliance as in other parties, that the polluter should pay. A great deal more could be done by manufacturers to encourage by a combination of stick and carrot, but at the end of the day even biodegradable refuse is left lying on the streets for a long time before it biodegrades, and in that sense it is degrading our environment while that process continues.

We have heard of the defects of the Litter Act 1983, which has not tackled litter. Nationwide there has been a singular lack of prosecutions. The police feel, with understanding from most members of the public, that they have more important functions than to struggle with littering. In any case, the Act is not cost effective. The likely cost of a prosecution under the Act is about £200 and the average fine would be about £40. Cash spent on pursuing individual prosecutions through the courts would be better utilised in dealing on the ground with a large number of offenders through the fixed penalty approach. That is why I support the general aims and approach of this Bill. Any sensible initiative to support this Bill has to be tried. A fixed penalty system that works is preferable to the cumbersome procedures of the Litter Act.

Having enforcement officers asking people to pick up litter, with the back-up of the fixed penalty system, could have an impact on people's behaviour, and that is what the Bill is trying to achieve. The Bill, to be effective, has to have not just an effective punitive system, but a proper information and advertising campaign. I understand that is part of the Westminster approach.

I am sorry that the Government appear to have decided that all fines should go into the Exchequer rather than back to Westminster city council. If the number of fixed penalty notices is small because offenders pick up the litter when they are asked, there would still be an incentive for Westminster in having less litter. If Westminster does not receive revenue from fines, it has little initiative to issue penalty notices or to increase the number of enforcement officers. I should have thought that, when central Government is telling local authorities to tighten their belts, a little in-built financial incentive from the Government would not have gone amiss.

Like other hon. Members who have spoken, I am interested in the wider application of these powers. There is a great deal of public interest and support, and certainly much interest and support, too, from local authorities across the political spectrum. We have to ask what form the development of such a power will take. Will other councils be expected to promote their own legislation? Will we have to wait years for central Government legislation or can we not ask for an enabling measure so that the local authorities which want it will have power to do something? That is the way forward rather than requiring every authority to do exactly the same about the problem. I hope the Government will say that such enabling leglislation will be forthcoming.

Mr. Tony Banks: They have only got about three days.

Mr. Cartwright: There will be an Administration in power. Whichever Administration is in power, I hope that such an approach to the problem will be an important priority. All of us agree that litter disfigures our major cities, particularly London. It contributes to the shabby, dingy, down-at-heel appearance which too much of central London now gives.

There is also broad agreement that the quality of the environment must be improved. The fight against litter, however mundane it may appear, is very much part of the fight to improve the quality of life in London. To win the fight we need to change public attitudes. A punitive system on its own cannot do that. But the Bill, backed up by an education and information campaign, can contribute to the changes that we all want to see. For those reasons I support the Bill.

8.21 pm

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I spent some years as a Westminster city councillor. Although these issues were not before the council at the time, I am fairly familiar with the problems of the city of Westminster. It is perhaps a matter of regret that this is not an occasion for me to say what I think about the council's appalling housing policy, the homelessness, the neglect of social services, the difficulties elderly people face and so on. The hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) should be familiar with those problems. One difficulty underlying Westminster's approach is polarisation because the affluent areas of the city are so far away from the poorer areas. All too often city hall is remote from the poor and disadvantaged people in the northern part of the city who desperately need more attention than they are getting.

I agree with the hon. Member for Westminster, North that litter is an enormous problem. We are an extremely wasteful society. I wish local authorities went to more trouble to separate litter that can be recycled from litter that cannot. As a society we are exploiting our planet and we are not seeking to minimise the damage that we are doing to it. Litter is one manifestation of that damage.

London has always struck me as a particularly dirty city —and by London I mean inner London and the city of Westminster. It is always remarkable how much cleaner cities in the north of England are. That may be because of tourism or it may be because many cities in the north have Labour authorities which deal better with such things. At any rate, it is disagreeable to note on arriving back in London how dirty it is. To that extent, I agree that there is a problem.

Of course, litter on the streets encourages more litter. If people see litter lying about, they will not look for rubbish bins but will simply throw the extra bits of paper on the street. If our cities were cleaner, there might be more pressure on individuals to throw their rubbish into rubbish bins and not on the street.

Given the difficulties, the streets of the city of Westminster are not at all bad. I fear that if the street cleaning services are privatised—as the threat appears to be—standards will go down. I need only to invoke the experience of the borough of Wandsworth, in which my constituency is situated, to show what happens when a council hands over responsibility to a private firm. The streets get dirtier and dirtier.

We are all against litter, and it is understandable that other local authorities are interested in any initiative which seeks to reduce litter. The hon. Member for Westminster, North read a list of local authorities that were for the Bill either in principle or in detail; he used words similar to those. There is all the difference in the world between being interested in an idea in principle and supporting it in detail. I suspect that many local authorities that have shown an interest in the scheme would be interested in any new idea that attempted to deal with the problem of litter, but most of them are not necessarily in support of the details because the details represent a sticking point. Therefore, I do not think that the hon. Member for Westminster, North should have said that all these authorities are in support of the Bill. I do not believe that support in principle represents support for the Bill as it stands.

In contrast to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), I am not sure that for all the money that has been spent Westminster city council lobbyists have done all that good a job. It was only yesterday afternoon that I first received background information. Then I got something from them in the post today. Fortunately, I still have friends on Westminster city council who were able to brief me more thoroughly than the city council itself did, although I had a conversation with an official in city hall about some details this morning. That was when I first learnt about the amendments that are to be introduced later.

I have several reservations. My first reservation is that we are told by the sponsor of the Bill that three major amendments are to be introduced. I can understand that, on Second Reading, sometimes criticisms may provoke a Minister or the sponsor of the Bill to say, having heard the arguments, that there may be a case for changes in Committee. But what we were told today by the hon. Member for Westminster, North as soon as he started was that there would be three amendments. What is more, those amendments will not deal with minor points of detail to tidy up small matters, but amendments which will change the Bill fundamentally.

I think that it is virtually without precedent for us to be presented with a Bill and to be told on its Second Reading that it is not right and will be completely different if it is passed. The House should not be treated in that way. The first I knew of these changes was late yesterday afternoon when I got a letter from someone who had been advising the city council. I learnt more about it this morning. It must be unheard of for the House to be presented with a Bill and to be told, "We have got it all wrong; we will make three major changes but you will have to wait and see because we cannot give you the details now."

The Bill will require much amendment to incorporate these three changes. Given the length of time the Bill has been around since Westminster city council embarked upon it, the least that could have been done was to withdraw the Bill and present it later in the form in which the council would like it to be. It is treating the House with less than normal courtesy and respect to deal with it in this way.

My second reservation concerns whether the measure will work. If I thought it would work, I would support it, but I have serious doubts about it. My first doubt concerns the 60 individuals who are called the multi-purpose inspectorate. Apart from the fact that all my instincts tell me that an expression like "the multi-purpose inspectorate" ought to be thrown out of the window and that we should start again with common sense English, I find it hard to see how this system will work.

The hon. Member for Westminster, North, who is sponsoring the Bill, said that there would be a means of identification. I understand that the inspectors will have badges. For some purposes they will not wear badges because when they are inspecting street trading it is better that they come upon the scene unannounced and then identify themselves. I do not know the background; there may or may not be good reasons for that. But if they are going to various parts of Westminster looking for litter louts, they will put on a badge. I question whether this is good enough. I question whether the process of approaching an individual and telling him that he must pay a penalty would work. If the individual does not pay the penalty, he is liable to be charged with a criminal offence, if I understand the system corectly. That is quite serious. I am not sure that a multi-purpose inspectorate, not easily identifiable and getting into a very sensitive area indeed, will be in a position to enforce this in a satisfactory way.

We are told that the inspectorate will consist, at least partly, of former police officers and that they will have had experience of dealing with these matters. But what about the others? It is one thing to visit a street stall and see whether all the traders are licensed by the city council. That is a straightforward process and should be easily understood, and street traders are aware of a local authority's powers in this respect. It is quite another matter to approach an individual in the street and, possibly after attempted conciliation, such as saying, "Why do you not pick that up, otherwise you are for it?", to deal with the matter in what could be a difficult situation. People will not be particularly amenable to being reprimanded. The majority may be, but some will not. I wonder whether the inspectors will be able to do this job properly unless they can be easily identified.

Mr. Hanley: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman would disqualify those who currently do the valuable job of traffic warden because of the problems that he has just mentioned.

Mr. Dubs: Not at all; the position of traffic wardens is entirely different. Traffic wardens are easily identified. They wear a uniform and they have one function only—to be traffic wardens. Secondly, they are concerned with where vehicles are parked. They are not obliged to get a name and address from an individual. Their job is to slap a parking ticket on a vehicle. I appreciate that sometimes they may have a bit of an altercation with a motorist who arrives as the parking ticket is being put on the car. Nevertheless, their job is to identify the motor car, not the driver. That comes later.

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Gentleman must admit that traffic wardens take part in traffic management in the metropolis, and their background is not that of the police. They are ordinary citizens who have been trained. Surely the inspectors which my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) mentioned would be similarly trained and would probably have a similar background.

Mr. Dubs: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but I believe that he is missing the point. When traffic wardens are carrying out one of the other functions, such as acting on point duty, their job is still to point cars in particular directions and give signals. They are dealing essentially with vehicles. That is rather different from approaching an individual and saying, "You have committed an offence and I am going to give you this ticket; if you do not pay up, you will have committed a criminal offence." It seems to me that the likelihood of altercations, confrontations and arguments is much greater. That is why I issue a warning that it may not work quite so easily. If someone approaches an individual and tells him to pick up litter that he has dropped, he may get a rather unparliamentary reply. Then the individual may say, "Anyway, who are you?" The reply will be, "I am a multi-purpose inspector." I leave hon. Members to judge how that will develop.

The inspectors may be issued with smart uniforms, will look as if they represent officialdom and will be given the status and backing necessary for them to do their job. All I am saying is that I do not see the system working easily on the basis of the information that we have had so far.

There are other difficulties. What happens if people throw litter from motor cars? One often sees a motor car going along and out comes a bit of paper, a cigarette packet, or whatever. It is not clear to me whether the multi-purpose inspectors will have the power to record the registration number of the vehicle and then do something about it or whether they can simply use their powers, and get the name and address of the individual so as to issue the necessary ticket. I suspect from the way in which the Bill has been drafted that motorists will be exempt from this.

My third reservation is this. Surely what we are doing in effect, although in fact we are not creating a new offence —and I understand that—is creating a new offence, because, although the offence of littering is on the statute book, it is not being enforced at the moment. So that there will be one part of the country, the city of Westminster, in which throwing down a cigarette paper, a packet or a sweet paper will now be an offence and something will be done about it. To that extent, the city of Westminster will be quite different from any other part of the country, or indeed any other part of London. I am reluctant to go along with having an offence which will be treated quite differently in one part of the country as compared with another. It will lead to misunderstanding and uncertainty, quite apart from the obvious problem of what happens on the boundary between Westminster and Kensington or Westminster and Camden and how far along Westbourne Park road an individual was when he threw down the litter. These are obvious problems, and perhaps the inspectors will steer clear of the boundary areas.

Far more likely to cause difficulties is the positon of visitors to London from other parts of the country, for they will suddenly find themselves becoming well nigh criminals for doing something which at home they certainly should not do—and I do not condone their behaviour—but for which there is no penalty. I question whether we should change the law in this respect in one part of the country only. I believe that this is a point of principle to which we should address ourselves. If we had a Government measure which sought to strengthen anti-litter legislation on a national basis, we would have the benefit of everybody in the country knowing what was going on. There would be a uniformity of enforcement procedures throughout the country and people would not be able to say that they thought they were in Kensington rather than Westminster, that the law is unfair and they will not give their names and addresses.

These are real problems because we are dealing with a problem on the street, not with a ticket on a motor car. This is a pretty sensitive matter. In practice, the multi-purpose inspectors will obviously steer clear of the difficulties. They would not be human if they did not, knowing that they have no powers to back up what they are doing. There will be no police officers to help them because police officers cannot get involved in this, as we understand from the amendments.

Therefore, I envisage enormous difficulties. My original instinct was to welcome this legislation, but the more I think about it the greater become my misgivings about whether it will be workable. It is a question not of the aim or the motive but of whether it is workable.

I cannot help feeling that the right approach would be a national one in terms of both uniformity of enforcement of the legislation and massive national publicity. I agree that Westminster has gone in for publicity, and I am sure that at a local level that has been beneficial; and it does have more litter bins than other local authorities. But I do not think that this matter should be left to one local authority. We are seeking to influence people's attitudes, to make people more conscious of pollution and of the harm that they are doing by throwing their rubbish down rather than putting it in rubbish bins and receptacles. Therefore, we need a national approach and a national education campaign.

Furthermore, I should like to see most packaging material and most of the plastic bags issued by department stores carrying an exhortation to the individual to put the item in a rubbish bin and not to dispose of it in the street. If we had a national campaign or effort, we might begin to get somewhere and, in that process, we could consider what sorts of sanctions there ought to be against individuals who ignore them and how they should be enforced.

I am sorry that I cannot give the measure my enthusiastic blessing because we are all aware how difficult the problem is. Although we in Britain are worse at littering our streets than people in some other countries, it is clearly not just a British problem. I should like to say that it is a wonderful idea and to give it an enthusiastic welcome, but it is not workable. It has not been thought through properly and, therefore, I felt obliged to express my reservations this evening.

8.41 pm

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): Before the debate closes, I should like to say that, while the House recognises the sincerity of the objections raised by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), they seem to be ones that could be overcome. The city of Westminster is to be congratulated warmly on its initiative. On behalf of residents in the royal borough of Kensington and Chelsea,

[Sir Brandon Rhys Williams]

I can say with certainty that we would welcome similar legislation, whether by way of a private Bill or by national legislation.

8.42 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): It may be helpful if I give a brief summary of the Government's attitude to the Bill, the main features of which have been so admirably and lucidly described by my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler). Subject to certain proposed amendments, to which I will refer shortly, the Government welcome the Bill and hope that it will receive a Second Reading. As has been said so notably by my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster North, litter anywhere, especially in our capital city, is an increasing and unsightly characteristic of our streets. It can also constitute a threat to public health.

For that reason the Government have taken or have sponsored a number of policy inititiatives, of which I mention two. We currently allocate some £500,000 a year through the Keep Britain Tidy group to a number of local initiatives undertaken by local authorities, schools and voluntary organisations. In July last year my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment launched the United Kingdom 2000 scheme under the chairmanship of Richard Branson. The objective was to increase the quality and quantity of work being done to improve the environment. I am glad to say that over 200 projects have been started involving some 4,200 volunteers. For the current financial year we have increased our funding for this project to around £1·5 million.

It has been asked whether the Government have some national scheme in mind similar or analogous to the scheme proposed in the Bill. We do not have such a general power, nor do we propose to introduce enabling legislation of the sort advocated by the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright). On the other hand, it is quite clear that if the Bill receives the assent of the House and is put into practice, it will provide an interesting experiment on which we can form a judgment as to the viability of future legislation.

The principal Act is the Litter Act 1983. Hon. Members might like to know that each year about 1,600 successful prosecutions are brought under the 1983 Act and that the average fine currently being imposed is around £32. However, as has been stressed by a number of hon. Members, invoking and enforcing the 1983 Act is a complex and, to be fair, expensive procedure. The Bill is designed to achieve a more effective and simpler method of enforcement.

We support the objectives of the Bill and, subject to certain changes being agreed in Committee, we shall support the passage of the Bill. The changes that we seek have been clearly outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North and I am glad to hear that he and the council agree to them. There are two changes. First, we believe that fines levied under the Bill should go into the Consolidated Fund and not into local authority funds. This represents a long-standing principle which was given statutory force in the Justices of the Peace Act 1949. The principle is that where a local authority levies a fine that money goes not into its own resources but into central Government funds.

There is an important principle which underpins that proposition. It is wrong in principle to allow an authority to enforce a law if it has a pecuniary interest in the manner in which it is enforced or the extent to which it is enforced. For that reason the Government wish to see the Bill amended in the way that I have outlined. If the House gives a Second Reading to the Bill, it will then have the opportunity of considering the Ways and Means resolution proposed in the name of my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary. If that is approved, the Committee would have the opportunity to make the amendments that I have described.

The second group of amendments relates to the power of police officers. The Government would be reluctant to see the Bill used as a means of imposing an additional burden on police officers. Those hon. Members who represent the capital well know the burdens that police officers of the Metropolitan force already carry. Therefore, the House will understand my reluctance to see the Bill being a vehicle for additional burdens being imposed on the Metropolitan force. Consequently, the Government would wish to see the Bill amended so as to delete from it those parts of it which empower a police constable to issue a notice. That will require an amendment to clause 4. It will remain possible for a police officer to institute proceedings under the 1983 Act if he thinks that that is appropriate.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister tell the House when the Metropolitan police were first asked their opinion on the provisions in the Bill, unamended, as it is before us tonight, because they should have been consulted at a much earlier stage? In terms of discussions with the police, who took the initiative?

Mr. Hogg: I am sorry that I have to disappoint the hon. Member in that I am not able to give him the answer to the detailed question that he has raised. He should more properly pursue that with the chairman of the Westminster city council.

The second group of amendments I referred to includes clause 9 which, as presently drafted, would impose additional duties on the police service. Clause 9 as drafted makes it an offence for somebody to refuse to give his name and address to an authorised officer of the local authority. We wish to see that provision deleted. If it remains in the Bill, it is bound to result in additional work being imposed upon the police service, which is not something that I wish to see happen.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North has given careful consideration to the changes that the Government wish to see and I know too that he has discussed the Bill with the council. He has indicated that the three changes I have mentioned in the course of my remarks are acceptable both to himself and to the council. I am pleased about that. Subject to that understanding, the Government would wish to see the Bill receive a Second Reading and wish it well in its passage through Parliament.

8.49 pm

Mr. Wheeler: With the leave of the House, I shall reply to the debate.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for what he has said and I again confirm that the proposed amendments to be moved in Committee, which I discussed earlier, will be proceeded with. I am glad that he and I are of one mind on that matter.

Mr. Dubs: Clause 9(2), which I understand will be deleted, says that it will be an offence to refuse to give a name and address. On the assumption that the amendment is incorporated into the Bill, would it be an offence under any other legislation for anybody to give misleading information to one of the officials? In other words, if they give a false name and address, is that an offence?

Mr. Wheeler: I can confirm that Clause 9(2) will be amended in Committee to remove the creation of an offence of failing to give a name and address. I cannot be precise on the other point the hon. Gentleman has raised. It is a matter to be answered in Committee. I hesitate to put myself in the role of the Attorney-General or anyone else, but it has always been my understanding in the enforcement of minor summary offences that it is for the enforcement officer, whoever that may be, to use his or her best endeavours to ascertain a proper name and address for the service of any document or process, be it a fixed ticket or a summons. As I speak I know of no criminal offence that would arise under the criminal law of the realm should a person, whether a citizen of the United Kingdom or of any other country visiting the United Kingdom, give a false name and address. I speak unaided and without the benefit of lawyers.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) quite fairly and properly raised a number of issues about principles. All of us in the House are the guardians of liberty. We are concerned about the interaction between enforcement agencies and citizens using the streets and the public highways wherever that may be, in the city of Westminter or elsewhere. As I said earlier, the city of Westminster proposes to train its staff who will form part of the multi-agency inspectorate. That is a cumbersome title but it is intended to include those officials of the council who are concerned with environmental enforcement, street trading enforcement and other matters for which the council has responsibility in addition to its new role. Those officials will be properly trained in the discharge of that duty. They will, of course, be equipped with proper identification of a sort that will leave the citizen in no doubt as to their status and credibility.

Whether they will wear a uniform is a matter for the council to decide on some future occasion in conjunction with its officials. However, I do not think that that is a matter of great principle.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West referred also to who might be supporting the Bill. I have a copy of a letter from the London Boroughs Association dated 3 February 1987 in which it confirms that it is supporting Westminster city council's endeavours to achieve this legislation. It goes on to say that it has written in appropriate terms to the Home Office and to the LBA's parliamentary panel in the House and in the House of Lords.

I understand that as part of the wide consultative exercise in which Westminster city council engaged it received encouragement, if not support, from the London boroughs of Tower Hamlets, Waltham Forest, Southwark, and Camden.

I can put at rest the mind of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West about consultation with the police. He is quite right to raise that matter. I can say that the commissioner of police was consulted at the beginning when the Bill was being proposed by the city council. He and his officers were able to spend some time considering the matter. Indeed, I had a discussion with the deputy assistant commissioner of police responsible for the city of Westminster district and I know that he and others had a most fulsome exchange with officials of Westminster city council and its leader. It is true that the police did have reservations about their involvement in this process. That matter, as the House knows, has been properly dealt with.

The hon. Gentleman also asked whether the unions had been consulted at Westminster city council. I can tell him that the offices which form part of the multi-agency inspectorate are fully aware of the measure and have been consulted. As far as I am aware, they, as a group, raised no objection to their involvement in the enforcement of the legislation. I can give an assurance to the hon. Gentleman and the House that, although Westminster city council is a pioneer in the privatisation of its services because it wishes to obtain value for money for its ratepayers and the most effective services, it is not intending to contract out those employees of the council who are involved in the inspectorial duties to do with environmental health, street trading or enforcement of the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) welcomed the Bill and I am grateful for his robust support. He understands the problems that large numbers of visitors can cause to an important town that is popular with tourists from both home and overseas.

The hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) was also robust in his support for the Bill. He said that the problem of litter is getting worse and he commended Westminster city council's initiative in bringing this measure before the House. He understood the extent of the difficulty since his own borough is a mecca for visitors and suffers from the problems of litter. I am glad that he was able to give such fulsome support to the measure.

The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) raised a number of points. He inquired about the measure of support from councils in the country for Westminster city council's proposals. I can tell him from the information given to me that some 112 local authorities expressed support—I use those words carefully—for the measure we are considering. A further 162 local authorities expressed their interest in the proposal. That is a remarkable record of consultation and betokens the energy displayed by the city council in its efforts to attract the widest possible interest in its endeavours.

The hon. Member for Battersea complained about the three amendments to which I referred earlier and said that the House had not received proper notice. But the purpose of consultation, particularly with a measure of this kind, is to ascertain the degree of support that it has, whether from the police, the Home Office or any other interested party, and to listen to representations that are made and amend the Bill accordingly. The council did just that. It should be commended not only for consulting but for heeding the advice that it received.

Mr. Tony Banks: But surely the hon. Gentleman accepts that amendments such as this reveal that Westminster city council did not consult properly before drafting the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. Tony Banks]

Battersea is right. It may not be unprecedented, but it is unusual for a great hole to be kicked in a Bill on Second Reading. This clearly reveals that, for all the hon. Gentleman's loyal protestations, Westminster did not consult as it should have done.

Mr. Wheeler: I reject the hon. Gentleman's assertion that the consultation was ineffective. The hon. Gentleman has been here long enough to know that amendments to Bills arise with remarkable speed and at extraordinary hours of the night, according to the needs and interests of this House and its Members. I do not think there is a great issue of principle here.

Mr. Dubs: I welcome the fact that Westminster council went in for consultation. My complaint is that Westminster council should have given us the Bill when the consultation was complete rather than have presented us with a Bill which, we are told, is defective in a number of respects. That seems to be the wrong way to go about it, and it means that we do not yet have before us a Bill representing Westminster council's intentions.

Mr. Wheeler: Surely it is relatively easy to scan such a short Bill and the amendments. There is no great difficulty here. This is not a Bill of several hundred pages with dozens of clauses but a Bill of two or three pages with only a handful of clauses. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman understands that.

The hon. Member for Battersea went on to ask whether the Bill would work. The litter legislation that the House passed in the 1950s has had a very chequered career as a piece of criminal legislation and has resulted in relatively few prosecutions in England and Wales. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State—the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg)—said, there have been about 1,600 prosecutions a year, which is a very small number. That reflects the difficulty of making the Act work. Westminster city council's proposals offer the reasonable expectation of a more effective form of enforcement. That is welcomed by a number of bodies outside the political machine with an interest in the environment. Therefore —and I believe that many hon. Members agree—it is worth running an experiment in the City of Westminster to see what progress can be made.

The hon. Member for Battersea suggested fairly that the Bill will create different enforcement practices as between one part of London and another as well as between other parts of the United Kingdom, and of course that must be true. However, if Westminster's experiment is found to be successful, no doubt other local authorities —for instance, the borough of Bournemouth—will exert pressure because they will want to try such an experiment in their districts. At that stage, the local authority associations may well persuade the Home Office to introduce enabling legislation to cover the country as a whole.

I am grateful for the encouragement that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) gave in his short and helpful intervention. I know that his local authority will be among those watching Westminster's experiment with great interest. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for his remarks and for his wholehearted support of the Bill, subject to the amendments to be properly moved in Committee.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time and committed.

WAYS AND MEANS

CITY OF WESTMINSTER

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the City of Westminster Bill, it is expedient to authorise payments into the Consolidated Fund.—[Mr. Douglas Hogg.]

Financial Services

Question again proposed.

9.4 pm

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): We have moved downstream from the city of Westminster to the City of London, where the problems are perhaps graver than those of litter bugs and where there are miscreants on whom we seek to impose more substantial fines and penalties than were the subject of our earlier discussions.

I reiterate my warm welcome for the orders. As I said, this legislation and the delegation order are important in giving to the Securities and Investments Board considerable powers and authority of regulation and investigation in the City. The financial services sector is of pre-eminent importance to the economy, deploying more than 1 million people and contributing more than £7·5 billion in overseas earnings. This legislation, of which the orders are a subsidiary part, is effectively the most comprehensive overhaul of investor protection and legislation for 40 years. The House and the public should be aware of the magnitude of what the Government are doing—for the first time, both establishing and delegating to a body of this importance and stature significant responsibilities in terms of future regulation of the City.

It is appropriate to remind my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State and hon. Members that the principal object of the legislation and of the orders is to enhance investor protection. Our principal concern must be to improve the lot of investors. We are not, I hope, giving powers to a body that will be an apologist for the City or a greaser of wheels. That is not our principal objective, although obviously we hope that this body will not stand in the way of an efficient, profitable and vibrant City, especially the investment industries.

I should like to ask my hon. and learned Friend the Minister a number of specific questions which, although I have paid tribute to the legislation, are of some concern. I note from the orders that a number of important powers are being transferred. As I understand it, a number of the powers which were added in Committee to the SIB will be delegated under the order. I am interested in those powers that are not being transferred, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has deemed appropriate to keep unto himself. He is empowered under the relevant section of the Financial Services Act 1986 to delegate to the SIB a wide range of responsibilities. In fact, he has chosen to delegate the majority of those powers, but it appears that some significant ones have not been delegated, and I should like to ask why.

Why, for example, is the power to withdraw authorisation not being delegated to the SIB? It is nonsense that the SIB will be responsible for granting certain businesses authorisation if they seek it from the SIB, but the SIB will not be empowered to take that authorisation away—that power will still be vested in the Secretary of State. The SIB will be responsible for overseeing the self-regulating bodies which, in turn, will grant authorisation through membership to institutions, yet the SIB will not in those instances be able to withdraw authorisation. That is a fairly minimalist approach. Perhaps, if we intend the SIB to be taken seriously in the City, we should have been a bit more courageous in the teeth and the power that we are giving to it.

It seems rather odd that the SIB will not be allowed to make statements on misconduct in the City. Why not? The watchdog body, the SIB, is responsible for ensuring, on a day-to-day basis, that people are conducting good business. If it finds that they are not, that there are misdemeanours or possible criminal activity, why should it be prevented from making statements about that misconduct? I want it to make statements about misconduct, and I want it to be respected and fair. It should be able to say, in the City and publicly, that certain activities are unacceptable and that they need further investigation. It should be able to pin the blame, where it is justified, on certain institutions and persons, be they authorised or not. Why is the power to make statements on misconduct reserved to the Secretary of State? It could have been transferred to the SIB. The Minister has deliberately chosen not to do so.

Why are the powers on injunctions not being transferred to the SIB? It will be able to investigate, authorise and bar businesses. It will be able to grant authorisation and set up a long and detailed rule book on the way that the City should operate, yet when it discovers that something is going wrong it will not only be unable to withdraw authorisation or make a statement on misconduct, it will be unable to take out an injunction to prevent that misbehaviour. The power to ask a court for an injunction rests and remains with the Secretary of State. That would have been a reasonable power to give to the SIB if we are sufficiently satisfied that it has the personnel, rules, authority and statutory identity to be able to do the job that Parliament is setting for it.

I see why, by way of contrast, my hon. and learned Friend the Minister has said that the rules on indemnity should not be transferred to the SIB. It is wholly proper that indemnity from the civil law should not be delegated to any body other than the Government. Rightly, my hon. and learned Friend and the Government have kept that power for the Secretary of State.

In all other respects we are adopting a softly-softly approach, but we could have gone further in giving the SIB the teeth to do the job that we envisage for it.

Those matters relate to the powers that will not be transferred. I ask my hon. and learned Friend why some of the powers that will be transferred are to be exercised concurrently with the Secretary of State. In other words, the order is saying that some of the orders that the Government give or delegate to the SIB are powers that both the Secretary of State and the SIB will be able to exercise. Why is it necessary to have a concurrent exercise of power for injunctions against unauthorised people? It is strange that under the proposed order the SIB will not be able to take out an injunction to stop an authorised institution doing something but it will be able to take out an injunction against unauthorised people doing something that they should not. It seems an arbitrary and questionable decision to provide a distinction in this case. The SIB should have the power of injunction in authorised and unauthorised cases. I do not see why, in the case of unauthorised concerns, it has been deemed permissible to give that power concurrently to the SIB yet not in the case of authorised businesses.

I turn to the delegation of investigations. It is proposed that the power to investigate certain misconduct will be exercised by the SIB. In Committee that power was envisaged and extended. The SIB will be able to exercise that power currently with the Secretary of State.

[Mr. Anthony Nelson]

Who is to take the lead? Where will the responsibility lie, in certain instances, to investigate suspicious cases? Will certain activities be the responsibility of the Department and others the responsibility of the SIB? Will it be the body to which the complaint is made in the first instance that will take up an investigation?

At some stage, we shall need some rather clearer guidelines if there are not to be gaps in or, conversely, overlapping of responsibility and an explanation of why such a concurrent exercise of power is deemed to be necessary.

The SIB will take on significant powers. I have three points of advice. First, I urge it to think ahead and not respond only to past events when framing its rules or making any statements on matters concerning investor protection and the running of investor markets. Secondly, I advise it not to be nobbled. It is easy to be nobbled in the City. The City and many investment institutions have a way of making people who are not part of its inner circle believe that they do not understand the principles or mechanics of their operation. In fact, the City is by no means invulnerable—nor should it be invulnerable—to questioning and supervision. I hope that the SIB will continue to have the independence and authority that it has already demonstrated and will not move into the cosy club of the City and be nobbled by City opinion and City experience.

Thirdly, the SIB must remember who sent it there. Parliament did. It is not the creature of the City, set up either to preserve a closed shop or to establish the smooth running of the City. It is there principally to do the job of investor protection. In my judgment, the relationship between the SIB, SROs and the many institutions under them should be slightly uncomfortable at all times. They should not get on too easily and too well. They should be slightly fearful and respectful. In striking the right balance between co-operation, in which the SIB must engage, and the vigorous pursuit of control and supervision, they should err on the side of recognising the principle of investor protection as paramount.

For those reasons, the debate and the orders are important. The orders are the culmination of a trilogy of important pieces of legislation that not only will transform the regulation of the City but will create a more vibrant, profitable and respectable City whose integrity and profitability will earn the respect of the world.

9.17 pm

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I declare an interest as the non-executive chairman of Fraser Green Ltd, a firm of investment managers who are licensed dealers and who have applied for membership of the Investment Managers Regulatory Organisation. I also help to run courses teaching members of the Financial Intermediaries and Managers Brokers Regulatory Association their rules. I assure the House that it is in nobody's interest to make sure that the rules are difficult so that as many people as possible come to me for guidance. It is in everybody's interest that the rules are workable, that they are able to be understood by people in the investment world and that they are flexible enough to deal with changes as they occur.

As Professor Jim Gower said, the most important point of the rules is that FIMBRA members should be able to carry them out. If the retail end of the market cannot accept the rules and finds that it cannot work to them, the whole edifice will come crashing down. The framework that is set out in the Financial Services Act 1986 is the right set of rules to give the best possible chance to all those involved in investment business to carry out their operations and, at the same time, to give the best chance of effective investor protection.

I welcome the order and pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister. When he took on his onerous task, he little saw the difficulties with the legislation that lay ahead. I would not mind betting that, had he seen the rocky road in front of him, he would have considered rejecting his position. He has gained the admiration and respect of those in the City and of hon. Members for the way in which he tackled the legislation.

I must also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson). His speech was typical of the care and consideration that he has given to the legislation throughout its progress. I know that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister would agree that my hon. Friends the Members for Chichester and for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) — it is invidious to choose but two — made such constructive contributions in Committee that, through their own power of persuasion and depth of knowledge, they improved a Bill that has since become a workable, practical Act.

Some unavoidable problems still remain. The bulk of the SIB's rules, for example, is unavoidable. Anyone confronted with that draft set of rules would be daunted by the task of reading through them—yet many people will have to do that if they are to adhhere to the rules properly. The legalistic language in the rules is extremely difficult, and it would be better if it were not quite so complicated. However, I see no alternative to the way in which the rules have been drafted. As my hon. and learned Friend the Minister said, they are merely the codification of best practice. They are not a couple of hundred pages of legislation or brand new rules to which people must adhere, but a catalogue of what they should be doing already, coupled with some extra requirements to ensure that they fit into the self-regulatory framework.

Other remaining, unavoidable problems are the complicated formulae that are to be found from time to time in the rules, and the procedures through which many people will have to go. Some of the remaining problems are regrettable; happily, they are open to review in the future. One of them is the abolition of the requirement for professional indemnity insurance. I understand why that has been removed and many small businesses will be happy that that requirement has gone, because it reduces an extra cost for smaller businesses. I fully recognise that it has been replaced by the compensation scheme, which I believe is one of the most hopeful aspects of the legislation. It represents genuine investor protection. The fact that an investor is guaranteed his losses up to £48,000 out of £50,000 is a comfort that many investors wish had existed in the past.

I regret the fact that the registration of individuals under the SIB's draft rules will not extend to those who deal with the public but do not have management authority. The registration of individuals, which is limited to principals, directors and partners, has not gone far enough. Many people deal directly with the public and they, too, should be registered and their qualifications for doing their jobs should be open to scrutiny.

There could be stronger inspection and suspension regulations in cases in which those who inspect the finances of an organisation are not yet satisfied. I further regret the fact that foreign-owned branches are still not being properly controlled. They could still avoid full scrutiny. They should be required to deposit an amount equal to that required in the financial resource rules with a bank in the United Kingdom to make sure that there is no possibility of their failing to meet the requirements that they would have to meet were they part of a wholly United Kingdom group. However, I am sure that experience during the months and years ahead will show whether the rules must be tightened in that regard.

I also regret that cold calling is still allowed in its present form and has been extended in some respects. I do not like cold calling when it is practised on me. It is an extremely annoying intrusion, especially when done by telephone. However, it is a well-established principle. Those in the investment industry who use cold calling have persuaded my hon. and learned Friend that the practice is necessary and not especially harmful and that through its use many who would not have been able to benefit from investment and savings have been able to enjoy the advantages of so doing. Therefore, I can understand why the rules are as they are. Against this background, I hope that there will be regular scrutiny of the experience of investors, of the industry and of the public generally over the months and years ahead. If rules need to be tightened, I hope that the process will be put in hand quickly and effectively. When a new form of investment is created or when a new investment practice is conceived, I hope that the changes that flow from these developments will be carried out quickly and effectively so that loopholes are not allowed to continue for too long.

There are certain regulations that I consider to be too harsh. I understand, however, that it is extremely difficult to get anything right in legislation of the sort that we are considering. It is clear that one is open to subjective judgment.

Many small firms may find themselves defined as category 4 firms and therefore required to produce a minimum liquidity requirement that is more suited to that of a larger stockbroking firm. This will be unfortunate, but I am sure that the problem can be dealt with in time.

I welcome the strong stand on polarisation that has been taken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and by my hon. and learned Friend. I would hate the message to go from the Chamber to the other place that we do not feel firmly and strongly that we are introducing investor protection and not investment business protection. That is the basic principle and the pivot of the Act. We believe that the public should know with whom they are dealing and what they are buying. They should understand what they will get for their money and the risks that are involved in getting it, and any confusion of these principles must be eradicated by this measure. Many hon. Members have supported the principle of polarisation even though they have been subject to extremely strong lobbying and even though the basic Conservative philosophy would be to leave that which has been successful and which has not been proved to be abusive to continue as it is. In this instance we can see that the public need to be protected, and I am pleased that the banks in different ways are adjusting to their task. I do not see the likelihood of a strong battle for polarisation to be reversed, and I hope that wisdom will prevail in another place. I am sure that it will.

The message from this Chamber is that what has been achieved on polarisation is for the benefit of the general public. It is not every piece of legislation that is so clear in its objectives.

I welcome also the reduced costs for small firms. The Act was not intended to drum out of business the sole trader, and that should not have been its objective. That would have been anti-competitive and grossly unfair. It does not follow that a person who happens to work in a large firm is competent and that someone who works for himself is incompetent. However, if small traders in the investment world do not have the resources that are necessary to carry on with their business, they should not be in business. It is strange that many stockbrokers carp at the amount of capital that they are required to have to survive, yet would never consider the flotation of shares in another business unless it were vastly bigger. Businesses must have sufficient capital to be able to survive and sufficient liquidity and solvency to enable them to carry out their work effectively.

On the other hand, there is no need for unnecessary costs that lead successful individuals towards insolvency. The reduction of costs that we have seen during the formulation of the draft rules by the SIB, the reduction of costs for those not handling clients' money and the withdrawing of the insistence on professional indemnity — although I hope that many firms will take that up voluntarily — is a constructive step in helping small businesses.

When Opposition Members read the report of this debate in Hansard—they are certainly not here to listen to it — I hope that they will understand that we have arrived at the right framework for investment protection. The Securities Exchange Commission in America has said repeatedly that if it were to begin again it would choose the framework which my hon. and learned Friend has ferried so successfully through Parliament, in a measure that has been amended as a result of detailed consideration and consultation with all interested parties and right hon. and hon. Members. This is exactly the right framework, as it produces effective and qualified people to regulate those in investment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I have given the hon. Gentleman much licence because of the technical nature of the matters with which we are dealing, but I remind him that we are not dealing with a Bill or an Act. We are dealing with a very limited order, which seems to have little to do with the point he is raising.

Mr. Hanley: I am most grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If I may continue with my conclusion, I hope that you will forgive me for the enthusiasm of my speech because I have been unable before now to speak at length on this matter.

Given the powers which have been granted to the SIB, and the fact that a child has now been born, I congratulate all of those concerned and say that this is the right framework. I am merely responding to points made by Opposition Members earlier. As long as this framework is shown to be flexible, it will serve extremely well not only the nation but those in the investment world.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Like all my hon. Friends, I welcome this delegation order. I wish the greatest of good fortune to the SIB in the marathon task it has been given by this legislation. I utter the tiniest word of caution, following what was said earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames), who requested the Minister to—if I can paraphrase him—hasten slowly on the basis that we had better get it right rather than get it fast. It is difficult to disagree with that sentiment, but I remind the Minister that we are substantially behind the timetable upon which we embarked after the Second Reading of the Bill some 18 months ago when, although no specific date was given, the hope was expressed that it would be operational by the middle of 1987. That cannot now be the case.

While I endorse the statement that we have to get it right, I hope the Minister will take on board that with the acceptance of this delegation order there should be a continuing sense of urgency. I put it no stronger than that. The rules of the SIB, which are now available to us, are opaque and complicated, but it is little short of a miracle that we have been able to produce in a relatively short time rules which had to be started from scratch. The rules are changed slightly from those proposed originally. Whether the Financil Services Act is seen as a protection for the investing public or a vehicle for regulating practitioners, there can be no question that the rules of the SIB are the test of the effectiveness of the new system.

For that reason I express some concern that professional indemnity cover—a point referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley)—is no longer a requirement under the SIB rules. I have long taken the view that the existence of professional indemnity is of benefit to both the public and the intermediaries. I feel a sense of loss that this requirement is no longer part of the SIB rules.

I recognise that professional indemnity cover must be paid for and some intermediaries will shed few tears over the fact that they are no longer required to effect it. But that is a rather short-sighted view. Here I should declare an interest, which I have declared on the many occasions that I have addressed the House on this subject, in that I am parliamentary adviser to the British Insurance Brokers Association, a trade association of some 4,000 member firms, of which approximately 3,000 could be categorised as small brokers. Yet there is no doubt that the BIBA is full of regret that the previous requirement for professional indemnity cover is no longer part of the SIB rules.

Some people will say that the compensation fund is sufficient. But I would venture to question whether that is so. Let me pursue separately the two points of the cost to small intermediaries, in particular, and the fact that having a compensation fund makes it less necessary for us to have professional indemnity cover as a requirement.

Many small intermediaries will contend that professional indemnity cover will be too costly at a time when many people are calling, successfully, it would seem, for a reduction in the costs to the small intermediary in particular. That overlooks the fact that the existence of a professional indemnity policy can sometimes represent the difference between a company staying in business and being sued out of existence. There may well be a powerful argument, particularly for small intermediaries, for requiring professional indemnity cover.

From the investor's point of view, even if the company with which the investor entrusts his savings were to act fraudulently, professional indemnity underwriters have shown over the years that they will pay up in such circumstances, enabling——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I may not fully understand these matters, but I find it difficult to understand what this has to do with the delegation of the Secretary of State's responsibilities to this new body. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will tell me to which part of the orders his remarks relate.

Mr. McCrindle: If you are telling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that it is out of order to refer to the SIB rule book, which is part and parcel of the Secretary of State's decision to introduce the order, clearly I have wasted my time in waiting for the past four hours to be called. However, I respectfully suggest that that delegation——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am at the hon. Gentleman's feet in these matters. If he honestly assures me that these are relevant matters, I shall accept his word.

Mr. McCrindle: My powers of persuasion are clearly greater than I had expected. I was ready to make the case more extensively, but the fact that I am now permitted to continue will enable me, to your pleasure, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to that of the House, to restrict my remarks to a shorter period than might have seemed necessary a few moments ago.

In the event of a professional indemnity policy being in existence, even if there is an element of fraud, underwriters have shown over the years that they will pay up, thereby enabling the excess above the compensation fund limit to be recovered. That is clearly in the interests of investor protection.

That brings me in turn to the compensation fund, which, again, is very much part of the rule book to which I have taken the liberty to refer. I welcome the existence of a compensation fund, but £48,000, although it sounds a good deal, is not a vast sum in 1987. Besides, if there is no professional indemnity protection, more claims are likely to be lodged against that compensation fund.

If my prediction in that respect is correct, this welcome compensation fund may soon come under some strain. I do not know why, if professional indemnity were thought necessary by the SIB before, it is not considered necessary now. I cannot understand why all mention of it is now absent and I cannot understand what has changed to persuade the SIB that it is no longer necessary.

But again, thinking in terms of the SIB rule book and the effect that that would have on not only that institution but the self-regulatory organisations to which the Minister referred, if the SIB intimates that it no longer requires professional indemnity insurance, it follows that it will be acutely difficult for any of the SROs to require professional indemnity cover under their rules.

FIMBRA, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) referred, clearly intended, and still intends, to require professional indemnity to be affected, but there is no way that I can see that that requirement could be maintained if the SIB withdrew from its earlier suggestion that it should be effected.

Let me point out to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister the effect on the Insurance Brokers Registration Council, a body that arguably runs in parallel in investor protection with the SIB. Since 1980, professional indemnity cover has been required before an intermediary can register as an insurance broker under the legislation. Part of the requirement to enable an intermediary to do so is the possession of a professional indemnity policy. If the SIB drops the requirement, what will be the effect? I venture to suggest that a great many companies involved in non-life assurance business would be inclined to deregister. What price consumer protection then?

Let me try to summarise the case. In my view, professional indemnity insurance has, and must have, a place in any total regulatory regime. As with the Insurance Brokers Registration Council, it must be viewed in conjuction with capital adequacy rules and a compensation fund. Without a professional indemnity requirement, a gap, through which consumer protection may be lost, still exists.

I accept that professional indemnity insurance has a cost attached to it. However, I would argue that the cost is borne by the firm of intermediaries, and will bear a direct relation to the claims record of that firm. I raise that point to underline that, if there is no record of fraud or negligence, the cost in many cases will be quite reasonable. That compares equitably with the proposed compensation fund, where the cost will be borne by every firm other than the one that has caused the problem. Secondly, the amount of contribution to a compensation fund required, and thus the costs incurred, will increase if PI insurance is not required, and the cost of PI may therefore not outweigh the increased cost of contribution to a compensation fund.

I apologise for having concentrated almost exclusively on what may seem to many to be a narrow point. I hope that, if I have done nothing else, I have at least underlined to the House the importance that I attach to it, as do a great many other people. I hope that a message will go out from the House that, while welcoming the SIB, supporting the delegation order and wishing that body the best of good fortune, we feel that there would be some advantage in reconsidering its decision to drop its previous requirement that PI cover should be effected.

9.42 pm

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): When we started out on the Financial Services Bill, I think that all of us on the Standing Committee, whatever our party, had certain specific objectives. One was to ensure, first and foremost, that investors were properly protected. The second was to establish a fair market in which there was a level playing field, and in which all the players were at least as equal as we could make them. Our third objective was that regulation should be achieved at reasonable cost, and that it should be flexible in itself. Our final objective was that any form of regulation that we proposed should not impede the proper development of the market, and its future expansion for the prosperity of the nation as a whole.

However, we perhaps little realised when we embarked upon the legislation the extraordinary pressures that would be brought to bear on us from all sectors and all sides of the market, and the learning process that many of us would have to go through. I pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for having achieved these objectives and for the extraordinarily flexible way in which he has dealt with the problems. We are all greatly in his debt regarding the activities to date of the Securities and Investments Board.

As for flexibility, it is essential that the market should be allowed to develop new products and to deal with new products. It would be tragic if today we created a precedent that set the SIB rules in tablets of stone for all time. That is not our intention, nor is it the intention of the SIB. It is important that the message should go out that all hon. Members regard the development of a prosperous and thriving market as vital and that it should be possible to incorporate future developments.

I am particularly interested in the development of a unitised property market. I hope that it will be possible to accommodate it within the SIB rules and that nothing we do today will impede the development of that or similar markets.

As for the level playing field, it is vital that either old or new products should not have an unfair advantage over other products. Both the current and future regulations should be as fair as possible to companies that offer different products. We have gone a long way down that road. It has been a difficult process and there has been a good deal of controversy. I am not convinced that we have gone as far as we could over the disclosure of expenses on with-profits policies. I understand the difficulties, but I hope that the SIB and the Department will continue to think about the problem and that they will introduce practical proposals.

On cost, I am pleased that it has been possible to reduce the cost of regulation for smaller firms. In the early days of the legislation there were many scare stories in the popular press and in the financial press about cost. It was feared that smaller firms would be driven out of business. Very few people now think that that is so, even though the costs are so high.

One hopes that it will be possible to reduce the costs even further. Nevertheless, there have been developments in the market, and some of the larger elements in the industry have supported some of the smaller elements. I hope that that process will continue so that the establishment of small firms is not inhibited. They can contribute to variety in the market and to the range of advice that can be given to potential investors.

Furthermore, the SIB must be seen to be fair. It must clamp down on abuses, wherever they arise. It is no use passing legislation if people are able to get away with practices that all of us would regard as reprehensible. There has been quite a lot of that in the recent past. We hope that it will not arise in the future.

We should all support the actions of the SIB and the SROs in policing this legislation. I hope that none of us will be backward in supporting those actions as and when necessary. I have been pleased to see the firm line that the SIB has taken on polarisation. That was the first big test of the resolve of the SIB and of this House in the face of immense pressure from the big battalions of the banks and building societies, who wanted to be a case apart.

The banks said that the friendly neighbourhood bank manger was able to speak to his clients quite differently from the way sharp insurance salemen would talk to their so-called clients. The banks are thrusting, aggressive commercial organisations and are quite different from the friendly old banks that we were used to in the past, and the new market players are also quite different.

[Mr. John Butterfill]

Today's bank managers are motivated to achieve results for a financial conglomorate. Sadly but truly, they cannot be relied upon to be totally impartial because the pressures on them are far too great. It is right that they should be subject to exactly the same rules as everybody else in this market. There can be no exceptions. They must decide whether they can give impartial advice to the public or sell their own products. The two are not compatible and cannot be conjoined.

The message should go out from this place to another place and elsewhere that we will not be moved. Despite all the insinuations that we will be moved, polarisation is an essential part of these proposals and cannot be removed without destroying the legislation that we have strived so hard to put into place.

9.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Michael Howard): This has been a most interesting debate, characterised by thoughtful and constructive contributions from my hon. Friends which has marked this legislation from the outset. I say that not in any sense of undue controversy in relation to the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook). I am grateful for the kind remarks of my hon. Friends, and I pay tribute to the part played by my hon. Friends in Committee in the formulation of this legislation.

The hon. Member for Livingston suggested that if we were starting again we would do it differently. I reject that assertion unhesitatingly and unqualifiedly. That suggestion springs from a profoundly mistaken view which the hon. Gentleman and some of his hon. Friends have held, or pretended to hold, about the legislation from its commencement — that it is a soft option or halfway house between statutory regulation, which they purport to see as tough and fierce, and unmitagated self-regulation, which they rightly see as being more of an easy option.

This legislation was not put on the statute book as an easy or soft option. It was formulated in the way in which it was because it represents the most effective way of regulating financial markets, and it incorporates a flexibility and an ability to respond quickly to developments in the market place which a fully statutory system would not have done.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): Is the Minister saying that, if he could transport himself back two years and drafted the Bill afresh, he would still say nothing in that Bill about the Takeover Panel?

Mr. Howard: Unhesitatingly. The Takeover Panel is under review. We may before too long learn more about improvements which can be made in the operation of the Takeover Panel. But it by no means follows that taking a statutory approach necessarily improves the way in which the provisions regulate the markets with which they are concerned.

The other point about the hon. Gentleman's speech which ties in with this relates to resources. He talked about the resources which are available to the Securities and Exchange Commission in the United States. The SEC has been bedevilled by endemic complaints of lack of resources. Only recently its chairman asked for an increase of a third in his budget. It is absurd to suggest that putting such a body in the public sector would assist in making resources available for it to do its job properly. It is another of the fundamental misapprehensions which Opposition Members have had about the legislation from the outset.

Mr. McCrindle: Does not my hon. and learned Friend also agree that the point the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) was making was that more resources will find more fraud? In fact, in the Boesky case it was a tip-off to Merrill Lynch that brought about the disclosures. No amount of money in the SEC would have opened up that can of worms.

Mr. Howard: I prefer not to comment on individual cases, tempting though it is, but the point underlying my hon. Friend's intervention is undoubtedly valid.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) urged caution about the timetable and raised issues which he said are not yet fully resolved. In answering him, I would very much pray in aid the observations of my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle), who rightly pointed to the need to get the system in being as soon as we can. I am not sure that there has been a slippage. I think the phrase we used when the legislation was under consideration was that we hoped to get the system in place in the second half of this year. We now say by the end of the year; that comes within the second half of the year. I hope that the main provisions will be in place by then.

We must be on our guard against falling into the trap of allowing the best to become the enemy of the good. It is important that the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley should be resolved, and I am confident that they will be. We must try to get them right. But ordinary savers and ordinary investors should have the right to compensation if they lose money because of someone's misconduct, and they should have that right as soon as possible. That is an important factor to be borne in mind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Nelson) raised several points springing from the deep concern which he has displayed on the legislation from the outset and from the important part which he has played in shaping it. He asked why a number of functions have not been transferred. I hesitate to say this, but there may have been a tinge of misunderstanding at the bottom of the points which he raised because the powers to which he referred will be transferred in nearly all cases.

The limitations on their transfer are narrow and somewhat technical. For example, the power to withdraw the authorisation to which he referred is reserved to the Secretary of State only when the grounds for doing so are a contravention of a reciprocity notice issued by the Secretary of State. The power to issue reprimands is reserved only when misconduct relates to business at Lloyd's because of the separate arrangements being made for regulating Lloyd's. The power to seek injunctions is reserved only when the contravention in question is a contravention of the provisions on the promotion of foreign insurance contracts. I hope that those observations will reassure my hon. Friend about the concern which he expressed.

My hon. Friend also asked why some matters were still concurrent in relation to the SIB and the Secretary of State. That is of importance in the early stages of the system while the SIB begins the task of exercising its powers, and not necessarily something which is to be regarded as a permanent feature of the system. We do not anticipate that it will lead to problems about who should take the lead in the specific difficulties to which my hon. Friend referred. There will be close co-operation between the Secretary of State and the SIB on these matters, and I suspect that in practice it will largely depend on to whom the information leading to the action is given. I do not expect this to give rise to any difficulty.

I hope also that, in the light of what I have said, my hon. Friend will acquit us of any half-heartedness in our desire to see the SIB playing its prominent role with the full force and powers which all of us who have been concerned with this legislation have always had in mind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes made a number of points. He referred to foreign-owned businesses. They will of course be subject to the rules, including the financial resources rules, and in appropriate cases where it is necessary to protect investors the SIB will be able to require a business to keep assets in the United Kingdom.

My hon. Friend raised a number of other points on the rules, some of which he said were too harsh and some not harsh enough. One of the great advantages of the system, largely missed by those who keep talking about some other ill-defined system, is that it will have the ability to change its rules with a minimum of legislative formality so long as they comply with the provisions of the statute. The rules are not writ in stone but will develop with time, and I am sure that points such as those raised by my hon. Friend will be taken into account by the SIB when it reviews the matter, as it inevitably will.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar, in particular, referred to the lack of a requirement that there should be indemnity cover. I understand the point my hon. Friend made, but he will, particularly in view of his own experience and intimate knowledge of the industry, understand the importance of balancing against those requirements the need to limit costs. If one takes into account the compensation fund which will be available, it is difficult to find serious fault with the reasoning process which led the SIB to come to the conclusion which it did. Again, this is not necessarily a matter which is writ in stone; it is a matter in relation to which it is possible for the system to develop. But one can readily see the reasoning process which led the SIB to its conclusion.

My hon. Friend the Member Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) pursued some matters which he originally raised in Standing Committee. He played his part in ensuring that some of those concerns were fully taken into account in the rules and in the process of evolution. I am sure that he will welcome the study that has been set up by the SIB into the degree of information which can be made available, in particular in relation to endowment insurance policies.

I have already emphasised that these orders are but one step in the process of implementing the framework envisaged by the Financial Services Act 1986. Once the orders are approved and made, the way will be clear for the SIB to recognise self-regulating organisations — assuming of course that they meet the criteria set down in the Act. Those recognised SROs will then need to consider the applications of thousands of businessess, which will be seeking authorisation. The SIB, for its part, will need to process applications for direct authorisation.

Both the SIB and the SROs will be building up their staffs to cope with the requirements of day-to-day regulation. This cannot be done overnight. Indeed, it would be idle to suppose that an entirely new system of regulation which was both effective and balanced could be introduced with the stroke of a pen. But I have no doubt that all these matters will be resolved as quickly as possible. Investors have a right to expect an adequate level of protection. That is why we passed the Financial Services Act. Investors naturally wish the Act's provisions to be introduced as quickly as possible. That is why we have forged ahead with these orders. The SIB has shown itself alive to the requirements of the new requirements of the new system and determined that the United Kingdom will be, and will be seen to be, a "clean" place in which to do investment business. That is why I ask the House to approve the draft orders.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Financial Services Act 1986 (Delegation) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 22nd April 1987, be approved.

Resolved,

That the draft Finacial Services (Transfer of Functions Relating to Friendly Societies) Order (Northern Ireland) 1987, which was laid before this House on 22nd April, be approved.

PETITION

South Park Primary School, Ilford

10.5 pm

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): It is my honour to present a petition that includes over 400 names of parents of pupils at the South Park primary school, Ilford.

The Petition showeth

That their children are at risk by virtue of their inability to cross the road outside the school without having to move between parked motor vehicles, in that the zig-zag, no parking, school lines are advisory and not mandatory.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your honourable House will urge the Government to make the said signs mandatory as soon as possible.

It is a special pleasure to present this petition, not only because the school is an excellent one with a splendid headmaster, Mr. Drew, and a dedicated staff, but because it is where I started my full-time education. The petitioners hope that the Government will take note of the petition for the benefit of pupils in schools throughout the country. I am indebted to Mrs. Janet Smyth of Tavistock gardens, Mr. David Peacock of Brixham gardens and Mrs. Jean Jones of Breamore road, Seven Kings, for their splendid efforts in bringing forward this petition, of which I hope the Government will take due note.

To lie upon the Table.

Mentally Handicapped Persons (Mid-Kent)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

10.6 pm

Sir John Wells (Maidstone): In recent years there has been a great movement endeavouring to get people with mental disabilities out of the Victorian institutions in which they have been incarcerated back into the community, or, in the case of some older people, into the community for the first time. They may have been incarcerated in those large Victorian asylums for their entire lives. Those asylums are all over the country and are being closed. They seem ghastly and grim to ordinary people. Therefore, those closures are generally welcome. But we must remember that much good and dedicated work has been done in those places over the years and, in looking forward to their closure, we must not forget their past good work.

Tonight I want to talk about Leybourne Grange in Mid-Kent, whose position is completely different, as it is not a great Victorian monstrosity. The hospital is based in a house that was given in the 1930s by its owner for the welfare of those with mental disabilities. Some 27 houses and bungalows have been built since then in the extremely pleasant grounds of about 150 acres. It has farm, horticultural, workshop and other training facilities, including a school which is widely used by those with mentally disabled people from outside the hospital area.

Leybourne has been the happy home for many children, many of them well advanced in life. This excellent establishment was formerly run by the Kent county council and since reorganisation by the Department of Health and Social Security. It has a capacity for some 1,500 patients, of which only some 600 places are currently being used because of the rundown. Leybourne is now threatened with closure. I received a courteous and helpful letter from the chairman of the Tunbridge Wells health authority which administers it. It is curious that the hospital is not within the Tunbridge Wells health authority area. It is an offshore hospital, for want of a better description. Therefore, perhaps the health authority does not have quite the affection for it that we have in my part of Kent. It is not in my constituency but a few hundred yards outside. However, the whole of Mid-Kent is within its catchment area. It is important to my community in Maidstone and it is important to my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) who has spoken to me about this but is, unfortunately, unable to be with us.

With the threatened closure, parents and families of the patients—some of the parents are dead—are concerned for the future. Leybourne Grange has attracted great loyalty from the parents and many of them have urged me to sign early-day motions 424 and 425, which to date have 113 and 109 signatures respectively. I do not hold early-day motions in high esteem; they are a pretty useless part of our procedure. However, the fact that those two have achieved such a high number of signatures shows the genuine anxiety that there is on both sides of the House about the sweeping move to change the system without going into greater depth about the needs of the patients. I think that it is well worth my right hon. Friend the Minister considering those early-day motions.

My purpose in raising this with my right hon. Friend is to re-examine the working of the policy of care in the community. I have seen for myself some of the excellent work being done by the Maidstone district health authority in placing patients in the community. In general, I am a supporter of the principles outlined in Cmnd. 4683 about community care. However, its ideals are not suitable for each and every case.

We know that the system has worked well for many years in Holland, but there have been disastrous results when this sort of system has been applied in the United States and Italy. One must also remember the unhappy attitude of the property owners in properties adjacent to those where the health authority seeks to set up small homes. It is the awful "not near me" syndrome which is all too prevalent. That point is made strongly in the excellent notes that have been produced by the parents of the Leybourne Grange patients.

In one village in my constituency there are several residents clamouring about the fact that people from institutions should not be put near them. Yet, there are parents of a Leybourne child living a few houses away who are most anxious that their child should stay in Leybourne. Therefore, it seems that there is a great contradiction and muddle in the thinking of ordinary members in the community.

I want to urge my right hon. Friend to consider the fact that, if Leybourne is to be closed, the needs of each patient should be considered individually, carefully and fully. Those who can benefit from a return to the community should be so returned. However, let there be a modern pleasant alternative, a new Leybourne, for those patients for whom a caring, quality institution is still needed. I believe that that new village community might well be established at the very place where the present hospital is situated. There is no tradition of grimness. Indeed, it is a most excellent place.

I would now like to turn to the notes that have been produced by the parents of the Leybourne children. They make the point that the children are much happier in a stable community, and we all know that. If they are living in Leybourne or in a new Leybourne, rather than being shuffled from small hostel to small hostel, they will be happy. In small units, one is unlikely to achieve the continuity of care that is possible in Leybourne.

I am most concerned, too, that if the children are driven out into the community, the community will be unable to cope. I question whether the county councils' social services — I am talking on a broader national basis, because I believe that Kent county council runs a pretty tight ship and is pretty efficient and very caring—will be able to cope with the extra burden that will be placed upon them. I do not think that they are geared to it at all. I want to draw attention to this as a national problem and I urge my hon. Friend the Minister for Health to get better liaison going between county council social services and the Department of Health and Social Security. After all, if the sites are to be sold—Leybourne is a valuable site — the cash will flow into the Health Service regions rather than into the county councils, which will have to foot the bill for looking after the patients. I fear lest some less caring county council drive some of the patients into bed and breakfast or similar accommodation, which would be deplorable.

I mentioned my hon. Friend the Member for Medway because many of her constituents are patients in Leybourne, and she takes a great interest in the well-being of the institution. My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam)—who is unable to be here tonight, for obvious reasons — also shares my concern about the relationship between county councils and the DHSS. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to do something at a national level to put our minds at rest.

As I have said, Leybourne is no Victorian monstrosity. It has always been a centre of caring excellence. The staff have always been superb, and it is not surprising that their morale is temporarily rather low because of the uncertainties that they face. I believe that if we could create a community village on the Leybourne site—if my hon. Friend could persuade the Tunbridge Wells health authority to take that path—we would have many much happier parents and the children in Leybourne and in our part of Kent would continue to be happy. Therefore, I ask my hon. Friend for his help tonight.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Tony Newton): I congratulate—rather more than is the convention—my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir J. Wells) on his success in securing the debate. I know from the correspondence that Health Ministers—not only me but many others before me—have received from him on this subject that it is very close to his heart. He has pursued it on many occasions as a Member of this House.

I join him in recognising the equally active concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner). Both my hon. Friends assiduously pursue the interests of their constituents. Having been Minister with responsibility for the disabled for some time, I also know of the long-standing interest shown by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) which is well known to the House.

I shall address some of the anxieties expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone about the implementation of community care policy throughout the country before dealing with Leybourne Grange. I should like to refer in particular to the co-ordination between health authorities and social services departments that is required.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his generally supportive expressions about the generality of community care policy and the objectives that are being pursued. That would put my hon. Friend very much in line with, perhaps not all opinion, but the overwhelming majority of opinion about the way in which these developments have been moving and the way in which the Government have encouraged them to move. I recognise that the co-ordination to which my hon. Friend referred is a vital part of a successful change from institutional care to care in the community and that it has not been achieved to perfection in every part of the country. I share my hon. Friend's view that the Kent health authorities and the Kent social services department generally have a good record in working together in these matters, and I am sure that they are grateful for what my hon. Friend said.

I hope that my hon. Friend recognises that those same flattering observations could be made of numbers of other health authorities and social services departments. I recognise that in some places this co-ordination does not yet work as well as we would like. We are giving it a good deal of attention and have sought to encourage it by various changes, including the improvement in the so-called joint finance arrangements, which have been made over the past few years.

The deputy chairman of the NHS management board, Sir Roy Griffiths — my deputy — has been asked to undertake a 12-month review of community care and to advise on options that would contribute to making it more effective, to ensuring that we get value for money from the very large sums that are spent, and to ensuring that the policies are properly targeted and are as effective as they can be. I am sure that he will wish to take account of my hon. Friend's observations when carrying through that work.

The Tunbridge Wells health authority envisages the closure of Leybourne Grange by 1994-95 as local services in the community are fully developed. That was stated in the authority's strategic plan, and that plan is consistent with Government policy. I assure my hon. Friend that the needs of the residents of Leybourne Grange will dictate the time scale for reducing the number of patients and for the eventual planned closure of the hospital. The South East Thames regional health authority has set up a co-ordinating group of health and local authority officers who are drawing together all the district plans for the placement in the community of their residents at the hospital. That co-ordinating group is also establishing service development policies, personnel policies and resettlement policies relating to the hospital and drawing on the wealth of experience gained by a similar group which planned the community care of patients who were at the Darenth Park hospital, with which my hon. Friend will be familiar.

Administrative systems such as those to which I have referred are necessary to achieve effective co-ordination, but we fully recognise that, however much co-ordination there is, there can be legitimate concerns in the minds of the families of mentally handicapped people when the possibility arises of their son, daughter or relative transferring from a hospital, which may have been his or her home for many years, to the community. I am conscious that, because of some of those concerns, the Save Leybourne Grange Association has been campaigning against the planned closure of the hospital.

I am glad to say that the chairman of the Tunbridge Wells health authority and its general manager have met the association's chairman to discuss its concerns. I emphasise that, in the Government's policy and in my personal view, no one should be discharged without the prior development of community-based services and careful consideration of the future needs of each individual. In general in mid-Kent the health authorities and Kent social services department have been working together closely and effectively to develop a range of community provision for mentally handicapped people. I shall give one or two instances.

The Medway health authority and local social services operate a community living project using premises at Leybourne Grange to prepare individual residents to make the transition between an institutionalised model of care and the community model of care that the project provides in its staffed houses. So far that project has resettled 32 residents from Leybourne Grange into the community and it plans to resettle a further 20 people each year.

Maidstone health authority, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone paid tribute, in which I would wish to join, and the local social services run the Maidstone community care project. That has resettled into the community 39 residents from Lenham hospital which, as my hon. Friend will be aware, is another hospital for mentally handicapped people in Mid-Kent, and the authority plans to resettle a further 36 people. It hopes to resettle successfully into the community 75 residents of Leybourne Grange between 1987 and 1991. I am glad to say that the build-up of community services also involves, and it is important that it should, the voluntary organisations. In Maidstone, for example, MENCAP is actively involved in consultation and joint development plans for setting up a health authority project for mentally handicapped people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone and I have mentioned the need to give careful consideration to the future of each resident. That should involve not only the professionals who are responsible for the individual's care but also the parents and the mentally handicapped person wherever possible. Individual assesments are essential— I want to underline this again — because of the individual's specific needs, the wide range and type of community provision, the experience of professional staff and the views and needs of close relatives. All those matters need to be taken into account. I am glad to say that we have been assured that that careful and individual consideration will continue to take place before any resident is discharged from Leybourne Grange hospital.

I understand that the Save Leybourne Grange Association has recently suggested to the South-East Thames health authority that the hospital should be retained to provide a more local service to mentally handicapped people from Maidstone and the Medway towns only, rather than as at present to all health districts in Kent. My hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone made a suggestion which I understand is associated quite closely with that thought. That is primarily something to be considered by the health authorities concerned, since they have the statutory responsibility for the provision of services. I understand that the association can expect a reply on its suggestions shortly. I will undertake to ask that the health authorities' attention should be drawn to the remarks that my hon. Friend has made so that they can be taken into account in its considerations.

My hon. Friend mentioned staff. I would wish to echo what he said about the tremendous work that we can all too easily forget has been done by the staff of these large residential institutions over the years in caring for the people in their charge. The change of policy is no criticism of the efforts that so many of them have made to providing care, but rather a change in the perception of how the care should be provided in the long-term interests of the patients.

It is important that we should have in mind the needs and interests of the staff when we are making these changes. I know that, with regard to Leybourne Grange, a co-ordinated personnel policy is being worked out which will give staff full opportunities for employment in those districts which are receiving patients. That will include the early interview of staff and, in some cases, protection of salary and conditions of service. The personnel policies will be based on those that were introduced and are successively operating for staff at Darenth Park hospital.

I hope that in some of what I have said tonight I have been able to reflect, if not allay, the concerns that my hon. Friend expressed and to show that I agree with him on the essential need for individual assessment and the importance of improving co-ordination between the different authorities involved in those areas where it does not work as well as I am glad to say it does in Kent.

I hope that I have said enough to make it clear that the move to community care is not, in any sense, a careless or thoughtless policy. It is a policy that needs the careful planning that has been mentioned time and again in the course of this short debate; and it needs the individual assessment that I have emphasised.

When concerns of this kind are expressed, I never tire of saying to people that we do not regard community care as a cheap option. We do not want to hear it described —let alone describe it ourselves—in terms of decanting people from old institutions into some new environment. In the long run, it is a better way of providing individual care for people who need the care of the community, because we believe that that can best be provided in the community. I am certain that the policy, if properly implemented as we want it to be, will be better for many of what is becoming an earlier generation, who have spent too long in the older institutions. It is certain that it could, should and will provide in due course a much better future for new generations of people who may need our help than could have been provided in the past.

The task is a difficult one, not yet always achieved with perfection, but I hope that, through my hon. Friend's speech and his dedicated work for this cause, we have the opportunity to contribute to ensuring that in future progress is even better than it has been in the past.

Question put and agreed to.

House of Commons

Friday 8 May 1987

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Rates (Ealing)

9.34 am

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I beg to ask leave to present a petition to

The honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The humble petition of the Greenford Residential Group for the Environment, showeth

That Ealing Council is demanding an extravagant increase in rates from the residents of Greenford, and the rest of the borough of Ealing to which we object most strongly.

The petition is signed by a large number of residents especially from the Greenford area. It stands in the name of Mr. N. D. Keating and Mrs. C. A. Keating, chairman and secretary respectively of the Greenford Residential Group for the Environment. They are protesting most vigorously with thousands of other signatories against the horrendous, hideous and totally unjustified rate increase by Ealing Labour council of 65 per cent. for domestic ratepayers and 57·3 per cent. for industrialists.

Domestic ratepayers are finding it extremely difficult, and many find it impossible, to pay the horrendous increase. The increase in industrial rates is expected to threaten jobs, has already caused people to lose jobs and will increase prices.

As I have said, there are thousands of signatories.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will do everything in its power to help us in our protest against this outrageous rates increase.

And your Petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Speaker: It would be for the convenience of the House if the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) presented his second petition now.

Residential Development (Northolt)

9.36 am

Mr. Greenway: I have the honour to present a second petition.

To the Honourable the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled.

The humble petition of the Northolt Village Residents Association, showeth:

(1) That we wish to register the strongest possible objections to the proposal for change of use of the 'Sadia' site in Rowdell Road, Northolt, to incorporate a housing and non-industrial development; which includes a mosque.

(2) That we believe that the proposal, and the circumstances under which the London Borough of Ealing purchased the land and intend to dispose of it need full, frank and public discussion and a public inquiry.

The petition is in the name of the chairman of the Northolt Village residents association, Mr. Harry Hellier, the vice-chairman, Mr. Adams, the hon. secretary, Mrs. Carole Adams, and the treasurer, Mr. Douglas Greatorex, and many thousands of signatories. The petition concerns the proposal of Ealing council to sell an industrial site which has always been a site for jobs and industry to a group which proposes to change its use, build a mosque and residential housing in the middle of the industrial estate. That will add greatly to the traffic difficulties in an already congested area and to the difficulty of residents with jobs on the site. The site is an industrial site and not a residential site. It has never been a residential site. There are strong objections about the proposal and local people have not been consulted by Ealing council.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will support our demand that Ealing Council immediately set in motion the procedures to hold a full public inquiry to review the purchase, disposal and future use of the site along the lines of the public meeting that I called, attended by 500 people.

And your Petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Retirement Age

9.38 am

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): I am pleased to present the petition from citizens of Leicester, other local residents and the officers and members of the pensions and retirement care campaign concerning the state pension eligibility for men.

At present women may retire at the age of 60 on state pension and men may only do that at the age of 65. While some hon. Members and others are fit, willing and anxious to remain at work into their 70s and 80s, too many people who are desperate for a dignified and decent retirement at 60 are forced to stay at work until they are 65 and to retain jobs that others who are unemployed are desperate to have. I pay my special tribute to the Leicestershire union of mineworkers and its leader, Mr. Jack Jones, for collecting so many of the signatures, of which there are over 500.

The petition is from the citizens of Leicester and other local residents.

It sheweth that the present State Pension Eligibility Age for men is 65 years and that this is discriminatory to the extent that women are elibible at age 60, although they may work to age 65.

Wherefore your Petitioners Pray that your Honourable House will urge the Government to ensure the taking of immediate steps to establish a Voluntary Retirement Age of 60 for both Men and Women.

The petition is presented in the light of a petition of over 1 million signatures, of which this is the first stage, and a predecessor of which I had the honour to present some years ago, and in the light of the totally unacceptable and wretched level of unemployment of Leicester and throughout the country.

To lie upon the Table.

Orders of the Day

Licensing (Amendment) Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

Clause 1

VARIATION ORDERS ETC.

9.41 am

Mr. Speaker: I call Sir Bernard Braine to speak to his amendment No. 1.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): May I seek your guidance, Mr. Speaker? When the House adjourned last Friday, I was speaking to amendment No. 1, but also to amendment No. 13. The two are interlinked in such a way that you recognised that there should be one debate. Therefore, I hope that you will allow me to pursue the argument on which I embarked, because of the inter-relationship of the two amendments.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. I did not make it clear that my selection remains as it was last week, and that with amendment No. 1 we shall take amendment No.13, in page 1, line 22, after '11.30 p.m.' insert 'with a two hour break between the opening hour and closing hour'.

Sir Bernard Braine: I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker. I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 22, leave out '11.30 p.m.' and insert '11 p.m.'.

When the House adjourned last Friday, I was on the point of summing up the case for the two amendments, which is concerned with flexibility and hours of opening. It might help the House if I summarise the beneficial effects of my two amendments on licensees and public houses, and above all in relation to public order, road safety and health.

I have always made it plain that the overwhelming majority of licensees are decent, hard-working people who need some protection from the pressure of the drink industry for ever-increasing consumption and the extended hours in which it can take place. Hon. Members will know from their own experience that the desire for extended opening hours is not universally held by all licensees or by their wives and families.

Two days ago I was delighted to receive, out of the blue, a letter from Mr. Eddie Johnson, landlord of The Crown, a public house in High road, Loughton. I have never met Mr. Johnson, but he gives me permission to read the letter to the House. He says:

"Dear Sir Bernard,

I would like to congratulate you on your stand against any relaxation of the licensing laws.

As a publican of 28 years, I have seen how the erosion of everything we hold dear in this country seems to have been accompanied by an increase in drunken, yobbish behaviour."

Mr. Johnson is making the point that I have made more than once in the House. He continues:

"I enclose a copy of an article that I had published in the Morning Advertiser three years ago. Since then they have put an embargo on any correspondence from me pertaining to the Flexi Laws campaign—indeed one of the features of that newspaper now is that opposition to the measure they say is nil whereas I know that most publicans of my acquaintance are against reform."

In the article, Mr. Johnson made it clear that, in his view, longer and more flexible hours are not needed. He also met head-on the argument that tourists grumble about afternoon closing and argue for later opening. He says:

"Pressure on the Government from the Brewers Society, the Tourist Board and would you believe, the National Union of Licensed Victuallers to allow our pubs to stay open later and longer, is getting stronger. As far as the NULV is concerned, it must be the first time in history a group is supporting an idea that will mean much more work for its members for much less pay. One reason given by the Board is that our licensing laws make tourists stay away and that the laws are silly. Do tourists stay away? London already can't cope with the numbers."

In 1985 report by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry concluded:

"the tourism industry would greatly benefit by a liberalisation of the existing laws. We consider that, both in regard to opening hours, and in provisions for families to take children with them into public houses, a change in the legislation is needed."

But where is the evidence for the claim that the availability of drink is a major determinant of people's choice of holiday location? The Scottish experience provides no such evidence. Between 1979 and 1985, the number of overseas visitors to Scotland increased by 8 per cent. In England and Wales over the same period, the number of foreign tourists increased by 54 per cent.

It is perhaps just possible that the failure of licensed premises to cater for families with children could be a significant factor in persuading British families to holiday abroad, but it is highly unlikely. For there is nothing in our existing law to prevent licensees from setting aside family rooms, provided that the rooms in question do not contain bars. The apparent unwillingness of many licencess or the brewery companies behind them to cater for whole families within the current law surely must be taken as showing a lack of demand for such facilities.

Compared with factors such as the value of the pound and the idiosyncrasies of the British weather, the difficulty of obtaining a drink in a public house at 4 o'clock in the afternoon is surely of minimal significance in deterring foreign tourists from coming to this country. Would American tourists, for example, be deterred from holidaying in this country by a two-hour break in the drinking day? I think not. Indeed, in the United States, alcohol consumption is falling precisely because of greater public awareness of the health risks associated with alcohol. One third of adult Americans are, in fact, teetotal.

In New Zealand, as I said last Friday, the Minister of Justice is being urged by a departmental committee to introduce a period of closure of public houses between 2 pm and 4 pm—in view of what has been happening in the House, this reads strangely—on the ground that it would help public houses in New Zealand achieve the "favourable image" characteristic of English pubs. How ironical, and how sad that at the very moment that our system is prasied and may be copied, the sponsors of this ill-considered Bill are seeking to abandon it in this country. There is no reason to believe that the tourist trade would be damaged by acceptance of amendments Nos. 1 and 13. Indeed, it can be argued that acceptance of the two amendments would help to retain the attractiveness of England and Wales to foreign tourists.

In our previous debates, much of our discussion has focused on road safety. I should like to summarise my views on that as it relates to the two amendments. As my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) pointed out last Friday, the issue between the supporters and the opponents of the Bill is primarily concerned with the facts. I agree with him that, in relation to road safety, the primary issue is the nature of the relationship between the availability of alcohol, and death and injury on the roads, and whether increased availability would be likely to increase the number of alcohol-related deaths and injuries.

Everyone accepts that a definitive answer to those questions is not possible because the statistical information that would decide the matter is not available. It is partly because of the absence of this vital information that the issue between the supporters and the opponents of the Bill is also that of on whom the burden of proof should be made to lie.

That raises an interesting question. It is not for me, as an opponent of the Bill, to prove that, in the absence of the relevant statistics, the Bill is undesirable. It is those who want to change the law who must show beyond any reasonable doubt, that to do so would not be harmful. I say here and now that prima facie there is a danger that increased availability might lead to increased deaths and injuries on our roads.

If that is so, the onus should be on the supporters of the Bill to show that increased availability will not lead to increased harm. Until that is done Parliament should follow the safer course. So far the supporters have not been able to do so. Questions to the Department of Transport have not produced figures to support their argument. It is entirely wrong to argue that the onus is on those who oppose the Bill to show positively that increased availability will lead to increased harm. That argument is utterly unacceptable. If the matter in dispute cannot be conclusively decided one way or the other, Parliament must choose the safer course—which, in this instance, is represented by my two amendments. They would go some way to control the availability of alcohol and would especially help to prevent continuous drinking throughout the day.

Why must we err on the side of caution? Why would continuous drinking hours be likely to increase road traffic accidents? It is clear that the incidence of alcohol-related traffic accidents is already closely related to the hours during which public houses are open. We do not need to look into the crystal when we can consult the book of experience.

I know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister has denied that there is a perceptible relationship between pub opening hours and road accidents. I can only ask him to reconsider the pattern of road accidents by the hour of the day at which they occur. I should like to quote the words of Dr. James Dunbar, director of the Tayside safe driving project, who is one of our country's leading authorities on drinking and driving. Incidentally, I believe that Dr. Dunbar went to the same school and university as my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood. In a telephone conversation on Wednesday night, he told me:

> "There is a significant difference in the times at which alcohol related accidents and non alcoholic accidents occur. Non alcohol accidents peak during the rush hours when people are travelling to and from work. Alcohol related accidents first begin to occur significantly at midday, an hour or so after the pubs open, and then increase steadily through the rest of the day, peaking at between midnight and two o'clock in the morning, after the pubs have closed."

Of course alcohol-related traffic accidents are affected by pub opening hours—to what else would we expect them to be related? At the moment, the peak of alcohol-related traffic accidents occurs late at night. The danger inherent in the Bill's proposal for continuous afternoon drinking is that the peak would then start earlier in the day, during the late afternoon, when schoolchildren and other especially vulnerable road users, such as the elderly, are about.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood argued that extended drinking hours would encourage more leisurely drinking, which in turn would tend to reduce the likelihood of drink-related accidents. Although he cannot offer any proof, that is the basis of his case. I begin to despair, because there is no force in that argument at all. The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) explained last Friday that even small quantities of alcohol impair driving ability and increase accident risk. He was absolutely right. Thus, the possibility of more leisurely drinking hardly matters in this context. Moreover, and as Dr. Dunbar has pointed out, if my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood were correct, we should expect the average blood alcohol level of drink-driving offenders in Scotland to have declined since the introduction of extended opening hours. However, Dr. Dunbar's own research into the question has discovered no such decline. In other words, there is no evidence of lower blood alcohol levels having been brought about in Scotland by extended opening hours.

Dr. Dunbar goes further. Other research that he has carried out has shown that approximately one third of drink-driving offenders, aged 29 and over, are already problem drinkers, who habitually drink to excess. They are not simply unlucky people who have been caught out on a single occasion, possibly when celebrating the enactment of this Bill. They are people who regularly drink to excess before driving. It would be naive in the extreme to believe that people with such a weakness would not take advantage of extended opening hours, and that their doing so would not make them even more dangerous drivers than they are already.

In Dr. Dunbar's experience, an accident that results in death is often an accident that follows all-day drinking. As a Scot living and working in Scotland, he is strongly in favour of a two-hour break in the drinking day precisely to reduce the likelihood of all-day drinking followed by driving, the results of which are all too familiar to him in the mortuary.

Perhaps the supporters of the Bill can now begin to understand the logic and the good sense of the recommendation of the New Zealand ministerial committee, which, believe it or not, has just recommended that there should be an afternoon break in that country, which has never had one. It has recommended that because of the splendid example set and the splendid image created for English and Welsh public houses by our afternoon break over a long period. Is that not ironic?

There is a strong possibility that at least one in every 20 road accident deaths involving innocent children is alcohol-related. Twice as many children and young people are killed every year by an alcohol-related road death than were drowned in the Zeebrugge ferry disaster that has so shocked the nation. The onus is upon those who want to abolish the break to prove that not one child will be harmed by the measure. Magistrates must have the power to act and to protect life by being able to place a break in continuous all-day drinking. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Amendment No.13 would not only have a protective effect with regard to the incidence of drinking and driving; it would also serve to mitigate the worst effects of the Bill in a more general sense. A two-hour break in the drinking day may not seem a great amount of time in relation to a single public house but, in a city with perhaps 1,000 public houses and clubs, the total reduction brought about by amendment No. 13 would be substantial—a maximum of 2,000 fewer drinking hours per day. Such a reduction would certainly help to reduce the harm to public health.

If anyone doubts that the increased availability of alcohol would lead to increased harm, let them explain why the highest incidence of alcohol-related liver disease is found among those occupational groups having the easiest access to alcohol—that is, those who work in the drink industry itself, including publicans and managers of licensed clubs.

More than 10 years ago I was the chairman of the first working party in the United Kingdom to look into the effects of alcohol in the place of work. I was not popular when we published figures showing which trades and professions were most vulnerable to drinking alcohol to excess. I am sorry to say that publicans and their staff headed the list.

The very awareness of the drink trade that its employees are at special risk of experiencing alcohol-related problems has led to numerous drinks companies, to their great credit, to establish special policies on alcohol problems for their employees. These often include measures to reduce the availability of alcohol during working hours. The working party's examination of alcohol in the workplace was followed up by effective action. Guidance from the Health and Safety Executive to the drinks industry published in 1982 stated:

"It is recommended that drinkable alcohol producers should have a clear and written policy aimed at protecting both the health and safety of their employees. The policy could form part of their safety policy under section 2(3) of the Health and Safety at Work Act and might include the following elements:

(a) Control of the availability of alcohol.

(b) Restriction or prohibition of consumption of alcohol on the premises.

(c) Establishment of agreed disciplinary procedures for alcohol abuse."

Amendments Nos. 1 and 13 are based on the truth that the drink trade recognises and applies to its own work force, if not to its customers. The amendments would reduce the overall availability of alcohol in a locality without damaging the principle of flexibility.

I believe that all the expert bodies concerned with health and safety who have expressed an opinion on licensing reform would support the amendments. The dangers of increasing the already huge problem of alcohol misuse are real and are far too great for us to countenance changing the existing law so precipitately in the direction of extended pub opening hours—a step so manifestly in the dark. The least the nation expects of Parliament now or at any time is that we should take the safer course if there is a risk to health and life.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) will forgive me if I do not take up all the important matters he raised. Indeed, during our deliberations we have often discussed the experience in Scotland, and the content of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys' report, and argued that there does not appear to have been an increase in alcohol consumption since that change in the law. Therefore, there does not appear to have been an increase in consumption as a result of increased availability of alcohol. There is not much point in my crossing swords with my right hon. Friend on those matters again.

Amendment No. 1 raised an important matter. The scheme of the Bill provides for licensing justices to pay regard to matters such as nuisance to adjoining residents when deciding the closing hour at night. The Government have made plain their dislike of the scheme of the Bill, not least because of the resource implications. But one is bound to have sympathy for amendment No. 1 because it grapples with a problem with which the House would have to grapple if there were a different scheme of licensing reform and we were, for example, to choose a scheme which allowed individual licensees to decide when they would and would not open.

I am sure that if such a scheme of reform were proposed, the House would discuss anxiously what the final closing hour should be. We would certainly need to have regard to the convenience of people who lived near the licensed premises and we would have to discuss anxiously the possibility of nuisance being caused to adjoining occupiers. Therefore, it is absolutely right and proper that my right hon. Friend should have highlighted that matter in his amendment today.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Yet again the Minister has referred to the experience in Scotland and I fully understand that it may not be appropriate to have another discussion on the different conclusions that can be drawn from it. However, I must repeat that I regret that we did not set up means of monitoring the results of the changes in Scotland. Had we done so, there would have been much more light cast on our deliberations on the Bill. There are seldom opportunities for measuring changes of what some people would call a social experiment, and it is a pity that we have denied ourselves the ability to argue further with precision the consequences of this legislation.

Mr. Waddington: Obviously, there is a great deal in what the hon. Gentleman says, but he would not wish to ignore the statistical evidence which is available—he will acknowledge that some important messages attach to it. The statistics reveal that since 1978—that is after the reform had been in place for a year or two—the number of drivers killed over the legal limit has decreased. Certainly one does not see a picture from the statistics that exist of an increased number of deaths on the roads in Scotland, although there has been an increased availability of alcohol.

Mr. Dubs: Those figures are certainly encouraging, but, without wishing to stray beyond the limits of debating the Bill, there have been other changes in Scotland since 1978, including an increase in unemployment, so lower incomes and people having relatively less to spend on drink than previously. That may well be a factor affecting that period.

It is difficult to analyse these matters with precision. Had we thought this through when the changes were made in Scotland, we might have devised more methods of monitoring the situation than we did. I am aware that there are figures. Indeed, the Minister has mentioned figures and survey information and I would not deny their existence. But there are differences of opinion among experts who have examined the figures as to what precisely happened and why. We have missed an opportunity, but that is water under the bridge.

Amendment No. 1 suggests that the latest time to which a licensee may keep a pub open should be 11 pm instead of 11.30 pm—in other words, the normal practice in London. In some parts pubs close even earlier than that now.

The second amendment seeks to establish a two-hour break at some point in the drinking day. I should like to say something about the significance of these proposed changes. It has been said that tourism, which we all want to encourage, is deterred by our licensing laws. There may be arguments for changes in our licensing laws, but the argument that more tourists would be attracted if we changed them is not a powerful one, because there are many other motives for coming to this country.

In the past one of the deterrents to tourism was the inability of tourists visiting many parts of Britain to get a decent meal. That is changing and the quality of food in ordinary, inexpensive restaurants has gone up, although as I am a London Member I do not have the same chance to visit other parts of Britain as hon. Members with far-flung constituencies. That improvement has been more important for tourism than the licensing hours.

Secondly, many tourists stay in hotels and, as many hotels are licensed, guests can go back to their hotel and have a drink at any hour. As hotel residents they are not limited by the licensing hours and can more or less treat the hotel as their home. The House recently passed a Bill that relaxed the hours during which people may drink with meals. The previous provision that people could not drink with meals after 3 o'clock in the afternoon has gone. In so far as we wish to encourage sensible drinking, drinking with a meal is probably the best way to do that and all the medical evidence supports that view. All this makes greater our ability to attract tourists and we do not need to use the argument about extending licensing hours.

I shall now turn to the arguments about extending the hours to 11.30 pm. People may have difficulty in getting home because public transport is not what it ought to be. This is not the time fully to debate public transport and you would soon call me to order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I attempted to do that. However, there is clearly a relationship between the time people stop drinking and the method by which they get home. It is fine if they are in their local pub and can walk home. That is the most desirable situation. But sometimes they have to find public transport. We know that after 11 o'clock at night public transport is hard to get and after 11.30 it seems to stop altogether. Therefore, there would be an extra incentive for people to visit pubs by motor car, and that is precisely the danger.

Sometimes when I am on my way back from a constituency meeting after 11 o'clock, I am conscious that I have to drive a bit more carefully in case I encounter people who have left pubs. Such people are quite noticeable sometimes. They are also noticeable at times such as Christmas eve and new year's eve, and at such times my wife and I do our best not to get into a motor car at all, because now and again one observes people who should not be driving.

The later that pubs remain open in the evening, the greater the danger that motorists will have been to them and will have had a bit more to drink than they should have had. As I have said before, it is perfectly clear that even if a motorist is below the legal limit—and in my view the legal limit is too high—his driving ability may be impaired. All the research suggests that every drink will impair a person's driving ability a little, even though the way that it works differs from one person to another. Everybody's driving ability is affected for the worse by having more to drink. Anything that increases the likelihood that a motorist may have an extra drink or two must be discouraged.

10.15 am

There is a further point about the effect of later opening on local people. There is no fixed time at which people go to bed, but certainly the later in the evening that people drink the more likely it is that disturbance will be caused to people living nearby. Many pubs are in residential areas. Where they are not, the situation may be different. I know from experience in my constituency that there can be a lot of noise and disturbance.

Even now when pubs stops serving alcohol at 11 o'clock there is a period during which people are allowed to drink up. By the time they get out of the pub and get into their cars is can be quite late. There will be the noise of car doors slamming, and that disturbance can go on late into the night even with an 11 o'clock finish. If pubs were allowed to open until 11.30, the noise and distrubance caused to people who, for example, may have to get up at 6 am to go work would go on until midnight. We must respect the right of people to sleep and we must respect people's right to have a bit of peace and quiet in the evening. For those reasons, I am concerned about any aspect of the Bill which would make the likelihood of a peaceful night's sleep remote.

The other powerful argument by the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) in relation to the afternoon break is about schoolchildren coming home. It is clear that there are more car accidents in the afternoon than in the morning. It is also clear from the figures that young children coming home from school are more at risk than when they are going to school in the morning. It may be that they are more alert in the morning and walk to school more slowly than they do in the afternoon. Perhaps motorists are more careful when going to work in the morning. Even now, some people driving in the afternoon have had rather more to drink than they should. There are disturbing and distressing instances of accidents that have occurred during the afternoon, but I shall not take up the time of the House by going through them.

Certainly we want to minimise the danger to schoolchildren on their way home from school. Of course when they leave school in the afternoon they are boisterous. Schools have railings to prevent children from running across the road. However, it is easy for schoolchildren on their way home to forget themselves when they want to go and play football or whatever. A little bit of thoughtlessness on the part of the child and an inability on the part of the motorists to stop quickly enough can cause a tragic accident. We want to minimise the chances of such things happening.

[Mr. Dubs]

I view these amendments with sympathy and I fully understand the motives of the right hon. Member for Castle Point in moving them. However, it is right that the House should again have its attention drawn to the possible dangers. Of course, there are benefits on the other side, but they are part of a broader discussion of the Bill and are not part of a specific discussion of the amendments. I hope that amendment No. 1 will be accepted, because it seems sensible and right and will give people peace and quiet and lessen the danger a little.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): I shall be brief. I should like to speak about one or two of the points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) in relation to the letter that he received from Mr. Johnson. I emphasise that, under the provisions of the Bill, Mr. Johnson is not compelled to do anything that he does not wish to do. It is entirely up to Mr. Johnson whether he changes his present hours of opening.

My right hon. Friend spoke about tourism in relation to Scotland and England and Wales. The overwhelming majority of tourists to Great Britain have to come through London. That is a fact of life, and therefore needs to be taken into account in the tourism argument.

I live next door to a pub in London. I am in no doubt that there is a strong argument for amendment No. 1. There are also arguments against amendment No. 1, but it does not raise matters of principle in relation to the Bill. In the correspondence that I have received about the Bill, the most significant complaint—I have had many letters of support—has been about later opening hours.

The remarks made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point and by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) about amendment No. 13 have been illuminating. Amendment No. 13, of course, does not technically achieve what my right hon. Friend is aiming for, and that is the afternoon break. Clearly, if amendment No. 13 were accepted, it would be possible for a licensee to open at 10.30 am, to close at 10.35 for two hours, and then continue trading thereafter.

I am not persuaded by the arguments about amendment No. 1. It is not a matter of principle. I recommend that the House accept amendment No. 1.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I beg to move, That further consideration of the Bill, as amended, be now adjourned.

I give notice that if the Question is agreed, I propose to name Friday 3 July as the day for the Report stage to be resumed.

The Bill is an all-party measure, involving debates held over two days—30 January and 27 March. It received an unopposed Second Reading and has successfully gone through five Committee sittings. Standing Committee C never sat later than about 7.30 pm. It is not the case that the Bill reached the Floor of the House as a result of unreasonable behaviour on the part of its sponsors. Last Friday, on Report, the Bill had a full day on the Floor of the House.

It has had magnificent support from hon. Members on both sides of the House who, on many occasions, gave up other engagements to be present to support it. Frankly, it has progressed through the House against apparently overwhelming odds; it was No. 8 in the ballot. Of course, it has been opposed for honourable reasons, principally by my right hon. Friend the hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine). Some hon. Members are opposed to it to a greater or lesser degree and for different reasons. The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who had hoped to be here for the debate but has other engagements, has expressed reservations on some matters. The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) has expressed his reservations. My hon. and learned Friend the Minister has stated the Government's reservations, which are principally concerned with resources.

Earlier this week, as sponsor of the Bill, I had to ask myself a crucial question. It was this: given the amendments that have been selected for debate and their grouping, given the days that have been allocated for private Members' Bills, and given my right hon. Friend's formidable debating powers, knowledge and known views, was there any prospect that the Licensing (Amendment) Bill could reach the statute book, even on the most optimistic assumptions? The most optimistic assumptions were that today a large number of supporters of the Bill would be present to win closure votes if necessary and that the general election would not take place until after the summer recess.

Hope springs eternal, especially in the breasts of private Members who try to get legislation through the House. I had to conclude that, even on such assumptions, the Bill could not reach the statute book. I am not a betting man, but if somebody had been offered odds at 100 to one on the Bill reaching the statute book, he would not have put £1 on, but would have kept it for a rainy day, possibly in Scotland, on which he could have used it to shelter in a pub.

I wrote to the supporters of the Bill, stating that they should feel under no obligation to be present if they had other pressing engagements today—the rough equivalent of the one-line Whip. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Malone) is here. In Scottish terms, gemmes a bogey. There are good reasons for the belief that hon. Members have many other pressing engagements. I have important constituency engagements this evening. It is a matter of record that supporters of the Bill, both hon. Members and wholly innocent academics, have been subjected to a vicious smear campaign by an hon. Member who is not a member of the Standing Committee.

In the light of that, I emphasise that I did not move this motion because I have to go to what the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) last week referred to as my marginal constituency. It is a matter of record that, at the last election, I received over 46 per cent. of the popular vote and a majority of over 8,000. We in Eastwood will fight for every vote because every vote counts. Let the House be under no misapprehension that my commitments are wholly compatible with my presence here, if necessary, until 2.30 pm. Indeed, thanks to the Government's splendid policy of allowing more competition on domestic air routes, there is an excellent air service between Glasgow and London.

At the next election I do not expect my majority to be as high as that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point. I have looked at his results. The general swing of opinion does not seem to matter for him. His majority simply goes up and up. In one sense, the House is about majorities. It is also about the rights of minorities to be heard. In relation to the Bill, my right hon. Friend is in a minority. He may wish to express his views in full on the general matters. Of course, that is his right, and I shall be here to listen.

Let us not forget the circumstances in which the Bill received an unopposed Second Reading — it was certainly by careful planning, but it was not inadvertently slipped through at 2.30 pm. At about nine minutes past two, after a debate in which he said that he would oppose a Second Reading, and after my winding-up speech, the hon. Member for Newham, South did not seek in any way to divide the House. It is possible that the hon. Member may have been persuaded by my eloquence in my summing up, but I have some doubts about that. Both of us knew the consequences of the hon. Gentleman not dividing the House and of my sitting down at nine minutes past two o'clock rather than at 28 minutes past the hour. One of the consequences was that the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), who had been sitting quietly in his place for some time, was able to speak to his Bill. That is not a Bill which is supported by those of my hon. Friends who support this Bill or by myself, but we felt that there was no reason why the hon. Gentleman should not have his way. That is an important principle.

10.30 am

There is another important principle that is fundamental to the House, and that is parliamentary privilege. The hon. Member for Workington is not in his place, but I feel that I have to say that that right has been grossly abused and debased by him. What he said and implied about me last week is not an issue, although to be accused of not caring about the deaths of young children, which was clearly the implication of what the hon. Gentleman said, as recorded in column 528 of Hansard, is not a very pleasant experience. Perhaps my reaction to that reflects the fact that I am used in the main to criticism from Scottish Labour Members, who would never have made that sort of speech. Under parliamentary privilege the issue has been debated at length and I shall not go over it now.

The hon. Member for Workington has smeared three of my hon. Friends on a wholly bogus point. It has been made clear by Mr. Speaker and by the Chairman of Standing Committee C that they behaved with absolute propriety. In columns 498 and 499 the hon. Gentleman smeared two distinguished Scottish academics. I have been a Scottish academic and I know that an individual's reputation for intellectual integrity is fundamental. Essentially the accusation was that academics had fiddled research data because they were being funded by the Scotch Whisky Association. The hon. Gentleman quoted the exact figure of £49,000, but he did not say that the project in question was funded from various sources, including Her Majesty's Government. The funding from the Government was about £100,000.

I do not know the motives of the hon. Member for Workington and I do not know whether he was genuinely misinformed. I do know, however, that it is not reasonable to assume that the three organisations which were mentioned—Alcohol Concern, the Scottish Council on Alcoholism and the British Medical Association—would have deliberately misinformed the hon. Gentleman or any other hon. Member.

The Bill was introduced for a number of reasons. It is a personal assertion of belief in the Act of Union of 1707, which I believe has benefits north and south of the border. That is possibly under greater threat than many hon. Members realise. It is an assertion of belief in the Act of Union for a Scottish Member to introduce on the basis of experience in Scotland measures that relate to England and Wales. Something broadly right in principle was done in Scotland when the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1976 was put on the statute book by the previous Labour Government.

It has never been my contention that everything in Scotland is necessarily perfect. I believe, however, that the evidence shows that the results of the 1976 Act are either positive or neutral when set against various criteria. That is what the evidence suggests, and my personal observations both before and after the passing of the Act confirm that. I repeat my invitation to my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point to visit Scotland and to meet the police in my constituency. I would go further. If my right hon. Friend is minded to do that, I would invite him to address my constituency Conservative association, but I do not suggest that the subject of that address should necessarily be licensing hours. The invitation is a genuine one.

I believe that the licensing law in England and Wales is a mess. It is highly biased against pubs and clubs, which provide a controlled environment for the consumption of alcohol. I shall exemplify the position, as I did broadly in Committee. Let us assume that a constituent of an hon. Member arrives in London on a July afternoon and wishes to have a drink. What are his options? First, he could come here. He could seek out his Member of Parliament, who would doubtless take him for necessary refreshment. Secondly, he could buy alcohol in an off-licence and then sit in a park and drink it. He could now, as the hon. Member for Battersea said, enter a restaurant and consume alcohol there. He could take a train to Gatwick and back and consume alcohol there. What he could not do under the present licensing laws is enter a public house and consume alcohol there, even if the licensee wished the public house to be open. I do not believe that to be sensible.

The Bill is not about off-licences. As I understand the state of the law in England and Wales, it is legal for an 18-year-old who is accompanied by two 16-year-olds to be handed £5, for example, by the 16-year-olds on the street and for him to enter an off-licence to buy alcohol for the 16-year-olds to consume on a park bench, for example. No one will have committed an offence, even if the person in the off-licence knew what was happening. I may be wrong in that interpretation of the law, but I think that the law in England and Wales needs reform.

The Bill has united many people. It has united hon. Members from both sides of the House and those who may be said to have some self-interest in its passage, such as the National Union of Licensed Victuallers, the Brewers Society, the National Association of Licensed House Managers and the Transport and General Workers Union, as the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) told the Committee.

It has the support of the tourist organisations, although I do not think that the tourist argument is necessarily decisive. It also has the support of the three local authority associations in England and Wales — namely, the Association of District Councils, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Association of County

[Mr. Allan Stewart]

Councils. Such associations cannot reasonably be said to have a financial or commercial interest in the passage of the Bill.

If my proposal is accepted, the Bill will not be dead; it will remain on the Order Paper. It establishes an important point, and it could well be debated again on 3 July. There may or may not be a June election. If there is not, the supporters of the Bill, on an all-party basis, would be able to approach the Government and say, "The climate for change has been clearly established. What do the Government propose to do now?" If there is a June election, I believe that, irrespective of the result of that election, reform is inevitable. Such reform need not necessarily take the precise form suggested in this Bill; there are arguments for different types of reform.

I should like to thank the Bill's supporters, and also to thank my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State for his courteous neutrality. I also thank the hon. Member for Battersea for what he said. My right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point has opposed the Bill for wholly honourable reasons.

I hope that the House will accept the motion as an appropriate procedure, so that, after a due interval for the contributions of others — especially, perhaps, from my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister — other measures in which private Members believe may also be debated today, possibly the last day of private Members' time in this Parliament.

Mr. Ron Lewis (Carlisle): I apologise for not being present at the commencement of this morning's proceedings. I spent a very successful day in Carlisle yesterday, where we strengthened our hold on the city council. I motored home late last night, and I had to get up rather early this morning to come here. I regret not having been here on time. It was no one's fault; the time factor was to blame.

I am glad that I was here to listen to the tail end of the speech by the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). As I came into the Chamber, however, I wondered where all the supporters of the Bill had gone. I should have thought that they would be present to give the hon. Gentleman moral support in his endeavours.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Because of the time when the hon. Gentleman came into the Chamber, he may not have appreciated the precise position in relation to my supporters. I explained that earlier, before he arrived.

Mr. Lewis: I thank the hon. Gentleman for putting me right, and I apologise if I have said anything that I should not have said. Nevertheless, I should have thought that the supporters of a measure of this kind, whatever the circumstances, would have been present right up to the end to give it its funeral. But evidently the hon. Gentleman has done that himself with his motion.

10.45 am

I have taken part in a number of debates during my 22 years in the House. I have been privileged to take part in some, on a non-party basis, with the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), and I have vivid and happy recollections of discussing a similar Bill in Standing Committee in the early hours of one morning. We got it on to the Floor of the House on the same day.

Sir Bernard Braine: The hon. Gentleman may recall that that Bill sought to bring children under 14, unaccompanied, into licensed bars. No wonder we were able to defeat it.

Mr. Lewis: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his intervention. He is absolutely right. The tragedy is that the present Paymaster General was the promoter of that Bill. However, Parliament in its wisdom defeated it.

This may be the last time that I shall take part in a debate in this hallowed place that I have been privileged to serve, and have loved to serve. The work done by the right hon. Member for Castle Point in opposing the Bill, in Committee and at various other stages, should be commended. I should like to pay respectful tribute to his excellent work on this subject over the years. The right hon. Gentleman is not a strict teetotaller, as I am, and I do not hold that against him. However, he and a number of others can see the potential dangers in opening the floodgates. Heaven knows, we have enough of a problem on our hands now. To open the doors for all-day drinking would be a retrograde step, and I do not want it to happen.

I am all in favour of the principle of flexible rostering, and I feel that the hon. Member for Eastwood should consider it. But I am dead against an extension of the present hours, as are a number of people in the trade, because of the potential dangers, particularly in relation to young people. I admire the hon. Gentleman for bringing the Bill to a conclusion, and I am only sorry—you will correct me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I am out of order—that the Selection Committee that selected the members of the Committee to examine the Bill——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. We are debating the motion that further consideration be adjourned, The hon. Gentleman should stick to that.

Mr. Lewis: I shall try to stick to the Bill, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was merely trying to say that I am sorry that, as a result of my intervention in sending a letter and raising a point on the Floor of the House, some hon. Members whom I named, and who are not dishonest people, have now taken a personal dislike to me. That has been evident in the measure of their friendship, and I deprecate it.

Having said that, let me congratulate the right hon. Member for Castle Point. I know that he will be back, not only in his present capacity but as the Father of the House. I wish him well, and all the others with whom I have been privileged to serve in this place for nearly 23 years. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be as successful in his opposition in the future as he has been in the past.

Sir Bernard Braine: I am greatly moved by the kind remarks of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lewis). I do not think that the public fully appreciate how, on some great social issues, the members of the different political parties work together for what they consider to be the public good. I recollect many happy campaigns in conjunction with the hon. Gentleman and members of other parties. I am sorry that he is leaving Parliament; he will be greatly missed by us all.

The motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) was wholly unexpected, but it was a welcome development and I accept it in the spirit in which it was moved. The whole House should be grateful to my hon. Friend for suggesting that time should be provided for further reflection on the Bill. Nevertheless, I am not surprised. My hon. Friend's experience as a Scottish Health Minister will have made him sensitive to at least some of the criticisms of the Bill that I have found it necessary to make. I am grateful to him for his kind words. Throughout all our exchanges, he has conducted his case with great courtesy and good humour.

I am not opposed to the Bill, any more than the hon. Member for Carlisle is opposed to it, because it seeks to allow greater flexibility of opening hours, but I am opposed to the move to lengthen the total number of hours on the supposed ground that it would make for more civilised drinking. That is complete nonsense. It would certainly increase the availability of alcohol. That might be good for the profits of the drinks trade, but it would fly in the face of warnings from the World Health Organisation, the medical profession, the royal colleges and the alcohol care agencies. They have warned that an increase in alcohol consumption is inevitably accompanied by an increase in health harm.

I shall develop only one aspect which it is important to put on record, as and when we return to the issue. Had we proceeded with the Bill this morning, I should have moved an amendment to draw attention to the prevalence of under-age drinking in public houses and to the serious implications for law and order and for the health of our young people. If debate on the Bill is to be adjourned, it must be adjourned on the understanding that these implications are grasped and that something is done about them. I draw some comfort from what my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State said this morning: that the Government will have to insist that the implications are grasped and that something is done about them.

In raising this problem, I am attempting to follow the long and honourable tradition of Parliament, at least in the present century, of protecting children and young people generally against alcohol. The Bill does nothing to solve the problem of under-age drinking. If enacted unamended, the Bill would make the position worse.

There are several reasons why it is wise to adjourn consideration of the Bill—and, I hope, to drop it—but none is more important than the fact that, contrary to the best intentions of my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood, it lengthens drinking time and increases the load on licensees at a time when under-age drinking is causing grave concern to the police, teachers, parents and the public at large.

I have with me a large collection of cuttings from newspapers that are published in every part of England and Wales that refer to illegal under-age drinking in public houses. The headlines are chilling. I take a few of them at random. The headline in the Basildon Evening Echo reads:

"Pub kids 12—drinking booze."

The headline in the Reading Evening News says:

"Teeny drinkers in health crisis."

The headline in the Liverpool Echo reads:

"High on the drink drug — up to 80 per cent. of Merseyside teenagers, some as young as 14, are drinking in pubs illegally."

And the Manchester Advertiser headline says:

"Children go to school drunk."

I could quote hundreds of examples, but those will suffice.

I have in my hand the monthly press digest for October that is published by the Institute of Alcohol Studies. It reveals a terrifying and nationwide problem. I shall refer to only one article, which, significantly enough, appeared in the Police Review of 19 October 1986. In this article Mr. Colin Sheppard looked at the link between juvenile crime and the alcohol consumed by under-age drinkers in public houses. Speaking of a 16-year-old sitting straight in his chair, his fingers gripping it to keep his balance, he reports that the boy said:

"Where I come from, lads start drinking when they are about 15 or 16, some more than others but usually on at least four days a week including weekends. The usual pattern is to pub crawl around the city pubs, especially on Friday and Saturday evenings, and then look for the wimps to pick off. It's hit and run, really, with us hunting in packs and sometimes being hunted. It's always good fun if Forest are at home and the away supporters are in town, then we get some real sport — a really good boot job on them makes the night. By about throwing out time I have had about eight or nine pints of ale like me mates and then we look for a club. If they won't let us in there's usually aggro — either on the bouncer or damage. Why do I do it? It's the thing to do. Booze and fight—what else is there that matters?"

Mr. Sheppard goes on to say——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that we are debating whether we should adjourn consideration of the Bill. He must relate his remarks to that and not make the speech that he intended to make on an amendment that we have not yet reached.

Sir Bernard Braine: I am referring not to an amendment but to the reason why I am not prepared to accept the adjournment of the Bill. You are quite right, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to point out that an amendment that has not yet been reached would have gone into the matter in great detail. I do not propose to go into as much detail now as otherwise I should have done, but this is the last opportunity to tell the House and the country what is going on.

A moment ago, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood gave a long list of reasons why he thinks that the Bill, which had an unopposed Second Reading in this House, has a great deal of support in the country. Does it? If it does, it must be due to a fit of absence of mind. Therefore, it is right and proper and in the interests of children that I should produce evidence that was published in a recent issue of Police Review. Mr. Sheppard said:

"I asked 50 male offenders at the Nottingham Senior Attendance Centre. 'When did you start drinking alcohol regularly?' . . . No fewer than 23 said they had been drinking regularly in public houses since the age of 15. As one put it, 'I don't think anyone could stop youngsters having a drink under 18 if they wanted to. Anyway, why should they? No-one seems to bother. You never see the copper in pubs checking up on ages and the landlords don't bother because they are making a living.' . . . More than half the sample — 28 — said that the prime responsibility for under-age drinking was unconcerned parents and 26 felt that the licensee could do more to check on the ages of drinkers . . . Whereas only 11 saw a role for schools in educating the young about the problems of drink . . .

Twenty of the sample said they thought that drinking intoxicants to excess made them want to commit offences and a further 10 thought that alcohol made them more likely to commit offences. In 21 cases, drink was said to be likely to make them more agressive and 19 felt that the effect of drink was to increase their dislike of authority, in particular the police.

One youth said: 'Booze makes me silly and I hit people. It takes about 10 pints to get me like that and I get through that on Fridays and Saturdays. Where I live there's nowt else to do and that's it really . . . ' Four of the sample thought they had a health problem related to drinking. One 18-year-old told the group, 'I started when I was about 12 or 13, it was in local pubs, playing snooker and having a pint. I've been at it ever since. Last year I started buying Martini and cheap wine and I get through six bottles a week. I drink about 30 pints of beer a week in pubs and I don't really care. The doctor says my guts are in a mess.—that's life.'"

11 am

That is the situation about which I am complaining, and about which the Bill is completely evasive. Perhaps hon. Members will begin to see why head teachers are so concerned about what is happening — the deliberate breaking of the existing law, and here I am not talking about the Bill but the seeming impotence of the police in many areas and the turning of a blind eye to a worsening problem.

When it became known that I was opposing the Bill, I received a great volume of support from people who had begun to feel that nobody cared about the matter. After the Bill reached Committee, I received a letter from Mrs. D. R. Rivilland, MSc., headmistress and the chairman of the health education working party of the National Association of Head Teachers. Perhaps you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, knew of that worthy organisation in your previous capacity. Mrs. Rivilland wrote:

"I wish to protest most strongly about the Licensing Amendment Bill being put forward by Mr. Alan Stewart M.P. and I hope that you will include the following points in your opposition. The enormous increase in under-age drinking gives real concern to head teachers of secondary schools, particulary as the existing laws are already so difficult to enforce. Quite young children are now consuming units of alcohol on a regular basis and many parents are unaware that alcohol consumption and misuse by young people is a far more serious problem than abuse or experimentation with hard drugs".—

I repeat, "with hard drugs".

It is not only protests of that kind against the Bill, but the inadequacy of existing law, which the Bill would worsen, that should concern us.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood has decided to adjourn the debate on his Bill, and it would be easy for me to accept that and go away quietly. I am not prepared to do that. Successive Governments have felt unable to grapple with the problem and have left it to private Members to introduce Bills, which, in one way or another, have proved defective, and I feel that that the present grave situation in regard to under-age drinking must be looked at in greater depth. That is why I insist that, if we are to accept the motion, we should be given some assurances on that.

The Justices' Clerks Society, whose members have unrivalled experience in this matter, tells us that the present law is inadequate—I shall deal later with what it says about my hon. Friend's Bill. In its recent report, "Licensing Law in the Eighties" the Justices' Clerks Society states:

"The question must then be posed. Where do the young persons obtain their liquor? Some steal it, but the majority go to the local public houses and off licences. There is clear evidence that young persons also obtain their intoxicating liquor from registered clubs and disco clubs, the latter allowing young people to buy and consume alcohol until late in the evening or early in the morning. There is no doubt that crimes of public disorder, violence and criminal damage occur after the young people leave the licensed premises. Magistrates talking to each other, and to their clerks, complain of two things:—(1) at the law which makes it so easy for young persons to obtain intoxicating liquor and for licence holders to sell it to them; and (2) at the police for not prosecuting more licence holders for selling intoxicating liquor to obvious minors and more young persons for consuming and buying."

That is evidence which the Home Office should be considering carefully — the evidence from the justices' clerks, who advise the licensing magistrates and upon whom they depend for help and guidance.

The justices' clerks go on to say:

"The police respond by complaining of the difficulties they encounter in prosecuting a licence holder in view of the necessity to prove he acted 'knowingly'. They also say that the courts too readily accept the word of the licence holder when he says that he could not tell that the young person was a minor."

The justices' clerks beg Parliament to do something about the matter.

They go on to ask why there is so much under-age drinking:

"In view of the fact that police, magistrates and clerks—and incidentally parents know that under-age drinking goes on day in and day out all over the country, what is the explanation?"

Of course, they know where the fault lies. They say:

"Experience has shown that it is difficult to obtain convictions in view of current legislation and the police simply hesitate to prosecute licence holders and young drinkers. In one police area in the south of England, only two licence holders were prosecuted for selling to minors, which, in the context of the problem nationwide, demands action, and effective action."

The justices' clerks suggest a course of action—I shall not go into it now, because it would require an amendment to the Bill, which we are not discussing now — that would certainly require a change in existing law that is not contemplated in this Bill.

I said earlier that for nine years I was the chairman of the National Council on Alcoholism. We built up a network of counselling agencies, and some hon. Members played a valuable role in our work. Indeed, one of the sponsors of the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), actually trained as a counsellor, and I pay warm tribute to him for that. I am now president of the Greater London alcohol advisory service, which co-ordinates such services throughout the capital. I can tell the House from the direct experience that I have gained over the past 20 years that matters have been getting steadily worse. Over that period—and this is why I am so loth to accept the motion to adjourn without qualification—young people have not been exempt from either the growth in consumption or its adverse consequences—especially with alcohol, as compared to other psycho-active and potentially addictive drugs. There is no generation gap or culture divide. It could be argued that young people's drinking patterns have already been aided and abetted by their seniors, and the variation orders in the Bill would certainly aid and abet them further.

I am not prepared therefore to accept the motion without some promises and undertakings because, over the past 20 years, the number of people drinking alcoholic beverages has increased, because drinking starts at a younger age and is more frequent, and because greater amounts of alcohol are consumed. The facts are known. A report on adolescent drinking was commissioned by the Department of Health and Social Security. I am delighted to see that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security—the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) — is with us. Long before she entered this House or became a Minister, she showed a keen interest in these matters. She has a deep knowledge of them. If there is one person occupying a role in government for which she is uniquely fitted by her experience, it is my hon. Friend. She will know that the report prepared by the Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys during 1983-84 was presented to the Minister for Health in October 1985 and was finally released by the Minister in December 1986. The fieldwork was done in 1984 and the complete report was sent to Ministers in October 1985. I had to ask in the House why it had not been published before. It did not see the light of day until the week before last Christmas. That delayed report confirms the view that, for adolescents, the major drug of misuse is alcohol and that they suffer many more problems from it than from all other drugs combined.

I do not have the slightest doubt that, if the OPCS were asked to conduct similar fieldwork when the variation orders proposed in the Bill have been in operation, the findings which I am about the reveal would be greatly magnified. The survey showed that, by the age of 13, 82 per cent. of boys and 77 per cent. of girls had had their first drink. Twenty-four per cent. of boys said that they were nine or younger when they had their first drink. Among 13-year-olds, more than 26 per cent. of all boys and 17 per cent. of all girls drank alcohol on four or more days a week and 30 per cent. of boys and 38 per cent. of girls drank at least once a week.

Among 15-year-olds, 34 per cent. and 25 per cent. respectively drank on most days in the week. Of those who drank, about half the 13-year-olds drank fewer than four units of alcohol a week, which is equivalent to two pints of beer, while among the 15-year-olds half the boys and one third of the girls drank more than 10 units a week. Nearly one in five 15-year-old boys drank more than 25 units of alcohol a week. The Royal College of Psychiatrists has stated that the upper health limit for adult men should be no more than 21 units a week; so the younger generation is already drinking harder than the doctors think is satisfactory for mature adults.

Of 15-year-old drinkers, 55 per cent. of boys and 48 per cent. of girls experienced one bout of drunkenness during the year, half of them more than once. Fifteen per cent. of 13-year-old boys reported getting into arguments or fights after drinking. That proportion rises to 17 per cent. for 14-year-olds and 27 per cent. for 15-year-olds. Half of 15-year-old boys, a third of 14-year-old boys and a quarter of 13-year-old boys report falling over as a result of drinking too much. Since the adolescents were asked to report on the events in the year before the survey, the 13-year-olds were recalling events that happened when they were 12.

The OPCS report states:

"The greater the degree of social enjoyment that adolescents recalled as being associated with an evenings drinking, the more likely it was to have been followed by a disagreeable combination of sickness, incapacity and regret."

The report continues:

"Heavier drinking among the relatively small minority of adolescents who do drink heavily is not episodic or opportunist drinking, it is an established regular habit . . . Heavy drinking, including no doubt what is known in adults as problem drinking, among a minority of adolescents (even among secondary schoolchildren) is a regular commitment that forms part of their lives. It is not an occasional adventure . . . A minority of adolescents have a regular habit of heavy drinking. Some of them are still at school."

I have already produced evidence to show the anxieties of one headmistress on this subject.

The report continues:

"The more money they have the more likely they are to drink, to drink a lot, to get drunk and to get into difficulties. Only a minority go right through this process but the better off are more likely than those who have only little money to go down the path."

Those warnings should sound an alarm bell.

Under-age drinkers account for one in 14 of all drunkenness convictions — my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State knows that to be a fact. For the first time this century, 16-year-old boys are more at risk from drunkenness than middle-aged men. The rate of convictions per 100,000 of population among 16-year-olds exceeds that of the 30 to 60 age group. Between 1982 and 1985 the number of offences and cautions among 14-year-olds increased from 94 to 224, or 138 per cent.; among 15-year-olds, from 301 to 492, or 63 per cent.; and among 16-year-olds, from 1,047 to 1,538, or 47 per cent.

How in heaven's name can the Government and the nation ignore figures of that kind? God knows what we are building up for the future. This is not the first time a Licensing (Amendment) Bill has been brought before the House without any consideration having been given to the impact of its provisions on the younger generation. I had to remind the hon. Member for Carlisle that one of the campaigns in which we were engaged dealt with a Bill which—although, of course, it introduced the principle of "flexibility"—sought to permit children under 14 to enter bars unaccompanied. It too was given a Second Reading and went through Committee. But, on Report, the House of Commons suddenly tumbled to what was proposed and threw it out. We cannot go down this line again ignoring the facts.

While overall drunkenness offences peaked in 1980, the number of under-age drivers found guilty of drunkenness or cautioned was higher in 1985 than in 1980. Over 1,000 young people die each year in an alcohol-related accident, and so it goes on. I could say much more on that subject, but I shall not.

There is one other reason why I am reluctant to agree to the adjournment of the Bill without any promise that the break in hours will be restored. The Bill as constituted, even if it were the best Bill in the world, simply cannot be implemented without causing serious disruption for the courts. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department — the hon. Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg)—told us that there were serious resource problems. My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State has had to remind us repeatedly that there are serious resource problems. We would be acting irresponsibly, would we not, if we were to accept this motion without a clear statement that the resources necessary to implement the Bill are available? Home Office Ministers have referred to this, although not in great detail.

Let us consider how serious the matter is. In the current issue of The Law Magazine, which reached me only two days ago, Mr. Peter Lydiate a justices' clerk, bluntly warned:

"the traditional system of administering justice in the people's courts is now under threat".

When we are told that the administration of the magistrates courts already faces a "deepening crisis", we cannot allow the Home Office to put further pressure on the courts by seeking to implement this Bill until the courts feel that they can cope with the extra burden. Mr. Lydiate states that 310 justices clerks are responsible for a further 1,300 court clerks. Justices clerks have to be barristers or solicitors of at least seven years standing. Twenty five per cent. of the court clerks are also legally qualified. If the Bill ever sees the light of day, the work that it will entail must be seen in the light of the burden placed on the courts when the Crown prosecution service comes into operation—I believe it may be already in operation.

Mr. Waddington: Yes.

Sir Bernard Braine: It must be seen in the light of the burden placed on the courts since the Crown Prosecution Service came into operation. The new service was to relieve seriously stretched police departments from having to prosecute in magistrates courts. That action has already had an adverse effect on the staffing of magistrates courts, according to Mr. Lydiate. He said:

"One vast source of potential Crown Prosecutors was clearly the hundreds of barristers and solicitors employed and trained by justices' clerks to act as court clerks. . . These court clerks were targeted for recruitment as Crown Prosecutors."

Up to April last year, 21 per cent. of legally qualified court clerks left the service, many to go into prosecuting solicitors' departments. There is little doubt that this serious and dramatic trend has continued, perhaps even at a greater pace.

I must describe the reality of the situation facing our courts in order that the House might see why my argument is so important. We need to be given assurances that the Home Office will allocate more resources to the justices' clerks, in order to appoint appropriate qualified staff to meet the demands that they already face, as well as the additional work that the Bill will place upon the courts.

The Justices' Clerks Society is concerned about the length of court hearing times. This has to be spelt out because we have not been told about this burden. The society is concerned about the length of court hearing time and the additional work that will arise if the Bill is passed in its existing form. The society has estimated that each application for a variation order will last on average about 10 minutes. There are some 96,000 licensed premises in England and Wales. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State—the hon. Member for Grantham—told us on Second Reading that 75 per cent. of those, or some 72,000, will apply for variation orders. On the most optimistic reckoning, 4,000 extra court sessions will be required to deal with all the applications. If such applications are opposed, we can double or treble that number.

To show how this will affect licensing districts, I will give four examples—two large districts, one medium and one small. As the Bill applies schedule 2 to the Licensing Act 1964, it follows that objectors can turn up at a hearing unannounced, thereby prolonging it by up to half an hour or even more. In Manchester, a large district, it has been estimated that if all the licensed premises were made the subject of applications for variation orders, at an average of 10 minutes, an application would require about 180 additional court hours to be accommodated within an already overburdened workload. A normal court sitting lasts three hours, which would mean an additional 60 sittings for licensing justices. If there were objections, as I believe there would be, the 60 sittings could become 120 or even 180.

In Birmingham, another large court, with 1,200 licensed premises to cater for, 200 hours will be required. This would require 66 sittings or even 200 sittings. In Medway, a medium sized court with 475 licensed premises, 78 hours, or 27 to 78 sittings would be required. In Batley, a relatively small court, catering for, say, 100 licensed premises, 16 hours, or five to 15 sittings would be required.

There are other problems. The Act currently allows for a maximum of eight licensing sessions plus brewster sessions in which to deal with the business for a licensing district. The minimum number of licensing justices prescribed by regulations is five, which in almost all areas will have to be increased to the maximum of 15 in order to cope with the burden that variation orders under the Bill would place on the courts. This will obviously create additional expenditure.

As the maximum number of justices under the existing law who can sit and take variation orders is 15, that will mean that in Manchester, which has an existing maximum of 18 half-day sittings, with an additional 60 half-day sittings per annum, justices will be sitting on 78 licensing sessions, thereby reducing their availability to deal with criminal, domestic and juvenile work. I have spelt out that impossible situation in detail to show how ridiculous and ill thought out the Bill is. The question of the resources that will be required has not even been considered. This unsatisfactory situation would worsen if hearings were lengthy because of objections to applications.

In Manchester, as I have already said, the workload would increase to 120 sessions. One could envisage a situation where licensing justices would be spending all their time in the licensing courts to the exclusion of all other work. My right hon. and learned Friend knows that the courts are already experiencing delays because qualified clerks are leaving the service. He knows that the Home Office has allowed one element of the service to compete with another, due to already inadequate finance. The courts must be adequately financed if justice is to be properly administered. The lack of adequate remuneration and the attraction of higher salaries from the Crown Prosecution Service has lured qualified clerks away from the service in their droves.

Peter Lydiate, in the article I mentioned, stated that he believes that this is deliberate poaching. He said:

"The plan was simple. Pitch the basic salaries of the new Crown Prosecutors above those fixed for clerks. This was done; it worked."

The effect of this on the magistrates courts was that large numbers of court clerks were seduced away from the magisterial service, leaving an instant vacuum which justices' clerks have been energetically trying to fill during the past year, with great difficulties. The effects already stare us in the face. As Mr. Lydiate said, many courts have been closed and the hearings of cases put off for weeks or months for want of sufficient court clerks.

Already, justices' clerks are faced with the training of new recruits. Mr. Lydiate said:

"Corrective action shows little prospect of success. It takes years to train appropriate barristers and solicitors to a level of competence."

There is no more difficult and abstruse area than licensing law. Lay magistrates need and expect expert guidance. The Justices' Clerks Society is deeply concerned that the Home Office has turned down suggestions that court clerks should be proficiently qualified barristers or solicitors. We are not matching like with like in our courts. We are opening up a minefield of case law with variation orders.

Lay justices need the best advice that can be given. Licensees, with the help of their association, will be given barristers or solicitors to argue their cases.

What Mr. Peter Lydiate said of the magistrates courts applies to the licensing courts. He went on to say:

"Magistrates courts therefore face a dark period where, in most courtrooms today, the bench of unpaid lay justices will be sitting to hear from a barrister or solicitor acting as Crown Prosecutor, a barrister or solicitor acting for the accused and their court clerk.

He will be required to give expert guidance on all that is said and done concerning law, evidence, practice and procedure, and to ensure that the justices apply correct judicial criteria to any decision."

We are not told that the Bill will be withdrawn. It is to be adjourned. It will come back at some future time. Of course, the Home Office will look at it very carefully, but there is no guarantee that the Bill will not come before us again in its present form.

The Bill is an administrative nightmare. Frankly, I cannot see that it will ever be implemented. Therefore, there will be a need to increase the maximum number of sessions and the maximum size of licensing committees to deal with the work if it ever becomes law. This would involve a change in the Licensing Act 1964, which the Bill does not deal with. The Bill cannot be implemented without amendment to that Act. That fact has only emerged from my close study of the matter.

I know that the House is not going to pass the Bill now, but how could it ever pass the Bill in its present form? We are entitled to know whether the Home Secretary will be obliged to come before Parliament with new legislation before the Bill can ever be introduced—unless my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister can tell us that the Home Secretary has the powers already. Parliament needs to know, and it has not been told. We deal in generalities with a Bill which, as I have shown, has grave social consequences. I have not mounted the entire case against the Bill as yet. I have taken particular points that cause concern. There is much more that could be said about it. It is not an innocuous little measure but a very dangerous one.

11.30 am

Indeed, even if more financial resources were found to implement the Bill, I wonder whether we are justified in pressing it upon the courts. Again, Peter Lydiate issued a warning. He said:

"Even if the coming years were to bring an increase in salaries to make them competitive with those of Crown Prosecutors, which is by no means certain, it may be too late."

In short, there will be considerable difficulty in absorbing this extra work without causing additional delays to the hearing of criminal, juvenile and domestic cases. Additional court and court clerk time will be involved, to the detriment of other more pressing work, and that is taking place at a time when recruitment and retention of suitably qualified court clerks is proving increasingly difficult.

I could go on to describe the financial consequences of all that. Whether the Government will ever find the money for it is another matter. Unless additional resources are made available, there is a great fear in the licensing world that liquor licensing work will grind to a halt because of a total inability to cope.

I believe, therefore, that the Home Office has a specific responsibility to protect the licensing justices in our constituencies. I hope that I have said enough to convince the House that the debate on the Bill should not be adjourned but that the Bill should be quietly dropped. Perhaps some day the present Government, or another, will find the courage to legislate and will grasp the fundamental truth that alcohol, with all its pleasant associations for most of us, is not like other commodities. Its sale must be regulated if the harm it can cause is not to continue to grow as at present.

I believe that the public will support sensible alcohol control policies. Once the public are told the facts and given a lead — the drink-driving campaign, seat belt legislation and tobacco tax are good examples — I believe that there will be an acceptance of sensible counter policies.

Above all, when the Government are faced with the choice—I address myself particularly to my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister—between the politics of wealth creation—a course which increases the profits of the drink trade — and the politics of health, they would do well to remember the wise counsel of one of our greatest Conservative Prime Ministers, Benjamin Disraeli, who said that "the first priority of Government is the health of the people."

It still is.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): It is appropriate for me to start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). One thing is certain; as a result of his deciding to present this Bill to the House we have had a series of interesting debates when right hon. and hon. Members have been able to ventilate their views, not on the precise terms of the Bill but on the danger of excessive consumption of alcohol, the danger to young people, and all those important social issues.

I am sure that my hon. Friend would wish me to thank my officials in the Home Office on his behalf. Few members of the public realise how much work is done within Government Departments to help private Members with their Bills. My officials certainly gave a great deal of help to my hon. Friend, pointing out to him that it was essential, if his Bill was to make any progress, that he should address his mind, for instance, to the resource implications. Of course, it is no secret that my officials drafted amendments for him to try to mitigate some of the resource problems that would obviously arise from the Bill as originally drafted. Therefore, I thank my officials for their help in that regard.

It was pleasing to see the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lewis) here this morning. I, among many, am sorry to see him go and that this is his last Parliament. My memories of Carlisle are somewhat mixed, having spent my first days in the Army there, not all of which were entirely delightful. However, I have delighted in my acquaintance with the hon. Member, as has my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine).

My right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point said that he was not opposed to more flexible hours. He said he was opposed only to an extension of the total number of hours. That plain statement of his views is welcome. The public think that there should be reform of our licensing laws. I think that the public think that there should be a measured relaxation of the present restrictions. I think that they will be convinced by the evidence from Scotland that greater availability — by that I mean relaxation of restrictions of hours and licensees being able to decide for themselves whether they should open in the afternoon—does not necessarily mean higher consumption. The sort of dire consequences that were forecast after the liberalisation took place in Scotland in 1976 simply have not occurred.

My right hon. Friend pointed to the mischief that can be caused by excessive consumption of alcohol. None of us need to be convinced of that. My right hon. Friend pointed to the dangers to young people of consuming too much alcohol. None of us doubts that alcohol misuse is a serious problem in Britain and none of us doubts that there is too much drinking by too many young people. However, that is not the question to which we have to address our minds on this Bill. The question is whether that problem, which all of us acknowledge, would be made worse by a modest relaxation in licensing hours. The truth is that there is no evidence that it would.

I dealt with the evidence, or lack of evidence, in the most interesting debate on licensing reform and alcohol abuse initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks) on 27 February. I pointed out that the "basic conclusion of the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys report was that the relaxations in Scotland have led to more leisurely and responsible drinking. The study shows that between 1976 and 1984 there has been an increase in the consumption of alcohol by women, but no significant increase in consumption by men. Alcohol Concern has suggested that the fact of there being no change in men's drinking may be accounted for in part by unemployment, which is one of the points canvassed by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow."

I pointed out that that was entirely unrealistic because

"If unemployment was a factor, one might have expected it to affect women as well, and I think that it is fair to assume that drinking by women has gone up in Scotland because of the more relaxed social attitudes to drinking by women."
—[Official Report, 27 February 1987; Vol. 111, c. 525.]

My right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point went on to point out the relationship between alcohol and crime. We all know that. Anyone who has practised in the courts well knows that there is all too close a relationship between alcohol consumption and crime. The question, however, is whether that has anything to do with a modest relaxation in licensing hours allowing licensees more choice as to the hours for which they open.

On 27 February I said that the statistics for offences involving alcohol consumption must be considered with a great deal of caution and that some changes in trends might be accounted for merely by changes in police policy. One cannot simply point to a smaller increase in a particular offence in Scotland compared with England and say that that proves the point. I went on to point out that opponents of change could find no comfort in Scotland because there had been a dramatic fall in drunkenness offences, and drink driving offences had increased nothing like so fast as in England and Wales. With respect to my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point, therefore, it is difficult to sustain the argument that drink driving offences will increase in England following the same modest relaxation in licensing hours as has occurred in Scotland.

We must not lose sight of the ball. We are not discussing the dangers of drink. We are considering whether a modest relaxation in the law such as that which has taken place in Scotland would lead to the dire social consequences suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point. In my view, it is almost impossible even to begin to mount an argument to that effect, bearing mind that none of those dire consequences has occurred in Scotland.

Sir Bernard Braine: Is it really so impossible? My right hon. and learned Friend recognises the connection between alcohol and crime and I have given him incontrovertible evidence that under-age drinking, from the age of 13 upwards, is increasing in public houses, as is the harm that it causes through the link it has with public disorder and criminal offences. That is all taking place illegally now. If my right hon. and learned Friend cannot cope with an illegal situation of such gravity now, how can he suggest that relaxing matters still more and allowing longer drinking hours will not exacerbate the problem? It certainly will not make it any better. Why does my right hon. and learned Friend run away from that?

Mr. Waddington: If it is all happening illegally already, what on earth does it have to do with the Bill? As I have said, it is impossible to find statistics showing that there has been a worsening of the situation in Scotland as a result of the relaxation. I do not accept all that my right hon. Friend has said because I believe that the vast majority of licensees are extremely responsible people who do their level best to conduct their houses properly and to prevent under-age drinking, but the fact that there is such a problem in England today does not begin to be an argument about extending to England some of the changes that took place in Scotland in 1976.

Lastly, my right hon. Friend said that the Bill raised serious resource problems. He is entirely right. That is why we advised my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood as to how some of the deleterious effects of the Bill could be mitigated and that is why he tabled amendment No. 40. That amendment would have mitigated some of the deleterious effects, but it would not have solved the problems, and I have pointed out throughout our deliberations that his is not the scheme of reform that the Government would have recommended to the House. In the light of that, the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point in seeking assurances that the Home Office would allocate additional resources to deal with the Bill if it became law seem somewhat unrealistic. That is a problem that we should have to consider if a miracle occurred, but as miracles do not occur very often my right hon. Friend will allow me to suggest that we can consider that matter if and when a miracle occurs.

Mr. Dubs: First, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lewis) who suggested that his brief contribution to this debate might be his last in the House. Members in all parts of the House will be sorry to know that this is his last Parliament as he has earned the respect of the whole House for his contribution to its work and I am sure that he will be sadly missed.

In considering the motion before us, it is helpful to consider what has happened during the passage of the Bill thus far. Two approaches could have been adopted. The first is an overall approach considering all the problems related to alcohol and its abuse—licensing hours, health measures, preventive measures, drink-driving, and so on. Such an approach would require a Government measure because it is too complicated for a private Member's Bill. Had there been such an overall approach—I am sure that the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) and the promoter of the Bill would both subscribe to this—we might have approached the measure with more agreement than has been achieved so far. That would also have been my own preferred approach, but that was not the position in which we found outselves when the Bill was introduced.

I think that the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) has been a Member of Parliament longer than I have, so I do not wish to seem to speak from greater experience, but I suspect that if he had been a little more modest and confined himself to a rather simpler measure it might have got further. A simpler measure would have involved flexibility within the present overall limit of opening hours. Such a measure would have achieved the main aim of flexibility and the hon. Member for Eastwood would have had the support of the House on that point. Instead of discussing a motion to adjourn further debate, we might have been congratulating him on steering the Bill on to the statute book. If there is ever a lesson to learn from private Members' Bills, it is that they should be kept as simple and as uncontroversial as possible. I would have supported a move towards flexibility, but I would have preferred that to be in the context of a nine and a half hour day and no longer. That would have enabled us to make a little progress and to judge the consequences of flexibility without running the risk of all the dangers that the right hon. Member for Castle Point described so eloquently this morning and on other occasions.

I regret that the Bill was not drafted in that way. If it had been so drafted, it would have represented sensible progress without the risks and dangers that the measure has aroused in the minds of some hon. Members. There is no doubt that alcohol is lethal. If alcohol was a new product which was not yet legal and we were debating whether to make it legal, not one hon. Member would vote to make it legal if we had any idea of the consequences of alcohol in our society. We are not in that position. It is clear that alcohol is the most widely used drug and intoxicant in the world. Therefore, it is unrealistic to ask whether we can ban it. We must find a compromise for those people who derive pleasure from alcohol—I admit that I am a modest drinker and derive a little pleasure from it—and so prevent some of the worst consequences of alcohol. That is the challenge and that will continue to be the challenge for this House when legislation on this matter is introduced in future.

We are all concerned about drinking and driving, the effects of alcohol on young drinkers and the effect of alcohol on the health of many people in this country. So many people are in hospital because they have had too much to drink. We must achieve a balance between the pleasure that alcohol gives to many people and the enormous harm that it can cause. We must arrive at that balance in our legislation. I wish that the hon. Member who sponsored the Bill had been more modest and had drafted the Bill in the way that I have suggested.

I want to pay a tribute to the right hon. Member for Castle Point. He has displayed tenacity and determination and has probably single-handedly—although there was other support for him—in Committee and in the House prevented the passage of the Bill. He has shown energy, attention to detail, commitment and anger about the consequences of alcohol and that has impressed all hon. Members. I pay that tribute across the party political divide and I am sure that he understands the reason for that tribute.

However, I am a little puzzled as to why the promoter of the Bill is seeking to adjourn the debate. The hon. Member for Eastwood paid me the courtesy of telling me in advance of today's sitting of his intention. I do not want to challenge his motives. However, I am rather puzzled about this. I have expressed some reservations about the contents of the Bill while supporting the principle of flexibility. I believe that the hon. Member for Eastwood said that reform was inevitable. At least, that was mentioned by someone in the House and I think that it was mentioned by the hon. Member for Eastwood.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I said that as a statement of belief. Of course, I believe that reform is inevitable. I want to make that point clear.

Mr. Dubs: It was a statement of his belief that reform is inevitable. I am therefore puzzled as to why he is calling a halt to the debate now. Whether or not we agree that the hon. Gentleman would have failed in his attempt to get the Bill through its remaining stages this afternoon, if he believes that reform is inevitable, he could have used today's debates as an opportunity to put down a marker for the future. After all, we all know that one of the purposes of private Member's Bills is to put down markers for the future, and the vast majority of private Member's Bills are tabled for that purpose, not in the hope of their reaching the statute book. He would have put down a better marker for the future if he had continued with the Bill today, thereby showing his determination, commitment and attitude to further amendments which he might have been disposed to accept. In future, if a Government or private Member tries to legislate in this area, that further information from the rest of today's debate might well have been helpful.

Mr. Ron Lewis: My hon. Friend is arguing about why the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) should continue with his Bill. Although some of those who supported the Bill knew that the hon. Gentleman would move the motion, would not my hon. Friend have thought that it was their duty to be with him here right to the end?

Mr. Dubs: I would have thought so. I thank my hon. Friend for drawing my attention to that.

Where there is a difference of opinion in the House on private Members' legislation, those who are most tenacious tend to win the day. There is a contrast between the tenacity of the right hon. Member for Castle Point and the attitude of some of the supporters of the hon. Member for Eastwood. I appreciate that the hon. Member for Eastwood told us earlier today that he had written to his hon. Friends saying that they should not bother to turn up because he would seek to adjourn the debate. Nevertheless, I should have thought that the House and, indeed, the public, would look at hon. Members' commitment when they judge what is going on in the House, not just the words that are spoken. There is nobody more tenacious than the right hon. Member for Castle Point.

I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle has come back to the Chamber. He missed the tribute that I paid to him. All Members of the House are sorry that this is his last Parliament. Indeed, that may have been his last intervention—I hope not. We have more time next week, and perhaps even longer. My hon. Friend has earned the respect of all hon. Members for the contribution that he has made, his commitment and his dedication to his beliefs. He will be very much missed, but we all wish him a long and happy retirement——

Mr. Waddington: As the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) would point out, the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Lewis) also missed what I had to say about him, which was also kindly.

Mr. Dubs: My hon. Friend has now had the embarrassment of listening to our tributes, and he can read them twice over in Hansard on Monday. I have not been in the House all that long, but I know that it is always sad when one's colleagues decide that they will stand no longer. They are missed. I want my hon. Friend to know that.

I welcome the fact that my hon. Friend took all the trouble to come here today. After all, many other people did not. I know that he is concerned about the Bill. After he campaigned in Carlisle yesterday in the local elections, the fact that he took the trouble to come here simply to be present is a further sign of his dedication and commitment. I hope that his successor notes that and takes a leaf out of his book.

I am puzzled because I should have thought that it would be helpful to the future deliberations of the House if we had the benefit of debating the Bill for the rest of the day. I am disappointed that we have not had that opportunity.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I repeat the point that I made when moving the motion: this procedure enables other private Members to have an opportunity to put a case to the House, with which I may or may not agree. That principle is important, too.

Mr. Dubs: That is an interesting point, which I shall come to later. I had assumed that that would be one of the hon. Gentleman's motives, but I shall consider the others first because it is important. His first argument was that he thought that he could not get the Bill through all its stages today. Implicit in what he said—he may have said it explicitly—was the view not only that he could not get the Bill through today, but that if there were no election, there would be no chance of getting his Bill through by October, which normally would be the end of the parliamentary Session. So the hon. Gentleman let his supporters go and he gave up his opportunity.

I am surprised at that because the other day I was on the Standing Committee dealing with the Obscene Publications Bill. The promoter of the Bill was determined —he failed—to try to get his Bill to the Floor of the House for the final day when the Report stage of private Members' Bills takes precedence so that they have a chance of becoming law.

Mr. Stewart: I do not want to extend this argument, but this is the last day, other than 3 July, on which private Members' Bills can be considered on Report and on Third Reading. Given that, if a private Members' Bill does not get through the House today, it clearly cannot go through another place and be back for consideration on 3 July which is the last day available for private Members' Bills.

Mr. Dubs: I understand that, but I should have thought that that would have been an argument for continuing until 2.30 pm today, rather than giving up at 10.30 pm, if there is commitment to the legislation. This is an important point of principle because private Members' time is limited and is a valuable commodity. Members fight hard to get a share of the time that is available on the Floor of the House for putting forward their own ideas and Bills. Therefore, to give in quite so easily makes me wonder, but I have already covered that. I understand that this is the last day for the Report stage, but that suggests to me that the hon. Gentleman might have shown more determination than he did.

12 noon

The hon. Gentleman hinted that he does not believe that there will be an October in this parliamentary Session or that there will not even be a Friday next in this Session. We are all aware that this may well be the last private Members' Friday before the general election — [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman throws his hands up as if to say that he does not know, but perhaps he does know. However, I wonder whether it is right for a Member of this House—of course I accept that the decision must be his—to decide that he will not pursue a private Member's Bill merely because an election might be called on Monday or Tuesday. We have had an election hanging over us for some little while now and there will be other occasions when an election dangles over the House and the country. We should not stop work and forget our responsibilities simply because we think that an election may be called. The hon. Gentleman may have been influenced by the results of yesterday's local elections. However, I believe that he made his decision yesterday evening before any of us had access to those local election results.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Yes, I did.

Mr. Dubs: The hon. Gentleman says, yes. Nevertheless, one should not take as a forgone conclusion what the Prime Minister will decide. I cannot help thinking that it might have been a better tactic if the hon. Gentleman had continued until 2.30 pm.

My last argument, to which the hon. Gentleman gave weight because he intervened on it a moment ago, is that he wants to give an opportunity this afternoon for other Bills to be considered. He said that it would be a generous gesture on his part to allow other legislation to be debated and that that is why he is seeking to adjourn his own. According to today's Order Paper, about 21 other private Members' Bills are waiting to be discussed when we have disposed of the Licensing (Amendment) Bill. I wonder which of those Bills he is seeking to favour because clearly he is giving up his time for the sake of another measure. Therefore, I am looking with some interest at the other Bills to see which the hon. Gentleman wishes to speed on its way.

Mr. Stewart: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not draw any implications from the fact that well down the Order Paper is a ten-minute Bill, which is in my name. I hope that he will not suggest that.

Mr. Dubs: Of course, I should not do any such thing. As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I was simply casting my eye down the list of the Bills that are waiting to be debated today. Every one of those Bills stands less chance of becoming law than the hon. Gentleman's Bill. Virtually all await Second Reading debates or are adjourned debates on Second Reading, so they all have further to go to reach the statute book.

The Tobacco Smoking (Public Places) Bill is an important measure and would add significantly to the health of the nation. If I thought that it had a chance of becoming law I would sit down. Clearly, I would wish to speed it on its way. However, we may not reach it because the Local Government Act 1986 (Amendment) Bill [Lords] comes next. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman thinks that it will be disposed of quickly so that we can reach the Tobacco Smoking (Public Places) Bill.

The Tobacco Smoking (Public Places) Bill will help to decrease the amount of smoking. The effect of smoking on non-smokers is damaging to their health and can be lessened by having a legislative basis for reducing smoking in public places. As a non-smoker I should like to see that Bill on the statute book. Indeed, I suspect that most hon. Members would happily jump over the second item of business—I know that our procedures do not allow for that—to the third because we would be helping the health of the nation.

The fourth item of business is the Coal Mining Subsidence Bill and, clearly, the hon. Gentleman wants that measure, standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes), to reach the statute book.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I appreciate the difficulties that we have today, but I would be pleased if we could reach that Bill. It affects many constituencies and Members of Parliament as the problem of coal mining subsidence stretches from the north into Scotland, part of which the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) represents. It is an important Bill and a tragedy that we shall not reach it. The National Coal Board has dealt unfairly with many people, particularly some of my constituents.

Mr. Dubs: I thank my hon. Friend for explaining that and I share his view that it is an important Bill. If I thought that by adjourning this debate there was a chance of discussing the Coal Mining Subsidence Bill and quickly passing it into law, I would not waste a moment by drawing the attention of the House to its importance. I would want to get on and discuss it.

Such are the pressures of a private Members' day that, clearly, we shall not reach that measure. My hon. Friend will have to reintroduce it after the general election, when there will be far more support from the Government for it because we shall be sitting on the Government Benches. It will either be a private Member's Bill with Government support or, even, a Government measure. It is a sign of the usefulness and dedication of my hon. Friend that he seeks to do this. The hon. Member for Eastwood has not said whether he supports the Bill, but I suggest that he is sympathetic to it or at least does not want to delay it.

I do not want to take the time of the House by going through every Bill on the Order Paper, tempting though it is. Clearly, they all have a part to play. However, it is worth saying a little about one or two of them. One of the Bills——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are debating whether the discussion on the Licensing (Amendment) Bill should be adjourned. While the hon. Gentleman may refer to the other Bills as being a motive for the adjournment of this debate, he must not discuss them in detail.

Mr. Dubs: I certainly would not want to do that. The hon. Member for Eastwood said that one of his motives in seeking to persuade the House to adjourn this debate was that other Bills were waiting to be discussed. He did not say which Bill he favoured and I am seeking to tempt him to hint which one it is, without debating the other Bills, so that we may know his other motives. That would help us to judge whether we should adjourn now or decline to adjourn and continue discussing the amendments to the hon. Gentleman's Bill. So far I have not been successful in tempting him to give us a hint, but if we did do that we would be clear about the matter.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I am puzzled about why the hon. Gentleman is pursuing this theme. I did not seek to favour any Bill on the Order Paper but was simply making the point that adjournment of this Bill would give other hon. Members an opportunity to speak. That is what happened when I sat down at nine minutes past two o'clock on Second Reading. That gave to his hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) an opportunity to have a say, although I disagreed with the measure put forward by the hon. Member for Leyton.

Mr. Dubs: Nobody could quarrel with that as a statement of willingness to give way to other hon. Members who wish to put forward other measures. The Housebuyers' Protection Bill stands in my name and some time ago I introduced it by leave of the House. I would be less than human if I did not make a passing reference to this important piece of legislation. Much to my surprise, Government Whips blocked it on a previous Friday. I would have thought that the Government Whips would want to encourage protection for housebuyers and would want to find time to debate this simple and modest measure. Even at this stage, I hope that they will decide to let the measure go through as a sign of their commitment to people who are seeking to buy houses and need consumer protection in the process of so doing.

I shall not test this further by going through the Bills that we might reach today. I have commended my own Bill and achieved one of my purposes.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee,) to be further considered on Friday 3 July.

Local Government Act 1986 (Amendment) Bill [Lords]

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1

AMENDMENT OF LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT 1986

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

12.13 pm

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Would it be in order, Mr. Armstrong, to speak on the Bill as a whole?

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Certainly the hon. Lady may do that. The Bill has only two clauses.

Dame Jill Knight: This Bill came into being for a very good reason. It has not come into being because there have been vague suspicions that all is not well about the teaching of sex in our schools. It is before the Committee because there is evidence in shocking abundance that children in our schools, some as young as five years, are frequently being encouraged into homosexuality and lesbianism. That is happening in our schools, is being paid for out of rates, and is against the wishes of the children's parents.

For those reasons, and because of the abundance of evidence, the Bill was introduced in another place where, of course, it has gone through all its stages. It gained unqualified acceptance from all sides and all political parties in the other place.

As I have said, there are many pieces of evidence as reasons for this Bill. I shall quote only a few examples. First, there is a publication called "The Playbook for Kids about Sex". It is written for young children and is presented in the type of colour and line drawings that would appeal to a child. In fact, it is the most frightening piece of propaganda against children. There is also a book called "The Milkman's on his Way". I shall not shock the House by quoting from it, but, in explicit terms, it describes intercourse between a 16-year-old boy and his adult male homosexual lover. The book glorifies homosexuality and encourages youngsters to believe that it is better than any other sexual way of life.

Recently, the lesbian and gay development unit of Haringey council made a video called "How to become a lesbian in 35 minutes". Under the aegis of the council, it was shown to mentally handicapped girls, of whom one was aged 18, one was aged 16, and the others were much younger. Another book is being promulgated by a local council. It is called "Jenny lives with Eric and Martin". That book has been the subject of a great deal of public protest. It pictures a little girl of about six in bed with her father and his lover, both of whom are naked. It is a picture storybook, aimed at six to eight-year-olds, and is made available by education officials in and for junior schools. There was a great outcry. Anyone who would oppose the Bill should read that book and consider how they feel about it. It tells youngsters:

"Jenny is a little girl. Martin is Jenny's dad and Eric is Martin's lover. They all live happily together."

Eric draws Jenny a series of cartoons of two men saying: "I love you, Fred. 'I love you too, Bill.' Why don't we move in together? 'That is a good idea.'"

It is terrifying to me that local councils have been promoting that kind of stuff. I could give the House many examples, but I shall not go on. There is a pile of filth, and it is shocking when one considers that it is all paid for by the rates. What is the aim?

Today, one or two of us are thinking about manifestos. I shall not go into the reason why, but certainly we are doing so. I look no further than the gay liberation front manifesto to find the reasons for such stuff appearing before our children and being promulgated and proselytised to them. The gay liberation front manifesto states:

"We must fight for something more than reform. We must aim at the abolition of the family. This will benefit all women and gays."

We could argue for some time about how true it is that the abolition of the family would help women, but it is debatable whether it would be anything other than a disaster for the country.

It is important that the House should understand that the Bill in no way attacks the rights of adult people to live their own lives in their own way. It is a free country. Many homosexuals live their lives totally within the law and would no more think of molesting little boys than a normal heterosexual would think of molesting little girls. Nothing in the Bill is aimed at such people. There is all the difference in the world between allowing adults to live in the way in which they consider is right for them and trying to pervert little children.

I remember the occasion many years ago when we were first presented with a Bill on homosexuality and the rights of homosexuals. The debate was joined as to whether homosexuals were born or made. An elderly gentleman who had been a colonel in the Indian army told me that it was his belief that homosexuals were made if enough influence was exerted upon them. He said that in the hill country and in parts of Poona, when he was in the Indian army, drummer boys used to be sent out from England —they were often orphans—and sent up to the forward areas to the regiments. He said—I have never forgotten this—that not one of those children had a chance. They all ended up as homosexuals because of the life they were forced to lead. I find it outrageous that little children should have been perverted in that way.

Those in another place and millions outside Parliament object to little children being perverted, diverted or converted from normal family life to a lifestyle which is desperately dangerous for society and extremely dangerous for them. Any venereologist will say that syphilis, gonorrhoea and genital herpes are characteristically infections of homosexuals. If that were not enough, we now have the terror of AIDS. Very few hon. Members fail to appreciate the seriousness of the danger that AIDS presents to the whole of our society, yet some of that which is being taught to children in our schools would undoubtedly lead to a great spread of AIDS. Even the knowledge of the danger of AIDS has not stopped the promoting of homosexuality among little children.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): The hon. Lady has suggested that the whole of our society is in danger from AIDS — homosexuals and heterosexuals. There is evidence in some countries of an increasingly wide spread of AIDS among the heterosexual population, and I do not understand why she is dwelling on homosexuality. It seems that in the end AIDS will affect all people in about the same way.

Dame Jill Knight: The hon. Gentleman's intervention suggests that he has not done his homework on AIDS. The disease spreads into ordinary heterosexual members of society through contact with those who have had AIDS, and I think that 95 per cent. of those who start AIDS come from the homosexual section. It is from that section that the danger of AIDS has come, and within that section the danger is infinitely more severe than in any other. That is where it started, and I cannot believe that the hon. Gentleman, who has a serious regard for morality and good behaviour in life, can fail to appreciate that little children as young as five years of age in our schools ought not to be taught that homosexuality is a normal way of life. It is undoubtedly true that the desperate disease of AIDS starts with and comes mainly from homosexuals.

Mr. Dubs: It is my understanding that the danger of AIDS is now faced equally by both the heterosexual and homosexual sections of the population, and that there are certain countries where heterosexuals have been as affected by AIDS as homosexuals. I am talking about medical opinion on the likely way in which AIDS will spread in future, unless the spread of this dreadful disease is checked. It is misleading to suggest that the link between AIDS and homosexuality is such that there is not the likelihood of an equivalent link between AIDS and heterosexuality.

Dame Jill Knight: I must urge the hon. Gentleman to look into the subject with rather more care than he has obviously done so far. If he asks any of the eminent doctors in London—let alone outside London—who are experts on the subject, he will find that AIDS starts among homosexuals, and that they pose the greatest danger. The disease spreads to others when a homosexual with AIDS has relations with a woman, or gives tainted blood that has not been screened. We know of that danger from other countries.

The hon. Gentleman must not try to hold up our proceedings. He may be seeking information on the matter, but I must tell him, with the greatest courtesy, that at present he is not very well informed on it. Any doctor who has specialised in the subject would say, "For God's sake, do not promote homosexuality as a way of life. It is desperately dangerous."

Let me return to my main theme. The proselytising in schools of a homosexual society is all paid for by the ratepayers, 99 per cent. of whom strongly object to their money being used in that way. Parents' associations have been set up: the Parents Action Group has been particularly active. Nearly a year ago, a deputation from the group went to protest to the deputy leader of a local council that the policy discriminated against religious beliefs. The deputation included people with a wide range of religions—for instance, Catholics and Muslims—and some with no religion. They were told that the Koran needed updating, and that the Bible should be rewritten. What a thing to tell parents who are anxious about what is happening to their children. Further, a member of the gay and lesbian sub-committee of the council told the group that "parents do not know what is in the best interests of their children . . . we do." Some of the doctors do, too.

Let me add in passing that teachers who have protested strongly at what they have been asked to do have been discriminated against and intimidated in the most frightening manner. That worries me as well.

Hundreds of thousands of pounds are being spent by some councils in promoting homosexuality in our schools. All of that money could be far better spent. I am not talking about boroughs in which no council houses need repairing, and nothing needs to be done about the roads; I am not talking about councils that have examined everything in their remit and have concluded that there is nothing else on which to spend their money. Every penny of the money spent on promoting homosexuality could and should be far better spent elsewhere, and it bothers me to learn that parents and ratepayers who have gone to protest have on some occasions been physically attacked.

This is a very short Bill, with one main clause and four subsections. Subsection (1) prevents a local authority from giving "financial or other assistance" to any person for the purpose of publishing or promoting homosexuality as an acceptable family relationship, or for the purpose of teaching such acceptability in any maintained school. Hon. Members should note the words "other assistance". The other assistance would cover the provision of local authority premises for a guest speaker or the financing of conferences to get over the homosexuality message to six-year-olds. Anything of that kind would be banned by the Bill.

12.30 pm

Subsection (2) provides that a breach of subsection (1) shall be dealt with in the civil courts, and subsection (3) identifies those who may institute proceedings under subsection (2). They are given locus standi. Subsection (4) sensibly excuses a local authority if it has taken reasonable steps to ensure compliance with the law but its instructions have been ignored.

Clause 2 relates to the short title. It provides that the Bill will not apply to Northern Ireland.

The Bill has completed all its stages in another place and support for it came from right across the political spectrum. The Earl of Halsbury, who introduced the Bill, was supported by the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Longford, Lord Campbell of Alloway, Lord Denning and Lord Bellwin. They feel that the Bill should be enacted as it stands as it would put a stop to the iniquitous corruption of children. I thank all those who have helped in various ways to frame the Bill. Not thousands but millions of people of all parties and of none have said that they support the Bill. I hope that the House will bless it and will pass it.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I am glad to take this opportunity to congratulate my kinsman the Earl of Halsbury on his clear discernment of the public mind on an important moral issue. We owe him gratitude and praise for carrying this Bill through all its stages in the other place.

We live in an age of doubt. Many moral certainties of Victorian times and the orthodox Christian traditions of earlier generations are being questioned, openly challenged and quite often publicly flouted. Everyone should approach moral questions with humility. The Greeks gave us the injunction—"Know thyself."—at the same time as they originated our democratic culture. How many people can claim truthfully to have attained full self-knowledge? The road to self-knowledge often takes us through stony places. Many of our moral beliefs originated with the teaching of the Greek thinkers. Our own Christian testament was written in Greek, yet homosexuality was not always condemned in classical Greece.

The whole subject remains a source of difficulty and uncertainty in the consciences of a number of people—including, as I know, an element among my constituents in Kensington. But it is an obvious fact that a man's physique shows rudimentary female characteristics, and I think that few men would claim to be entirely devoid of qualities that we associate primarily with the feminine virtues. Few women, I think, would wish to be entirely without any element of manliness. Indeed, some of the grandest figures in history and the most influential personalties of today have a broad sexual orientation.

I should like, however, to make two points very strongly in support of the intentions of the Bill. First, the physical processes of generation can be fertile or they can be morbid and fruitless. It is repugnant to the majority of people to see the endowments of our bodies, which enable us to recreate our own likeness and to perpetuate human life, turned into useless or unnatural channels. They are not happy, although they are prepared to accept, that such practices take place in privacy. They certainly are not prepared to endorse the policies of certain elements on local councils, such as ILEA or some outer London boroughs, that homosexuality should be presented openly, and even authoritatively recommended, with the support of public funds.

Secondly, on a more general constitutional consideration, it has become increasingly widely held since the 16th and 17th century wars of religion that the political organs of the state should not seek to govern or to interfere with the freedom of private conscience. In parenthesis, as we move into a post-Socialist political framework, we are coming, I think increasingly to accept that it is not permissible for political figures to intrude themselves into industry or the workings of the economy either. But it is not generally acceptable now that the state should devote substantial efforts and resources to the dissemination even of the tenets of faith, or the enforcement of codes of personal conduct in private, which enjoy majority support. It is certainly quite inadmissible that a small, unrepresentative group should capture control of a local authority and then divert its resources to the promotion of highly controversial minority points of private belief and conduct within families.

In London many parents — I believe the great majority — are deeply opposed to the promotion of homosexuality in education and will warmly support the Bill. I am proud that it was on my motion last week that the Bill obtained its Second Reading, and I trust that it will now successfully go through its remaining stages in this honourable House.

The Minister for Local Government (Dr. Rhodes Boyson): I have listened carefully to my hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) and for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams). I have also read the debates in another place where the Bill received support from all quarters and there were no Divisions at any stage.

As is usual with Bills brought in or taken up by a private Member, I intervene to make clear the Government's view of the Bill. As many hon. Members know, the Government's views of the Bill have, from time to time, been misrepresented. Many of those who have written to hon. Members, whose letters have been drawn to my attention and the attention of other Ministers in the Department of the Environment by those hon. Members, have thought that the Government are opposed to this Bill. That is certainly not the case. Bills brought in by private Members or, as in this case, private Peers, fall into a number of categories. Some embody a policy which is totally alien to that of the Government, and those we must oppose and advise hon. Members to vote against. Others reflect Government policy, and may even have been suggested by the Government. Those, of course, we support. Others may reflect the Government's views, but be on a subject about which the Government think that it is for Parliament to make up its own mind. Others may be in harmony with the Government's views but perhaps not deal with the matter as the Government would think most appropriate.

It is into this last category that this Bill fell when it was introduced. There can be no doubt that every Minister who has been involved with the Bill strongly supports its aim, encapsulated in its long title

"A Bill intituled. An Act to restrain local authorities from promoting homosexuality".

The whole country owes the noble earl Lord Halsbury and his colleagues a debt of gratitude for bringing forward the legislation and ensuring that the topic stays in the front of public debate.

At the outset of the debate in the other place, my noble Friend Lord Skelmersdale made it clear that the Government have every sympathy with the aims underlying the proposals in this Bill. I re-emphasise in this House that sympathy. The Government share the view that a society is defined by its shared beliefs and habits. There are some kinds of behaviour that Christian charity may lead us to tolerate, but that is no reason why public funds should be spent on promoting that behaviour and no reason why we should tolerate those who spend public funds in that way. Undermining the common standards of society, flaunting behaviour that the overwhelming majority of those brought up in this country and in its traditions find revolting, unsettling the minds of the coming generation is one way — a subtle way — of changing the society in which we live.

All of us have noticed in recent years an attack on the institution of the family, which is the basic building block of society. A society that turns its back on the family and undermines it in any way will pay heavy penalties in the future. One understands that certain people are born with different interests — I put it as gently as I can. I am certainly not one of those who would wish there to be any persecution of those individuals. I do not think that any hon. Member wishes that. The Bill opposes the positive images of lesbianism and homosexuality, as though they were alternative ways of life that should be shown to all children in schools. Those images imply that one can say to children that they can live in a family with a mother and father, but there is an alternative way of life which is just as reputable, in which one lives with a person of one's own sex, and the two are equal. That could undermine the basis of our society. The vast majority of parents, irrespective of how they voted yesterday or of how they will vote in a general election, feel intensely about this matter.

One could say that the positive promotion of the images of lesbianism and male homosexuality as though they are equivalent to family life could bring death in one generation. I am not referring to AIDS. I am talking about death in a generation, because there is no future in it—it is the end of creation. Any society that is concerned for its future in every way and for its continuation must have a clear view about what it is doing.

I am sure that we are all alarmed about many things that have been going on. My hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston referred to this. Baroness Cox, who lived until recently in my constituency, said on Second Reading:

"I was speaking to teachers in Manchester on Saturday and was assured that similar policies are being pursued in parts of the North of England. This should not surprise us."

She referred to the book "Tackling Heterosexism". I have seen that book, but could not lay my hands on it for this debate. I shall provide the book for any hon. Members who would like to see it, because I was horrified by what I saw.

Baroness Cox said that the book has "been brought out by nine London boroughs, recommends that the Inner London Education Authority and other local education authorities should:

'put resources into developing materials and changing curricula in order effectively to challenge heterosexism in lessons at all stages in the education system from primary school up to colleges of further education and that a variety of materials be developed, for example videos for use in lessons which would raise the issues of heterosexism and present Lesbians in a positive light . . . [and that] heterosexism awareness training courses should be introduced as a compulsory part of in-service training and during teacher training programmes'."

Baroness Cox said:

"In places such as Brent"—

a place in the British Isles that I know very well—

"those who do not pass such courses are to be debarred from sitting on appointments panels, and the implications of that for future appointments are self-evident; namely, that successful candidates in the future will have to be ideologically correct and have the appropriate sexual attitudes." — [Official Report, House of Lords, 18 December 1986; Vol. 483, c. 320-21.]

Recently, I was approached in my constituency by parents of all political parties about a document in Brent libraries—"Out in Brent"—which I have with me. It uses a definition that differs from the one that we would have used five or 10 years ago. There are lists of homosexual and lesbian literature; the book was easily available on the lower library shelves and children were picking it up. The name of one library was given to me and many people wrote to me about the matter. I took up the matter. Parents were concerned, irrespective of where they stood on the political platform.

I quote again from a letter printed last year in the Daily Telegraph by somebody who had before her ILEA's book "Secondary Issues?" which is also available to hon. Members. It is distributed to schools and purports to deal with equality of opportunity in secondary education. The letter says:

"In the section on school libraries it enthuses 'We have included lesbian and gay contact phone numbers on wall charts giving general advice, produced book lists, and we have positively included work on lesbian and gay people in library worksheets.'"

I draw the following to the attention of hon. Members. The letter in the Daily Telegraph says:

"The book notes with approval the removal of a section on romance from a school library".

There is no romance in these sad days, according to how some people would like us to live. ILEA replaced the section on romance

"with a section on 'relationships'—'encompassing lesbian and gay relationships, heterosexual relationships and family relationships.' Organisations listed for schools to contact include a 'Gay Teachers Group'."

12.45 pm

I have other letters, including one to the Prime Minister from another borough in London. I will not delay the House further by referring to other material, except to refer to an advertisement in Haringey's publication "Job Search" that promised preferential treatment for gays and lesbians seeking jobs as play group assistants looking after 5 to 11-year-olds. I remember reading last year that in that borough parents, again from parties of all political views, closed a school for a day because they objected to what was proposed in this type of teaching.

It is wrong for public funds to be used to promote homosexuality as an alternative to the family way of life. It does not follow from that that it is automatically right to invoke the law to prevent local authorities from using public funds in this way. The defenders of those aberrant local authorities will be quick to point out that they are elected, that they are responsible to their electorate, and that the electorate can turn out the members who support practices of which they disapprove. That is true, but it does not mean that Parliament should stand by and do nothing.

Hon. Members will know of my interest in 19th-century local government. Before the reform era in the 1830s, local authorities quite often used their powers to line the pockets of their members. In the Municipal Corporations Act 1835, Parliament did not stand by and leave it to the voters. Our predecessors took effective steps to outlaw such practices. It is for Parliament to define the area of action for local authorities. There can be no doubt of the constitutional propriety of Parliament intervening if we think that local authorities are going too far. There can be no doubt about the support of the Government for the principles behind the Bill.

My noble Friend Lord Skelmersdale also made it clear that the Government have reservations about some aspects of the Bill and it is my duty to comment on those. First, the Bill goes over ground that Parliament has recently traversed. The Education (No. 2) Act 1986 made significant changes in the law relating to sex education in schools. It transferred responsibility for decisions on sex education to the new governing bodies to be set up for every maintained school. It required those concerned to ensure that any teaching on sex is set within a clear moral context and is supportive of family life. There are those who feel that it is premature to enact further measures until we see how the 1986 Act works. On the other hand, the supporters of the Bill have argued forcefully that there is sufficient scope within the Act for the continuance of measures of which we and they disapprove.

Secondly, the Local Government Act 1986 made provision for a code of recommended practice for local authorities when making decisions on publicity. Again, it can be argued that time should be given for this code to be produced, approved by Parliament, and take effect. My noble Friend Lord Skelmersdale told the other place that we intended to include a provision in the code that local authority publicity should not offend against generally accepted moral standards. I can confirm that today we are issuing that code of practice for formal consultation with the local authority associations, as required by the Act.

Finally, it can be argued — people have done that through the ages in the House—that it is premature and that we ought to deal with all the areas in which discretionary activity by local authorities is causing concern. That, of course, is what F. M. Cornford in his classic work "Microcosmographia Academica" identified as the principle of the wedge. I have a copy of that book with me, not by accident. As hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber will know,

"The Principle of the Wedge is that you should not act justly now for fear of raising expectations that you may act still more justly in the future—expectations which you are afraid that you may not have the courage to satisfy".

The House will have to decide for itself whether or not this approach is correct. I conclude by saying once more that the Government have great sympathy for the aims of those who have promoted this Bill. In fairness to the House, we have identified and I have brought to its attention some aspects which may be shortcomings. It is for the House to decide whether those shortcomings are so great that the clause should not stand part of the Bill. It is a private Member's Bill and the House must make up its mind.

However, the Government do not take the view that those shortcomings are sufficient to deny the Bill a passage. As those who have read my writings will expect, for my part I think that the clause should stand part of the Bill, and I support it.

Mr. Dubs: I am a little taken aback by the way in which the House has, with a measure that is bound to attract a lot of publicity, bypassed some of the normal procedures. I am not clear what happened on a particular Friday afternoon, but it seems that we gave the Bill a Second Reading on the nod—I assume that is what happened—and then we bypassed the normal Committee stage upstairs and we are dealing with the Committee stage on the Floor of the House.

Dr. Boyson: I believe that the Bill was moved to a Committee of the whole House. I just say that in fairness.

Mr. Dubs: I am aware of that. However, we have avoided the normal process of discussion in Committee upstairs and taken it on the Floor of the House. It is my experience that when the House does not give a measure proper scrutiny, it is likely that bad legislation will be the outcome. That has been my experience whenever the House has tried to do things on the nod.

Dame Jill Knight: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the measure was fully discussed in another place. That is not unusual in itself. There was a wide-ranging debate, including a Committee stage and Report stage, and a small amendment was moved. There has been nothing untoward in the way in which the Bill has been produced or put to the House. Every rule of the House has been adhered to.

Mr. Dubs: I am not suggesting that every rule has not been adhered to. I am suggesting that, if we can reach the Committee stage of a Bill without the necessary preliminary debate, discussion and scrutiny, although every rule of the House may have been adhered to technically, the real, proper process by which we subject legislation to debate and discussion is not taking place.

The fact is that most people were not aware that the measure was coming up for debate. If they had known, not withstanding the local elections yesterday, the House would not have been so empty. It was assumed that we would spend more time on the previous Bill and that we would not reach this point. The House and the country are effectively being taken unawares by the way in which this measure is being dealt with.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I have to object to the hon. Gentleman's line of argument. The Bill was on the Order Paper last Friday for all hon. Members, the Gallery and everybody else to see. I moved that it should have a Second Reading at a time when there were other hon. Members in the House. They could have objected had they chosen, under the long-standing procedures of the House. But not one Member chose to object, with the result that the Bill obtained a Second Reading, as the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) said, on the nod.

I did not propose that it should be committed to a Committee of the whole House, but with a one-clause Bill is it not really rather fatuous to insist that it has to be sent to a Committee upstairs, which would be appropriate for a longer and more detailed measure? I think that the whole Bill occupies less than about 40 lines. Surely, on a matter of broad general interest, hon. Members might well be glad to have the opportunity to intervene in the Committee stage which is offered when the Bill is taken on the Floor of the House but which is restricted when the Bill is committed to a group of 16 or 20 Members.

Every Member of the House could have been present here today to intervene on the Bill if he had so chosen, but I think the vast majority of Members support the Bill and those who have reservations about it are wise enough to keep them to themselves.

Mr. Dubs: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's line of argument. We all know what happens on Friday afternoons. This measure has been slipped though and I am sure that most Members do not realise that we are in the middle of the Committee stage of a Bill that we did not expect to reach today.

Dame Jill Knight: It was on the Order Paper.

Mr. Dubs: It is no use the hon. Lady saying that it was on the Order Paper. The fact remains that most hon. Members were not aware of it. There are masses of measures on the Order Paper every Friday. There are more than 20 on today's Order Paper. If the first 10 had been withdrawn and we had started making progress on the 11th everyone would have been astonished, as the hon. Lady well knows.

I do not suggest that any Member has not behaved absolutely properly. I am protesting that we are the victims of a procedure which is undemocratic in practice and denies Members the chance to debate a very important matter. I am perfectly aware that there is concern in our constituencies about this issue. Some of us would have liked to consult further on it, had that been possible. It was not possible because of the way in which we have arrived at debating this measure. I believe that the situation is wrong and undemocratic.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight) said that the Bill had been subjected to scrutiny in another place, but that is no substitute for a proper debate in this House. Most of our constituents do not follow what goes on in the other House and have no access to Members of that House, so most of our constituents are prevented from making their views known if the only debate is in the other place. If ever there was an argument for abolishing the other House, it is the argument that because a matter has been discussed there we need not bother about it. That is an appallingly undemocratic attitude and I resent the argument by an elected Member of this House that Members of the other House, who are unelected and accountable to no one, have discussed the matter so we need not bother. We are caught in a situation in which we cannot give the measure proper scrutiny.

The Minister has said that the Government have three reservations about the Bill but that if the House wills it the measure will go through. That is not right either. We are dealing with an extremely important matter which goes to the heart of moral issues in this country and the way in which our children are educated. Whatever one's view—the hon. Member for Edgbaston surely believes in proper debate and discussion—it is wrong that we should be bulldozed on such a sensitive and difficult issue on the basis that it has been slipped through the House of Commons when only half a dozen Members were present, so it can just go through.

I resent that approach. It is wrong in principle, even if an election is called on Monday, to bulldoze a measure through in this way. It is possible that a majority might have supported it, but there is no way of putting the matter to the test. It has been an abuse of the procedures of the House to bypass normal democratic debate and discussion and I bitterly resent the fact that the House has been put in this position. There is no opportunity for a proper debate because the Benches are empty.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: The hon. Gentleman is continuing to advance an argument which is really contrary to the whole tradition and procedures of the House. The fact that the Committee stage of the Bill was on the Order Paper for today was printed and was known to any hon. Member who chose to take an interest. Any hon. Member who wishes to take part in this Committee stage is able to do so now. I have noticed that there are not many hon. Members who wish to intervene in support of what the hon. Gentleman is saying. That is perhaps something that the hon. Gentleman should also take into account. If he feels that there are large numbers of hon. Members who would oppose the Bill had they appreciated that it was going to have its Committee stage today, would he be so kind as to enlighten us by giving us their names?

Mr. Dubs: This is preposterous. The hon. Gentleman understands what I am saying. I have said that there should be proper debate. I have not ventured a single comment on the merits or demerits of the Bill. I have said that it is wrong in principle that we should not have the opportunity for a proper debate. We are being denied that opportunity. The Government have said that they wash their hands of the Bill and that someone else should decide. They think that there is no need for the Bill, but they are not prepared to do anything about it. That is quite wrong.

Dr. Boyson: I want to explain one point for the record. I did not say that I did not think that there was no need for the Bill. I said that, as the Bill stood, the Government may have certain reservations about certain points. However, we support the Bill and I certainly support it as an individual. We did not say that we did not think that there was no need for the Bill. There is a need for a measure to control homosexual and lesbian propaganda in schools. I will not be misinterpreted on that point.

Mr. Dubs: Fine. I hear what the Minister has said. Nevertheless, I listened very carefully to the Minister's comments. He went through the Bill and then said that he had to express three reservations on behalf of the Government. I accept fully his own personal position. However, he went through the reservations, which suggested to me that the Bill at this point was unnecessary because two other Bills will come pretty close to meeting the same aims. Therefore, it was not necessarily right in principle to have a third piece of legislation until we have had a chance to assess the effects of the other two. That is a pretty fair rendering of what the Minister said. Normally when we are bulldozed in this way, the Government would say that the Bill should make no further progress and we should consider the impact of the other two pieces of legislation first and then decide. That is the proper way in which a responsible House of Commons would legislate, not in the way that we are seeking to legislate today.

Dame Jill Knight: I remind the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) that earlier today he appeared to suggest to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) the reverse to that procedure. He said that he would be perfectly happy to skip the other Bills to reach the Bill that he is promoting or one of his hon. Friend's Bills. The hon. Member for Battersea must be consistent. There are rules to which we must all adhere. The hon. Member must not go in one direction in response to one Bill and another direction on a point of procedure.

Mr. Dubs: I have been perfectly consistent. Let me explain to the hon. Lady why I am being consistent. When I argued that there was a Bill standing in my name further down the list on the Order Paper, it must be understood that I was seeking a Second Reading debate for that Bill so that the House would be able to debate the basic principle of my Bill—

Dame Jill Knight: That is exactly the same.

Mr. Dubs: —after which the Bill would have gone to a Standing Committee for further discussion and scrutiny, as is proper.

Dame Jill Knight: Within the rules of the House, the hon. Member for Battersea is perfectly free to ask that his Bill be taken on the Floor of the House. Every hon. Member must consider the position and the date. Bearing in mind that full debates may have taken place in another place, every hon. Member is perfectly free to decide to have a debate on the Floor of the House, and the hon. Member for Battersea would have been free to make such a decision.

Mr. Dubs: I am not disputing the right of any hon. Member to make that decision, nor am I disputing the right of any hon. Member to use the small print of our Standing Orders to expedite business that they wish to further. Nevertheless, I also have the right to say on behalf of many other hon. Members that we resent the fact that we are being bulldozed in this way without an opportunity for debate.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: Who are those hon. Members?

Mr. Dubs: It is no good the hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) asking from a sedentary position who they are. It is disgraceful that an important Bill that affects the way in which our children are to be educated is to be debated without more than a handful of hon. Members present. Even the hon. Member for Edgbaston would surely not wish her Bill to progress without proper debate or discussion.

I resent one more thing. We have not had a chance to go to our constituencies and discuss some of the details with constituents who have raised those matters with us so that we can refer to them in the House. I did not know that the Bill would come up in this form; otherwise I should not be making these points. I am not alone in that. Had I known that, I should have been able to come to the debate with more examples, possibly even in support of what the hon. Member for Edgbaston said, or in contradiction of what she said. But, above all, I would have had the chance to speak to teachers and education authorities.

Technically, the Bill is about local government. The Minister had long experience in education before he came to the House, but there is no representative of the Department of Education and Science on the Government Front Bench. Instead, we have a Minister from the Department of the Environment. I understand why—it is a local government Bill—but the Bill is in fact about education. We are not approaching it as if it were about education, but we should. Then there would be Ministers from the Department of Education and Science and colleagues of mine on the Opposition Front Bench who speak on education, who could address properly and sensibly how best to deal with those difficult and sensitive areas in our schools. I am angry that we cannot do that.

There is not even the chance for a pause so that the House can reflect on those matters. We have to go rushing through with the measure. That is wrong in principle. I should like to ask you, Sir Paul, whether there is any way in which we can be protected from that procedure, which, although technically correct, in practice represents an abuse of hon. Members' rights.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): Let me try to help the hon. Gentleman and respond to his question. The proceedings are entirely in order, so I am afraid that there is nothing that I can do to assist him.

Mr. Dubs: I feared as much. I remember when a Bill was being rushed through at an earlier stage in the proceedings than the stage that we have now reached, and Mr. Deputy Speaker said from the Chair that Mr. Speaker did not like Bills being rushed through without an opportunity for proper debate. Although the example is not parallel, that is still the position.

Having made my protest—I feel strongly about that—I should like to refer to the debates in the other place. More than one hon. Member has said, "Well, the other place has debated it. That is all right. It was a full debate." However much publicity and attention were given to the Bill and its passage in the other place, there was not nearly as much as there would be if we were to debate it properly in the House of Commons. We all know that. Feelings run high on the issue, or the hon. Member for Edgbaston would not have called forth the examples that she gave in her speech. I am sure that some people would oppose the Bill and others would like to understand its details better and the implications.

Because feelings run high on the issue, it would have been right for public opinion to be made aware that we were debating the Bill today. Whatever excuses we have or do not have for looking at the small print or at the Order Paper for what might come up for debate today, the fact is that the public were not aware of that. I defy any hon. Member to say that a large number of his constituents realised that we would discuss the issue today and that he had letters urging him to take a particular view on the Bill in the debate this Friday. I am certain that not one hon. Member had such a letter or any representations from a constituent.

Therefore, we are proceeding without regard to our constituents and without the normal processes that allow us, in discussion and by listening to our constituents, which is a key part of our job, to come here with better knowledge and better information.

I should have liked more detailed discussion with education authorities. The Minister read something from the Inner London education authority. The hon. Member for Edgbaston read something from an education authority and the hon. Member for Kensington also read something that referred to one or two education authorities. However, we have not had a chance to listen to what the education authorities have to say.

If the education authorities had been aware that this Bill was to come before us, it is absolutely certain that they would have written to us to give us their views for and against the Bill. They would also have given us details and examples and we should have had a better informed debate then we are having at the moment. That has been denied to us and it is why I am resentful about the way in which we have approached this matter.

In her speech introducing the clause, which, after all, is virtually the totality of the Bill, the hon. Member for Edgbaston said a great deal about AIDS about which I must take issue with her. I concede that I am certainly not an expert on the subject, but I have listened to and read a certain amount about it, as we all have. I resent the hon. Lady's suggestion that there is such a clear link between AIDS and homosexuality and that heterosexuality hardly comes into the issue. It would have been helpful if a Minister from the Department of Health and Social Security had been here to clarify the matter.

I have not come equipped with all the evidence, documents or research that I have received. Quite frankly, I am not sure that the hon. Lady's comments were accurate. She suggested that we must not in any way—I am not sure whether she used the word "promote" but for the sake of example I shall quote from her Bill—"promote homosexuality" in schools, because of the likelihood that that would increase the chance of people getting AIDS. Is that a fair version of what the hon. Lady said?

Dame Jill Knight: Not really. I mentioned the various diseases which, sadly, are linked with homosexuality. I said that any venereologist would agree with that. I gave a long list of those diseases. I did not intend to speak about AIDS at length. It was the hon. Gentleman's intervention that led me to say a little more about that than I had intended. Our disagreement about this would clearly be settled if the hon. Gentleman would ask doctors about it.

Serious diseases are linked with homosexuality but that was only one of a number of reasons why children should be protected from being taught that homosexuality is a way of life.

Mr. Dubs: The hon. lady is linking two rather different things. It is one thing to say that homosexuality is a way of life from which children should be protected—I shall come to that a little later—but it is another thing to assert, as I think she did, that somehow homosexuality means AIDS and that AIDS means homosexuality.

Dame Jill Knight indicated assent.

Mr. Dubs: The hon. Lady is nodding, so that is what she is saying. However, I must say to her that, having seen her own Secretary of State for Social Services on television and having watched some of the educational and publicity programmes about AIDS, I am by no means convinced that the hon. Lady understands these matters as well as she claims.

Dame Jill Knight: Go and ask a doctor.

Mr. Dubs: It is no good the hon. Lady saying, "Go and ask a doctor," because doctors appeared on the television programmes. Some time ago the Chief Medical Officer of the Department of Health and Social Security spoke in one of the Committee rooms at a meeting in this Palace of Westminster to answer hon. Member's questions about AIDS. I have listened to doctors. I am not quite as ignorant as the hon. Lady suggests. She made the dangerous suggestion that AIDS affects only homosexuals and that heterosexuals are all right.

Dame Jill Knight: I did not say that.

Mr. Dubs: The hon. Lady came very close to saying that. I gave her three opportunities to put the record straight, but all that she has done is repeat her suggestion. I am happy to give the hon. Lady another chance. To put the matter in perspective, the hon. Lady came armed with information to pilot the Bill through the House and claimed that I was ignorant while she was knowledgeable. If she has all this knowledge, perhaps she would at least explain the matter. I believe that it is both wrong and dangerous to suggest that heterosexuals are not enormously at risk from AIDS.

1.15 pm

The publicity, information and statements from the Secretary of State and Ministers at the Department are based on the suggestion that there is an increasing risk of AIDS spreading through the heterosexual population. Not one hon. Member can deny that. We must be aware of that risk, as well as the risk to other groups, such as homosexuals and addicts who use infected needles. Those are the three main groups. One of the great dangers which prompted the Government to spend £20 million on publicity was the enormous risk of AIDS spreading through the heterosexual population. There is evidence from almost every country to that effect, so I do not see why the hon. Lady seeks to deny it.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Is the hon. Gentleman disputing the figures released by the DHSS, which show that so far well over 90 per cent. of deaths from AIDS have been among the homosexual community?

Mr. Dubs: I am not disputing the DHSS figures. I am not sure whether the figure is 90 per cent., but I take the hon. Gentleman's word for it. My point is that the risk to the heterosexual population of AIDS spreading is great. The hon. Lady suggested otherwise, and I was objecting to that.

This is not just a debating point on a Friday afternoon to be forgotten. The matter is serious because it affects our ability to educate all people about the risks, so that they know what the dangers are and can take appropriate action to minimise, reduce or prevent their catching AIDS. The Government have paid great attention to that, Ministers have appeared on television and the DHSS has produced many documents. There has been an enormous effort to educate the whole population about it and it is wrong to give a misleading impression, as the hon. Lady did.

I do not oppose the Bill, but I wish to express the anxieties which many people share. The hon. Lady spoke about promoting homosexuality. I am particularly anxious that we provide proper education about the danger of AIDS and I agree with the Government's efforts to publicise it. We may need more of them, and perhaps the Government started too slowly, but at least they are doing something. We must consider how we shall continue the education campaign against this dreadful disease and we must be careful that we do not inadvertently pass legislation which makes educating our children and young people more difficult. No hon. Member would dispute that. Indeed, in Committee on the Obscence Publications Bill, we were anxious that nothing in the Bill should prevent proper education about the risks that AIDS presents to all sectors of the population.

The hon. Lady also spoke about syphilis and one or two other diseases. Again, she suggested that they had close links with homosexual people. Unless I misheard, she did not add that syphilis can also affect heterosexual people. Indeed, I thought that the risks were about equal to both groups. She sought to confine her remarks about the risks of syphilis spreading to the homosexual population only.

That is misleading and wrong. After all, we are talking about legislation that has to do with how we educate our children. It has to do with education in our schools and about how health risks can properly be put to schoolchildren so that the risks and dangers to them can be minimised. The hon. Lady did not seem to pay much attention to that. Clause 1 states:

> "A local authority shall not—
> (a) promote homosexuality or publish material for the promotion of homosexuality;".

I should like to ask a question about that. If I had had the opportunity, I would have put down amendments designed to probe more deeply into this matter. Are we quite certain that the phrase "promotion of homosexuality" will not prevent publicity about the risk of the spread of AIDS from homosexual behaviour? That is important in terms of educating our children.

Whether the hon. Lady likes it or not, it is not in dispute that about 10 per cent. of the male population are homosexual. I do not know how accurate that figure is, but it is one that is generally quoted. If that is the case, it is likely that in any class of schoolboys 10 per cent. of them will become homosexuals whether they want to or not. That is the way in which physically and biologically they are developing. I am not aware of any medical opinion which disputes the basis of that.

The Minister spent a good part of his life teaching. I wonder whether we should not pay attention to the fact that in a class of boys about 10 per cent. are likely to develop as homosexuals. Is it not important that schools should publicise the risk of AIDS to those boys? If they are not taught about that, I do not see how we are doing right by the boys in our schools. I should like to see this issue properly debated. Some people may say that the promotion of homosexuality does not mean that, and that one can describe the risk of getting AIDS through homosexual behaviour while not promoting homosexuality. I do not know the answer to that question. If I had the answer and could be assured that that was not a problem, I could move on. However, while I have my doubts, I have to draw the attention of the House to that.

I am persuaded by medical opinion and by what the Government have said that in the AIDS epidemic we face one of the greatest health crises that has affected us, and indeed the world, for centuries. We must do nothing that minimises our ability to prevent this dreadful disease from spreading. Is this Bill likely to have that effect, or is it likely to hamper the right of teachers to give sex education that will explain these matters, consistent with the 1986 Act about which the Minister spoke? Perhaps he will explain that in a little more detail. That is one of my worries about the Bill.

My other worry about the Bill relates to what the Minister said about the sort of educational material that can be made available to schools and the rights of parents, governing bodies and teachers to decide together how these matters can be put over in schools. I should like to have a little more information about that. I appreciate that the Minister cannot speak on behalf of the Department of Education and Science, but I am quite sure that he is equipped to throw a little more light on the subject. My two main worries are, first, whether we are preventing the teaching of all students in schools about the dangers of AIDS and, secondly, about the general approach to sex education and how it will be affected by the Bill.

We cannot deny that homosexuality exists and that there must be some reference to it; otherwise we will send our young people out into the world not very knowledgeable. I repeat that, in the context of advertising and publicising the dangers of AIDS, we have gone some way towards doing that. I should like to believe that the Bill does not stop us going further in that direction.

Tobacco Smoking (Public Places) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

1.35 pm

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

As hon. Members will see, this Bill has all-party support. That support includes the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) who unfortunately cannot be with us today, as he has not been well recently. The House will know that the hon. Gentleman is not standing in the next general election. He has been a formidable proponent on the health front, particularly over smoking and tobacco products. The House will miss his contributions in the future, and I am sorry that he cannot support me in today's debate, as I know that he would if he were present.

The Bill has, as it were, two prongs. Its aim—I quote from the long title—is "To limit smoking in public places; to make provision with regard to smoking and employment".

I have sometimes been described as a vehement anti-smoker. Perhaps I should explain that I am not a great fanatic or zealot on the issue. Nor am I a converted smoker; I have never smoked, although I claim no great credit for that. I well understand the pleasure that other people obtain from smoking. I can even say that some of my best friends are smokers. Indeed, I must confess that my wife enjoys the occasional cigarette, and that my loyal and very hard-working secretary valiantly types out letters about my Bill encompassed by wreaths of smoke. I should add that, as she is fortunate enough to have a room to herself, she would not be affected by its provisions.

I can also understand people who find that they are, as the saying goes, "dying for a fag". There are times when I feel that I could just do with a tot of whisky. I can also understand those who find themselves addicted to tobacco products. I confess that I, too, have an addiction—to a certain well-known brand of glacier mints. If I were told by the medical authorities that glacier mints were harmful to me, I dare not contemplate what might be the withdrawal effect on me of ceasing to be able to have them. I am therefore not without sympathy for the smoker.

However, the medical evidence on the harm done by cigarette products is overwhelming. Smoking is the largest avoidable cause of disease in the United Kingdom. The medical authorities estimate that 100,000 people a year die prematurely from smoking. That means that about 10 people die every hour, simply because they smoke. They do not have to die.

Prohibition is not practicable, and I do not suggest that it is, but it is the duty of Parliament and the Government to persuade smokers to reduce their smoking, or to stop smoking, and to dissuade young people from starting to smoke. To this end, a number of steps have been initiated.

Some of us were disappointed that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not increase the price of tobacco products in his last Budget. Advertisements and cigarette packets carry health warnings, and the larger the warnings and the stronger the language the more effective they will be. Some believe that there is a strong argument not simply for restricting the advertising of tobacco products but for banning it altogether.

As for the promotion of tobacco products, all sorts of stories are put across by the tobacco companies about what they are trying to do. I am a marketing man and I know the value of promotion in trying to sell a product to new markets. Means are used to attract public attention to tobacco products, such as the sponsoring of concerts and sports events. I am strongly of the opinion that it is wrong that sports events should be sponsored by the tobacco companies, because of the implied connection between sport and health. That is clearly inappropriate. It is particularly sad that from time to time the BBC and the independent television companies have televised events that are sponsored by tobacco companies. I welcome the modification of the extent to which that happens, as evidenced by the recent televising of the snooker championship. There are more subtle and insidious ways in which cigarette companies use their names by promoting concerts and holiday agencies, and they should be the subject of further action. My Bill would be another way to reduce the incidence of smoking.

I have referred to the proven harm of smoking, but there is increasing evidence that harm is done to the non-smoker by so-called passive smoking. The House will be familiar with the recent report of the Independent Scientific Committee on Smoking and Health that refers to the increase in the risk of lung cancer from exposure to environmental tobacco smoke. It suggests that the risk of lung cancer for people who are living with smokers, is increased to the extent of 30 per cent.

Apart from the medical arguments, one has to have regard to the social arguments. Smoking creates a very unpleasant atmosphere and a smell that clings to other people's clothes. If I were to go into the Members' Tea Room, or into the waiting room of a railway station, or into an office or work place and produced an aerosol that let out a foul smelling odour, I should be considered, at the least, to be anti-social, if not offensive, yet it is considered to perfectly normal in those settings for somebody to light up a cigarette or, even worse, a cigar and to puff smoke all over those in the immediate vicinity. I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South-East (Mr. Lightbown) is looking uncomfortable—as well he may the next time he sits beside me in the Tea Room. It can be argued that one does not have to be there and that one can leave, but I do not see why one should have to leave because of the circumstances I have described. It is far more difficult for those in a work place. They cannot leave.

Let me make it perfectly clear that the purpose of my Bill is not to restrict the liberty of smokers but to safeguard the rights of non-smokers who are, after all, in the majority; it is estimated that nowadays probably no more than a third of adults smoke. The idea of setting aside separate places in which people can smoke is not a new one. We are familiar with smoke rooms in pubs, for example. For many years, there have been railway carriages marked with "No smoking" signs, and to the credit of those who run public places, such as restaurants, some now have areas marked "non-smoking". But that implies that there is something slightly eccentric about being a non-smoker—that one is the odd one out, and that special provision has to be made. I should like to change that attitude so that it is accepted that non-smoking is the norm and areas have to be designated for smokers.

My Bill is drawn in general terms, and I intend that the detailed provisions should be set out in regulations that the Secretary of State is empowered to make. I envisage that, for example, in very small places, or in places to which the public resort for relatively short periods, no smoking would be allowed. That would include lifts, escalators, taxis, shops, public toilets, and so on. Similarly, it would include business and Government offices to which the public had access and, I think, theatres, cinemas, classrooms, lecture halls, hospitals and clinics. It would seem reasonable that in restaurants at least one third of the total area should be designated for non-smokers. In view of the proportion of non-smokers to smokers, which I mentioned, I should have thought that it would be generous to allow two thirds of the space for smokers—unless, of course, a room was particularly small, in which case it would be designated a non-smoking area.

In places of employment, areas such as the cafeteria should have at least a third of the space designated as non-smoking areas. It must be assumed that shared work areas are non-smoking areas unless they have been otherwise designated with the agreement of all those who work in them.

People will ask whether a Bill such as this will be acceptable, whether it will work and whether there is a demand for it. I think that it is certainly acceptable—that is evidenced by the way in which the complete non-smoking policy of London Underground has been accepted. We know, too, that a number of restaurants and cinemas now have non-smoking areas and that in most theatres no smoking is allowed.

On the question whether the Bill will work, similar legislation is working in the United States, where 40 states have a complete ban on smoking in public places and 11 others have legislation restricting smoking in work places. The Americans have had few problems of enforcement, and it is not uncommon to find that the cost of signs and posters stating whether an area is a no-smoking area is often offset by the cleaning costs. I am afraid that smoking is a filthy and dirty habit. I remember talking to a British Rail employee who had to deal with complaints about labels being scratched off the windows of non-smoking carriages. He said, "You can always tell which are the non-smoking carriages. Just look at the colour of the ceilings." That is perfectly true.

Is there a demand for this legislation? I can only say that, since my Bill was published, I have received letters from people all over the country supporting it warmly. I shall not take up too much time of the House, but should like to quote from a couple of those letters. A couple wrote:

"There is nothing more objectionable when going for a meal, to arrive, start ones meal only to find the people on the table adjacent just finishing theirs and lighting cigarettes all round!"

Another gentleman wrote:

"I am a sound engineer for the BBC and have to sit alongside smokers for hours at a time. The BBC management gives no support for an all-out smoking ban in studios areas. Legislation is the only real answer. If our ventilation plants leaked smelly dirty smoke into work areas, no one would work there, but smokers see nothing wrong in polluting the air around them."

Another lady explained how smoke seriously affects her throat and chest, so she must be extremely careful whenever she goes to a public place to ascertain whether people are smoking. I received some interesting correspondence from a public transport operator who is faced with determining the extent to which he can introduce and enforce non-smoking in a competitive environment. He commented:

"This is a matter which should be dealt with by legislation."

There is pressure for legislation. I am conscious of the fact that I shall be opposed from at least two directions. One is the so-called libertarian lobby—those who feel that people should be free to do as they like. We all know that life is not like that. To live in a reasonable civilised environment we all have to consider each other and adjust our behaviour accordingly. As I have implied, I believe that my Bill strikes a reasonable balance between the liberty of the smoker to smoke and the liberty of the non-smoker to breathe smoke-free air.

The other opposition will come from the tobacco producers—the industry which sees itself, even today, having to become smaller because of the reduction in smoking, and it is very anxious about that. I hope that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) does not mind my pinching one of his best lines, which is that the industry kills off 100,000 people a year, so that it has to find more customers to keep up consumption.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I shall seek royalties from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Sims: Of course there are more subtle ways in which the industry will use its influence, especially by advertising in the press. A few months ago, an article in the Daily Telegraph was critical of those trying to restrict sports sponsorship by tobacco companies. The article was a fair comment on a matter of some controversy and I wrote a letter to the Daily Telegraph responding to it and putting counter-arguments. I thought that, perhaps, as a Member of Parliament, and in particular as the chairman of the all-party parliamentary Action on Smoking and Health group, my views might merit publication. Not only was my letter not published but not a single letter responding to that article was published, despite the fact that I know that several doctors wrote in similar terms. I subsequently wrote to the editor of the Daily Telegraph a letter that was not even acknowledged. Despite the fact that I wrote it to him privately inviting him to comment on the fact that there had been no printed response to the original article, I heard nothing further.

I do not like to feel that the independence of the press is influenced by commercial considerations, but I simply invite the House to note the volume of advertising by tobacco companies in The Telegraph Sunday Magazine and the one-sided presentation of the argument which I have described.

I accept that there will be objections to my Bill, but I hope that I have persuaded the House about its desirability. In particular, I hope that I have persuaded my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State—the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie)—who has so effectively promoted the need and the means for healthy living and that she will consider my Bill sympathetically.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on introducing the Bill and on the way in which he presented it. He has made a very good case for it. As a libertarian, I agree principally with the Bill. We should always encourage people to have freedom and to enjoy themselves, provided that they do not impinge upon the freedom and enjoyment of other people. What has influenced me considerably has been the effect of the no smoking ban on the Underground. The effect has been remarkable, not only because the atmosphere is so much better but because there is less litter, dirt, cigarette ends and packets, and bits of silver paper laying around in the tube and on the trains. That has made a remarkable difference to the Underground and has done a great deal to influence public opinion that smoking is all right, but only in the right places.

I have some reservations about parts of the Bill, such as the places where the public would have access, which could be places such as solicitors' offices or business premises. That will have to be gone into thoroughly and clarified in Committee.

I am glad that there is provision in the Bill for full consultation with employees so that management and employees can agree on places where smoking should be permitted and where it should be banned.

I imagine that the Bill will not apply in the Palace of Westminster. However, I would hope that it will have a spin-off effect because, while we have an admirable Smoking Room, as a reformed smoker—somebody who used to smoke large quantities of cigarettes but who went through the painful process of giving it up, for which I feel much better — I have no objection to other people smoking. However, I find smoke a difficulty in some of our Committee rooms, which are rooms where the public has access on occasions. Hon. Members could learn quite a bit about how to improve our own air and environment by introducing the concept that it is not welcome for hon. Members to smoke, particularly in some of the smaller Committee rooms and in other parts of the Palace of Westminster.

I believe that there will be difficulties in implementing the legislation, if it goes through, in restaurants. I can well sympathise with people who want to sit in a part of a restaurant where smoking will be disallowed. But it is extremely difficult for restaurateurs, particularly in some of the smaller restaurants, to earmark those spaces. It depends so much on their custom and on what sort of bookings they get whether they can place people in those areas.

It would be preferable to work towards a voluntary code of practice. That is something that could emanate from the debate. Many restaurateurs already say to people, "Would you like to be in a non-smoking area?". If possible, I always go for the non-smoking area. It is not essential that we have legislation to do so much of what is in the Bill. I hope that today's debate will lead to a greater awareness — I believe it will — of the desire of many people to see smoking banned from some areas and concentrated in other areas.

I suspect that the Bill will not make progress. If a general election intervenes and prevents its progress, I hope that we can return to the subject in the next Parliament.

1.59 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I do not want to detain the House for very long, but I should declare an interest, as indeed should every hon. Member, as I am presently standing, and a few Members are sitting, in a public place where smoking has been banned for nearly 300 years. The Standing Orders have provided since 1665,

"That no Member do presume to take tobacco in the gallery of the House or at a committee table," on the assumption that nobody would be so offensive and inconsiderate as to smoke in the Chamber. That was not decided in an attempt to get hon. Members to look after their health but because people found the fumes, smell and smoke from other people's pipes — that is presumably what they were smoking at that time — too noxious to be acceptable in civilised company — if the House of Commons could ever be described as "civilised company".

I have another interest to declare. As chairman of the London group of Labour Members I was a party to the decision-making process within the Labour party in London which led to the prohibition of smoking on London Transport. I recall that we had a few discussions about whether that was likely to prove unpopular and whether it could properly be portrayed as a gross invasion of people's liberty and so on. We concluded that some people might portray it as an invasion of other people's liberty but that, generally speaking, it would work, be successful and that not many people would take offence. I am glad to say that that is how it turned out because no one in politics likes to be unpopular. I am convinced that the ban on smoking on London Transport, both at the stations and on the Underground trains, has proved to be popular.

One of the things we need to remember is that that ban has proved popular with the large proportion of smokers. All the surveys show that a large proportion of smokers would like to give up and welcome any outside deterrent because it brings them nearer to giving up.

All that was done—the House banning smoking and the prohibition of smoking on the Underground — before there was really any substantial evidence to show the adverse effects of somebody smoking close to another individual. That has now been described as secondary smoking, which seems more popular on the Conservative Benches than secondary picketing. However, there is little doubt about the effect now and there are very few people of any scientific merit, except for a few wholly financed by the tobacco industry, who would dispute the claim that the inhalation of other people's smoke is damaging in the long-term. It is not as damaging as smoking but it does make a considerable contribution to lung and heart disease as well as being a general irritant causing people to cough and so on.

I am not entirely sure whether the Bill of the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims)—he has the support of a number of my hon. Friends — will do the trick. However, we need legislation to help the extension of non-smoking in public places. If it is left purely to a voluntary effort we shall not see the progress that we expect, largely because people such as restaurateurs will be as dubious about the effects on their popularity as we in the London Labour party were about the effects on our popularity of banning smoking on the Underground. As their immediate livelihoods would be at stake they might not be willing to take too many risks in that respect. However, we need some legislative back-up for the developments that are taking place.

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that it is now part of the Labour party's official policy that, if by some mischance it was to become the Government, it would legislate to prohibit smoking in some public places?

Mr. Dobson: The logic of my argument was so obvious to the hon. Gentleman that he has moved on to my next sentence but one. I believe that we should look at the overall problems and at ill health caused by smoking and bring forward comprehensive measures to restrain it in a variety of ways. In formulating that legislation, we should have to give careful consideration to the merits of proposals to restrain smoking in public places. I am not saying that we commit ourselves to that at this moment, so it is no use the hon. Gentleman suggesting that I am. My own view is that some legislative back-up is needed, but we have not concluded that that is necessarily part of our general approach to reducing smoking.

What we have said, which I believe would have a greater impact on the reduction of smoking that almost everyone wants, is that there should be a total prohibition on the advertising and promotion of tobacco products. With 100,000 people dying of smoking-related diseases or afflictions every year, we owe it to them and to everyone else to take whatever steps are necessary to restrain smoking. That would be my first priority and it is certainly that of the Labour party. Nevertheless, we need to consider the question of smoking in public places.

One of my doubts about the measure before us, although I have considerable respect for the promoter's efforts, relates to the definition of a public place.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that it is the Labour party's intention to introduce legislation to ban the sponsorship of sporting events by tobacco companies?

Mr. Dobson: We have made that perfectly clear for several years. To those who object that some people in sport would be less well paid if their pockets were not being lined by the tobacco barons, I can only say that, having met some of the Middlesex cricketers earlier this week, many sports people in this country have their incomes substantially increased beyond what they could command by getting people to pay to watch them. So far as I know, W. G. Grace did not need any sponsorship to boost his income. Amateur though he was supposed to be, he obtained a substantial income from cricket, as the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan) will know.

It is totally unreasonable and irrational for any sporting activity in this country to be subsidised, and the pay of people in it substantially enhanced by the tobacco industry, when the clear purpose and objective of such sponsorship is to promote the sale of tobacco and, in particular, of a limited number of brands of cigarette. It is absurd for sporting activities, which are supposed to make people healthy in mind and body, to be used as a vehicle to persuade young people to take up smoking, as a result of which their health will almost automatically be damaged.

The Labour party has made it absolutely clear that that is our approach. We regard it as wholly unreasonable for any sporting activity to be used to promote smoking and we stick by that view. Plenty of people with much less offensive products and services are willing to sponsor sport. As the hon. Member for Lewisham, East knows, some have even come forward recently in relation to cricket sponsorship. There is nothing new in what I have just said. We have made it clear that that is our policy.

I am not sure that we accept all the various definitions of "public place", and so on, in the Bill, but I have considerable sympathy with it. As people who work in places in which we or our predecessors have had the power to ban smoking and have done so, we owe it to large numbers of employees to encourage employers, if necessary by legislative action, to provide them with workplaces that are free from other people smoking. We have devoted a lot but not enough effort to making workplaces safe, wholesome and healthy. I believe that it is absurd for an employer to take the necessary steps to make a workplace safe, wholesome and healthy and then for the employees to make things unsafe for their working colleagues.

I personally have most sympathy for the aspect of the Bill which encourages and, if necessary, would give power to employers to make workplaces free from smoke that workers did not want. That is a wholesome and reasonable proposition that we should explore. However, to return to the point that I was making before the interventions, we need a comprehensive approach to help people to stop smoking and to deter them from smoking. Similarly, we would do better to have a comprehensive approach to the consumption of booze.

Mr. Moynihan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way because I know that he wants to speak only for a short time. However, in view of the arguments that he has put forward with regard to tobacco, would he argue equally as strongly that a Labour Government would seek to place legislation on the statute book to prohibit the sponsorship of sporting events by the alcoholic drinks industry?

Mr. Dobson: No. The hon. Gentleman is clearly simply getting things written into the record. He knows full well that we distinguish between—

Mr. Wiggin: That is the purpose of this Bill. That is the purpose of the whole exercise.

Mr. Dobson: I am sorry, I cannot cope with two interventions at the same time.

Mr. Wiggin: I apologise for making a sedentary intervention. However, of course we are here to put things on the record, just as the sponsor of the Bill is absolutely certain that it will make no progress. Even if we all voted, there would not be enough support for the Bill to make progress. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) knows perfectly well that that is the purpose of the exercise.

Mr. Dobson: As long as the hon. Member for Lewisham, East does not race around to the press and say that the Labour party has suddenly enunciated a new policy on these matters, I do not mind. I have been trying to make a short speech so that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security can make her ministerial contribution. We have made it clear that we shall prohibit the promotion and advertising of tobacco products. However, we have not said that about alcohol because there is a clear distinction between the consumption of tobacco products and the consumption of alcohol. The plain fact is that virtually any smoking is harmful, whereas very few people other than those who are dead set against drinking in any form would claim that the limited and sensible consumption of alcohol from time to time in various forms is particularly harmful. Conservative Members must have friends who are habitual drunks, and we all have friends and acquaintances who suffer from alcoholism. Indeed, I do not suppose that there is any hon. Member who does not have such an acquaintance. Therefore, as a society we must recognise that we must pay attention to the way in which we counter alcoholism. It needs a different approach from the one that I and the Labour party take towards smoking. Nevertheless, there must be a comprehensive approach which would involve changes in the licensing laws, but only as part of a comprehensive package.

I have considerable sympathy with the objectives of the Bill. However, I have considerable doubts about some of the detailed propositions and drafting aspects. The matter must be dealt with as part of a comprehensive Government-promoted approach to the reduction of smoking.

2.14 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on his efforts this Session with the Bill. If my postbag is anything to go by, he has a great deal of public support. I welcome the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate (Mr. Banks) and I noted the words of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who has found a novel way of keeping me quiet—by talking a lot himself. Never mind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst has a long record in this area, as parliamentary adviser to ASH. He has served his constituents—and indeed the nation—very well in the efforts that he has made and the way in which he has presented his case.

As my hon. Friend knows, ASH is funded partly by the Department of Health and Social Security. Last year we paid it £177,000. Its grant has gone up by about 52 per cent. in real terms since 1978-79, which shows our commitment to the work that it is trying to do. I have been associated with it. I worked with ASH for no-smoking day on 11 March and in November for the launch of the booklet "Women and Smoking. A Handbook for Action".

I agree with the suggestion about the way in which norms might be presented in future. I do not like the negative approach. I do not like to talk about no-smoking areas. I prefer to talk about smoke-free zones. Perhaps that is because I am a natural optimist, but it should be the norm that people take a close and effective interest in their health in this country, as people do in many other countries. It should be the norm that our public behaviour is pleasant and non-hazardous to others. My hon. Friend will share with me a memory of the time when, on buses or public transport, there would be a notice saying, "No spitting. Penalty £5." We do not see those notices any more because it is now not regarded as normal to indulge in such behaviour. Perhaps the time will come when certain other types of behaviour join that.

It does no harm to rehearse the dangers of smoking. Smoking causes lung cancer. There will be about 40,000 deaths from lung cancer in this country this year—about 30,000 men and about 10,000 women. In Scotland, lung cancer is now the leading killer of women prematurely and has overtaken breast cancer. Deaths from lung cancer overall have fallen by about 9 per cent. since 1979, but are up 20 per cent. among women. As the Minister responsible for women's health, I regard those figures with the greatest alarm. Among teenagers, girls now smoke more than boys. What a terrible future heritage that is.

The chances of lung cancer are 11 times greater for smokers than for non-smokers. About 1 million lung cancer cases are reported worldwide every year, and most of them are dead within two years. The survival rate of lung cancer victims five years from diagnosis is only 7 per cent., which is therefore a worse survival rate than for AIDS and many other things about which we are most concerned.

Smoking is also associated with most other common cancers, and it is a particular problem for those who enjoy drink. The death rates from cancer to the upper digestive tract for those who smoke and drink are between four and seven times as great as for those who drink but do not smoke. Therefore, I would say to people: "If you enjoy a drink, don't smoke." Smoking is strongly implicated in other respiratory diseases, especially the English disease, bronchitis, and emphysema and, most important of all, it is a factor in our biggest killer, coronary heart disease, which will kill about 150,000 people this year. There is one heart attack in this country every three and a half minutes. One third of all men under 65 will have a heart attack and half of them will die, about 40 per cent. within the first hour or so. Such a toll cannot be tolerated in this country for much longer.

Why should the Government take an interest? Surely personal freedom should matter. I say to hon. Members on both sides of the House that I am probably about as Right-wing as anybody in the House, and I am very proud of it. But there are two reasons why the overriding principle of personal freedom may sometimes be breached. The first reason is if there are substantial costs to the public purse. One of my other deeply-held Tory principles is that I would wish to see public expenditure kept under control. To the National Health Service alone, heart disease has a cost of some £400 million a year. Cancers do not cost quite so much because people tend to die fairly quickly, so they are not a burden for very long, but I would mind less what people got up to if it did not cost the Government and taxpayers an enormous amount of money. We also have to recognise the costs to industry in working days lost and in lost productivity, particularly when the people concerned are cut down in their prime.

The other main reason is that individual actions may harm others. I am an asthmatic—that is my interest. So smoking is an irritant to me and to the many thousands of asthmatics in this country.

There is now plenty of evidence that passive smoking causes illness in others. We know of the effect, in a smoker's household, of respiratory diseases in children and other family members. We know also that the contaminants in smoking can cross the placenta of a pregnant woman and damage her baby. That is even the case if she is a non-smoker, but lives with a smoking husband. We now know also that there is a chance that lung cancer can be caused in non-smokers by people who smoke.

The interim statement of the Independent Scientific Committee on Smoking and Health was published on 13 March 1987. Having considered the relevant studies, the committee concluded

[Mrs. Edwina Currie]

"while none of the studies of passive smoking and lung cancer can on its own be accepted as unequivocal, the findings overall are consistent with there being a small increase in risk of lung cancer from exposure to environmental tobacco smoke, possibly between 10 per cent. and 30 per cent."

That is possibly 200 or 300 extra deaths from lung cancer a year. The final report will be available later this year and the Government will then consider whether action is required, and, if so, what.

It is probably worth pointing out that that committee was set up by a Tory Government in 1973. Indeed, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst knows, Tory Governments have been prepared to use legislation to take the sort of action that he seeks. The first legislation against smokers was in the 1960s. However, it was a Tory Government in 1972 who banned smoking among those handling food. It was also a Tory Government who, passed clauses in the Transport Act 1983 to provide opportunities to restrict smoking on public transport. As has been mentioned, that has been taken up by the London Underground, and by air companies such as Loganair and by Belfast Citybus Ltd. British Rail has told me that in the new timetables that are to be published next week only 25 per cent. of the places will be available to smokers. That is a spectacular improvement. Therefore, Governments have taken action on this matter.

However, even without legislation, the British are now giving up smoking faster than people in any other country. About 2·5 million smokers took part in no smoking day this year. An attitude survey that was conducted in connection with "Look After Your Heart" showed that three quarters of our people do not smoke and that three quarters of those who do wish to change. Therefore, we are making a lot of progress.

However, I must advise my hon. Friend that at this stage I do not feel that this Bill should join that collection of legislation. I do not like telling people what to do; I would much rather persuade. In principle, I would rather use almost any means but compulsion, and I especially dislike using the law. When, as a Back Bencher, I supported legislation such as that on fluoridation, the sale of scented erasers or that on seat belts, it was only because I had become convinced over a long period—in the case of fluoridation after more than 10 years' experience in the city of Birmingham — that progress on public health would be hampered by the lack of a legal framework. In those cases, I was prepared to support changes in the law. However, at this time, and in the form of this Bill, I am not yet so convinced. I do recognise, with the greatest appreciation, the motives and the evidence presented by my hon. Friend. I suspect that we agree about ends but at this time, we probably disagree about the means.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I thank the Minister for giving way, especially as I have not heard all of the debate. As someone who is passionately anti-smoking, I should like to draw her attention to the problems of the staff within her own Ministry at the DHSS who wish to be able to work in a smoke-free atmosphere. It seems that the guidance given to local offices by the DHSS head office is unclear about that. I have a case of a young woman who medically and emotionally cannot stand smoke in her environment. As a result, she is unable to work in a particular office. Can the Minister give some help to her and to other people in the same position by guaranteeing at least one smoke-free area in each DHSS local office?

Mrs. Currie: I too have had several letters similar to that. I assure the hon. Gentleman that in the DHSS we are discussing not only the question of smoking but other aspects of public health and the ways in which we might encourage our staff to take advantage of the facilities that are available, such as the screening programme. If he would like to send me the letter about which he is concerned, I shall endeavour to do what I can.

The timing of this matter is important. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst will recognise the sense of what I am saying about that. It is not just that this Session may be shorter than it might otherwise be; I am reluctant to take steps before the final report of the independent committee. I am aware that public opinion is shifting fast on this issue and that we still have too many smokers, but many people are being enabled and helped to give up, not least my husband, and I am pleased about that. Therefore, this year we may well see a sharp reduction in the number of people who may be upset, troubled or find the Bill difficult to accept.

I am also concerned that action now may be counter-productive. I do not wish to antagonise smokers or to put them on the defensive; I would much prefer to proceed on the basis of co-operation, if possible. There are plenty of examples where that is happening. ASH told me that it has had numerous requests for its document, "Smoking and Work: Ideas for Action", and that in many cases employers have reported surges in job applications from top employees of rival firms as a result of providing a smoke-free working environment. That shows that there is a great deal of movement.

I have a further fear. I am keen that business should take an interest in all aspects of health education, not just smoking, but food in the canteen, drink policies and the encouragement of a fit lifestyle. I am slightly worried that if we legislated only on smoking—I hasten to add that I have no proposals to legislate on any of the others—we may be seen to be putting the other items in the background. However, if a company, its employers and employees co-operate successfully on smoking they may wish to go further and to give attention to other practical issues, all of which will help to contribute to a healthier nation. I would be happy to see progress in all those directions.

The Bill has objectives which, from the point of public health, we support. I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise the reasons for our slight reluctance to accept it now. I congratulate him on all his efforts, which I know will continue and I wish him well with them in future.

2.26 pm

Mr. Sims: By leave of the House, I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for her remarks about me and for her comments on the Bill. In the light of what she has said and possible impending events, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion and the Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

Coal Mining Subsidence Bill

Order for Second reading read.

2.27 pm

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

It appears that I have three minutes to put my case. It is not only my constituents who are suffering from the problem of coal mining subsidence, but those of right hon. and hon. Members who have coal mining in their constituencies. British Coal has made a wicked decision on the cases of some of our constituents. The legislation makes it clear that one must claim compensation for repairs to property within six years of the cessation of coal mining beneath that property. In Nottinghamshire, for example, the National Coal Board, as it was, allowed a 12-year period, but not long ago British Coal decided to shorten it to six years. The result is that many people have been left outside that six-year period and the NCB has rejected their claims.

A few days ago the chairman of British Coal had a meeting here to talk about the future of the mining industry. At the same time I had the opportunity to question him about what he would do about the problems of people whose applications for compensation for repairs to their property damaged by coal mine workings had been rejected, but I did not receive a satisfactory reply.

The Bill has been introduced with a view to introducing some fairness in the system. The Government encourage people to be home owners and many of my constituents have bought their own homes, even from the local authority. However, when homes are damaged many claims are rejected by British Coal, which does not want to know about them. British Coal has a responsibility to meet these claims and I had hoped that perhaps we could get this Bill on to the statute book.

It being half past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Friday 15 May.

National Health Service (Newham)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

2.34 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): An acute crisis of medical and nursing staff afflicts the National Health Service in the London borough of Newham. It is getting worse. That is why I sought this emergency debate in Parliament to lay bare the facts and to seek a response from the Government. Newham, as I have often explained to the House, has more than its share of difficulties. In health matters, the borough is caught in a pincer. As recent authoritative reports have shown, much sickness is caused by deprivation and the debilitating effects of an unhealthy environment. Good health greatly depends on adequate incomes, diets and good warm housing.

Since 1979, Government policy has doubled the number of people in Newham living in poverty on supplementary benefit, and actually trebled the number of unemployed. Cuts in housing expenditure have led to a waiting list of 12,000 people, and the worst housing in London. That damages health, especially for the most disadvantaged. Yet, when my constituents seek health care they suffer again, for they are confronted by a service in crisis, which is breaking down under the strain of trying to cope, and is under-staffed and under-resourced. A frightening burden is being placed on devoted but overworked staff, while local people endure longer waiting lists and delays in treatment. Sometimes for patients, the hours of waiting can negate the benefits of treatment and cause unnecessary pain and distress. Acute staff shortages make it difficult to maintain standards of care.

I have raised these matters before and have given Ministers the details in correspondence, but there has been no satisfactory or adequate response. It is because the situation in Newham is worsening that I deal with the matter again today.

Services for and health care of Newham patients are suffering because of shortages of staff right across the board. I spent a large part of last Tuesday discussing the matter with the Newham community health council, Lady Sherman and her colleagues at the Newham health authority, and Mr. Richard George, the manager of Newham general hospital. At present, there is a shortfall of staff of 420 in the Newham health authority. They range from medical staff locums, nursing staff, medical records staff, medical secretaries, occupational therapists, audio technicians, pharmacy staff, chiropodists, and many others. The shortfall of nurses is particularly grave. Shortages are acute among operating theatre nurses, operating department assistants, intensive therapy nurses, paediatric nurses and midwives.

The health authority is being forced to use untrained people and to have extensive recourse to agency staff, which, of course, is more expensive. But that does not help to make up the shortfall. One clear reason for the shortages is the abysmally low rates of pay in the NHS, the competition that it faces from local authorities and other employers who offer higher salaries, and also the additional London weighting that is offered by neighbouring areas. The Government recently agreed to pay this year's pay review body's recommendations on nurses' and midwives' pay. I welcome that, but the unanimous view of all those to whom I spoke was that it was too little, too late. It still leaves salaries unacceptably low—well below those of comparable white-collar jobs—and will not solve the problem.

There was also agreement that the level of London weighting was hopelessly inadequate and in no way compensated for the high cost of housing and living in London. Contrasts were made with central banks and building societies that offered London allowances of up to £2,000 on top of already higher salaries. I was assured that, unless some flexibility and improvement is given in the face of the aggressive action of the institutions that I mentioned, the position will get worse.

Newham health authority's problems in attracting nursing staff are compounded by the inducements being offered and the vigorous recruitment drives being mounted by countries such as Australia, the United States and Saudi Arabia. Another worry is the difficulty in recruiting and retaining administrative and clerical staff, particularly for medical records departments. It is vital to have records available for all out-patient clinics and for in-patients on the wards, and it is important for patients' continuing care that their GPs are aware of what treatment is being given to them or is proposed. Yet a medical secretary on personal secretary grade gets £4,912 to £5,855. For HCO grade the salary is from £5,418 to £6,556. How many hon. Members could get a secretary for such miserly sums? When agency staff have to be employed, they are paid double. The City of London, with its big bang salaries, is only 20 minutes away on the tube, so why should secretaries work for the NHS? Yet doctors need their records.

Incidentally, I do not understand why, as Mr. Jim Franklin, a carpenter at Newham general hospital told me, fully skilled building craftsmen are being offered £29 a week less than maintenance craftsmen. Perhaps I could have an explanation.

The shortage of midwives is extremely grave. The birth rate in Newham is booming. It increased 20 per cent. last year, yet the local school of midwifery is closed because of an inability to recruit midwives. Newham is 20 per cent. short of midwives, and Newham general hospital is 15 short. That places a huge burden of stress on those who remain. It is the mothers and babies who suffer. Out of some 250,000 qualified midwives nationwide, only 30,000 are willing to practise in the NHS. This begs the question of their rewards. Even after their increase, a staff midwife receives only £7,730 per annum minimum, to £8,600 maximum. Can anyone say that that is enough?

Another acute shortage is of occupational therapists. At St. Andrew's hospital there are none at all at the moment. At Goodmayes hospital, which caters for many Newham people with mental illnesses, there is only one. She, with untrained helpers, has to provide a service for between 100 and 180 clients daily. The other vacancies have not been filled for a long time.

One of the most worrying shortages is of nurses. The monthly reports of the director of resources show a steadily worsening position, with extra costs due to the shortage of agency nurses yet still a shortage of 21 per cent. The high use of agency staff of up to 10 per cent. has serious implications for continuity of care and accountability. On Tuesday in Newham general hospital I was shocked to learn that, although there should be 10 operating theatre nurses, there are only two.

This has had a disastrous effect. The four-theatre operating suite, allowing for routine maintenance, should provide 34 sessions a week. However, this was reduced to 30 on 6 April because of nurse shortages, and on Monday of last week this had to be reduced further to only 20, a cut of 40 per cent. The surgeons cannot work for lack of nurses and the waiting list for patients grows longer. There will be 20 sessions a week for a fortnight, and no one knows what will happen after that. The hospital also has a one-third shortage of operating department assistants. There is a shortage of intensive care nurses at the hospital. These nurses give care on a one-to-one basis to patients in beds with much expensive hi-tech equipment. There are four such beds in Newham general hospital, but at least one is usually shut down.

There should be eight paediatric nurses at the hospital working with children, but there are only two. There is only a quarter of what there should be. At St. Andrew's hospital there are 90 nursing vacancies. There were once three accident and emergency departments in Newham and there is now only one, which is at Newham general. It was designed to take 32,000 to 33,000 cases per annum but it is now having to cope with 70,000. The congestion can be imagined. The waiting time for patients is usually around four hours, but is often longer. This causes great frustration and sometimes violence. The stress and strain on nurses can be imagined. Is it surprising that morale suffers? And let us recall the meagre rewards that we offer nurses. Even with the increases, a student nurse will now receive from £4,540 to £5,170. An enrolled nurse will be paid from £6,250 to £7,750. A staff nurse will receive from £7,300 to £8,600.

The service at Newham's accident and emergency department is not just on the brink of collapse; on several occasions it has collapsed and has had to be closed because of a shortage of nurses. On 5 January it closed at 5.40 pm until 10 am on 7 January. In other words, it was closed for 40 hours. On 20 March, it closed at 5 pm until 10 am on 23 March. In other words, it was closed for 65 hours. Ambulances were diverted to as far away as Romford, yet my constituents should be able to rely on the casualty service.

The position was explained in an article in the Newham Recorder on 15 April, which referred to hospital neglect of a dying woman. The article reads:

"Damning allegations about lack of nursing care for a dying 71-year old woman were admitted last week by Newham General Hospital. Hospital chiefs upheld her son's claim that she was left unattended for four hours after falling and badly cutting her face. The Hospital Manager . . . said: 'We apologise unreservedly. We accept that the state she was found in was unacceptable.' He said the ward she was in was understaffed, and had many nurses who were only temporary, when the incident happened over Christmas last year. 'We have been trying to improve the care on that ward ever since', he said."

The article continues:

"When her son David visited on Christmas Eve he found her slumped in a chair, unattended, with blood on her face. He stayed with her for four hours but could get no treatment for her. Mr. Cookson, who lives in America, told Newham General he was 'disgusted' with their treatment of his mother."

I can well understand that Mr. Cookson was appalled at the treatment received by his mother—so would all of us be. But Cabinet Ministers do not suffer such treatment. They do not use the service. The Prime Minister claimed that the NHS was safe in her hands, but she does not consider herself safe in its hands. When she requires treatment she goes private. We are getting double standards, a good standard for the wealthy who can buy privilege and a second-class one for the rest. It is a two-tier system with profit-led care for the haves and an inferior cash-starved service for the have-nots.

The Government's encouragement of private practice is of no use to the people of Newham. My constituents see only a faltering commitment to the NHS, with a lack of resources damaging the standard and quality of health care, undermining the basic principles on which the NHS was built.

The NHS was built by a previous Labour Government on the noble socialist principle that in sickness wealth should be no advantage and poverty no disadvantage, that the best treatment should be available to all free at the point of use and paid for from general taxation. In this way the healthy support the sick. Now we have a Government who cut taxation while starving the NHS, thereby vandalising a service of which this country was once so proud.

I make no criticism of the medical staff. They are devoted to their tasks but overworked and underpaid. They are bearing the brunt, unfairly, for the under-resourcing of the NHS. The system is kept afloat only by working dedicated staff into the ground. The Government often boast about the increased throughput of more patients despite fewer beds, but higher throughput means patients are more dependent, and therefore more demanding when in hospital. But a price has to be paid, and it is being paid by the nurses. They endure stress, depression, fatigue and often poor job satisfaction through lack of time to do work properly, in deteriorating conditions. Is it surprising that morale plunges?

We must obtain practical and effective solutions to the real and pressing problems in Newham today. The Government must show that they care. I hope that I do not hear from the Minister the tired, stale old excuses or the jargon-riddled evasions that I have received in official letters before, when I have raised these matters on behalf of the people whom I represent. Action needs to be taken now, and I hope we shall see some new thinking and positive steps taken quickly to alleviate the pain and distress that exists.

First, let me deal with pay. I welcome the agreement to implement nationally the proposals of the pay review body. However, in the Newham context, we must go further. Our borough, for some inexplicable and bizarre official reason, is not considered inner London, although it is impossible to imagine a borough more "inner city" than Newham, whatever criteria one takes. Not only that, but Government statistics reveal that we are the most deprived local authority area, bar one, in the whole of England and Wales. So why this absurd and unjust discrimination? Newham should immediately be classified "inner London". That would straight away give higher salaries to many of the staff, and bring them up to those paid to our neighbours. Unless and until that is done, the attraction will always be to the adjacent boroughs, thus denuding Newham because of its low salaries—despite its high living and housing costs, the threat of crime and the other drawbacks of deprived areas.

I wrote to the Department about the matter twice last year, and received replies from the Under-Secretary on 20 May and 19 August. In his last letter, he talked of the boundaries of the London weighting. Of course a line has to be drawn somewhere, but surely it must be plain that it is ludicrously drawn at the moment, with St. Andrew's hospital on one side and Newham general on the other, and leaving the borough of Newham on the wrong side. Remedying that nonsense is something that can be beneficially done now. In addition, the Government should consider other ways of providing premium pay for areas with shortages of staff. I should have thought that that fitted in with their own ideas of "market mechanisms".

In his letter to me, the Under-Secretary said:

"In the longer term, we have identified as a top priority for the NHS Management Board, and Len Peach as Director of Personnel, achievement of an adequate supply of well-trained and motivated staff and securing action on significant shortages of manpower. Work is in hand to find ways to reflect local economic factors in pay arrangements whilst preserving the essential, national framework of the service."

So "work is in hand". That was many months ago. What has happened to that work? Why the delay? Why not get on with it? Will the Minister announce something advantageous to us today, as she has the opportunity?

Then we must look at housing. Why should staff journey to work in Newham from other, possibly leafier, suburbs? It is impossible, with prices soaring far out of their reach, for staff to buy houses in the borough. On the contrary, many nurses have been driven out, and are leaving for other parts of the country with cheaper houses and lower living costs. We shall never solve our staff shortages until we tackle the accommodation problem.

What do the Government propose? I ask the Minister to reply specifically on that point. The Government have slashed the money to local government for housing by well over half, and have cut Newham's housing investment programme allocation by over £150 million since 1979. That has resulted in an exacerbated housing crisis in Newham, with over 12,000 people on the waiting list and hundreds of homeless families in bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

The borough council can do little. The Government have a responsibility: what are they going to do? I want to hear the answer today.

Finally, I make a proposal of my own. The Government never tire of telling us that the London Docklands Development Corporation is regenerating east London. What has it done to regenerate the National Health Service? A considerable population is growing in Beckton, all of whom will need health care; they will make demands on the National Health Service. There are, of course, plenty of flats for sale in docklands, if one has the spare £350,000 to pay. But the nurses do not. Will the Government take action to see that the development in Docklands not only makes demands on the NHS but also contributes to it? This is one of the few places locally with land available. Will the Government speak to the LDDC now, with a view to building nurses' accommodation in Docklands at low cost? That would attack the problem. It would be a practical idea, and this afternoon we want to hear from the Government some practical ideas. We want to hear not what they cannot do but what they can do.

I look for an assurance that the Minister and her officials will give their full attention to the staffing of the NHS in the borough and that they will take all the action that is necessary to remedy the scandal of the gross and dangerous shortages that exist, and to ensure that the people of Newham have a good, adequately funded, resourced and staffed health care system, on which they know that they can rely.

I look forward to the Minister's reply. She must know that, unless urgent action is taken now, the NHS in my area will slide further into a spiral of decline from which it will be difficult to recover.

2.51 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mrs. Edwina Currie): As is the usual courtesy, I congratulate the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) on his success in the ballot and on choosing this subject for today's debate. He has made a number of my points for me, such as pay and Len Peach's suggestions about pay flexibility, but I am afraid that shortage of time means that I shall be unable to answer all his questions. Perhaps he would write to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, who I am sure would be interested to hear from him about housing in London.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): What about the boundary point?

Mrs. Currie: If Opposition Members want an answer to some of the questions for which I have responsibility, I hope that they will provide me with an opportunity to give them.

The Newham health authority is one of the best in London. Under the leadership of Sally, Lady Sherman, and all her staff, it is doing an excellent job in caring for the people of east London. It is a caring, thorough and responsible authority. Recently I visited Plaistow hospital for the rededication of the chapel, which was led by Princess Alice. I was most impressed. I understand that substantial improvements in health care have taken place since the Newham district general hospital was opened in 1983.

I am glad to have the opportunity to discuss briefly today the staffing of such an authority. The hon. Gentleman is quite right when he says that there are problems. I have obtained a list of the directly employed staff of Newham health authority at 30 April 1987. If he wishes to have it, I shall arrange for the hon. Gentleman to have a copy of this information. It shows that in certain specialties, not just nursing, there are serious problems. Nursing is the most spectacular simply because large numbers of nurses are employed. The number of budgeted establishment places for trained nurses is 946, but only 752 are in post. The authority is all right for untrained nurses in post. It has 180 out of the budgeted number of 183. The budgeted learners establishment is 250, but only 188 are in post. I suspect that that has much to do with the drop in the enrolled nurse training intake that has taken place recently all over the country.

The authority should have 28 pharmacy staff but it has only 21. It should have 18 operating department assistants but it has only 13. It should have 32 radiographers, but there are only 27. It should have four audiologists, but it has only one. It should have 41 physiotherapists, but it has only 34. The authority has 19 speech therapists, and that is its budgeted number. The authority is very short of occupational therapists. There should be 17 occupational therapists in post but there are only seven.

The authority should have 285 administrative and clerical workers, but there are only 256 in post. I confirm that the hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to how difficult it is to attract medical secretaries. That problem exists not just in Newham or in London but in a number of other parts of the country where alternative employment is readily available.

The hospital is all right for library staff; it has one post and one person in post. Seventy-seven of the 90 catering posts are occupied, but there are only 127 domestic and cleaning staff out of an establishment of 151. Portering, linen and transport are all satisfactory. The engineering services are slightly down, but not substantially so, although, of the 18 posts in building services, only 12 are filled. The hospital is up to establishment in garden maintenance and health education services. The problem therefore seems to be specific to certain activities. I note with great interest that some of the unskilled posts seem to be filled and that the problem seems to be in recruiting to fill the skilled posts. If I have time, I shall come back to that.

The authority tells me it has experienced some difficulties in recruiting permanent nursing staff up to the complement, although most of the vacancies are filled with agency nurses, which does not cost more, because the authority is obliged to pay the nurse only at the midpoint of the scale relevant to her qualification. A number of measures have been taken to boost the recruitment of nursing staff. The authority is seeking to remedy the shortage of theatre nurses by pursuing an in-house training programme and, in the long term, by developing links with the English national board's theatre course at the London hospital. The authority has involved itself in a little reverse brain drain by recruiting in Ireland, where it interviewed 500 possible recruits. Eighty-four training places were on offer and 30 applications from trained nurses are now being processed along with a further 280 letters of inquiry. We welcome that development.

The health authority is planning to spend an extra £66,500 in 1987-88 to promote recruitment. In addition to that normal advertising, health authority officers run a weekly job shop at Plaistow jobcentre and plan to extend the scheme to other jobcentres. Resources have been set aside for London Transport and local bus advertising, and efforts have been made to recruit staff in areas of high unemployment such as Liverpool and Yorkshire. There has been a good response to the authority's clerical and secretarial register, which will act as an employment bank.

Therefore, it is not a question of money, and the problem is certainly not to do with the funding that goes to the health authority. In 1982-83, the gross revenue expenditure of the health authority was £30,613,000. This year, the initial cash allocation is over £44 million, which represents a substantial increase and an increase in real terms. The authority's funding this year shows a 4 per cent. change from the previous year.

The problem is not affecting patients. The number of in-patient cases has risen from 21,000 in 1982 to over 22,000 while the number of day cases has increased from 1,600 to 35,000. Added together, those figures show that the number of patients who are treated per year has risen by about a seventh. Out-patient attendances are affected by changes in the arrangements for ear, nose and throat and general surgery and other changes that have been made since the new hospital was opened. However, the waiting list in Newham is very much better. The improvement is among the best in the country. The number of people waiting for urgent treatment dropped from 2,000 on 31 March 1983 to 1,188 on 30 September 1986, the last date for which figures are available, and very few have to wait for longer than the required one month.

Similarly, the number of non-urgent cases has dropped from 1,819 to 1,115. The improvement applies to general surgery, and trauma and orthopaedics, for which the number of non-urgent cases on the waiting list dropped during that period from 532 to 393, and only 64 cases now have to wait more than a year. I accept that that figure is too high, but there has been a spectacular improvement.

Mr. Spearing: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Currie: I am sorry, but there is no time.

Mr. Spearing: There are four minutes left.

Mrs. Currie: With the gaps in staffing that we have seen, but with a substantial increase in funding, a leap in patient treatment and a clearing of waiting lists — an improvement of some 40 per cent.—there are a number of points that are clear and worth putting on the record. [Interruption.] The National Health Service staff are clearly all working like Trojans. Since those people are the constituents of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) I hope that he will join me in recognising the extraordinary spectacular efforts that are clearly being put into Newham by all National Health Service staff. Any company—indeed, any establishment—would be proud of the way in which staff are working in that health authority. It is remarkable. I was particularly pleased when I was there to see how good morale was and the cheerful and pleasant atmosphere all those staff had created for patients.

One of two things is happening. Newham may be managing perfectly well without its full "paper" establishment of staff. The authoriy tells me that it is using overtime and agency staff and, as a result, is within 2 or 3 per cent. of establishment. That may be a sensible way to respond to fluctuating need, but management would be wise if it looked at its funded establishment to see whether it has the pattern and teams — the mix — that it still wants, or whether changes are needed. I am sure that the hon. Member for Newham, North-East agrees that it serves no purpose to put numbers on a piece of paper. But this also raises the question how staff in scarce specialties can be well and effectively used. As a result of today's debate, I shall send the figures to the regional health authority and Lady Sherman and ask if they can give some thought to the sort of questions that I am raising. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support me.

Either Newham is managing perfectly well by managing its staff in a way that does not show on paper, in which case it should be more explicit about it, or it is not managing perfectly well and staff should be recruited.

Mr. Spearing: Boundaries.

Mrs. Currie: My guess is that it is not a matter of boundaries. We find these difficulties in a number of parts of London. Therefore, poaching from other neighbourhoods would not solve the problem.

I was interested recently to meet nurse trainers from the West Lambeth health authority who are making a considerable effort to recruit and train young men and women from the Brixton area—people who do not have the paper qualifications to come into the traditional forms of training but who, they feel, have a great deal to offer the Health Service. They find that they are meeting an enormous enthusiastic response. I have spoken to the chairman of that district health authority about the efforts of those nurse trainers and asked him to support them.

It is significant that Newham is able to recruit people for the unskilled posts but has the most difficulty in recruiting for the highly skilled posts; yet there are supposed to be 300,000 unemployed people in London. Perhaps, as a result of today's discussion, which I welcome, we can draw the attention of all concerned to the question whether our patterns of recruitment and training, particularly in London where these problems seem most acute — and not just in nursing because, as we have demonstrated, the problem seems to be reflected in a number of other jobs — are appropriate to the labour force which is available and which wishes to work for us.

It may well be that nothing much will come out of this, that we shall continue in the same way and that health authorities such as Newham will continue to use overtime and agencies as they have done so far. If they continue to look after more patients and to bring down their waiting lists, I have to say that we should work on results as much as on input.

Perhaps, as a result of today's discussion, a spark has been struck which may help the constituents of not only the hon. Member for Newham, North-East but other London Members and people throughout the Health Service. I am more than willing to have an open mind on these matters and I shall endeavour to take the action which I have described.

3.3 pm

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): The Minister has not answered the central points put by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) about the recruitment of nurses for an accident and emergency service, about the whole question of boundaries and about adequate incentives for skilled secretaries——

The Question having been proposed after half-past Two o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at four minutes past Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 27 April 1987

HOME DEPARTMENT

Women Police Officers (Lancashire)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the number of women police officers in the Lancashire constabulary area, and the ranks held, showing the appropriate percentage in each case.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested, as on 31 March 1987, is as follows:

Police rank	Number of women police officers in each rank	Percentage of women in each rank
Superintendent	1	2·38
Chief Inspector	1	1·45
Inspector	2	1·25
Sergeant	14	2·76
Constable	245	10·49
Total	263	8·39

Thorpe Village

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he hopes to complete the security survey on Thorpe village in the Orchard Park estate, Hull.

Mr. Mellor: The survey is part of a study of the effect of the priority estates project on crime, housing, management and community life on housing estates. Thorpe village is one of five study areas. We hope to complete the Thorpe village survey interviews in June.

Prison Establishments (Chiropodists)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in the last year for which figures are available arrangements have been made for chiropodists to hold sessions in prison establishments; and in which prisons were such sessions held.

Mr. Mellor: The information held centrally relates only to sessions held on a regular basis. In September 1986 the position was as follows:

Establishment	Frequency of session
Bristol	One weekly
Camp Hill	One monthly
Cardiff	One weekly
Drake Hall	One weekly
Frankland	One monthly
Leyhill	One monthly
Lincoln	Two weekly
Liverpool	One fortnightly
Maidstone	One weekly
Manchester	Two weekly
Norwich	One monthly
Parkhurst	One monthly
Ranby	One fortnightly
Styal	One weekly
Wormwood Scrubs	One weekly
Wymott	One weekly

At other establishments sessions are arranged on an ad hoc basis in the light of demand and at the clinical discretion of the medical officer.

Prison Establishments (Mother and Baby Units)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to extend or improve facilities for mothers and babies in prison establishments.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 5 March, at column 689.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the research project by the University of Sussex in three prison department mother and baby units is expected to be completed.

Mr. Mellor: The report is due to reach the Department in February 1988.

Prison Medical Staff

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many medical officers, hospital officers and nurses employed in prisons have attended training courses in health education.

Mr. Mellor: Information in the form requested is not available from central records and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The professional and in-service training received by the staff groups mentioned contains elements relevant to health education. Such education, involving staff in various disciplines, is an ingredient in a number of existing or planned programmes and initiatives.

Restrictive Trade Practices

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Independent Broadcasting Authority has registered a network agreement with the European Economic Community Commission directorate responsible for monitoring restrictive trade practices; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: I understand that the IBA takes the view that, as a statutory authority, it is not required to notify such agreements under article 85 of the treaty of Rome.

Prisons (AIDS)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those prisons designated as regional centres for prisoners suffering from AIDS; if he has any plan to increase the number or capacity of such units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Accommodation at Brixton prison and Risley remand centre is already available for the care and support of inmates who develop AIDS and who do not for the time being require the facilities of the National Health Service. A further purpose-built unit of 12 beds is to be provided at Brixton. Our contingency plans also envisage care and support facilities at other establishments in case of need, but a final decision about their location has yet to be made. At the present time there is no diagnosed case of AIDS in the prison system.

Television Licence Fee

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further representations his Department has received over pensioner households being exempted from the television licence fee.

Mr. Mellor: Since 28 January, when I answered a similar question from the hon. Member at column 250, written representations about the level of television licence fees for retirement pensioners have been received from 46 hon. Members and 278 members of the public. the majority of these representations favour reduced, rather than free, licences for pensioners; a view strongly endorsed by a delegation from Pensioners' Voice which I received on 11 March.

Child Abuse

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further action he proposes to combat child abuse; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I intend to issue next month a paper on the use of video technology in trials involving allegations of abuse. The purpose of the paper will be, first, to seek views from outside Government on the detailed operation of the scheme provided for in clause 21 of the Criminal Justice Bill, whereby children will be able to give evidence by video link at such trials. Secondly, the paper will discuss whether a change in the law should permit a more widespread use of video recordings of a child as evidence in these trials. Copies will be placed in the Library as soon as the paper is issued.

I also propose to establish a working group of experts with recent experience in the field of child abuse to review recent developments in the investigations by the police of such cases. The object will be to offer guidance to chief officers of police on best practice, having regard both to the need for the efficient investigation of the allegations and the interest of the child.

Mr. Winston Silcott (Bail)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has completed his inquiries into the circumstances which led, in a recent case, to the grant of bail to Mr. Winston Silcott; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: On 28 May 1985 Winston Silcott was committed in custody for trial at the Central Criminal Court, on a charge of the murder of Anthony Roy Smith. On 31 May 1985 Silcott successfully applied for bail. He was later convicted of the murder, on 6 October 1985, of PC Blakelock. I understand that he has appealed against that conviction. He has also been convicted of the murder of Smith.

The bail application on behalf of Silcot was heard in chambers, and no contemporaneous record is available. This is unsatisfactory. In the absence of such a record, it is impossible to be sure of the detailed circumstances which led to the granting of bail. In particular, it is not entirely clear how closely the court addressed the possibility that the applicant might commit further offences while on bail, or what information the court considered concerning his character, antecedents, associations and community ties.

Decisions on bail are among the most difficult which a court has to take. In 1985, 22 per cent. of those committed for trial were committed in custody, including 88 per cent. of those charged with murder.

Nineteen per cent. of the prison population are now unconvicted, which is double the percentage seven years ago.

We have considered whether procedural or administrative changes are desirable in the handling of bail applications. The Crown Prosecution Service now has responsibility for making representations in respect of all applications for bail in criminal proceedings. With the agreement of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, arrangements are now in hand for ensuring that guidance to the Crown Prosecution Service includes the clearest possible instructions on best practice in dealing with bail applications. In addition, my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor intends to ensure that increased attention is given to bail in judicial studies and magisterial training. As to court procedure, there are sound reasons why the details of a bail application should not be made widely known to the public. The Government are not so far persuaded that bail applications to the Crown court ought ordinarily to be made in open court, but clearly there is a strong case for requiring that there should be a record of bail proceedings where appropriate. Arrangements will be made for this to be done in suitable categories of case.

We have also looked at the balance which the Bail Act strikes between the need to protect the interests of unconvicted defendants and the need to ensure, as far as possible, that such defendants do not commit offences or subvert the course of justice while awaiting trial. We have considered whether to bring forward proposals during proceedings on the Criminal Justice Bill now before Parliament, for amendment to the provisions of the Bail Act governing the granting of bail. The balance of the Bail Act will be kept under continuous review but we have considered that it would be a mistake to seek to alter that balance as a result of the Silcott case.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

House of Fraser

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about his decision to appoint inspectors under the Companies Act to investigate the circumstances surrounding the acquisition of shares in House of Fraser during 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Howard: No.

It is not the practice of Secretaries of State to disclose the reasons for the appointment of inspectors. I can say, however, that I have asked the inspectors to look in particular at the circumstances surrounding the acquisition of shares in House of Fraser plc in 1984 and 1985.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has any plans to arrange for staff of his Department to be screened for antibodies to human immundodeficiency virus.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 358]: There are no plans to introduce such screening among staff of the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether any current or former staff of his Department have been found to have developed AIDS or antibodies to human immundodeficiency virus.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 358]: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on Wednesday 22 April, at column 628.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to ensure that staff of his Department are warned about those homosexual and other activities which are deemed to involve a high risk of AIDS infection.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 358]: All staff in the Department of Trade and Industry have received individual copies of information and advice about AIDS.

PRIME MINISTER

AIDS

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Prime Minister if she will consider matching pound for pound from public funds the money raised from voluntary contributions during the past four weeks of International AIDS Day.

The Prime Minister: I congratulate all those who have raised money for AIDS projects through International AIDS Day. This is an entirely private charitable venture. For their part, the Government are undertaking a £20 million programme of public education. A further £7 million has been allocated in 1987-88 for the treatment, care and counselling of victims and infected people. An extra £14·5 million for research over the next three years will be made available to the Medical Research Council. Money has also been provided for the voluntary bodies dealing with AIDS. The need for further funding will be kept under review.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Privatisation (Share Purchases)

Mr. Canavan asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland how many prosecutions have taken place in Scotland, and how many are pending, in connection with the purchase or attempted purchase of shares in companies which have been privatised since 1979.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As far as can be ascertained there have been no prosecutions in Scotland in connection with the purchase or attempted purchase of shares in companies which have been privatised since 1979.

TRANSPORT

M65

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest position with regard to the M65 link to the M6/M61; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Investigations by consulting engineers are well in hand. We expect to announce the precise route for the link road in the summer and to publish statutory orders early next year.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received seeking a link from the M65 eastwards to the M1/M62; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have received suggestions, principally from Lancashire county council, that a new link might be needed, but we have no proposals. The existing A6068 route eastwards from M65 is a lightly trafficked local authority road on the primary route network.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any proposals to upgrade the link between the M66 and M65 to motorway standards.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. The existing high standard dual carriageway link, completed in 1985, was designed to cater for existing and future traffic requirements.

M62

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on potential for traffic growth on the M62 across the Pennines.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The M62 section across the Pennines, soon to be improved by the addition of climbing lanes, can accommodate substantial traffic growth. We plan to widen the busy section of the motorway north of Manchester.

Driving Tests

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the average waiting time for a driving test at each driving test centre in Lancashire in the last five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This information is not readily available. The waiting times in April for the last three years were:

Centre	1985 Weeks	1986 Weeks	1987 Weeks
Blackburn	11	15	13
Blackpool	11	10	7
Chorley	8	10	11
Heysham	12	15	10
Nelson	11	14	8
Preston	10	12	7

Figures for earlier years are not available.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many driving tests have been conducted at each driving test centre in Lancashire in each of the last five years; and what the percentage failure rate has been in each case.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The figures are as follows:

Centre	1982		1983		1984		1985		1986
	Number of tests conducted	Percentage of failure rates	Number of tests conducted	Percentage of failure rates	Number of tests conducted	Percentage of failure rates	Number of tests conducted	Percentage of failure rates	Number of tests conducted	Percentage of failure rates
Blackburn	8,918	48·0	8,380	48·5	6,659	46·6	8,752	48·7	8,376	50·0
Blackpool	9,271	48·8	8,671	45·6	8,196	43·3	8,045	42·2	8,648	40·0
Chorley	2,626	47·0	3,918	44·3	4,083	45·3	4,292	43·5	6,240	46·0
Heysham	5,769	50·8	4,464	48·0	4,441	48·5	3,986	48·0	4,360	46·0
Nelson	7,270	47·5	5,117	41·9	4,914	44·8	5,855	47·0	6,634	47·0
Preston	6,123	51·2	5,868	50·0	6,806	49·2	8,122	46·8	7,571	42·0

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many driving test centres there are in Lancashire; where they are sited; and how many test examiners are employed at each centre.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There are six driving test centres in Lancashire, sited and staffed as follows:

Centres	Examiners employed (1 April 1987)
Blackburn	6
Blackpool	6
Chorley	5
Heysham	3
Nelson	4
Preston	6

Rail Commuter Services

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the numbers of commuters using rail services from Essex into London in each of the past five years.

Mr. David Mitchell: Specific data on passengers travelling from Essex into London are not available. However, the figures for the number of passengers arriving in the morning peak at Liverpool Street and Fenchurch Street stations for the past five years are as follows:

Thousands

	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986
Liverpool Street	62	58	58	58	64
Fenchurch Street	27	28	28	28	29
Total	89	86	86	86	93

Note: These figures include commuters from all of Essex, some East London suburbs, and small areas of Cambridgeshire and Hertfordshire.

Motorway Barriers

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his answer in the Official Report of 8 April, Official Report column 249 relating to motorway barriers he will state what proportion of central barriers construction contracts will be covered by his proposed sample check of 150 miles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The 150 miles of detailed checks cover some 36 separate sections of motorways constructed between 1958 and 1976. Continuous central reserve safety fences were not provided on motorways until after 1970, and were added to motorways constructed prior to this date under contracts arranged locally. The information requested is not readily available. It is estimated the sample should cover about 20 per cent. of central barrier construction contracts.

Aviation (Competition)

Mr. Trotter asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has now heard from the Civil Aviation Authority following his request to it to hold consultations with the airline industry, in order to ensure a proper framework for free and fair competition in British aviation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Civil Aviation Authority's consultation paper on safeguards against monopolistic and anti-competitive behaviour was issued on 22 January. Consultees were originally given until 31 March to respond, but, in view of the complexity of the issues and the need to ensure that they are given the fullest consideration, individual requests for further time to submit a response have been granted. The authority expects that all submissions on this consultation, and on the parallel consultation on market entry, will have been received by the end of May.

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the Government's policy on the encouragement of competition in the British airline industry and strengthening the role of other airlines as competitors to British Airways.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Government are committed to a sound and competitive multi-airline industry and to the promotion of fair competition in all markets, so long as the United Kingdom's interests are not prejudiced. This policy offers British airlines, with adequate resources, opportunities to provide competing services and thus to strengthen their position. It is also the aim of the policy that the United Kingdom civil aviation industry as a whole should continue to include airlines strong enough to compete aggressively against foreign carriers.

It is essential for the continued success of the Government's policy that there should be effective safeguards against anti-competitive behaviour. The Civil Aviation Authority, at our request, is reviewing the information available to it on airlines' activities and whether that information should be improved, in consultation with the air transport industry, its users and others. The authority is also consulting on the question of market entry.

Coaches and Minibuses (Seat Belts)

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he intends to make it a legal requirement that persons on the exposed seats of new coaches and minibuses to which seat belts are to be fitted will be obliged to wear those belts.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. We aim to encourage their voluntary use.

Pacer Units

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library information on the anticipated reliability and frequency of servicing of pacer units at the time of British Rail's purchase of these units; what information he has on the extent to which these expectations have been met; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: These are management matters for BR, and the Government do not receive the type of information requested. I understand, however, that BR has experienced certain problems in the operation of their pacer units. Where these difficulties have not already been overcome, BR is confident that they can be resolved.

Inter-City Services

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his answer of 22 April, he will discuss with British Rail appropriate definitions of overcrowding on Inter-City services.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am happy to discuss with British Rail its standards for Inter-City, but it is required to operate this service on a commercial basis and it is for it to decide on the combination of quality, price and provision that best enables it to meet the needs of its customers and to compete successfully with other modes.

Drink-Driving

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a review of the high-risk excess alcohol offender scheme.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We need more results before drawing firm conclusions. The scheme has been running for four years. In the last 12 months the first drivers have completed their obligatory three-year period of disqualification and have had to satisfy the licensing authority that their drink problem is under control.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, commencing in this year's edition of "Road Accidents Great Britain: The Casualty Report", he will publish the proportion of fatalities, by age group, with alcohol levels 0 to 20 mg per cent., 21 to 50 mg per cent., 51 to 80 mg per cent. and those over 80 per cent.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Information is available in tables C4 and C5 on page 23 of the 1985 edition, but not as a detailed cross-tabulation. We will consider this suggestion.

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps are being taken to improve methods of data collection in relation to official statistics regarding the number and proportion of fatalities resulting from accidents where excess alcohol was identified as a major contributory factor.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Coroners' reports contain information on blood alcohol levels of fatalities. This is summarised in "Road Accidents Great Britain: The Casualty Report". This book also contains information on breath tests of drivers involved in accidents. The number of such tests administered is a matter for the police.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the construction of the Channel tunnel will have any impact on war graves or cemeteries containing war graves in the United Kingdom.

Mr. David Mitchell: The construction of the Channel tunnel will have no impact on war graves or cemeteries containing war graves in the United Kingdom, though the Commonwealth War Graves Commission has, of course, been kept informed of the plans.

A423 Stubbings Bypass

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made with regard to his decision on the A423 Stubbings bypass; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The inspector's report following the A423 inquiry is still being considered. I hope to make an announcement this summer.

ENVIRONMENT

Widdicombe Report

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department is replying to all those organisations which have submitted observations on the Widdicombe report.

Dr. Boyson: We have received nearly 400 responses to our invitation for comments on the Widdicombe report. The Department has acknowledged each one, but will not be responding individually to the various comments and observations contained in them. I can, however, assure the hon. Member that my right hon. Friend will take proper account of the responses in his consideration of the report and its findings.

Housing Grants

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of housing grants to the private sector were mandatory grants in 1979 and each subsequent year (a) nationally, (b) in the north-west region, (c) in Lancashire, (d) in Burnley and (e) in Pendle.

Mr. Tracey: The information reported by local authorities is available in the form requested only from 1981-82.

Capital Expenditure on Mandatory Grants as a Percentage of all Expenditure on Renovation Grants

	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
(a) England	21·4	16·9	10·8	17·2	25·5
(b) North West Region	15·4	14·8	6·2	10·3	15·5
(c) Lancashire	25·9	16·4	7·0	10·3	19·2
(d) Burnley	63·4	43·5	5·2	15·8	50·7
(e) Pendle	23·6	16·9	13·0	15·6	20·0

House Building (Grimsby)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses were built each year in Grimsby since 1979.

Mr. Tracey: Reported completions of dwellings in Great Grimsby appear in the following issues of "Local Housing Statistics", which are available in the Library.

Year	Issue Number
1979	59
1980-83	73
1984	77
1985	78
1986[1]	80

[1] First nine months

County Hall, Wakefield

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has had discussions with the chairman of the West Yorkshire Residuary Body about the district valuer's assessment of the value of county hall, Wood street, Wakefield; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what recent discussions he has had with the chairman of the West Yorkshire Residuary Body regarding the sale of county hall, Wood street, Wakefield; and if he will make a statement;

(3) when he expects the West Yorkshire Residuary Body to make its decision on the sale of furnishings and contents of the county hall, Wood street, Wakefield;

(4) when he expects the West Yorkshire Residuary Body to make its decision on the sale of the county hall, Wood street, Wakefield.

Dr. Boyson: I have discussed the sale of county hall with the chairman of the residuary body and I understand that marketing should soon be completed.

Acid Rain

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will report on the work undertaken with the UNECE Geneva convention on long-range transboundary air pollution by the group of experts on cost and benefit analysis into an economic assessment of the acid deposition problem in the United Kingdom; and if he will provide details of conclusions which the group has reached.

Mr. Waldegrave: The executive body for the UNECE convention on long range transboundary air pollution has given the group of experts on cost and benefit analysis a wide-ranging remit to develop and apply appropriate economic methodologies to the evaluation of alternative abatement scenarios, for the ECE region as a whole and not specifically the United Kingdom. The group has had two formal sessions and has not yet reached conclusions, but these will be made available in due course.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the emission scenarios for sulphur dioxide, nitrogen oxides, hydrocarbons and other pollutants which are being used for cost-benefit analysis of the acid deposition problem in the United Kingdom within the context of the UNECE Geneva convention on long-range transboundary air pollution.

Mr. Waldegrave: The executive body for the convention on long range transboundary air pollution adopted the following sulphur dioxide emission scenarios for the ECE region as a whole at its second session in September 1984, taking 1980 emissions as the base level:

Scenario 1	No additional sulphur control measures to (a) 1995 and (b) 2010.
Scenario 2	Maintain base level emissions to (a) 1995 and (b) 2010.
Scenarios 3 in 4 and 5	10, 30 and 50 per cent. respectively, reductions base level emissions by (a) 1995 and (b) 2010.

No emission scenarios have yet been adopted by the executive body for nitrogen oxides, hydrocarbons or other pollutants.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in full in the Official Report the text of the United Kingdom's sulphur dioxide abatement programme as provided to the group of experts on cost and benefit analysis within the UNECE Geneva convention on long-range transboundary air pollution.

Mr. Waldegrave: No such programme has been provided to the group of experts on cost and benefit analysis. Research work being undertaken for my Department on the development of economic evaluation models in the context of United Kingdom domestic policy have been used as a substantial input to the work of the group. It is intended to make the results of this research available in due course.

Estate Action

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will announce his approval for the Thorpes scheme on the Anchor park estate under the estate action programme.

Mr. John Patten: Estate Action is considering the local authority's outline application for additional resources to carry out improvement works linked to more localised management on the Thorpes part of the Orchard Park estate in Hull, together with bids from other authorities.

Local authorities will be advised shortly which outline schemes they should work up as firm bids for Estate Action support. Formal approval of schemes will follow once local authorities have consulted tenants fully and produced satisfactory detailed schemes and costings in line with their outline proposals.

Marine Pollution

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has yet completed his consideration of the report sent to him on 20 April by the Greenpeace organisation on the pollution of the North sea by nitrates and other agricultural based chemicals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Not yet.

Renovation Grants

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider modification of the criteria upon which renovation grants are considered so that, in addition to the condition of a dwelling, the needs of the applicant can be considered; what representations he has received from local authorities and others in this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: Local authorities already have discretion to take into account a number of factors other than dwelling condition, including the needs of the grant applicant. We are considering changes to the system to reflect more directly applicants' needs and resources, in the light of responses to the Green Paper "Home Improvement — A New Approach" and subsequent representations.

Rana Heterodactyla and Rana Tigrina

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information his Department keeps on the importation of rana heterodactyla and rana tigrina; if he will give figures on the countries of origin; and if any conditions are imposed by United Kingdom authorities in the methods of slaughter.

Mr. Waldegrave: I assume the hon. Member is referring to rana hexadactyla and rana tigerina. International trade in these species has been monitored since 1 August 1985 under the terms of the convention on international trade on endangered species and statistics of imports from non-EC countries have since then been maintained by my Department.

From 1 August 1985 to date, 3,629 kg of rana hexadactyla legs and 200 kg of rana hexadactyla meat have been imported from India. There have been no imports of rana tigerina.

No conditions relating to methods of slaughter are attached to import permits, which are imposed for conservation reasons. There is, however, an internationally recognised code of practice relating to the processing of frogs legs to which, I understand, the Indian Government subscribe.

Mixed Football

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will discuss with the Football Association the implications for Her Majesty's Government's policy on equal opportunities of the FA's rule forbidding mixed football; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The Football Association and the Women's Football Association both encourage the participation of everyone in the game. As with most physical sports, however, the view of both associations is that while very young children of either sex may compete on equal terms, the interests of competitive football are best served by separate competitions for men and women at the junior and senior level. I see no need to offer advice to the FA or the WFA on this view or any inconsistency between it and the Government's approach to equal opportunities.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

University of Wales

33. Mr. Foot asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will open immediate discussions with those conducting the affairs of University college, Cardiff about the loss of posts now projected.

Mr. Walden: The University Grants Committee is already in contact with University college, Cardiff about the college's financial position, including its current academic and financial plans.

34. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will have discussions with the University Grants Committee regarding the implications for education in Wales of the financial situation of the University college of Wales, Aberystwyth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend and I, together with the chairman of the University Grants Committee, met representatives of the University of Wales on 29 January to discuss aspects of the funding of the university.

St. Saviours, Ealing

Sir George Young asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to allocate funds for the improvement programme planned for St. Saviours, Ealing.

Mr. Dunn: I cannot at present say when funds might be allocated for this project.

Nursery Education

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish for each of the year since 1978 his estimate of the total number of places available nationally in nursery schools and nursery classes.

Mr. Dunn: Information on the number of places in nursery schools and nursery classes is not collected centrally. The number of full-time and part-time pupils in maintained nursery schools and nursery classes in primary schools in England each year since 1978 was as follows :

January each year	[1]Number
1978	201,337
1979	210,248
1980	215,451
1981	221,590
1982	235,401
1983	247,825
1984	258,601
1985	266,936
1986	272,480

[1]The number of full-time and part-time pupils in nursery schools and nursery classes.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to arrange for staff in his department to be screened for antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mrs. Rumbold [pursuant to her reply, 30 March 1987, c. 344-45]: No.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether any current or former staff of his department have been found to have developed AIDS or antibodies to HIV.

Mrs. Rumbold [pursuant to her reply, 30 March 1987, c. 344-45]: I would refer my hon Friend to the answer given by my hon Friend the Minister for Health on Wednesday 22 April.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he has taken to ensure that staff of his Department are warned about those homosexual and other activities which are deemed to involve a high risk of AIDS infection.

Mrs. Rumbold [pursuant to her reply, 30 March 1987, c. 344-5]: In April 1986 the Management and Personnel Office, after consulting the chief medical officer, DHSS, circulated all Departments with guidance to managers and model notes for staff. This Department drew on those notes in producing advice to staff through the medium of an office notice. I understand that a copy of the central guidance is available in the Library.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Envelopes

Mr. Speller asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will estimate the annual cost to the Exchequer of the larger size of brown manilla envelopes supplied for use by the House of Commons; what representations he has received concerning the number of such envelopes which have broken in the post; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: The estimated cost of the brown post-paid envelopes, code number 131, supplied for right hon. and hon. Members use during the period March 1986 to April 1987 was £42, 572·60. This amount includes postal charges at first-class rates.

The Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee at its meeting on 19 May last year considered the feasibility and cost of stocking more robust brown envelopes and decided that orders should be placed on an experimental basis for a stronger self-seal brown envelope of 120g/m2 code number 23-115. These are being tried out by the Committee Office and the results of the experiment will be reported to the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee shortly.

ENERGY

Waste Conversion

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Energy what funds he has made available, and to which local authorities in Scotland for the conversion of domestic and industrial waste into fuel.

Mr. David Hunt: The Energy Efficency Office has funded research and development and demonstrations of the conversion of domestic and industrial waste into fuel, to the value of £3,134,000 in the United Kingdom.

No local authorities in Scotland have applied to my Department for funding, but our energy technology support unit is monitoring the performance of a pilot refuse derived fuel plant operated by Glasgow district council.

Sizewell B

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the current estimate of the Central Electricity Generating Board for the capital cost of the Sizewell B nuclear power station.

Mr. Goodlad: I am advised by the CEGB that its latest estimate is £1,245 million in 1982 prices, the price basis used by Sir Frank Layfield. This includes substantial costs incurred because of the time the CEGB had to wait for a decision; these are a function of the inquiry process rather than the type of station.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Conscientious Objection

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the draft recommendation and report prepared by the Steering Committee for Human Rights of the Council of Europe on conscientious objection to compulsory military service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The United Kingdom Permanent Representative to the Council of Europe supported the draft recommendation and report which were adopted by the Committee of Ministers' Deputies on 9 April 1987.

Immigrant Workers

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent changes there have been to the rights of immigrant workers in Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Hong Kong Government announced on 16 April revised conditions of employment for foreign domestic helpers in Hong Kong, covering conditions of stay, wage levels, and new arrangements for changes of employment and renewal of contract. These revisions followed a Government review of the employment of foreign domestic helpers in Hong Kong. The Hong Kong Government also reminded all foreign domestic helpers to observe conditions of stay by not taking on additional work and reminded employers to take out accident insurance for all foreign domestic helpers in their employ.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, if he has received any assurances from the Government of Sri Lanka that the British citizens working for KMS are not employed in military operations.

Mr. Eggar: No. As I told the hon. member for West Bromwich, West (Miss Boothroyd) on 24 March, we understand that KMS employs British citizens under a private commercial contract with the Sri Lankan Government to training services to their security forces. We have emphased throughout to KMS and to the Sri Lankan Government alike our view that British subjects should not be engaged in military operations of any kind in Sri Lanka.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether any current or former staff of his Department have been found to have developed AIDS or antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Eggar [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c 341-42]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on 22 April.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has any plans to arrange for staff of his Department to be screened for antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Eggar [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 341-42]: There are no such plans at present.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he has taken to ensure that staff of his Department are warned about those homosexual and other activities which are deemed to involved a high risk of AIDS infection.

Mr. Eggar [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 341-42]: In April 1986 the Management and Personnel Office, after consulting the chief medical officer, DHSS, circulated all Departments with guidance to managers and model notes for staff. This Department drew on those notes and on the Department of Employment-Health and Safety Executive book "AIDS and Employment" in providing notes for staff. I understand that copies of both those pieces of guidance are available in the Library of the House.

EMPLOYMENT

Wage Rates

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General if he will publish in the Official Report the percentage increase in average full-time male manual and average full-time and part-time female wages in the Borders region since 1979 to the latest figures available, together with the percentage increase in the retail prices index and the equivalent percentage wage rate increases in United Kingdom national terms for the same period.

Mr. Lee: Estimates of earnings in the Borders region are available only for full-time manual male employees.

The information is shown in the table:

Percentage increase April 1979 to April 1986
Gross average weekly earnings

Full-time[1] adult[2] male manual employees	Per cent.
Borders region	+101
United Kingdom	+90
Retail prices index (all times)	+80

[1] Whose earnings are not affected by absence.
[2] On adult rates (1979 figures have been adjusted from an age related basis).

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General if he will publish in the Official Report a statistical analysis of average wage rates since 1979 (a) in the Scottish borders, (b) in Scotland and (c) in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: The available information on average earnings for the Borders region and the comparable information for Scotland and the United Kingdom is set out in the table:

Gross average weekly earnings—Full-time[1] adult[2] male employees (April)

	£ per week
	Borders Region	Scotland	United Kingdom

Health and Safety Executive and Industrial Pollution Inspectorate

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General what are the lastest figures he has available for staffing levels, actual and establishment, of the Health and Safety Executive and the Industrial Pollution Inspectorate (a) in the United Kingdom as a whole and (b) in Scotland.

Mr. Trippier: The Health and Safety Executive's responsibilities cover Great Britain but do not extend to Northern Ireland. The number of permanent staff in post at 1 March 1987 and planned manpower for 31 March 1987 are as follows:

1. Health and Safety Executive (Great Britain)
(including Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate)
(a) Number of staff in post—3,594
(b) Planned manpower—3,677

2. Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate
(a) Number of staff in post—48
(b) Planned manpower—58

The Industrial Air Pollution Inspectorate operates in England and Wales. On 1 April 1987 the inspectorate transferred from HSE to the Department of the Environment's Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Pollution. Responsibility for air pollution inspection in Scotland rests with Her Majesty's Industrial Pollution Inspectorate for Scotland.

3. Health and Safety Executive (Scotland)
(a) Number of staff in post—178
(b) Planned manpower—179

4. Her Majesty's Industrial Pollution Inspectorate for Scotland

There were 18 permanent staff in post in the inspectorate on 1 March against a planned manpower of 19.

Borders Region

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General (1) what has been the change in the amount of part-time working in the Borders region since 1979;

(2) what has been the change in the number of manufacturing jobs in the Borders region since 1979;

(3) what has been the change in the number of service based jobs in the Borders region since 1979.

Mr. Lee: My Department's statistics for the region monitor only net changes in employment between census dates. No census was taken in 1979, or 1980, and the most recent figures are for September 1981. The September 1984 census estimates for local areas are not yet available.

"Lifting the Burden"

Mr. Shersby asked the Paymaster General, if he will take steps to publish an up-to-date version of the White Paper entitled, "Lifting the Burden".

Mr. Trippier: "Lifting the Burden" (Cmnd. 9571), published in June 1985, was followed, in May 1986, by a second White Paper on deregulation entitled "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" (Cmnd. 9794). A summary leaflet "Cutting Red Tape" was published at the same time. We expect to publish a further report during 1987.

Training Schemes

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General how many people in (i) Burnley and (ii) Pendle constituencies are engaged in (a) the YTS, (b) the community programme, (c) the job release scheme, (d) the enterprise allowance scheme, (e) the job splitting scheme, (f) community industry and (g) the young workers scheme.

Mr. Lee: Not all the figures are available in the precise form requested. However, the available information for Burnley and Pendle at 31 March 1987 is as follows:

		Burnley	Pendle
1	YTS	719	538
1	The Community Programme	422	465
2	The Job Release Scheme	164	118
3	The Enterprise Allowance Scheme	681
4	The Job Splitting Scheme	18
(f)	Community Industry	Nil	Nil
(g)	The Young Workers Scheme	Closed last year 31 March 1986
4	The New Workers Scheme (succeeded the Young Workers Scheme)	1,393

Labour Statistics

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General if he will publish in the Official Report for (a) Burnley constituency and (b) Pendle constituency (i) the population and (ii) the number unemployed as at 1 January and 1 July in 1979 and each subsequent year.

Mr. Lee: Following is the available information, which is also in the Library. The most recent information on the population in parliamentary constituencies is from the 1981 census of population, which identified populations of 94,078 and 85,744 respectively, present on census night (5-6 April 1981) in the Burnley and Pendle constituencies.

The following table shows the numbers of unemployed claimants in the parliamentary constituencies of Burnley and Pendle on count dates closest to 1 January and 1 July. The comparison is affected by the change in timing of the compilation of the unemployment statistics in March 1986. Statistics of unemployment for parliamentary constituencies are derived from the ward-based system and are available only from June 1983.

	Burnley	Pendle
14 July 1983	6,205	4,700
12 January 1984	6,039	4,689
12 July 1984	5,855	4,499
10 January 1985	5,895	4,720
11 July 1985	6,040	4,803
9 January 1986	6,085	4,839
10 July 1986	6,093	4,914
8 January 1987	5,769	4,534

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what was the number of people unemployed in (a) Burnley and (b) Pendle by standard industrial classification when such figures were last available.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the numbers of unemployed registrants, analysed by the 1968 standard industrial classification, at jobcentres which closely correspond to the Burnley and Pendle parliamentary constituencies in May 1982, the last date for which such figures were collected. These figures are not comparable with the current monthly count of unemployed claimants at unemployment benefit offices.

Unemployed Registrants, May 1982

	Burnley and Padiham Jobcentres	Barnoldswick, Colne and Nelson Jobcentres

Total unemployed registrants	6,264	4,433

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what are the unemployment figures, broken down by male and female and under 25 years, 25 to 50 years and over 50 years of age for each of the last four years for (a) Burnley constituency and (b) Pendle constituency.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The tables show the number of unemployed claimants in the age groups requested, analysed by sex, in the constituencies of Burnley and Pendle, for January of each year from 1984. This comparison is affected by the change in the timing of the compilation of the count in March 1986.

Unemployed Claimants, Burnley Parliamentary Constituency

January 1987	790	623	1,438	746	630	307

Mr. Peter Pike asked the Paymaster General how many people in (a) Burnley and (b) Pendle have been unemployed (i) for more than one year and (ii) for more than two years; and what were the corresponding figures in 1979.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The table gives the numbers of claimants who had been unemployed for the durations requested in the parliamentary constituencies of Burnley and Pendle on 8 January 1987, the latest date for which an analysis of unemployment by duration is available. Statistics of unemployment for parliamentary constituencies derived from the ward-based system and are available only from June 1983.

Community Programme

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General when he expects to increase the maximum community programme wage for labourers.

Mr. Lee: We keep under review the maximum level of wages which can be reimbursed under the community programme and make changes when this would improve the cost-effective use of taxpayers' money. There are no plans at present to increase the maximum level of reimbursement of wages for participants.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General how many community programme places in the Borders region are expected to be lost as a result of new Manpower Services Commission restrictions on approved places and average occupancy rates.

Mr. Lee: It is proposed that the average number of filled places for the Borders region in 1987-88 shall be 261, compared to 282 during 1986-87.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on Government policy towards reductions in Manpower Services Commission community programme projects in the Borders area in 1987-88.

Mr. Lee: In 1987-88 the community programme will provide jobs for 300,000 people, the same number as in 1986-87. The programme will operate at an average level of about 245,000 filled places over the year, slightly below the current level of 248,000 filled places. At the same time the Manpower Services Commission is seeking to ensure that places are as far as possible targeted on those areas of greatest need and this means that some shifts in the geographical distribution of places will occur. In the Borders area places have been allocated according to the distribution of the numbers of long-term unemployed people within Scotland. This means that there will be an average filled place allocation of 261 places for 1987-88 compared to 282 places during 1986-87.

Mr. Craigen asked the Paymaster General when he expects to reply to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill's letter of 20 March regarding the Manpower Services Commission's community programmes in inner-city areas in Scotland.

Mr. Lee: I shall be replying to the hon. Member shortly.

Ministerial Visit (Liverpool)

Mr. Wareing asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement on the visit to Nabisco at Long lane, Liverpool of the Department of Employment Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on Thursday 2 April.

Mr. Lee: I was invited to the Nabisco bakery at Aintree, Liverpool on 2 April to present certificates to a number of YTS managing agents in the locality who had recently gained the status of approved training organisation. The requirement for all YTS managing agents to gain ATO status is an important aspect of the Manpower Services Commission's programme of quality development in YTS.

Earnings

Mr. Craigen asked the Paymaster General when he will reply to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill's letter of 7 April about disparities in the United Kingdom in the level of earnings.

Mr. Lee: I shall be replying to the hon. Member shortly.

Pneumoconiosis

Mr. Wigley asked the Paymaster General how many persons have to date received compensation payments under the pneumoconiosis, Etc. (Workers Compensation) Act 1979; and what has been the total amount of money paid out under the provisions of that Act since it reached the statute book.

Mr. Trippier: As at 23 April, 4,619 persons have received payments amounting to £26,953,073 since the Act came into force on 4 July 1979.

Aids

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Paymaster General whether he has any plans to arrange for staff of his Department to be screened for antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 353]: No.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Paymaster General whether any current or former staff of his Department have found to have developed AIDS or antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 353]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on Wednesday 22 April.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Paymaster General what steps he has taken to ensure that staff of his Department are warned about those homosexual and other activities which are deemed to involve a high risk of AIDS infection.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 353]: In April 1986 the Management and Personnel Office, after consulting the chief medical officer DHSS, circulated all Departments with guidance to managers and model notes for staff. The Department of Employment group drew on those notes and on the Department of Employment-Health and Safety Executive book "AIDS and Employment" in providing notes for staff. I understand that copies of both of those pieces of guidance are available in the Library of the House.

Earnings

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Paymaster General whether he will publish in the Official Report his estimate of the numbers and average gross earnings in the fiscal year 1987-88 of the median and deciles of full-time male and female manual and non-manual workers.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.
No official forecasts are available.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Marine Pollution

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement outlining the nature of his responsibilities for marine pollution; and if, in particular, he will indicate what calculations he has made of the cost of disposing of sewage sludge per wet ton by means of incineration, agricultural application, land fill and sea dumping, respectively.

Mr. Gummer: Under part II of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 my right hon. Friend the Minister is responsible in England for granting licences for the disposal of waste at sea. He is also jointly responsible, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, for granting authorisations under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 for the discharge of radioactive wastes from licensed nuclear sites and UKAEA premises in England. In addition, under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 we are consulted by water authorities or by the Secretary of State for the Environment about the potential effects on fisheries of proposed pipeline discharges into coastal waters. Comparisons of financial and other costs are more appropriately made in individual cases as they vary considerably according to the circumstances.

Pesticides

Sir Richard Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has on the value of the pesticides sold to farmers for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Information on sales of agricultural pesticides to farmers in the United Kingdom is not held by my Department. However, current indications from industry figures suggest annual sales approaching £400 million.

Ex-Spanish Fishing Vessels

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many ex-Spanish fishing vessels are now on the British Register; and what was the total on 1 January.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Thames Barrier

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what occasions in the past month the Thames barrier has been raised in order to prevent flooding in the London area, other than for testing purposes.

Mr. Donald Thompson: During the past month the Thames barrier was raised on Sunday 29 March due to a combination of northerly winds, a high spring-tide, and the level of surge and fresh water flow.

Soft Drinks Regulations 1964

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he intends to revise the Soft Drinks Regulations 1964; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The Government indicated in their White Paper on "Lifting the Burden" that they would review the Soft Drinks Regulations 1964. This has now been done and I shall be issuing proposals under the Food Act 1984 for revised regulations on soft drinks. These proposals will concentrate only on the following points:

(i) a requirement to declare the fruit or fruit juice content on the labels of soft drinks which are derived wholly or mainly from such sources;

(ii) minimum compositional standards only for soda water and Indian tonic water;

(iii) continuing the present requirements for "low calorie"

drinks;
(iv) continuing the present controls on the maximum amount of saccharin that can be used in soft drinks.

Many of the provisions in the current regulations will be revoked, notably those imposing minimum sugar content requirements and the minimum compositional requirements for fruit-based or fruit juice-based drinks. These proposals are therefore in keeping with the Government's policy of simplifying or removing regulations wherever it is appropriate to do so.

DEFENCE

Service Dwellings

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in the Official Report the number of service dwellings and official lodgings, showing where they are situated, untenanted for over two months in (i) England, (ii) Wales, (iii) Scotland and (iv) Northern Ireland.

Mr. Freeman: Records are not maintained in the form requested and such information could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, as at 31 march 1987 a total of 4,389 married quarters had been vacant for over one year, of which 3,652 were in England, 66 in Wales, 574 in Scotland and 97 in Northern Ireland. W79 Nuclear Missile Shells

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of deployment of the W79 nuclear artillery shells within Northern Army Group.

Mr. Stanley: As was repeated once again by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and by myself in the House on 24 March, at columns 162 and 148 respectively, no decisions affecting the modernisation of theatre nuclear weapons in service with British forces have yet been made. The modernisation of the nuclear artillery of other NATO forces is a matter for the Governments concerned.

Skyflash

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to overcome problems with Skyflash missiles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I am not aware of any current problems with the Skyflash missile.

Defence Quality Assessment Centre (Redundancies)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement regarding the calculation of the last day of service for redundant staff at the directorate general of defence quality assessment centre in Birmingham.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The quality assurance centre, Birmingham, was closed on 31 March 1987. The plans for the diversion of work and dispersal of equipment had been based on the cessation of work on that date and no work was possible at the centre after that date. Since no suitable employment could be found for the staff elsewhere, there last day of service had to be 31 March 1987.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Greater London

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements exist within his Department, within the central headquarters or in any regional or sub-regional organisation, for dealing with his responsibilities regarding public services or any other function in respect of the Greater London area; and how many full-time equivalent staff are involved in such work.

Mr. Fowler: My responsibility for health services in London are exercised largely through the four Thames regional health authorities, the relevant district health authorities and the special health authorities. In addition, the family practitioner services are administered by the family practitioner committees which are accountable to me. The exact numbers and deployment of their staff are a matter for the bodies concerned. Arrangements for liaison exist within the Department's organisational structure, but it is not possible to identify directly the amount of staff time devoted solely to London issues.

As regards personal social services, local authorities are required to act under my general guidance. I also have certain specific powers such as those of formal inquiry and inspection and responsibilities such as social work training. In carrying out these functions I am supported by the Social Services Inspectorate regional and central staff and by other headquarters staff. At the inspectorate's London regional office, there are 14 professional staff and nine administrative and secretarial staff primarily engaged in work relating to the London boroughs. It is not possible to identify separately the time spent by other staff on Greater London issues.

My responsibilities for social security in London are carried through by local offices of two London regions. The offices employed 9,890 full-time equivalent staff at 1 March 1987.

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services with which Departments and non-departmental bodies his Department, and its related non-departmental public bodies has consulted during 1986-87 in respect of services provided within Greater London; approximately how often such consultations have taken place; and what issues were discussed.

Mr. Fowler: My Department and the regional, district and special health authorities consult as appropriate with other departments and non-departmental public bodies. No central record is kept of the numerous oral and written consultations which occur.

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether there are any proposals to change the arrangements for discharging his Department's responsibilities regarding public services or any other function in respect of the Greater London area during the forthcoming year.

Mr. Fowler: I have no proposals to change the current arrangements.

Departmental Advertising

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of his Department's advertising and promotional budget is spent on regional and local newspapers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: The choice between using national newspapers or regional and local press is dictated by the need to achieve cost effective cover of the target audiences for particular campaigns.

Spending on press advertising by the Department in 1986-87 was £5·1 million of which £315,000 was spent in the regional and local press, representing just over 6 per cent. of the total.

National Insurance

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated cost of a reduction of one percentage point in the employee's and the employer's national insurance contribution in 1987-88; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1957 the rate of contribution in each case as a percentage of average earnings, together with the standard rate of income tax on earned income.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 25 March 1987, c. 197]: The information in the second part of the question is as follows:

National Insurance contributions expressed as a Percentage of Average Earnings of Males paid Adult Rates whose pay was unaffected by absence

	Employee's Contributions	Employer's Contributions[4]	Standard Rate of Income Tax (per cent.)

1987-88	9·00	10·45	27·00

[1] National insurance contributions were collected only on a flat rate basis up to April 1961. The percentages given up to then are based on flat rate contributions for men aged more than 18.

[2] Between April 1961 and April 1975 graduated contributions based on earnings were paid in addition to flat rate contributions. The percentages for this period are based on the aggregate of flat rate contributions for men aged over 18 and graduated contributions for those not contracted-out of the graduated pension scheme.

[3] The standard not contracted-out rates of national insurance contributions for employees and employers are used as a basis for each year since 1975-76.

[4] The national insurance surcharge is not included in the employer's contribution. This was payable by most employers from April 1977 up to 1984. The surcharge was levied on employees' gross earnings on the same basis as employers' NICs. It was abolished.

except for local authorities and some related employers, with effect from 1 October 1984. For local authorities the date of abolition was 6 April 1985. The rates were as follows:

	Rate per cent.
From:
6 April 1977	2·0
2 October 1978	3·5
2 August 1982	2·0
6 April 1983	1·5
1 August 1983	1·0
1 October 1984	0·0

Mrs. E. Hamilton

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will be able to reply to the point raised by Mrs. E. Hamilton about the payment of pensions on retirement about which the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill wrote on 31 March.

Mr. Lyell: My noble Friend wrote to the hon. Member on 23 April.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claims for single payments in respect of the exceptionally severe weather were received at Brown house, Burnley benefit office this winter; and how many were approved.

Mr. Major: Information on the number of claims is not available in precisely the form requested, but by 21 April 6,702 £5 payments had been made, and 1,093 claims refused, by the Burnley local office.

Bronchitis and Emphysema

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he now proposes to classify bronchitis and emphysema as industrial diseases.

Mr. Major: The Industrial Injuries Advisory Council has conducted an investigation into this subject and I understand that its report will be submitted to my right hon. Friend later this year. Its recommendations will be considered then.

Familial Hyperlipidaemia

Mr. Ashby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will produce figures for the last three years for each region showing the incidence of patients diagnosed as having familial hyperlipidaemia with particular reference to the sex and age when diagnosed of the patient;

(2) whether he will recommend that tests for familial hyperlipidaemia are included in medical examinations for all members of the armed forces, the police force and the Civil Service.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Pensioners

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish figures setting out the components of net weekly spending power in November 1985 and November 1986 for each of a single and married retirement pensioner, assuming (a) £15 a week rent and £7 rates and (b) £30 a week rent and £10 a week rates, and with the following amounts of income in addition to the state basic pension: £0, £5, £10, £15, £20, £30, £40, £50 and £100, respectively.

Mr. Major: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will estimate what proportion of the beneficiaries of private sector occupational pension schemes who derive entitlement from members who have retired since 1974 have been accorded increments sufficient to compensate fully for rises in the retail price index since the date of award of benefit;

(2) what proportion of the beneficiaries of public sector occupational pension schemes who derive entitlement from members who have retired since 1974 have been accorded increments sufficient to compensate fully for rises in the retail price index since the date of award of benefit.

Mr. Major: Information in the precise form requested is not available. The Government Actuary's 1983 survey of occupational pension schemes provides a summary of the most recent increases awarded to pensioners at the time of the survey. The following information is based on table 9·1 and paragraphs 9·5 and 9·7 of the Government Actuary's survey.

a. Private sector schemes

Increase most recently granted	Total (thousands)	per cent. of total
Nil, small, or irregular	440	21
2·5 per cent.	90	4
3 per cent.	320	15
4 per cent.	250	12
5 per cent.	550	26
6 per cent. or 7 per cent.	240	12
8 per cent. and over	170	8
In line with retail prices index	40	2
TOTALS	2,100	100

The mean inflation rate for the average period covered by increases granted in 1983 was 4·7 per cent.

b. Public sector schemes

Almost all pensions paid by public sector schemes are uprated in line with increases in the retail prices index, in accordance with the Pensions (Increase) Acts. Of those not governed by the provisions of the Pensions (Increase) Acts, nearly all adopt a similar practice.

Expenditure

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of 6 April to the hon. Member for Sunderland, North, Official Report, column 107, how much of the increase in social security expenditure reflecting a real increase in the average amount of benefit paid is attributable to actual real increases in benefit rates.

Mr. Major: Because of the number of structural changes to the benefit system over this period, and the complicated relationship between the rates of income-related benefits and the actual amounts paid, it would require substantial work to isolate the effect of real increases in benefit rates. I regret therefore that it would be disproportionately costly to provide this information.

Children (Placements)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many requests were received during the first quarter of 1985, 1986 and 1987, respectively, for placements for young people who had been sentenced under section 53 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933; and how many of these had been sentenced for burglary.

Mrs. Currie: The Department received requests as follows:

	First quarter 1985	First quarter 1986	First quarter 1987
Total
(i) Referrals	18	27	23
(ii) Sentenced for burglary alone	2	4	3
(iii) Sentenced for burglary and other offences	1	6	5

Research

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will detail the research funded by his Department, and other research of which his Department is aware, into the loss of the senses of smell and taste.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Acute Beds

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each year from 1979 to 1986 the total number of hospitals with acute beds and the total number of acute beds in each health district.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have such information as can be provided without incurring disproportionate cost as soon as possible.

Health Authorities (Improvement Programmes)

Mr Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each year from 1982-83 the value of the cash-releasing cost improvement programmes for each district health authority.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 4 February, at columns 701-702.

Hospitals (Statistics)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each year from 1979 to 1986 the total number of hospitals and the total number of beds in each health district.

Mrs. Currie: For information on bed availability in 1979 and 1985 and numbers of hospitals from 1979 to 1984, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 24 November 1986 at columns 98-106 and my predecessor's reply to him on 16 December 1985 at columns 84-96. The latest centrally available information on the numbers of hospitals in each district health authority is given in the table.

Correspondence

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will be replying to the letter sent to him on 5 March by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe, concerning the publication sent to him by the right hon. Member from the Society of Civil and Public Servants and the Civil and Public Services Association; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: I have written to the right hon. Member today.

AIDS

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements he is making to ensure that Government advertisements relating to the AIDS campaign are placed in provincial and local newspapers; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what use the Central Office of Information plans to make of regional newspapers in respect of public information on AIDS.

Mr. Newton: The first stage of the AIDS campaign has been mainly confined to the national press as this remains the fastest way of getting a complicated issue before as large a number of the adult population as possible.

We are now examining the scope for advertising in the regional press as a way of providing a local context for the AIDS public education message and also as a means of reaching the substantial minority which takes a regional or local newspaper only.

Attendance Allowance

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) on 23 March, Official Report, column 78, when he expects to complete his consideration of matters raised by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the Moran case; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to my replies to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on 7 April at column 149.

Adult Dental Health

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to announce his decision on the proposed 1988 national survey of adult dental health; how long he estimates arrangements for the carrying out of the survey will take; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) on 19 December 1986 at columns 785-86.

Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the Government have now established a target date for the full implementation, with commencement orders, of every section of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: Sections 4, 8(1), and 9 and 10 were implemented on 1 April 1987. With regard to the implementation of the remaining sections, I cannot add to my reply to the hon. Member on 10 March at column 157.

Guardians ad litem

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many, and what percentage of cases in the Huddersfield magistrates' court takes at least eight weeks to appoint a guardian ad litem and a further eight weeks to report.

Mrs. Currie: This information is not collected centrally. The hon. Member may wish to approach the court concerned.

Drinking and Driving

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps are being taken to improve cost estimates for National Health Service treatment of casualties of drinking and driving.

Mrs. Currie: Statistics kept for the first time in 1985 enable us to estimate the cost of National Health Service treatment of drinking and driving casualties in that year. The 1985 cost in England is estimated as £8·4 million.

Population Statistics

Mr. Maucher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate for the years 1987, 2007 and 2027 (a) the number of people in the working population, (b) the number of people in the retired population, (c) the average gross income for employment per member of the working population, and (d) the average gross income from pensions per member of the retired population, subdivided between state pensions, occupational pensions and lump sums from occupational pension schemes; with money expressed at 1987 prices and the figures for 2007 and 2027 assuming rates of growth of (i) 1 per cent. per year and (ii) 3 per cent. per year and the impact of personal pensions ignored.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 12 March 1987, c. 800-801]: The information is not readily available in the form or for the years requested. Table 1 shows estimated numbers of people in the working population and retired population in 1987-88, 2003-04 and 2023-24. Table 2 shows the estimated average annual gross income from employment per member of the working population in 1987-88, 2003-04 and 2023-24 assuming an annual average earnings growth of (a) 1·5 per cent. and (b) 3 per cent. Table 3 shows the composition of pensioners' incomes in 1985.

Benefits

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claimants in Cleveland receive invalidity benefit without also receiving supplementary benefit, or housing benefit supplement broken down by the following offices (i) Hadrian house, Eston, (ii) Crown house, Hartlepool, (iii) Royal house, Middlesbrough, (iv) Dawson house, Redcar and (v) Bridge street, Stockton.

Mr. Major: I regret that the information requested is not held.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate, for each region, Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and the United Kingdom as a whole of (a) the numbers claiming supplementary benefit, (b) the numbers dependent on claims for supplementary benefit, (c) the numbers claiming housing benefit, and (d) the numbers dependent on claims for housing benefit.

Mr. Lyell [pursuant to his reply, 9 April 1987, c. 411]: The latest available information is as follows:

(thousands)

	Scotland	Wales	Northern Ireland	United Kingdom
Number of supplementary benefit claimants[1]	564	290	184	5,156
Number dependent on supplementary benefit[1]	832	501	372	8,646

Housing Benefit

Mr. Raynsford asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from local authorities about the adequacy of his subsidy allocation for preparation costs to be incurred for the introduction of changes to the housing benefit scheme in April 1988.

Mr. Lyell [pursuant to his reply, 22 April 1987, c. 595]: It was announced last September that the Government would make £25 million available to local authorities during the 1987-88 financial year for preparation costs. After consultation with the local authority associations, the Department wrote to some 480 local authorities on 2 February inviting each authority to submit estimates of its costs, and giving an indicative figure for the amount of its individual payment calculated by reference to its current administration costs and caseload. The indicative figures were based on an allocation of £20 million of the £25 million sum, the remaining £5 million being held back to be allocated in the light of the responses.

Just over 400 authorities have responded and some 80 authorities have not responded. Of those who have responded, about 20 have written to say that they are content with the indicative figure sent to them and it is assumed that the same applies to those who have not responded. Some 30 have expressed specific reservations about the adequacy of the indicative amount in their case. The remaining authorities have not made any specific representations but have submitted estimates which exceed their indicative amount. Decisions on the allocation of the full £25 million will be made in the light of all the responses. Each authority will be informed of its allocation shortly.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Teachers (Pay and Conditions)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will make a statement on the future of teachers' pay and conditions in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Scott: A joint meeting of the Northern Ireland teachers' salaries and conditions of service negotiating committees adjourned on 15 April after three days of negotiations with an undertaking by all four of the teachers' unions represented that they would present details of the composite package of proposals for pay and conditions of service to their members. Three of the unions intend to ballot their members, the results of which will not be known before 18 May. It has been provisionally agreed that the negotiating committees will reconvene on that date.

SCOTLAND

Safety Rails and Gates

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is now in a position to report on his discussions with Strathclyde regional council social work department and Glasgow district council housing department about the provisions of safety rails and gates fitted in patients' homes about which the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill wrote to him on 16 March.

Mr. Ancram: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to his question on 22 April 1987 at column 568.

National Heritage

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will name the associations which are to receive grant assistance in 1987-88 under the National Heritage (Scotland) Act 1985.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) on 3 April at column 646.

Education (Capital Allocations)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state the capital allocations for education in the highland region for each financial year from 1977-78 to the present; and if he will express those allocations in addition as a percentage of Scottish annual totals.

Mr. John MacKay: the information is set out in the table.

Year	Capital allocation for educational building in Highland region (£000)	Percentage of total allocation in Scotland
1977-78	7,126	9·93
1978-79	2,622	4·71
1979-80	2,155	4·02
1980-81	2,096	3·92
1981-82	3,190	5·67
1982-83	2,525	5·21
1983-84	1,095	2·40
1984-85	660	1·64
1985-86	1,545	3·07
1986-87	1,315	2·86
1987-88	2,890	5·65

Refuse (Fuel Conversion)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with, and what financial assistance he has made available to, local authorities on the conversion of domestic and industrial refuse into fuel.

Mr. Ancram: The Scottish Office has not made financial assistance available to local authorities in respect of the conversion of waste into fuel. The only authority in Scotland operating such a process is Glasgow district council. The Govan plant has been funded using district council resources, but a grant of £10,000 was made available by the Department of Trade and Industry to enable the Warren Spring Laboratory to carry out combustion trials.

Zircon Satellite (Police Operation)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost of distributing to the press copies of the telex he sent on 10 April to the hon. Member for Linlithgow concerning the police operation at British Broadcasting Corporation offices in Glasgow.

Mr. Ancram: The cost of distributing copies of the letter by telex was about £11. Given the geographic spread of the main Scottish media outlets telex distribution is commonplace and cost-effective.

Agriculture and Fisheries (Review)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the terms of reference of the review of the functions of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland; and who will conduct the review.

Mr. John Mackay: The review of the functions of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland in the area of crops, plants and plant health announced earlier this month will be carried out by officials of that Department under the following terms of reference.

1. To examine critically all the relevant requirements (including the legal, technical and scientific requirements) of the existing systems concerning crops, plant health and pesticides, particularly as they affect areas where costs are recovered from the agricultural industry.
2. Taking account of the requirements identified in 1, to:
   (a) participate in the United Kingdom review of the PBR/NL and seed certification systems and to take cognisance of the results of that review;
   (b) consider in so far as they might affect Scotland the possible repercussions of any recommendations that might stem from the review referred to at 2(a) above;
   (c) review the operation of the seed potato regulations and the related systems for the production of pre-basic potato material and basic seed potatoes;

(d) review the operation of plant health controls (particularly as they affect seed potatoes) in relation to imports and exports, quarantine, PCN and other indigenous pests and diseases;

(e) review the operation of the soft fruit certification schemes;

(f) review the operation of the enforcement functions in relation to seeds and seed potatoes and to the control of pests (including the misuse of chemicals in the control of vertebrate pests) and the use of pesticides;

(g) review the R and D requirements (within the ASS or elsewhere) in support of the functions described at 2(a) to (f) above.

3. To examine against the future needs of the agricultural industry and consumers any possibilities for rationalising these systems by whatever means might seem the most likely to be effective in terms not only of cost and sound administration but of scientific rationale; and to make recommendations.

M8 (Improvement Programme)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the expected completion date for the improvement programme for the Baillieston to Newhouse section of the M8 motorway; and what are the anticipated total costs.

Mr. Ancram: The current programme assumes a works start in 1990 (subject to the satisfactory conclusion of statutory procedures and the availability of finance), with completion expected in 1993. Total cost of the scheme is estimated to be about £30 million.

Prisons (Disturbances)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what inquiries he has instituted into the recent disturbances at Her Majesty's prison, Perth, and other penal institutions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: I have, as is usual in such cases, called for reports from the governors. As the incidents referred to are currently the subject of police investigations and possible court proceedings, it would be inappropriate for me to make a statement at this stage.

Arts (Financial support)

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support per capita for the performing arts by each local authority in Scotland;

(2) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support for the performing arts by local authorities in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support for the arts by local authorities in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: Based on all local authority financial returns on their final outturn expenditure for 1985-86, total expenditure on the arts was £81·4 million.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support per capita for the arts, excluding libraries, by local authorities in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: Based on all local authority financial returns on their final outturn expenditure for 1985-86, total expenditure on the arts, excluding libraries, was £6 per capita.

Nuclear Disasters

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Strathclyde police as to, in the event of a civil nuclear disaster at Hunterston, (a) what evacuation time estimates have been prepared for the evacuation of the most populated 22½ deg sector from the power station out to (i) five miles, and (ii) 10 miles, (b) what time estimates have been prepared for the evacuation of the population within (i) five miles, and (ii) 10 miles of the power station, (c) what time estimates have been made for the evacuation of the population of Glasgow, (d) what time estimates have been made for the evacuation of high risk groups from Glasgow, (e) what time estimates have been made for evacuation of low mobility groups from Glasgow, and (f) what time estimates have been made for the distribution of potassium iodate tablets to the population of Glasgow; and if he will arrange for the basis and calculation of any such time estimates to be placed in the Library;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Dumfries and Galloway as to, in the event of a civil nuclear disaster at Chapelcross (a) what evacuation time estimates have been prepared for the evacuation of the most populated 22½ deg sector from the power station out to (i) five miles, and (ii) 10 miles, (b) what time estimates have been prepared for the evacuation of the population within (i) five miles, and (ii) 10 miles of the power station, (c) what time estimates have been made for the evacuation of the population of Dumfries, (d) what time estimates have been made for the evacuation of high risk groups from Dumfries, (e) what time estimates have been made for evacuation of low mobility groups from Dumfries, and (f) what time estimates have been made for the distribution of potassium iodate tablets to the population of Dumfries; and if he will arrange for the basis and calculation of any such time estimates to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 7 April 1987, c. 184]: The precautions taken in the design and construction of nuclear installations in this country and the very high safety standards applied in operating and maintaining them make it highly unlikely that accidents will occure which might significantly affect the public. But however remote the risks, all operators of nuclear installations are required by Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate (HMNII) of the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) as a condition of their site licences to prepare emergency plans, including those for dealing with an accidental release of radioactivity. The same requirement also applies to the sites of the Atomic Energy Authority. These plans, on which the police and other involved bodies must be consulted, are tested regularly in exercises monitored by HMNII. They cover both emergency procedures at the site and offsite arrangements to protect the public, including monitoring and evacuation within areas which vary according to the nature of the installation. These plans are capable of extension in the improbably event of this proving necessary, but the HSE does not consider that detailed plans covering a wider area are justified. It believes that a balance needs to be struck between detailed plans that are sufficiently extensive to cope with a serious accident and the unjustified use of resources involved in planning for improbable accidents. This approach was specifically endorsed by Sir Frank Layfield in his report on Sizewell. It follows that the specific calculations and assessments sought have not been made.

In an announcement on 18 December, Official Report, column 612, following the first stage of a thorough review of existing plans and procedures in the light of experience of the Chernobyl accident, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister concluded that existing plans continue to provide a valid basis for the response to any accident in the United Kingdom. In announcing his consent to the planning application for Sizewell B, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy accepted the Layfield report's recommendations relating to emergency planning. These will be taken fully into account in the continuing work on the Government review.

WALES

Welsh Water Authority

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the level of water rates in the area of the Welsh water authority.

Mr. Mark Robinson: It is the responsibility of the authority to decide the level of its charges in the light of its revenue and capital requirements.

Health Education

5. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy on health education in Wales in the light of the document, "The Health Divide," a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy towards reducing inequalities in the health of the people of Wales in the light of the report "The Health Divide," a copy of which has been forwarded to him.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My right hon. Friend's policies are aimed at improving the health of all the people in Wales. We have increased total cash resources available to health authorities in Wales in the current year by 7·9 per cent.; revenue provision to health authorities in Wales has increased by 33 per cent. in real terms since 1979; and we have invested £495 million in the capital estate since 1979; the number of staff directly concerned with patient care is up 13·5 per cent. since 1979 and tens of thousands more patients are being cared for in Wales today than was possible in 1979.

Marginal Land (Anglesey)

8. Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has made to the European Commission about marginal land on Anglesey.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No such representations have been made to the European Commission since the approach that led to some of the land on the island being classified as having LFA status in 1984. The time for a further approach to the European Commission about Anglesey LFA boundaries will be after the current consideration of representations and appeals has been completed later this year.

Patients (Waiting Lists)

14. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state, for the latest available year, the number and percentage of hospital appointments that were not kept; and what this represented in costs to the Health Service and in increasing waiting lists.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Grist).

Lakes and Rivers (Acidification)

17. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those lakes and rivers in Wales that are showing signs of acidification; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Although the areas of Wales most susceptible to acidification have already been identified from rainfall patterns, the water chemistry of the lakes and rivers, and the underlying geology, the Welsh Office is presently carrying out a base line study of lakes in central Wales which will identify specific acidification and other characteristics.

Farmers Union of Wales

18. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met the president of the Farmers Union of Wales; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I met the president of the Farmers Union of Wales, in company with my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, on Thursday 9 April. Our discussions centred on the European Commission's price proposals for 1987-88, with particular reference to the milk, beef and sheep sectors and agrimonetary issues.

Japanese Investment

21. Mr. Harvey asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to by how much Japanese inward investment in Wales has increased since 1979; what Japanese inward investment decisions have been monitored by his Department during April; and what is the policy of his Department towards such investment.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Detailed information is not available from 1979, but since WINvest was established on 1 April 1983 Wales has secured four new inward investment projects from Japan, 15 expansion projects and one joint venture involving a total of over 5,200 jobs and a capital investment of some £125 million. WINvest keeps in close touch with potential inward investors from Japan to ensure that they are aware of the benefits of investing in Wales. The policy remains that Her Majesty's Government welcome beneficial inward investment from Japan.

Road Works

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much money has been spent on major road improvements on the A55 trunk road in Wales during each of the past seven years, respectively; and what is the scheduled expenditure on this road for the next four years, respectively, including the present financial year.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information is as follows:

Outturn expenditure

	£ million
1980-81	16·591
1981-82	18·951
1982-83	50·661
1983-84	62·807
1984-85	40·412
1985-86	29·404
1986-87	[1]34·638

[1] Provisional.

Planned expenditure at November 1986 prices

	£ million
1987-88	60·528
1988-89	[1]63·696
1989-90	[1]63·676
1990-91	[1]57·138
Later years	[1]19·686

[1] These figures exclude expenditure on land which is expected to amount to some £12 million in the years beyond 1987-88.

Expenditure in 1987-88 and later years on schemes not yet in progress will depend on the completion of design and statutory procedures and the availability of finance.

House Improvement Grants

Mr. Coleman asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total amount paid in house improvement grants in (a) Wales and (b) Neath, respectively, in the financial year 1978-79; and what was the corresponding position in the financial year 1986-87.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The amounts paid on completed renovation grants for Wales and for Neath during 1978-79 were £8,492,600 and £383,000 respectively. The Wales total for 1986-87 is not yet available, but the amount for Neath is £428,000. The Wales figure for 1985-86 is £54,884,200, while for Neath it is £692,700.

Council House Building

Mr. Coleman asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many new council houses were built in the financial year 1978-79 in (a) Wales and (b) Neath, respectively; and what was the corresponding position in the financial year 1986-87.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Cardiothoracic Surgery

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what progress has been made towards the fulfilment of his policy commitments of 1983 in relation to the provision of new facilities in north Wales for cardiothoracic surgery.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Coleman asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest numbers of people unemployed in Wales and in Neath.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: On 12 March 1987 the total numbers of unemployed claimants in Wales and Neath Borough were 166,000 and 3,677 respectively.

Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate his Department has made of the number of people in full-time employment in Wales in 1987; and how this compares with the figures in 1979.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The estimated numbers of employees in employment at December 1986 and December 1979 were 678,000 and 864,000 respectively. These figures include all male employees and full-time female employees, but they exclude the self-employed. The number of self-employed is estimated to have risen by 30,000 between September 1979 and September 1986.

Public Rights of Way

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether the reviews of definitive maps of public rights of way in (a) Gwynedd and (b) Clwyd have been completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Neither of the reviews has been completed. Following substantial changes to the review of definitive maps procedure introduced by the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 the Secretary of State directed Gwynedd county council in January 1984 to abandon its review. Where a review has been abandoned, the surveying authority has to make an order to show any changes made by the draft map which did not attract any objections. We understand that Gwynedd county council's work on plotting these changes is well under way, although it has taken longer than expected. We hope that the council's work will reach a speedy conclusion.

The review in Clwyd is being carried out under the provisions of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 and the Countryside Act 1968. The final hearing into Clwyd's review was held on 24 April 1987. Once the Secretary of State's decision on this hearing has been issued all outstanding objections in relation to Clwyd's review will have been determined. Action will then be with the council to produce its definitive map and written statement.

The Arts (Support)

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support per capita for the arts by local authorities in Wales;

(2) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support for the arts, by each local authority in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information in the form requested is not held centrally. Information about grants by local authorities to the arts is collected and published by CIPFA in "Leisure and Recreation Statistics", (1986-87 columns 171 to 183). This publication, together with those of previous years, is held in the House of Commons Library.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Privatisation

Mr. Richard Page asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the total receipts in corporation tax, dividends and any other income to the Treasury from all the state enterprises after they were moved into the private sector, on a year-by-year basis.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information available from published annual reports and accounts of major privatised companies is given in the table.

[2] Dividends are the amounts paid and proposed which are charged to the profit and loss account of each year.
[3] Other income has been listed where the published accounts provide the information.

Earnings and Exports (Statistics)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing (i) the percentage increase in median earnings for full-time adult male manual and non-manual workers in real terms since 1976 and 1979, respectively, (ii) information available to him on the change in United Kingdom relative export prices for manufactures compared to Germany and Japan, together with relevant nominal rates of exchange and (iii) information on the nearest comparable earnings figures for Germany.

Mr. MacGregor: The figures requested are shown in the table.

Percentage increases over stated periods

	Real earnings			Relative export prices of United Kingdom manufactured goods [3]		Exchange rates [3]
	Great Britain [1]		Germany [2]	Germany	Japan	DM/£	Yen/£

1979-86	+4	+19	+3	+4	−10	−20	−50

[1] Median earnings, all industries, adult males from "New Earnings Survey" deflated by RPI. Figures relate to April of each year.
[2] Index of average hourly earnings in manufacturing deflated by the consumer price index. Source—OECD Main Economic Indicators, for April each year.
[3] United Kingdom export unit value index for manufactured goods divided by corresponding German or Japanese index. All indices measured in a common currency. Derived from data published in the Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics and IMF International Financial Statistics. Figures refer to 1986Q3, the latest period for which information is available.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the annual growth of (i) manufacturing investment and (ii) manufacturing production each year since 1979 in the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy, the United States of America and Japan, in each case taking the 1979 level as 100.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to two publications from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. Gross manufacturing investment figures can be found in National Accounts, Volume 2 (1986) and manufacturing output data are published in the Main Economic Indicators (monthly). Data for the United Kingdom are published in the Central Statistical Office's Economic Trends (monthly).

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the rise in work and labour costs in manufacturing each year since 1979, taking the 1979 level as 100, in the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy, the United States of America and Japan, and in the European Economic Community and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development averages.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to table 5.9 of the Employment Gazette (monthly), published by the Department of Employment, which shows wages per head in manufacturing, in national currencies, for a number of OECD countries. The Central Statistical Office's Economic Trends (monthly) also gives labour costs per unit of output, in dollars, for the largest industrial countries.

Land (Capital Gains Tax)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was the amount of revenue forgone in each financial year since 1981-82 as a result of conditional exemption from capital taxes on land allowed following agreement between the Nature Conservancy Council and the owner;

(2) if he will state the total acreage of land (a) in Scotland and (b) in the United Kingdom exempted from capital gains tax in each financial year since 1981-82 under agreements reached between the owner and the Nature Conservancy Council providing for reasonable public access.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Taxable Benefits

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his reply dated 6 April Official Report, column 78, concerning taxable benefits subject to special and general rules, whether he will provide an estimate for each of the three classes of the proportion of the actual value which is assessed to tax in each of the three cases together with a list of the more important items.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Building Societies

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report, the amount of building society holdings in each of the past five years and to date; how many registered building societies there are in the United Kingdom; and how often he meets representatives of the Building Societies Association.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

THE ARTS

Libraries

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will publish the spending per capita of local authorities on libraries for the last two years for each authority in England and Wales.

Mr. Fisher asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support per capita for public libraries by each local authority in the east midlands responsible for a public library service.

Mr. Luce: Details of the level of financial support per 1,000 population for public libraries by local library authorities are published annually by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy in "Public Library Statistics Actuals". No more detailed records are available to my Office.

Local Authority Support

Mr. Fisher asked the Minister for the Arts (1) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support per capita for the performing arts by local authorities in the west midlands;

(2) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support for the visual arts by local authorities in England and Wales;

(3) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support per capita for the arts by local authorities in England;

(4) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support per capita for the arts by each London borough;

(5) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support for the arts by each London borough;

(6) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support for arts centres by each local authority in Yorkshire;

(7) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support for the arts by local authorities in England;

(8) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support per capita for arts centres by each local authority;

(9) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support for the arts, excluding libraries, by each local authority in the east midlands;

(10) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support per capita for the arts by local authorities in the north-west;

(11) whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support for the arts by local authorities in the south-west.

Mr. Luce: Details of the estimated expenditures of local authorities on leisure and recreation services are published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy in the annual booklet "Leisure and Recreation Statistics". No records in more detail are available to my Office.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Dickens asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will give his latest estimate of the cost of (a) answering an oral question, (b) answering a written question, (c) printing all questions on the Order Paper and Notice Paper in the 1985-86 Session and (d) printing all answers in the Official Report in the 1985-86 Session.

Mr. Biffen: The costs in officials' time of replying to questions vary considerably, but the current average cost is estimated at (a) £75 for oral answers and (b) £45 for written answers. (c) During the 1985-86 Session the cost of printing all oral and written questions on the Order Paper and Notice Paper was £842,000, (d) the cost of printing all written answers in the daily Official Report in the 1985-86 Session was £430,000. The cost of printing all oral answers could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Civil Defence

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the amount of grant aid being given to each district and county council under regulations 4(1)(b) and 5(1)(c), respectively, of the Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations 1983 for establishing, equipping or maintaining emergency centres during the current financial year;

(2) if he will list those district and county councils which have applied for grant aid under regulations 4(1)(b) and 5(1)(c) respectively of the Civil Defence (General Local Authority Functions) Regulations 1983 to establish, equip or maintain emergency centres during the current financial year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The amount of grant aid to be paid to each county and district council for establishing and equipping emergency centres during the current financial year will not be known until audited claims have been received. However, county authorities have submitted estimates for 1987-88 as shown, and expenditure incurred in accordance with agreed estimates will be eligible for grant aid at 75 per cent. Expenditure on maintaining emergency centres is not eligible for civil defence grant aid.

Prison Establishments (Parking)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present number of parking spaces (a) for staff and (b) for visitors at (i) Risley remand centre and (ii) Strangeways prison.

Mr. Mellor: At Risley remand centre 304 parking spaces are available for staff and 66 for visitors. At Strangeways prison, Manchester, a total of 180 parking spaces are available for staff (27 within the main prison and 153 on a temporary basis on the adjacent fenced Croft site); there is at present no official parking space available for visitors, although street parking is available for up to two hours and there are local authority car parks in the area. Future car parking arrangements at Strangeways prison will be considered in the context of the planned major redevelopment of the establishment.

Radioactive Contamination (Police Training)

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Suffolk as to (a) how many days are allocated in the training of a police constable to dealing with accidents involving radioactive contamination, (b) how many days are allocated in the training of a police sergeant to dealing with accidents involving radioactive contamination, (c) how many days are allocated in the training of a police constable to dealing with accidents involving radioactivity, and what are their areas of expertise, (d) what training policemen receive in the use of personal dosimeters, radiac survey meters, decontamination meters, breathing equipment, and protective clothing, and (e) what is the total amount of money allocated to the training of, firstly, a police constable and, secondly, a police sergeant to deal with accidents involving radioactive contamination;

(2) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Cleveland as to (a) how many days are allocated in the training of a police constable to dealing with accidents involving radioactive contamination, (b) how many days are allocated in the training of a police sergeant to dealing with accidents involving radioactive contamination, (c) how many people are employed by the police to train policemen in dealing with accidents involving radioactivity, and what are their areas of expertise, (d) what training policemen receive in the use of personal dosimeters, radiac survey meters, decontamination meters, breathing equipment, and protective clothing, and (e) what is the total amount of money allocated to the training of, firstly, a police constable and, secondly, a police sergeant to deal with accidents involving radioactive contamination;

(3) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Durham as to (a) how many days are allocated in the training of a police constable to dealing with accidents involving radioactive contamination, (b) how many days are allocated in the training of a police sergeant to dealing with accidents involving radioactive contamination, (c) how many people are employed by the police to train policemen in dealing with accidents involving radioactivity, and what are their areas of expertise, (d) what training policemen receive in the use of personal dosimeters, radiac survey meters, decontamination meters, breathing equipment, and protective clothing, and (e) what is the total amount of money allocated to the training of, firstly, a police constable and, secondly, a police sergeant to deal with accidents involving radioactive contamination;

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Lady Castro Urra

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will grant Lady Castro Urra, formerly employed at Exeter university and now imprisoned without trial in Chile, the right to residence in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waddington: Any application that Lady Castro Urra may make to return to the United Kingdom will receive sympathetic consideration.

Radioactive Contamination (Emergency Services)

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) from which sources the emergency services in Gloucestershire can call for equipment to deal with accidents involving radioactive contamination; and if he will call for a report from the emergency services in that area detailing the total number of (a) dosimeters, (b) radiac survey meters, (c) sets of protective clothing, (d) breathing units and (e) decontamination units available for use;

(2) from which sources the emergency services in Avon can call for equipment to deal with accidents involving radioactive contamination; and if he will call for a report from the emergency services in that area detailing the total number of (a) dosimeters, (b) radiac survey meters, (c) sets of protective clothing, (d) breathing units and (e) decontamination units available for use;

(3) from which sources the emergency services in South Glamorgan can call for equipment to deal with accidents involving radioactive contamination; and if he will call for a report from the emergency services in that area detailing the total number of (a) dosimeters, (b) radiac survey meters, (c) sets of protective clothing, (d) breathing units and (e) decontamination units available for use;

(4) from which sources the emergency services in Somerset can call for equipment to deal with accidents involving radioactive contamination; and if he will call for a report from the emergency services in that area detailing the total number of (a) dosimeters, (b) radiac survey meters, (c) sets of protective clothing, (d) breathing units and (e) decontamination units available for use;

(5) from which sources the emergency services in Dorset can call for equipment to deal with accidents involving radioactive contamination; and if he will call for a report from the emergency services in that area detailing the total number of (a) dosimeters, (b) radiac survey meters, (c) sets of protective clothing, (d) breathing units and (e) decontamination units available for use;

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Absent Voting

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the clarity and intelligibility of the forms for absent voting and with the workability of the altered procedures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are satisfied of the workability of the new procedures for absent voting, which were drawn up after full consultation, and of the clarity and intelligibility of the forms, which reflect the requirements of the representation of the people regulations. We shall review both in the light of experience.

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes he expects the new procedures for absent voting to produce in the numbers of absent voters being registered and entitled to vote at local and parliamentary elections; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We expect the new procedures to lead to an increase in the number of people who are entitled to an absent vote at any particular parliamentary or local election, since for the first time holidaymakers and anyone else who is unable to vote in person on the date of the poll will qualify for an absent vote.

Immigration

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for visits for compassionate reasons such as attendance at a funeral have been refused in (a) India, (b) Pakistan and (c) Bangladesh since the introduction of visa requirements for visitors from the Indian subcontinent.

Mr. Waddington: The information requested is not available centrally.

Metropolitan Police (Overtime)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what current limitations exist on the amount of overtime that may be worked by any member of the Metropolitan police, or restrictions on the mileage over any given period and the use of its road vehicles.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I shall reply as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Manufacturing Industry (International Comparisons)

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the annual percentage increase or decrease since 1970 in net domestic fixed capital formation in manufacturing industry in the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy, the United States of America and Japan.

Mr. MacGregor: Figures for the United Kingdom were published in the Official Report on 30 March 1987, at column 357. Figures for the other countries specified are not available on a comparable basis.

Dover, Folkestone and Newhaven

Mr. Warren asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many customs officers have been available for duty at Dover, Folkestone and Newhaven in each of the last five years; and what has been the volume of vehicular traffic coming into the United Kingdom through each of those ports during the same years.

Mr. Brooke: For operational reasons it is not policy to disclose the numbers of Customs staff employed at specific locations. The staffing at Dover, Folkestone and Newhaven is regularly reviewed and an assessment made of the risks having regard to variations in traffic. The fixed staff are supported by mobile teams and specialist staff who are organised on a regional basis.

The number of vehicles entering the United Kingdom through the ports of Dover, Folkestone and Newhaven for the last three years for which figures are available are as follows:

	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
Dover	1,193,748	1,228,276	1,308,549
Folkestone	84,326	76,649	51,778
Newhaven	65,452	63,158	82,132

Motoring Expenses

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will review the treatment of motoring expenses for value added tax introduced by the Finance Act 1986, and in particular the assumption by the Inland Revenue that an agricultural business in a rural area will undertake 500 miles of private motoring per month.

Mr. Brooke: Customs and Excise will be monitoring the effects of the scheme carefully in the first year or two of operation: in any case, the Government are required to review the level of the scale charges on an annual basis, under the terms of the European Community derogation which had to be obtained before the scheme could be introduced.

Under the scheme, VAT is charged according to a fixed scale where fuel used for private motoring is paid for by a business which recovers the input tax on its purchase. The scheme is intended to produce a broadly reasonable result without the need for detailed mileage records to be kept. It applies to all such motoring, and does not make assumptions about agricultural as compared with other classes of businesses.

Income Tax

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total cost in 1986-87 prices of all reductions in rates of income tax since May 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Building Societies

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report the amount of building society holdings in each of the past five years and to date; how many registered building societies there are in the United Kingdom; and how often he meets representatives of the Building Societies Association.

Mr. Ian Stewart [pursuant to his reply, 27 April 1987]: The most recent information available is for the end of 1985. At that time there was a total of 171 registered building societies in the United Kingdom. The figures showing the total assets of building societies for the period 1981-85 are as follows:

Total Assets of United Kingdom Building Societies

	£bn
1981	61·9
1982	73·1
1983	85·9
1984	102·8
1985	120·1

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not recently met representatives of the Building Societies Association, but I meet the BSA from time to time.

THE ARTS

West Midlands (Financial Support)

Mr. Fisher asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will publish information available to him on the level of financial support per capita for the arts by local authorities in the west midlands.

Mr. Luce: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on Monday 27 April 1987.

PRIME MINISTER

Kingswood

Q60. Mr. Hayward asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to visit Kingswood.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Pensions

Q116. Sir David Price asked the Prime Minister what has been the improvement in real terms in the rates of retirement pensions since 1979, taking into account the new rates which came into effect on 6 April.

The Prime Minister: The Government's policy is pledged to protect pensions and linked long-term benefits against inflation. The uprating which came into effect on 6 April is fully in line with this policy, and reflects the rise in prices between January and September 1986. It will not be possible to calculate the precise real term increase in the rate of retirement pensions until the retail prices index for April is announced in mid-May.

British Broadcasting Corporation

Q178. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what criteria she proposes to use in deciding which persons to recommend to Her Majesty for appointment to the board of governors of the British Broadcasting Corporation when three vacancies fall due in the summer.

The Prime Minister: As in all appointments to the broadcasting authorities, I would wish to ensure that the members of the board combined personal distinction with a wide and balanced range of interests and experience in order that it should continue to fulfil its responsibility for safeguarding the public interest in broadcasting matters.

Engagements

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 28 April.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 28 April.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 28 April.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

ENERGY

Energy Action Projects (Scotland)

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what share of the £60 million package of local energy action projects is earmarked for Scotland.

Mr. David Hunt: It is currently estimated that Scotland will account for 15 to 20 per cent. of the 500 or so community insulation projects operating in 1988-89, and a similar proportion of Government support for those projects.

Draught Proofing

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what estimates he has made of the impact which the new arrangements for paying the cost of draught proofing have had on take-up.

Mr. David Hunt: The new arrangements for meeting the cost of the draught-proofing service provided by community insulation projects will not be introduced until April 1988.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has any plans to arrange for staff of his Department to be screened for antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Peter Walker [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 368]: No.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether any current or former staff of his Department has been found to have developed AIDS or antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Peter Walker [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 368]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on Wednesday 22 April at columns 627-28.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he has taken to ensure that staff of his Department are warned about those homosexual and other activities which are deemed to involve a high risk of AIDS infection.

Mr. Peter Walker [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 368]: This Department has circulated copies of the Department of Employment/Health and Safety Executive booklet "AIDS and Employment" to all staff.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

North-South Interdependence and Solidarity Campaign

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what financial contribution the Government are making to the European public campaign on North-South interdependence and solidarity organised by the Council of Europe; and if he will make it his policy to devote to this campaign at least as great a level of resources as that put into other campaigns organised by the Council of Europe.

Mr. Chris Patten: We are meeting the expenses incurred by the British representative to the European organising committee and bureau. While supporting the aims of the Council of Europe's North-South awareness campaign, we believe that non-governmental organisations are best placed to carry forward the campaign in Britain. Other Council of Europe campaigns have dealt with a wide variety of subjects, and are not directly comparable. Each case is considered on its merits.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Radiation

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he now has the results of the accelerated growth experiments carried out on Cumbrian vegetation contaminated by the Chernobyl fallout; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: We have just received some preliminary results from two successive croppings of the vegetation which was removed from the Cumbrian restricted area and grown on under simulated spring conditions.

It had been hoped that radiocaesium levels in spring grass would show substantial falls as caesium became locked into the soil. Unfortunately, these low mineral soils are not binding caesium as efficiently as lowland soils and the first two cuts have shown evidence of some continuing recycling of radiocaesium. While the simulated conditions may not fully parallel conditions on the hillside, the indications are that the reservoir of available radiocaesium in the root matt in some upland species is larger than we had hoped and we must now expect that there will continue to be some radiocaesium in the vegetation eaten by certain upland sheep in the restricted areas in Cumbria and Wales in this spring and early summer. In practical terms, it means that restrictions on the movement and slaughter of sheep in the worse affected areas will probably have to remain in place for most of the 1987 marketing season.

We shall continue to monitor the situation carefully. In view of our established live monitoring capability there will be no need for blanket bans and we shall do all we can to operate any necessary controls as flexibly as possible. Monitored sheep that pass the test are free to go for slaughter. For the small percentage that fail and have to be marked, we have full compensation arrangements for any price blight at auction. These arrangements were revised recently to encompass individual lot valuation, as well as special provision for ewes with lambs at foot.

Additional research has been put in hand to find the best practicable means of reducing the present problems and minimising the need for restrictions. I will keep the House informed.

For the future, we have an extensive programme of research and monitoring in progress which will enable us to refine our predictions and to identify when and/or where controls might be relaxed. I will keep the House informed of progress on this work.

TRANSPORT

Fishing Vessels (Grimsby)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the number of fishing vessels registered in Grimsby for 1979-80 and the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The records of the numbers of fishing vessels registered at ports in the United Kingdom are for calendar years. The numbers registered at Grimsby at 31 December in each of the years 1979, 1980 and 1986 (the latest year for which figures are available) is as follows:

	Number
1979	283
1980	271
1986	162

Rail Commuter Services

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the percentage increase in rail season ticket revenues from commuter services for each of the past five years.

Mr. David Mitchell: The annual real percentage change in season ticket receipts relating to British Rail's network south-east services for each of the past five years is as follows:

	Percentage
1982	[1] −15·3
1983	[1] +15·9
1984	−0·5
1985	+3·9
1986	+10·6

[1] Distorted by 1982 BR strike which depressed receipts in that year.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to inform himself as to progress in the negotiations between British Rail and Eurotunnel on the financing of the Channel tunnel; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Both British Rail and Eurotunnel are keeping me informed of the progress of these negotiations, which I am satisfied are being handled on a purely commercial basis.

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether Parliament will be informed if advice from the Channel Tunnel Safety Authority, or from its British delegation, is being disregarded.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Channel fixed link treaty gives the Safety Authority the right to make reports directly to the Government. The Government have assured the Select Committee on the Channel Tunnel Bill in another place (Minutes of Evidence, Monday 6 April, page 28, second column) that should the Safety Authority bring to the attention of the Secretary of State a fundamental disagreement on an important issue of public safety between itself and the Intergovernmental Commission, or should the United Kingdom delegation to the Safety Authority notify a similar disagreement between themselves and their French counterparts, the Secretary of State will report that fact to Parliament.

Dangerous Chemicals (Shipment)

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any proposals for tightening the regulations regarding the shipment of dangerous chemicals into the ports and their onward transport by road and rail in the United Kingdom; whether he is satisfied that the current European Economic Community code of practice governing such transport is adequate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The carriage of dangerous chemicals at sea is subject to the international maritime dangerous goods code. The code is continually updated to take accounts of new technological advances while safeguarding safety requirements.

Unloaded cargoes are subject to harbour byelaws. From 1 June the Dangerous Substances in Harbour Areas Regulations 1987 will apply.

Road transport in bulk from the port area is covered by the Dangerous Substances (Conveyance by Road in Road Tankers and Tank Containers) Regulations 1981. The Health and Safety Executive is currently considering a number of amendments to these regulations. The Road Traffic (Carriage of Dangerous Substances in Packages etc.) Regulations 1986, which became operational from 6 April this year, apply to certain substances in packages down to a capacity of 200 litres, and less in some cases. The Classification, Packaging and Labelling of Dangerous Substances Regulations 1984, as amended in 1986, apply throughout. These three sets of regulations provide comprehensive controls.

The transport of dangerous goods by rail takes place under British Rails' list of dangerous goods and conditions of acceptance scheme, which works very well.

Responsibility for implementing EC directive No. 84/631 — EEC on the transfrontier shipment of hazardous waste rests with the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Drink-driving

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans for a drink-driving campaign during the summer months.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Yes. Plans for the Government's campaign against drinking and driving will concentrate advertising resources during the summer, autumn and pre-Christmas periods. This is only part of a 365 days a year effort against this unacceptable behaviour.

The advertising will support other publicity initiatives using a variety of promotional methods and media in close collaboration with police, local authorities and others.

The continuing campaign will rely greatly on the public, the press, television and radio to bring pressure to bear on irresponsible elements who endanger their own lives and the lives of others by mixing drinking and driving.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what statistics he has on an annual basis, covering the number of drivers and passengers killed in motor vehicle accidents where consumption of alcohol by one or more of the drivers is shown to be a significant factor.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number of drivers/riders and passengers who were killed in road accidents in which any driver or rider either (a) subsequently failed a breath test or (b) was shown, on autopsy, to have a blood alcohol level in excess of the legal limit is as follows:

Great Britain: 1984: Death in drink-drive accidents

	Number
Driver/riders	414
Passengers	235

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what data he has concerning the periods of the day in England and Wales when road accidents in which alcohol is a contributory factor do and are more likely to occur.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The table gives some indication of involvement of drivers or riders over the legal limit.

Drivers/riders failing breath test: by hour of day: England and Wales 1985

Total	358,748	11,349	3·2

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what statistics he has, on an annual basis, concerning the number of pedestrians killed or injured by motor vehicles where consumption of alcohol by a driver is shown to be a significant factor.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The number of pedestrians who were killed or injured by drivers or riders who subsequently failed a breath test is as follows:

Great Britain—1985

	Number
Killed	107
Seriously injured	431
Slightly injured	583
Total	1,121

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many road users, including pedestrians, pedal cyclists and children, were killed or injured on the roads by a driver with a raised blood alcohol level; and if he will provide distributions of casualties and rates by hour of day, for 1975 and 1985 separately, for (a) Scotland and (b) England and Wales.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall answer this question shortly.

Travel to Work

Mr. Robert C. Brown asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the national average weekly travel-to-work cost.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The average weekly travel-to-work cost in Great Britain as at January 1987 is estimated as £5·50.

Roads

Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for Transport what his policies are for investment in roads; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I have placed in the Library of the House copies of "Policy for Roads in England: 1987" presented to the House today. This White Paper is in two volumes. Volume 1 describes the Government's current policies for the development of both the trunk and the local road system in England. Volume 2 outlines the national trunk road construction programme and reports progress since the last comprehensive review. It also sets out the results of my 1987 review and gives details of the 82 new road schemes that I have added to the forward programme.

Transport Services (Attacks)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many attacks there have been in the last five years on (a) passengers and (b) employees on (i) London Regional Transport services or property and (ii) British Rail Southern Region services or property.

Mr. David Mitchell [pursuant to his reply, 22 April 1987, c. 572]: The British Transport police has provided the following figures relating to criminal assaults:

Year	London Underground		BR Southern Region
	(a) passengers	(b) employees	(a) passengers	(b) employees
1982	758	73	303	47
1983	662	104	292	87
1984	1,008	84	323	84
1985	1,205	80	379	80
1986	1,370	105	448	60

Notes:
(1) Criminal assaults comprise murder, attempted murder, manslaughter, grievous bodily harm, malicious wounding, actual bodily harm, robbery and assault with intent to rob.
(2) Figures are based on the date of input to the BTP computer, which can be some time after the date on which offences were committed, and do not precisely reflect annual trends in actual offences.
(3) Figures for London buses are not separately identifiable.
(4) Figures for passengers on BR Southern Region include a small number of serious assaults on police, which are not separately identifiable.

SCOTLAND

Education Expenditure

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report for the latest year for which figures are available (a) the average net cost per pupil, cash, per secondary pupil at maintained secondary schools in each local education authority in Scotland and (b) the average expenditure in the same years per assisted place pupil for each local education authority in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: The latest available information, for 1985-86, is set out in the table.

Assisted Places

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the number of school pupils from each local education authority area who benefit from the provisions of the assisted places scheme during the current academic year.

Mr. John MacKay: Pupils at participating schools may come from outwith the area of the education authority in which the schools are located but the number of places currently taken up at schools situated in each local authority area is set out in the table.

Forth Valley Health Board

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he is now satisfied with the consultation procedure carried out by Forth Valley health board in respect of its proposals in relation to 11 Randolph road.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and learned Friend has been given a full account by the chairman of Forth Valley health board of the arrangements made for consulting local residents about the board's proposals for 11 Randolph road, Stirling. These consultations included the following steps:

a. The board sent a copy of the draft application for planning permission to neighbours inviting comment before its submission to the planning authority;

b. the same neighbours were invited to meet senior officers of the board to discuss these detailed proposals and interviews were arranged for all who responded;

c. neighbours were advised of the date when the planning application was being submitted to the planning authority;

d. the board has responded fully to every letter received from anyone claiming an interest in the proposal;

e. all residents of Randolph road have been invited to visit the Royal Scottish national hospital to see the arrangements made to train patients for discharge to the community and meet those chosen for discharge to the Randolph road house.

In recent weeks the chairman and general manager of the health board have met members of the Randolph road community group, and the board remains willing to discuss with local residents any details of the proposal which may still require clarification.

Geese

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many barnacle, pinkfoot, greylag and whitefront geese, respectively, have wintered on (a) the Solway and (b) the Island of Islay in each of the last five years.

Mr. Rifkind: My officials do not make counts of geese wintering in Scotland. The figures contained in the following table refer to seasonal migratory peaks and have been supplied by the Nature Conservancy Council from data collected on its behalf by the Wildfowl Trust.

Year and Area	Species
	Barnacle	Pinkfoot	Greylag	Whitefront

Final figures for 1986-87 are not yet available.

Balmore Industrial Estate, Glasgow

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what follow-up discussions the SDA will be having with the estates department of Glasgow district council over the possibility of conversion to, and construction of, small industrial units at the Balmore industrial estate, Glasgow.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 8 April 1987, c. 292]: I understand that there were discussions between the Scottish Development Agency and the estates department of Glasgow district council on 9 and 22 April. The agency has now offered to construct some 10,000 sq ft of small industrial units on the Balmore industrial estate and lease these back to the district council. Final details are still to be agreed.

Scottish Development Agency

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the Scottish Development Agency's annual budget for all promotional purposes for each of the last five years; and what percentage of its total budget these figures represent.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 10 April 1987, c. 467]: The information is set out in the table:

	(£000)	Per cent.
1982-83	4,827	4·2
1983-84	5,611	5·0
1984-85	7,755	6·9
1985-86	7,250	5·8
1986-87	5,453	4·2

Note: Figures include costs of marketing, production of printed material and videos, exhibitions, seminars, trade promotions and advertising, together with the overseas operational costs of Locate in Scotland.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons and firms are registered with the enterprise allowance scheme; how often payments are issued; and on how many occasions payments were delayed during the two months ended 31 March due to a breakdown in the supporting computer system.

Mr. Viggers: A total of 2,143 persons representing 2,054 small businesses are currently receiving assistance under the enterprise allowance scheme.

Payments to participants on the scheme are issued fortnightly in remittances of £80 on each second Tuesday of the 52-week period of payment.

During the two months ended 31 March 1987 there were two occurrences of a one-day delay in the issue of payments caused by temporary computer problems.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Balance of Trade

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the non-oil manufacturing trade balance with (i) the member states of the European Economic Community and (ii) the rest of the world each year since 1960.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is in the following table:

United Kingdom balance of trade in manufactures

Competition

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what has been the index of competitiveness each year since 1960, taking 1979 as representing 100.

Mr. Alan Clark The most commonly quoted measure is relative unit labour costs which is used in the following table. Data for 1960 are not available:

United Kingdom Relative Unit Labour Costs

	1979 = 100
1961	102·5
1962	100·9

Rolls-Royce

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further representations he has received regarding the proposed privatisation of Rolls-Royce; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: My right hon. Friend and I have received a number of representations about the company's privatisation. We welcome the return of Rolls-Royce to the private sector, further details of which were announced earlier today, including the offer for sale price.

Mr. Bendall asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a further statement on the privatisation of Rolls-Royce.

Mr. Channon: This morning the offer for sale of ordinary shares in Rolls-Royce was made at a price of £1·70p per share. This represents a market capitalisation of £1,362·5 million. The total number of shares being made available under the offer is 801,470,588, of which 789,705,883 have been fully underwritten and subunderwritten, the balance representing shares made available under arrangements by which employees can obtain shares free of charge.

Approximately 328 million shares are initially being offered to the general public including Rolls-Royce employees and pensioners. If the offer is at least twice subscribed, this number will be increased to 407 million shares, some 50 per cent. of the total. The remainder of the shares will be placed with financial institutions in the United Kingdom. There is no overseas offering.

Prospectuses and application forms will be published in certain newspapers from Thursday 30 April. In addition, all those who have registered with the Rolls-Royce share information office will be sent a prospectus, including a public application form. Copies will also be available from 30 April from certain banks and stockbrokers. Applications must be received by 10 am on Thursday 7 May.

Copies of the prospectuses are being placed in the Library of the House today.

Regional Development Grants

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total value of regional development grants and regional selective assistance grants awarded to businesses in Lancashire in 1987-88 and 1985-86 by district council area, indicating the number in each case.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The information provided in the table indicates offers of regional selective assistance made to companies in Lancashire in 1975-76 and 1985-86. It is not possible to provide details of assistance offered under old style regional development grant except at disproportionate cost. New regional development grant of £1,359,000 was offered to 52 companies in the West Lancashire district in 1985-86, which is the district in Lancashire with development area status and therefore eligible for regional development grant.

West Lancashire

Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many applications were made for regional selective assistance and regional development grant in the West Lancashire district in 1986-87.

Mr. Giles Shaw: There were four applications for regional selective assistance and 151 applications for RDG(2) in the West Lancashire district in 1986-87.

Note:
It is not possible to provide information in respect of the "old" RDG1 scheme as information is not maintained by individual areas.

Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total value of regional development grants and regional selective assistance made in the year 1986-87 to applicants in the West Lancashire district.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The value of offers made in 1986-87 in the West Lancashire district for regional selective assistance and regional development grant (2) was £487,000 and £3,041,195, respectively.

Note:
It is not possible to provide information in respect of the "old" RDG1 scheme as information is not maintained by individual areas.

Trade Deficit

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the latest annual figures for each of 1970, 1975, 1980, 1985 and 1986 for the (a) deficit in manufactured trade between Britain and Japan, (b) deficit in manufactured trade between Britain and the EEC, (c) deficit in manufactured trade between members of the European Economic Community and Japan and (d) deficit in manufactured trade between West Germany and Britain.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is in the following table.

Balance of Trade in Manufactures[1] (ECU billions[2])

	United Kingdom trade with:			EC (12) trade with:
	Japan	EC (12)	F. R. Germany	Japan

Japanese Disinvestment

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the cause of net Japanese disinvestment in the United Kingdom in 1982 and 1984.

Mr. Alan Clark: The figures showing net disinvestment in the United Kingdom by Japan in 1982 and 1984 relate to net inward direct investment. This covers transactions between Japanese companies and their United Kingdom subsidiaries, associates and branches in all sectors of the economy, including the financial sector. An analysis of inward direct investment into its components is given in the table. This shows net increases from net acquisitions of share and loan capital and from reinvested profits, offset by net reductions in indebtedness to overseas parent companies and head offices overseas.

The annual report for 1986 by the Invest in Britain Bureau, published recently, records more recent planned investment projects by Japan in this country. This shows that the United Kingdom's position as Europe's leading recipient of Japanese investment projects is being maintained.

Inward direct investment from Japan (£ million)

	1982	1984
Net acquisitions of share and loan capital	6·1	20·6
Increase in indebtedness due to overseas parent companies and to head offices overseas	−72·8	−107·6

Note. — Including oil companies within the direct investment figures from 1984 onwards did not affect the series for Japanese direct investment in the United Kingdom.

EMPLOYMENT

YTS

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General how many people in (a) Burnley and (b) Pendle entered the YTS in 1985; what was the placement percentage; and how many completed the scheme.

Mr. Lee: The table shows the available information.

	Burnley local authority district 1985-86	Pendle local authority district 1985-86
Starts[2]	692	498
Placement percentage[3]:
in full-time employment (per cent.)	63	61
in part-time employment (per cent.)	3	3
on a full-time course (per cent.)	3	4
Completers	458	313

[1] The starts figures quoted are for April 1985 to March 1986 as statistics are not available for 1985.

[2] The figure for YTS starts includes some individuals who entered more than one YTS programme during the course of the year and therefore slightly overstates the number of individuals participating in the scheme as a whole.

[3] These figures are from the Manpower Services Commission (MSC) follow-up survey of YTS leavers between April 1985 and March 1986.

Mr. Deakins asked the Paymaster General what proportion of 16-year-olds, 17-year-olds and 18-year-olds, respectively, entered employment in each of the three years preceding the introduction of YTS; and what have been the proportions in each year since YTS was introduced.

Mr. Lee: Information in the precise form requested is not available.

The available relevant estimates are shown in the following table:

[3] Registered unemployed for 1981 and 1982, claimant unemployed for 1983 and thereafter.

[4] Mainly those in employment (outside YTS) but including those who were neither employed nor seeking work (eg, because of domestic responsibilities). Also including the unregistered unemployed before 1983 and from 1983 those seeking work but not claiming benefit. This group is obtained by subtracting from the total population of the age group those estimated to be in full-time education or YTS-YOP and the unemployed.

Sex Discrimination

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General how many actions have been brought against employers, on a regional basis, under the Sex Discrimination Act on a yearly basis since 1983.

Mr. Lee: The information is given in the following table, which refers to applications registered at the regional offices of industrial tribunals. A small proportion of these applications will relate to the treatment of partners not employees, but it is not possible to identify these separately.

Earnings

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Paymaster-General what has been the increase in the ratio of median gross earnings of a full-time adult male manual worker compared with his counter-part on non-manual work between 1979 and 1986; and what estimate he has made of the effect this has had on employment in manual occupations.

Mr. Lee: Between April 1979 and April 1986 the ratio of the median gross weekly earnings of full-time adult male manual employees to those of full-time adult male non-manual employees is estimated to have decreased by 12·5 per cent. for Great Britain.

Summary evidence on the general link between pay and jobs is contained in "The relationship between employment and wages", a review by Treasury officials, January 1985, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Paymaster General if he will state each annual rate of unemployment in Grimsby from 1979 to the latest available year.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The table shows annual average unemployment expressed as a percentage of employees in employment plus the unemployed in the Grimsby travel-to-work area for each year from 1979 to 1986. The figures are not comparable over the whole period because of the change in travel-to-work boundaries, and changes in the compilation of the monthly unemployment count.

Grimsby travel-to-work area

1985	16·1
1986	15·2

[1] 1981 is the average of 10 months.
[2] 1982 is the average of 10 months only: January to October.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Paymaster General what has been the annual number of notified redundancies in Grimsby from 1979 to the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Lee: Information relating to confirmed redundancies is given in the following table:

Redundancies confirmed as due to occur in Grimsby

Year	Number
1979	0
1980	1,005
1981	1,886
1982	880
1983	1,436
1984	1,081
1985	332
1986	517

Note: The figures measure redundancies confirmed as due to occur, in groups of 10 or more employees, and are based on follow-up action of employers' notifications of redundancies under the Employment Protection Act 1975. Figures for 1986 are provisional.

Mr. Hawksley asked the Paymaster General how many people were in work in the Telford area in February 1987 and in February 1983; and what percentage of the population this was in each case.

Mr. Lee: The latest available information for new towns such as Telford comes from the 1981 census of population and is contained in the "New Towns Report, England and Wales, part 1", ref: CEN 81 NT(1), a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Hannam asked the Paymaster General if he will list the unemployment figures for Easter for the month of March in each of the years 1975 to 1987.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The table gives estimates of seasonally adjusted unemployment (excluding school leavers), consistent with the current count, for March of each year from 1975 to 1987 in the United Kingdom.

Unemployment (excluding school leavers) in the United Kingdom, adjusted for discontinuities and seasonality

[1] The March 1987 figure is provisional and subject to revision.

Enterprise Allowance and Loan Guarantee Schemes

Mr. Batiste asked the Paymaster General how many people in (a) the Yorkshire and Humberside region and (b) the Leeds travel-to-work area are currently (i) on the enterprise allowance scheme and (ii) in receipt of a loan under the loan guarantee scheme.

Mr. Trippier: On 22 April 1987 8,148 people were on the enterprise allowance scheme in Yorkshire and Humberside. This figure includes 1,189 people receiving the allowance in the Leeds area. Currently 1,374 loans under the loan guarantee scheme totalling about £40 million have been guaranteed in the Yorkshire and Humberside region. This includes the Leeds area for which separate figures are not kept. No records are maintained of those people who are receiving both enterprise allowance and a loan under the loan guarantee scheme.

Mr. Mike Bendall

Mr. Steen asked the Paymaster General if, in the light of the undertaking given by the Bridge Agency to Mr. Mike Bendall of East Hartley, Blackawton, Totnes, Devon, that his employment as a community programme worker in the Action Van project, Totnes, was secure until August 1987, and of the statement by officials in his Department that every field placement initiated by the Bridge Agency would be honoured by the Community Rural Agency which has replaced it, he will instruct the Manpower Services Commission to reconsider its termination of Mr. Bendall's employment on 1 May 1987.

Mr. Lee: Community programme participants are normally employed for up to one year, although in special circumstances this may be extended. Mr. Bendall has already benefited from over two years employment on the Action Van project. He was informed in January 1987 by the Bridge Agency that his particular post would not be continued when the project was renewed from May 1987. This remains the position.

ACAS (Annual Report)

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Paymaster General when the Secretary of State for Employment expects to receive the annual report of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State and I have received the ACAS report for 1986, which will be laid before both Houses of Parliament tomorrow. The report is also published tomorrow and copies will then be available from the Vote Office.

DEFENCE

Her Majesty's Forces (Sexually Transmitted Diseases)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in the Official Report the number of cases of sexually transmitted diseases recorded in Her Majesty's Forces in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Freeman: Statistics are not held centrally on the incidence of sexually transmitted diseases within the armed forces. Within the United Kingdom, service men may well seek treatment at NHS specialist treatment clinics, so the service medical authorities would not therefore be aware of all cases.

Underground Nuclear Tests

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if United Kingdom underground nuclear tests are for purposes other than the Trident ballistic missile programme;

(2) if United Kingdom underground nuclear testing will be required once the Trident ballistic missiles are in service;

(3) if continued United Kingdom underground nuclear testing is necessary for (a) safety and (b) operational reasons.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not our practice to identify the specific purpose of any joint United Kingdom-United States underground test or the weapons programme it supports.

Equestrian Events

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the answer of 22 April, if he will list those equestrian sports in which a service man can participate either individually or as a member of a team in a representative capacity and thereby be entitled to use military transport at public expense for the conveyance of privately owned horses.

Mr. Freeman: There is no specific list of approved equestrian sports in which a service man can participate and thereby be entitled to use military transport at public expense for the conveyance of privately owned horses. Examples of such sports which may qualify for approval are polo, show jumping, eventing, racing, point-to-point, hunter trials and tent-pegging. It is, of course, a prerequisite that participants must be representing either their unit, their service or the combined services.

Royal Navy Equipment Exhibition

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the list of names of countries to which invitations to the next Royal Navy equipment exhibition have been extended.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In common with all my predecessors, I do not intend to publish a list of countries invited to the Royal Navy equipment exhibition.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the next Royal Navy equipment exhibition will be held; and on which dates it will be open to (a) overseas customers, (b) the press and (c) the British public.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The next Royal Navy equipment exhibition is from 7 to 11 September 1987 and will be open each day to overseas customers and the defence-related technical press. On 6 September there is a press day which the national, local provincial and technical press may attend. The exhibition is not open to the public.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any plans to arrange for staff of his Department to be screened for antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987; c. 382]: No. No Occupational risks are involved, and there is no medical reason for introducing screening among civil servants in this Department.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any current or former staff of his Department have been found to have developed AIDS or antibodies to HIV.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987; c. 382]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on Wednesday 22 April.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to ensure that staff of his Department are warned about those homosexual and other activities which are deemed to involve a high risk of AIDS infection.

Mr. Archie Hamilton [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987; c. 382]: In April 1986 the Management and Personnel Office, after consulting the Chief Medical Officer DHSS, circulated all Departments with guidance to managers and model notes for staff. In providing guidance to managers for discussions with staff, the Department has drawn on these documents and on the Department of Employment/Health and Safety Executive booklet "Aids and Employment", which I understand are available in the Library of the House.

ENVIRONMENT

Bathing Beaches

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from regional water authorities regarding the financial implications of upgrading bathing beaches.

Mr. Waldegrave: Water authorities have recently submitted their 1987 corporate plans. Most authorities are expecting improvements in bathing waters to require increases in capital investment and operating costs associated with the disposal of effluent to the sea.

Council House Sales

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest figure for purchases of their homes by secure tenants since the Housing Act 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: Up to December 1986, 594,700 council tenants have bought their homes from English local authorities and new towns by exercising their right to buy.

Elmley Marshes, Kent

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will specify the management objectives agreed between the Nature Conservancy Council and Mr. Merricks for the Elmley marsh, Kent, site of special scientific interest, the timetable for implementing these objectives and the individuals represented on the proposed management committee and the trustees of the new reserve trust.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand that the management objectives for the new reserve at Elmley marshes are intended to provide for the maintenance and enhancement of the full range of nature conservation interests in the reserve, particularly in connection with the breeding bird population, the over-wintering wildfowl and waders, and the invertebrate population. These will be implemented by a management plan, which will include a timetable, to be drawn up in co-operation with the Nature Conservancy Council.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much the Nature Conservancy Council has given by way of grant or compensation to the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds for managing part of the Elmley marsh, Kent, site of special scientific interest adjacent to that controlled by Mr. Merricks.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am advised that the Nature Conservancy Council has agreed three applications for grant aid totalling £3,510 for the RSPB in connection with management works for its reserve at Elmley marshes.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what access the public will be granted and visitor facilities provided to the Elmley Marsh, Kent, site of special scientific interest, as a result of the payment of £1·6 million by the Nature Conservancy Council to Mr. Merricks.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand that the Elmley conservation trust will encourage the public to visit the site, although care will be needed to ensure that there is no conflict with the maintenance and enhancement of the scientific interest of the site. I understand it is intended to provide a visitor centre, a nature trail and observation hides, and that close attention will be given to the development of educational facilities on the site.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the agreement signed with Mr. Merricks over the management of the Elmley Marsh, Kent, site of special scientific interest will be subject to review at periodic intervals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The management agreement provides for payments to be reviewed at three yearly intervals in accordance with the financial guidelines issued in accordance with section 50(2) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Local Authorities (Countryside Expenditure)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the sums of money paid to landowners under the following agreements or orders are listed in the accounts of the local authorities making the payments, in a way that can be ascertained by an interested person exercising a right of inspection of an authority's accounts and associated documents under section 159(1) of the Local Government Act 1972: (a) a public path creation agreement under section 25 of the Highways Act 1980, (b) a public path creation order under section 26 of the Highways Act 1980, (c) an access agreement under section 64 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949, (d) an access order under section 65 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 and (e) a management agreement under section 39 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981.

Mr. Waldegrave: There are no special statutory requirements governing the accounting for these payments. The form of account is therefore for the local authority to decide. A right of inspection may be exercised under section 17(1) of the Local Government Finance Act 1982. Under section 17(2) of the Act, local government electors or their representatives also have a right to raise questions to the auditor on matters arising out of the accounts.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the management agreements that the Nature Conservancy Council has entered into with owners and occupiers of sites of special scientific interest between 1 April 1986 and 31 March 1987, the name of the site of special scientific interest and the amount paid.

Mr. Waldegrave: Individual agreements are treated as confidential matters between owners and occupiers of sites and the Nature Conservancy Council and it is not our policy to disclose details.

During the period 1 April 1986 to 31 March 1987, the Nature Conservancy Council completed 318 agreements covering 9,850 hectares. The total cost paid in the financial year 1986-87 was £5,093,674, which includes lump sum payments and arrears from previous years.

Private Rented Accommodation

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further measures he proposes to take to increase the amount of private rented accommodation available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: In recent months, we have taken a number of measures to increase the amount of private rented accommodation available. The requirement that increases in registered rents should be phased over two years has been abolished, as has the requirement to register a fair rent on a shorthold letting in Greater London. The assured tenancy scheme, which permits letting at market rents, has been extended to cover improved, as well as new, dwellings. The Housing Corporation is giving grants to housing associations for rental schemes combining private and public finance, with particular emphasis on accommodation for homeless people and job movers. In the Local Government Bill, we are seeking new powers for local authorities to give financial assistance towards the provision of privately rented accommodation.

We have made it clear that a priority task after the election will be further measures to stimulate the private rented sector by ensuring that landlords can receive a reasonable return on their investment while adequately protecting the security of tenants.

Council Housing Transfer Lists

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what weight he attaches to the length of council housing transfer lists when allocating resources for housing to the London borough of Waltham Forest.

Mr. Tracey: Resources are allocated to local authorities following consideration of all relevant factors including the information in authorities' HIP submissions. Generally, we would not attach much weight to waiting or transfer lists, as local authority practice in compiling such lists varies widely.

System-built Tower Blocks

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he can provide additional resources to enable the London borough of Waltham Forest to deal with the problems of repairing system-built tower blocks.

Mr. Tracey: The main HIP allocations to authorities for 1987-88 have already been made, as announced on 19 December 1986. The resources remaining after making these initial allocations will be distributed to authorities for projects prepared in conjunction with the Estate Action team, and to authorities which have particularly heavy obligations under the housing defects legislation, with a reserve of £2 million for the homes insulation scheme. Allocations in successive years have, however, taken account of the need to repair system-built tower blocks. Bids for allocations in 1988-89 will be invited soon.

Liverpool Arena

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be in a position to announce whether the Government will give financial assistance for the development costs of the Liverpool arena; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on 2 April at column 605.

Snooker Players (Drug Tests)

Mr. Colin Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from the Sports Council about the World Professional Billiards and Snooker Association's unwillingness to take action over positive drug tests on snooker players who were tested under the Government-funded Sports Council drug abuse advisory group scheme; and what response he has made.

Mr. Tracey: I have received no representations from the Sports Council on this matter. With the council, however, I share a concern over the use of certain medicines by some players, with or without medical prescription. I have therefore asked that the drug abuse advisory group of the Sports Council should discuss this issue urgently with the World Professional Billiards and Snooker Association and other interested organisations and to produce a report.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research studies are being carried out into the disposal of radioactive waste on small islands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am not aware of any research specifically directed at the disposal of radioactive waste on small islands.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to ensure that staff of his Department are warned about those homosexual and other activities which are deemed to involve a high risk of AIDS infection.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his answer, 30 March 1987, c. 420]: In April 1986, the Management and Personnel Office, after consulting the Chief Medical Officer, DHSS, circulated all departments with guidance to managers and model notes for staff. My Department drew on those notes and on the Department of Employment-Health and Safety Executive book "AIDS and Employment" in providing notes for staff. I understand that copies of both those pieces of guidance are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to arrange for staff of his Department to be screened for antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his answer, 30 March 1987, c. 420]: No.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether any current or former staff of his Department have been found to have developed AIDS or antibodies to HIV.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his answer, 30 March 1987, c. 420]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on Wednesday 22 April at column 628.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Conductive Education

3. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has recently received about funding in the United Kingdom for the study of the Hungarian system of conductive education.

Mr. Dunn: No such representations have been received since I replied to the hon. Member's question about this study on 12 March.

West Yorkshire

10. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received on the state of school buildings in West Yorkshire; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has received representations from Bradford local education authority, and from individual hon. Members, about the state of that authority's school buildings. He has also received representations, again including some from hon. Members, about building work at individual voluntary aided schools throughout the region.

University Research

11. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about his Department's level of support for university research for the current financial year.

Mr. Walden: Those engaged in university research regularly make the case for more Government money. Planned expenditure for 1987-88 is already expected to exceed £1·3 billion.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

12. Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on the progress of the GCSE examination plans.

Mr. Dunn: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike).

28. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information and reports he expects to be available to his Department before the start of the 1987-88 academic year on the standards of teaching achieved in GCSE courses; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 9 March at columns 23-24.

Nursery Education

13. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the local authorities which have, in the last three years, increased their provision of places in nursery schools and nursery classes.

18. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the local authorities which have, in the last three years, increased their provision of places in nursery schools and nursery classes.

19. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the local authorities which have, in the last three years, increased their provision of places in nursery schools and nursery classes.

21. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the local authorities which have, in the last three years, increased their provision of places in nursery schools and nursery classes.

Mr. Dunn: The Department collects information only on the number of pupils in nursery schools and classes. Nursery pupil numbers have increased between 1983 and 1986 in the following local education authorities in England:

Local education authorities where the number of children under five attending nursery schools and nursery classes increased between January 1983 and January 1986

Student Grants

14. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about the level of student grants for the forthcoming academic year.

Mr. Walden: About 50 representations have been received about the level of student grants for the 1987-88 academic year since the main rates of grant were announced on 30 January.

Teachers (Pay and Conditions)

15. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about the current teachers dispute.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My Department has received many letters, and views have been expressed to me personally by various organisations including four of the six teacher unions.

38. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the latest position regarding the dispute over teachers' pay and conditions.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I laid before the House on 9 April an order giving teachers an average pay rise of 8·2 per cent. backdated to 1 January and setting out duties and other conditions of employment. The NUT and NAS/UWT at their Easter conference have threatened further disruption in schools. The union activists have shown total disregard for the interests of children. Parents and the public will not support their selfish posturing at their pupils' expense.

City Technology Colleges

16. Mr. Freud asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the latest level of funding from private industry for city technology colleges.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: In addition to the £1 million sponsorship already announced by Hanson Trust and the Dixons Group, several other companies have expressed a willingness to provide funding and other assistance. I cannot give details until they are ready to make their decisions public.

School Working Day

17. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has received any representations concerning changes in the school working day.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has received three letters from hon. Members concerning consultations on this subject being conducted in one particular LEA.

Science Base

20. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to receive from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils its strategy paper on the implications of a major contraction in the science base; and what steps he proposes to take to expand the research capability of the industrial economy.

Mr. Walden: I understand that the Advisory Board for the Research Councils is preparing a strategy document which they expect to submit to my right hon. Friend before the summer. It is the Government's policy to promote closer and better working between the science base and industry and commerce. The recently announced LINK initiative is designed to strengthen collaboration between these sectors.

Derbyshire

22. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to announce his decision on the proposals of Derbyshire county council to reorganise sixth form education in Derbyshire.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend hopes to announce his decision on the proposals to reorganise sixth form education in Derbyshire by the end of the summer.

School Buildings

23. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent consultations have taken place with local education authorities concerning the state of repair of both primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: The state of repair of school buildings is discussed in the course of the many contacts which Ministers and officials of the Department have with individual local education authorities and with the local authority associations.

Nursery Nurses

24. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on advanced training of nursery nurses.

26. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on advanced training of nursery nurses.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend hopes that examining and validating bodies for nursery nurse training will have as their main concern the educational and career interests of students in providing a qualification which facilitates both entry to employment and the opportunity for progression in further education.

Education Partnerships

25. Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department has any plans to promote among local education authorities schemes for partnerships on the lines of the London Compact launched by the Inner London education authority and the London enterprise agency.

Mrs. Rumbold: Different forms of co-operation will suit different areas, and the Government take every opportunity to promote closer working between education and industry.

Higher Education

27. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received in response to his White Paper on higher education.

37. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the recent proposals for changes in university funding; and if he will make a statement.

39. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the White Paper, "Higher Education—Meeting the Challenge."

40. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from local authorities concerning the White Paper, "Higher Education — Meeting the Challenge"; and if he will make a statement.

41. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on his recent White Paper on higher education.

43. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the level of resources the Goverment intend to commit towards the achievement of the objectives set out in the White Paper on higher education.

Mr. Walden: Various, mainly favourable, representations have been received from hon. Members and others about the White Paper proposals to widen access to higher education, to re-establish the polytechnics and other major colleges of higher education as free-standing institutions, and to reform the University Grants Committee. My right hon. Friend and I shall be meeting representatives of the local authority associations shortly. Public expenditure on higher education in the United Kingdom is planned to increase to £4·1 billion by 1989-90. These and other plans will be reviewed in the usual way in the annual public expenditure surveys. We have issued a consultative document on the detail of the proposals for the polytechnics and colleges, and will shortly issue another on the proposed Universities Funding Council. Comments from all concerned will be welcome.

34. Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the availability of funds for higher education during the 1987-88 period, in the light of the proposals he announced on 1 April, Official Report, columns 1097-99.

Mr. Walden: In 1987-88 recurrent funding for the universities will increase by 10 per cent. and for the polytechnics and colleges by 9 per cent. Including the £15 million addition announced on 1 April, the science budget is being increased by 10 per cent.

The Government are confident that these expenditure plans provide the various sectors with the basis for fulfilling their roles to a high level of achievement.

"Better Schools"

29. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the 1985 White Paper entitled "Better Schools" remains Government policy in respect of the recommended size of rural primary schools.

Mr. Dunn: The White Paper set out some general principles concerning the size thresholds at which schools of different types can economically deliver a satisfactory curriculum. My right hon. Friend does not intend these principles to be interpreted as narrowly prescriptive, or as providing a set of bench marks for the closure of schools. Before formulating proposals for the closure of rural schools local authorities and voluntary bodies should take account also of wider considerations including the distances to be travelled to alternative schools in the event of closure and of the age of the children making these journeys.

16-year-olds

30. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of pupils aged 16 years and over have remained in full-time education in Yorkshire and Humberside; and how this compares with the national average.

Mr. Dunn: The percentages of 16 and 17-year-olds in full-time education at maintained schools and further education establishments in the academic year 1985-86 in Yorkshire and Humberside and in England were as follows:

	Academic year 1985-86
	16-year-olds in full-time education (percentage of age group)[1]	17-year-olds in full-time education (percentage of age group)[1]
Yorkshire and Humberside	42	27
England	46	30

[1] The number of 16 and 17-year-olds expressed as a percentage of the total number of 15-year-olds in maintained secondary schools one or two years earlier respectively.

44. Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of pupils aged 16 years and over have remained in full-time education in the north-west; and how this compares with the national average.

Mr. Dunn: The percentages of 16 and 17-year-olds in full-time education at maintained schools and further education establishments in the academic year 1985-86 in the north-west and in England were as follows:

	Academic year 1985-86 16-year-olds in full-time education (percentage of age group)[1]	17-year-olds in full-time education (percentage of age group)[1]
North-west	43	30
England	46	30

[1] The number of 16 and 17-year-olds expressed as a percentage of the total number of 15-year-olds in maintained secondary schools one or two years earlier respectively.

Violence in Schools

31. Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for the Education and Science what recent research has been carried out to ascertain the possible effect of violence watched on videos by schoolchildren on the level of violence in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am unaware of any recent research in this area. However, in 1983, an informal all-party parliamentary group sponsored an inquiry into the effects of exposing children to scenes of violence on video film. The report of research commissioned by the group was published in 1985 under the title "Video Violence and Children".

Science Budget

32. Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science by how much the increase in the science budget which he announced on 1 April exceeds the cost to the research councils of the recent university salaries settlement as it applied to staff employed on research council grants and fellows supported by research councils.

Mr. Walden: About £3·5 million; but there is no simple direct relationship between the academic pay settlement and the additional £15 million for the science budget, announced by my right hon. Friend on 1 April. This additional money has been made available to sustain the work of our most able scientists and their teams.

Research and Development

33. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his latest estimate of the current annual aggregate expenditure by his Department on research and development; and how it compares in real terms with the amount spent in 1978-79.

Mr. Walden: Aggregate expenditure on research and development by the Department in 1986-87 is estimated at £1,242 million. Expenditure in 1978-79 at 1986-87 prices was £1,136 million. In 1987-88, the expenditure is expected to exceed £1·3 billion.

Teachers (Essex)

35. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers in Essex are specially qualified to work with dyslexic children and children with other learning disabilities.

Mr. Dunn: The latest available information is for 31 March 1985. On that date, there were 112 full-time teachers employed in schools in Essex who were specially qualified to work with children with learning difficulties. Of these, 51 were in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools and 61 in maintained and grant-aided special schools. Teachers with qualifications to work with dyslexic children are not separately identified.

Illiteracy and Innumeracy

36. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further plans the Government have to tackle the problem of illiteracy and innumeracy amongst young people; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend announced his plans for establishing a national foundation curriculum in a statement on 7 April to the Education, Science and Arts Select Committee. Copies of that statement are in the Library. Our aim is to raise standards in schools by ensuring that all pupils receive an education which equips them with essential skills for adult life, and also encourages them to develop their full potential across a range of subjects. At the adult level, my right hon. Friend looks to the adult literacy and basic skills unit to act as a central focus to assist LEAs and voluntary bodies in establishing new basic skills provision and developing existing provision in order to suit the needs of their local communities. He gives high priority to the funding of the unit, and grant has risen four-fold from £470,000 in 1980-81 to an allocation of over £2,050,000 in 1987-88.

Capital Allocation (Lancashire)

42. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what further representations he has received about Lancashire county council's capital allocation for the current year.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has received further representations from hon. Members and their constituents, and has also met an all-party delegation from the Lancashire county council.

School Closures

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list in the Official Report those schools in England in which the official school premises have been closed.

Mr. Dunn: Cases where school buildings have had to be closed because of structural damage or for major repairs come to the Department's attention from time to time, mainly in the context of the annual submission by local authorities of their plans for capital expenditure. Authorities are not required to inform the Department of such cases, however, and there is therefore no centrally maintained list.

AIDS (Research)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to ensure that the medical Research Council has sufficient funds to finance research into the particular features of HIV infection among drug abusers and into its transmission to children identifiable in the Edinburgh region since 1983, and into their implications for the spread of HIV infection.

Mr. Walden: The Medical Research Council has been allocated £17·5 million for AIDS research over the next three years. The council's request for additional resources for AIDS research has been met in full.

Fire Precautions

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the present level of fire precautions in schools and colleges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The Department has received no general representations about the present level of fire precautions in schools and colleges. The Department's recommended standards for fire precautions are set out in "Building Bulletin 7, Fire and the Design of Schools." This publication is currently being revised and the revision is the subject of consultation with interested parties including the local authority associations.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what surveys he has undertaken to ascertain the effectiveness of fire precautions in schools and colleges.

Mr. Dunn: None.

The statutory responsibility for ensuring that fire precautions are effective in all such educational establishments rests with the local authorities concerned.

First-aid

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recommendations his Department makes for the provision of first-aid on school trips and other out of school activities.

Mr. Dunn: In March 1986 the Department issued a bulletin ("Safety in Education Bulletin No. 4") to local education authorities and to schools, containing general guidance to all involved with the organisation of outdoor pursuits and school expeditions. The bulletin supplemented previous departmental guidance on the subject and in particular drew on lessons arising from the tragic accident at Land's End in 1985.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recommendations his Department makes for first-aid provision in schools and colleges employing fewer than 150 staff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The Department's existing guide on first-aid is contained in the series of safety booklets dealing with various aspects of safety. In addition, Safety Bulletin No. 2 contains general guidance on first-aid. The Health and Safety (First-Aid) Regulations 1981 and approved code of practice have implications but focus primarily on the aspect of safety in the place of work. A new document offering guidance on various aspects of first-aid to schools and colleges is being prepared by the Department in consultation with various professional outside experts in the field for issue later this year.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received seeking the application of the Health and Safety (First-Aid) Regulations 1981 to schools and colleges employing fewer than 150 staff; and what consideration he has given to the matter.

Mr. Dunn: A few representations have been made from time to time. The requirements applying to first-aid in schools and colleges embodied in both common law and statutes, notably the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and the regulations and code of practice deriving from it, are appropriate and my right hon. Friend has no plans to introduce changes.

Tourism

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the establishments in higher education providing graduate and post graduate courses in subjects relating to the tourism industry and the numbers of students under tuition.

Mr. Walden: The Educational Counselling and Credit Transfer Information Service (ECCTIS) lists the following universities in Great Britain and polytechnics and colleges in England which run first degree or postgraduate courses in tourism, hotel management, hotel and catering management or institutional management:

First Degree
Strathclyde University
Surrey University
University College of Wales (Cardiff)
Huddersfield Polytechnic
Manchester Polytechnic
Middlesex Polytechnic
Newcastle Polytechnic
Polytechnic of North London
Portsmouth Polytechnic
Dorset Institute of Higher Education
Ealing College of Higher Education
New College, Durham
Norwich City College of Further and Higher Education

Postgraduate
Birmingham University
Loughborough University
Strathclyde University
Surrey University
Leeds Polytechnic
Manchester Polytechnic
Blackpool and Fylde College of Further and Higher Education
Dorset Institute of Higher Education
South Devon College of Arts and Technology

There were 915 enrolments on first degree and 64 enrolments on postgraduate courses in these subjects in polytechnics and colleges in England in November 1985. Similar data on enrolments for the university sector are not readily available.

Dystrophic Epidermolysis Bullosa

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide funds for the Medical Research Council to carry out research into dystrophic epidermolysis bullosa.

Mr. Walden: It is for the Medical Research Council (MRC) to decide how to apportion the grant-in-aid it receives from the Department's science budget between the various areas of research which it supports. The council is always willing to consider soundly based scientific proposals in competition with other applications.

University Grants Committee

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the grant available to the University Grants Committee will be reduced to compensate for the partial reimbursement of the community charge for students studying in Scotland; and if he will make a statement on the financial effects on Scottish universities.

Mr. Walden: Scottish universities will continue to pay non-domestic rates. There are no proposals for changing the present arrangements under which these rates are reflected in university grants. We do not expect the introduction of the community charge to have any significant net effect on the financing of universities in Scotland.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will place in the Library a copy of the report, "Site Selection and Characterisation for Deep Radioactive Waste Repositories in Britain: Issues and Research Trends into the 1990s", compiled by the Fluid Processes Group at the British Geological Survey.

Mr. Walden: The report will be published in the Journal of Radioactive Waste Management and the Nuclear Fuel Cycle during the summer. Copies will be placed in the Library as soon as possible.

Education Support Grant

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what results are being achieved following the allocation of education support grant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am glad to announce the publication today of the broadsheet "Encouraging Quality" which describes the excellent results achieved in many areas of activity.

Technical and Vocational Education Initiative

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Department issues any guidance to local education authorities on the selection of pupils for technical and vocational education initiative courses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I have been asked to reply.

The criteria for both the pilot phase of the technical and vocational education initative (TVEI) and its national extension, which have been sent to all local education authorities, indicate that the initiative is intended to cater for students of both sexes across the whole ability range. Proposals for TVEI funding must meet that requirement. However, detailed decisions in respect of the programmes to be followed by individual pupils within the curricular structure offered by individual schools taking part in TVEI are matters for the schools and pupils themselves and the pupils' parents.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Cervical Screening

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many health districts within the South-East Thames region have computerised call and recall of women for cervical smear tests.

Mrs. Currie: All district health authorities in the South-East Thames region plan to implement computerised call and recall systems for cervical cancer screening between May 1987 and January 1988. This is within the Government's target date of 31 March 1988 for implementation of such systems.

Mentally Ill and Mentally Handicapped People

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many places on a local authority basis for England are provided in local authority homes and hostels for mentally ill and mentally handicapped people.

Mrs. Currie: The latest available data (provisional) relating to the position in England at 31 March 1986 are given in the table. Data on group homes may not be fully comprehensive; however, action is in hand to improve future coverage. Further details can be found in the publication, "Homes and Hostels for the Mentally Ill and Mentally Handicapped at 31 March 1985, England", copies of which are in the Library.

Hospital Construction

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will report on progress on hospital construction within the North Western regional health authority area; which programmes have been delayed; and if he will make a detailed statement regarding each such delay.

Mrs. Currie: In the North-Western region, there are 77 health building schemes each costing over £1 million at various stages of planning, design and construction. The total value of this programme which will make a major contribution to the National Health Service estate in the region is estimated at £500 million.

Responsibility for the management of this capital programme lies with the North-Western regional health authority. The hon. Member may therefore wish to pursue any inquiries with the chairman of the authority.

Nurses

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many nurses (i) entered and (ii) left the nursing profession in the last year for which figures are available in (a) the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale health authority, (b) the North Western regional health authority and (c) the National Health Service in England and Wales.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) on 22 April at column 625.

No information is available on the number of qualified nurses and midwives entering and leaving the nursing profession in the North-Westen regional health authority and the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale health authority. It would not necessarily be correct to estimate the number on the basis of the figures for England as a whole produced by the Institute of Manpower Studies.

NHS (Pay)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the average gross earnings of (a) secretarial, (b) clerical staff in the National Health Service in the north west region; and what are the average gross weekly earnings of secretarial and clerical staff (i) in the north west region and (ii) in England;

(2) how many (a) secretarial and (b) clerical workers in the National Health Service in the north west region have gross weekly earnings of (i) more than £120, (ii) between £110 and £120, (iii) between £80 and £100 and (iv) less than £80; and what percentage each category represents.

Mr. Newton: The information requested is not available centrally. Clerical and secretarial staff are paid on one of the following national pay scales.

	Basic pay rate from 1 April 1986
	Minimum adult rate (21 or over)	Maximum
Clerical—routine duties	4,112	4,954
Clerical—full duties	4,112	5,628
Higher clerical grade	5,418	6,556
General administrative assistant	6,556	8,562
Copy typists/machine operators—normal	4,226	4,956
Copy typists/machine operators—extended	4,226	5,377
Shorthand typists—normal	4,508	5,141
Shorthand typists—extended	4,508	5,628
Supervisors scale 1	4,912	5,855
Supervisors scale 2	5,387	6,312

In addition to basic pay such staff may receive, where appropriate, London weighting and allowances for secretarial qualifications.

NHS (Staff)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what proportion of (a) secretarial and (b) clerical staff in the north west region of the National Health Service are women.

Mr. Newton: I shall give the hon. Member such information as is available as soon as possible.

Doctors' Lists

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has on the size of general practitioners' lists in (a) Burnley, (b) Pendle, (c) Lancashire and (d) England, respectively.

Mr. Newton: As at 1 October 1985 the average list size for unrestricted principals in England was 2,068 patients. The figure for unrestricted principals covered by the Lancashire family practitioner committee was 2,120.

Information is not held centrally in the form requested for Burnley or Pendle.

Nursing and Residential Homes

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, by each appropriate local authority, the number of private nursing homes and private residential homes registered, and the number of beds involved.

Mrs. Currie: For the latest available district health authority information, I refer the hon. Member to the summary booklet of private hospitals, homes and clinics statistics 1985, a copy of which is in the Library.

Figures for residential care homes run privately (including those operated by voluntary organisations) are given in the table.

Registered private and voluntary homes for persons who are elderly, disabled, mentally handicapped or mentally ill. Number of homes and places at 31 March 1986 (provisional)

Drug Addicts

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate the number of beds, and their location, in the North-West regional health authority area intended for registered drug addicts.

Mrs. Currie: Most people admitted for drug misuse are treated in general psychiatric wards and not in beds specifically assigned for drug misusers. On 31 December 1985 there were six beds available in the North-Western regional health authority area exclusively for the treatment of drug misuse. These were in a special in-patient unit in Prestwich hospital, Manchester.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the National Health Service waiting list numbers in Exeter for each of the years 1975 to 1986.

Mr. Newton: Following is the information requested for the Exeter district health authority since its establishment in April 1982; the figures are for the number of cases on the in-patient waiting list at 30 September.

Year	Number of cases
1982	4,436
1983	4,823
1984	4,555
1985	4,638
1986	4,639

Junior Hospital Doctors

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of junior hospital doctors are currently working more than 72 hours a week; and what progress he has made in reducing the hours worked by junior hospital doctors, as recommended by the Social Services Committee in its report in July 1981.

Mr. Newton: This information is not available in the form requested.

On 30 September 1986, 81 per cent. of junior hospital doctors and dentists in England and Wales were contracted for more than 72 hours a week. Encouraging progress has been made in reducing juniors' hours since 1981. We have banned rotas requiring a junior to be on duty, on average, more than one night and weekend in two, and we have asked health authorities to aim for a target maximum commitment of one in three—broadly equivalent to 84 contracted hours—or better. Between 1982 and 1985 we estimate that the number of posts in England with rotas more onerous than one in three fell or was planned to fall from 5,000 to 3,500, representing 18·4 per cent. of all the posts concerned. Recent indications are that there may still be a number of practitioners with excessive rota commitments, and we are currently seeking details of each case. Overall, contracted hours have continued to fall, from 88·9 in 1980 to 85·7 in 1986. These figures denote hours of availability rather than work; but independent surveys commissioned by the Review Body on Doctors' and Dentists' Remuneration indicate that average hours of work have also fallen, from 58·3 in 1981 to 57 in 1985.

Dystrophic Epidermolysis Bullosa

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to his reply to the right hon. Member for Brent, East on 3 April, Official Report, column 654, he will make it his policy to fund research into dystrophic epidermolysis bullosa.

Mrs. Currie: We are always willing to consider proposals for research, although, as I indicated in my earlier reply, the main Government agency for the funding of biomedical research in the United Kingdom is the Medical Research Council.

Pensioners

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the cost of giving single pensioners with no other sources of income an extra £5 per week and pensioner couples £8 per week assuming no change in social security benefits.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Chiropody

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to reduce the risk of cross-infection arising from the chiropodial treatment of patients who may be carrying blood-borne viruses of the hepatitis B and HIV types.

Mr. Newton: Specific guidelines for the prevention of the spread of HIV and other viruses are being prepared for a range of services, including chiropody, which involve practices in which the skin may be pierced.

District health authorities already have general control of infection policies which will apply to chiropodists working for them.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will seek to introduce compulsory registration to ensure that only persons who have completed a course of training recognised by the Chiropodists Board of the Council for Professions Supplementary to Medicine are allowed to practise chiropody; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: In the absence of general agreement among all the groups which might be affected, we have no present plans for legislation of the kind the hon. Member has in mind.

Sexually Transmitted Diseases

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in the Official Report the number of cases of sexually transmitted diseases in the United Kingdom in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Newton: The information requested is not available in the precise form requested.

Sexually transmitted diseases are not notifiable and figures are not available about those who receive private treatment or treatment from their general practitioners. The table shows the number of new cases treated in National Health Service genito-urinary medicine clinics in England and Wales. These are thought to represent about 90 per cent. of all cases. Figures for Scotland are the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, and for Northern Ireland my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

[2] This refers to those who, on examination, are found to have no condition requiring treatment.

Familial Hyperlipidaemia

Mr. Ashby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether he will produce figures for the last three years for each region showing the incidence of patients diagnosed as having familial hyperlipidaemia with particular reference to the sex and age when diagnosed of patients;

(2) whether he will recommend that tests for familial hyperlipidaemia are included in medical examinations for all members of the armed forces, the police force and the Civil Service.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 27 April 1987, c. 31]: Familial hyperlipidoemia (FH) (excess of fatty substances in the blood) is an inherited condition, causing an increased risk of heart attack and sometimes stroke at an early age. Information on the incidence of the condition is not collected centrally.

A workshop, on screening for risk of coronary heart disease, held at the Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh, in November 1985, concluded that there was no justification at the present time for general screening of the population. Since there is no professional or scientific consensus on the need for general population screening, it would not be appropriate to undertake routine tests on members of individual professions at present.

The Family Heart Association makes available information on this condition.

Mortality Statistics

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of actual deaths in each week from 1 January to 31 March each year since 1979, what was the expected number of deaths for each of those weeks based on historical experience, and what was the percentage difference between the two.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her replies, 21 January 1987, c. 623 and 25 February 1987, c. 328-30]: The calculations on the expected number of weekly deaths at age one year and over for the years 1979 to 1982 have been completed, and the figures are shown in the tables. Also shown is the information carried forward for the current year.

An explanation of the methods used to calculate the expected number of deaths is given in "Population Trends No. 34", a copy of which is in the Library.

Expected figures calculated using 1981 projected populations based on the mid-1979 total population (estimated from 1971 census data).

[1] Actual deaths averaged for the three weeks covering Christmas and new year.

[2] Actual deaths in the two weeks containing Easter Friday and Easter Sunday are averaged.

Figures for actual deaths are based on occurrences rather than registrations due to the registrars' dispute.

[3] Actual deaths averaged for the four weeks covering Christmas and New Year.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Computers

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his answer of 17 March, Official Report, column 471, about computer usage in schools, what steps are taken by his Department to monitor the results of spending on computers in schools; how he measures the performance of different schools; and what recent representations he has received from Her Majesty's inspectors on this subject.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department undertook a survey in 1985 on the use of computers in schools and related expenditure, copies of which are in the Library. A further survey is planned for this autumn, and thereafter at biennial intervals. Whilst the Department has not undertaken systematic performance measurements of individual schools in the field of information technology, reports by Her Majesty's inspectorate often include observations on this.

Multiple Sclerosis

Mr. Henderson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the nature and scale of research related to multiple sclerosis supported by public funds.

Mr. Walden: The Medical Research Council is the main Government agency for the support of biomedical research. I understand that the council is supporting a number of research projects on multiple sclerosis, including both basic work on the nature of the disease and clinical studies of its treatment. In the financial year 1985-86, the last year for which figures are available, the council spent £403,000 on research into multiple sclerosis. The council is always willing to consider soundly based research grant applications in competition with other applicants.

I understand that research into multiple sclerosis is also carried out in universities and medical schools using funds for teaching and research allocated on advice from the University Grants Committee. The Government are not in a position to influence directly the scale and nature of this research activity.

Freshwater Fisheries Biological Association

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what changes have been made in the funds granted to the Freshwater Fisheries Biological Association through the Natural Environment Research Council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: The funds granted to the FBA through the NERC for the last four years have been as follows:

£000

Science Budget Grant-in-Aid	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87
General (net of receipts)	1,357	1,373	1,471	1,440
Pensions (net of receipts)	154	85	104	177
Transfer of Centre for Culture of Algae and Protozoa (CCAP) (net of receipts)	—	—	—	338
Total Grant-in-Aid	1,511	1,458	1,575	1,955

The grant-in-aid from the science budget for 1987-88 has yet to be finally decided but it is expected to be about £1,508,000 made up as follows:

£000

Science Budget Grant-in-Aid
General (net of receipts)	1,310
Pensions (net of receipts)	123
Transfer of CCAP (net of receipts)	75
Total Grant-in-Aid	1,508

The FBA council has recently made proposals to the NERC as to how the reduction in total income, arising largely from lower expected commissioned receipts, may be met. Representatives of the NERC and the FBA are to meet shortly to discuss these proposals.

Hay Fever

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if there are any plans for a programme of research into the treatment and cure of hay fever; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: The Medical Research Council is the main Government agency for the support of biomedical research. In the financial year 1985-86, the last year for which figures are available, the Council spent approximately £616,000 on research projects directly and indirectly related to hay fever. The council is always willing to consider soundly based research grant applications in competition with other applicants.

Research into hay fever may also be carried out in universities and medical schools using funds for teaching and research allocated on advice from the University Grants Committee. The Government are not in a position to influence directly the scale and nature of this research activity.

Teachers' Dispute

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has received any recent representations from teachers, parents or pupils in Hertfordshire regarding the current dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My Department has received letters expressing a variety of views about teachers' pay and conditions of employment from teachers, parents and pupils in a range of local education authorities.

Secondary Pupils (Costs)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the appropriate cost of educating a secondary school pupil in inner and outer London; and what is the approximate grant provided by Government to cover those costs.

Mr. Dunn: The net recurrent expenditure per secondary school pupil in ILEA and the average for the outer London boroughs in 1984-85 were £1,940 and £1,250 respectively. Most Government support for local authority education is provided through the block grant element of rate support grant, which is an unhypothecated grant in support of all services. It is not possible to identify a particular element as being in support of secondary education.

Pupil-teacher Ratios

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will break down the pupil-teacher ratio given in table 3.12.4 of the public expenditure White Paper between primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Dunn: Pupil-teacher ratios within maintained primary and secondary schools in England each year from 1982 to 1986 are given in the table. These figures differ from the overall pupil-teacher ratios given in table 3.12.4 of the public expenditure White Paper as they include qualified teachers only and exclude teachers employed by LEAs who were not in schools on the census day. Projections for future years are not available. The Government's expenditure plans assume a continuing improvement in the overall pupil-teacher ratio up to 1990 in order to give effect to their policies for the schools. The plans do not consider how this improvement might be reflected in pupil-teacher ratios within the primary and secondary sectors. The Government look to local authorities and schools to take advantage of the improved overall pupil-teacher ratio by employing teaching staff to the greatest benefit of the pupils.

January each year	Pupil/teacher ratios within schools
	Primary	Secondary
1982	22·5	16·6
1983	22·3	16·5
1984	22·1	16·2
1985	22·2	16·1
1986	22·1	15·9

"Outlaws in the Classroom"

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what complaints he has received under section 46 of the Education (No.2) Act 1986 about the booklet concerning homosexuality entitled "Outlaws in the Classroom" which is being circulated by some teachers in schools in the Leicester area; what action he proposes to take; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has today received correspondence from my hon. Friend concerning this booklet. He is giving careful consideration to the points raised and will write to him in due course.

School Closures

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will reconsider the criteria for closure of secondary schools in rural areas with a view to varying the guidelines on minimum size.

Mr. Dunn: The advice in the draft circular "Providing for Quality" on the desirable minimum sizes of different types of school is not intended to be interpreted as narrowly prescriptive. It makes it clear that, for geographical and other reasons, it might not always be possible to bring all schools up to the recommended sizes. My right hon. Friend is currently considering the draft circular in the light of various comments made on it.

ENERGY

Sizewell B

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what specific areas of the Central Electricity Generating Board safety case for Sizewell B have yet to be fully accepted for licensing purposes by the Nuclear Installions Inspectorate.

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. Friend informed the House in his statement of 12 March, at columns 475-7, that the NII judges that there are no safety obstacles of substance to the issue of the licence. The NII are now finalising the drafting of the pre-construction safety report with the Central Electricity Generating Board.

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy; further to his statement on 12 March, Official Report, columns 475-77, if he intends to publish in full the final pre-construction safety report and the final safety review as soon as they are available, as recommended by Sir Frank Layfield in the Sizewell B inquiry report.

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. Friend accepted this recommendation in principle in his letter of 12 March 1987 to the chairman of the CEGB giving his consent to the station. He urged the CEGB to publish these reports insofar as it can do so within the constraints of commercial sensitivity, as soon as possible after it has submitted them to the NII. My right hon. Friend has placed a copy of his letter in the Library.

Power Station Sites

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he will list by year and location the urban and non-urban power station sites owned by the Central Electricity Generating Board which were sold between 1979 and 1985;

(2) if he will list by location the urban and non-urban power station sites owned by the Central Electricity Generating Board which were sold in 1986;

(3) if he will list by location the urban and non-urban power station sites owned by the Central Electricity Generating Board which are currently for sale.

Mr. Goodlad: The sale of power station sites in England and Wales is the responsibility of the Central Electricity Generating Board. I have asked the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

Renewable Energy Sources

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what the annual expenditure by his Department for renewable sources of energy has been for the period 1979 to 1986.

Mr. David Hunt: Expenditure on my Department's programme for research, development and demonstration into renewable sources of energy during the period 1979 to 1986 including external contributions is set out in the table:

	£ million
1979-80	8·9
1980-81	12·3
1981-82	19·2
1982-83	17·9
1983-84	13·7
1984-85	18·2
1985-86	15·3

Notes:

(1) Where available figures include expenditure on waste as a fuel and passive solar under the energy efficiency demonstraton scheme; contributions from external contractors and the European Commission.

(2) Information on spend by contractors is estimated from the contractual link with Department spend in many cases and thus may not be exact. In particular, it may be a few months out in its allocation and therefore spend from one year may have been moved to another year.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is the estimated advertising and promotional expenditure for energy efficiency and renewable sources of energy by his Department for 1987.

Mr. David Hunt: Estimated expenditure for the current financial year is £7,580,000.

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the annual advertising and promotional expenditure for energy efficiency by his Department, British Gas, the Central Electricity Generating Board, the Electricity Council and British Coal for the period 1979 to 1986.

Mr. David Hunt: Expenditure by the Department of Energy is as follows:

1979-80	73,000
1980-81	40,000
1981-82	74,000
1982-83	511,000
1983-84	1,827,000
1984-85	7,961,000
1985-86	12,132,000

Advertising and promotional expenditure on energy efficiency by the industries referred to is decided by the boards of those industries. I have therefore asked the chairmen of the industries concerned to write to the hon. Member.

Nuclear Power

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the annual advertising and promotional expenditure for nuclear power by his Department, the Central Electricity Generating Board, the Electricity Council, British Nuclear Fuels Ltd., the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority and the South of Scotland Electricity Board for the period 1979 to 1986.

Mr. Goodlad: Advertising and promotion by the CEGB, the Electricity Council, BNFL and the SSEB fall within the commercial responsibilities of these organisations, and I have asked the chairmen to write to the hon. Member.

The Government fund a public information programme about civil nuclear power carried out by the UKAEA. Expenditure in the current year is expected to be about £2·5 million. I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Meirionnyd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) on 26 June 1986 at column 270, in which I gave details of expenditure in previous years.

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the current estimated costs in 1986 prices for a commercial demonstration fast breeder reactor.

Mr. Goodlad: No commercial demonstration fast reactor has been built in the United Kingdom. The capital cost of such a station would depend upon the design, the time of the order, and other factors.

Gas Explosions

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has as to how many claims have been made against British Gas for compensation for personal injury or damage to property in the event of gas explosions; and how many were settled in the claimants' favour.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have asked the chairman of British Gas to write to the hon. Member.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Paraguay

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what official visitors from Paraguay have been received by the Government since 1979.

Mr. Eggar: The following Paraguayan Ministers have visited the United Kingdom between 1979 and April 1987 in an official capacity:

Dr. Ugarte Centurion, Minister for Industry and Commerce, May 1980 and April 1983;
Dr. Nogues, Foreign Minister, June 1981;
Dr. Saldivar, Foreign Minister, March 1986.

A number of other Paraguayans, including officials, parliamentarians, businessmen, lawyers and journalists, have visited the United Kingdom under the FCO sponsored visits scheme.

Diplomatic Missions (Parking Fines)

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish up-to-date figures indicating in numerical order, the number of unpaid parking fines incurred by each diplomatic mission in the last quarter for which figures are available; if he will publish, in alphabetical order by country, the number of unpaid parking fines incurred by each diplomatic mission in the last two years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested by my hon. Friend is given in the tables. the tables also include those international organisations which have incurred unpaid fines. The figures may be reduced by late payments.

The annual total for 1986 (23,237) is only 21 per cent. of the total for 1984 (108,932). We welcome this very significant reduction, and expect it to continue in the future. We shall continue to take firm action against the worst offenders, and will also be writing to those few missions which showed a significant increase in the number of unpaid fines in 1986 over 1985.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Charles Morrison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council held on 26-27 April.

Mrs. Chalker: I attended the Foreign Affairs Council in Luxembourg on 26 and 27 April.

The Council held a first discussion of the Commission's proposals for the future financing of the Community. I stressed that the root of the Community's financial difficulties lay in failure to control agricultural production, and that addressing that problem and improving the control of Community expenditure must therefore be the key elements in the lasting solution which we all want. Further discussion will take place at the May ECOFIN and Foreign Affairs Councils.

The Council agreed on a mandate for the Commission to open negotiations with Hungary on a possible agreement on trade and economic cooperation. Negotiations are expected to begin in the near future.

Turkey's application to join the Community was referred by the Council to the Commission for their opinion, following the normal procedure under article 237 of the treaty of Rome.

The Commission reported to the Council on recent discussions with the Japanese Government on the problem of Japan's trade surplus. The Commission will shortly be making formal proposals for urgent action to prevent diversion of trade following the imposition by the United States of duties on Japanese electronic and other goods. The Council will discuss further action in accordance with an agreed timetable at its May, June and July meetings.

The Council approved guidelines for EC aid to Asia and Latin America. It also discussed relations between the Community and Yugoslavia and between the Community and Israel.

In political co-operation, Ministers agreed a statement by the Twelve on the situation in Sri Lanka, the text of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

I also attended, on 27 April, the first meeting of the Co-operation Council under the EC/Algeria cooperation agreement.

WALES

Hospitals

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the numbers of out-patient attendances in National Health Service hospitals in Wales (a) in the years 1970 to 1975, (b) in the years 1975 to 1980 and (c) in the years 1980 to 1985.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The required information is given in the following table:—

Period[1]	Total Number of New Outpatient Attendances	Total Number of All Outpatient Attendances
1970-75	2,596,547	10,127,072
1975-80	2,574,214	10,579,694
1980-85	2,788,833	12,204,851

[1] (six years inclusive).

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales, what were the numbers of inpatients treated in National Health Service hospitals in Wales in (a) the years 1970 to 1975, (b) the years 1975 to 1980 and (c) the years 1980 to 1985.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The required information is given in the following table:—

Period[1]	Total Number of In-Patient Discharges and Deaths
1970-75	1,937,204
1975-80	2,067,101
1980-85	2,343,250

[1] (six years inclusive)

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the numbers of available beds in National Health hospitals in Wales in (a) the years 1970 to 1975, (b) the years 1975 to 1980 and (c) the years 1980 to 1985.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The required information is given in the following table:—

Period[1]	Average Daily Number of Available Beds
1970-75	25,268
1975-80	23,779
1980-85	22,583

[1](six years inclusive)

National Health Service

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total expenditure on the National Health Service in Wales in the years (a) 1970 to 1975, (b) 1975 to 1980 and (c) 1980 to 1985, expressed in actual and in real terms.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The following table sets out the information requested for each year since 1974-75.

Total Net Expenditure on the National Health Service

£ million

[1]Year	Annual Expenditure	[2]Real Terms
1974-75	202·6	686·5

1985-86	920·7	920·7

[1] The information requested is not available prior to 1974-75.
[2] Actual expenditure revalued to 1985-86 prices using the GDP deflator.

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the recurring revenue allocation to the National Health Service in Wales (a) in the years 1970 to 1975, (b) in the years 1975 to 1980 and (c) in the years 1980 to 1985, expressed in actual and in real terms.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information available is set out in the following table:

Net Revenue Expenditure on the National Health Service

£ million

	Actual Expenditure	[2]Real Terms
[1]1974-75	187·3	634·7
1975-76	250·7	676·0

1984-85	809·8	860·3
1985-86	865·9	865·9

[1] The information requested is not available prior to 1974-75.
[2] Expenditure figures revalued to 1985-86 prices using the GDP deflator.

Renal Dialysis

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the total cost of providing the renal dialysis unit at Bangor, Gwynedd;

(2) how much was his Department's contribution to the renal dialysis unit at Bangor.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The capital cost of providing this unit was met by the company providing the service and the information requested is not held by the Department. The Department pays the charge levied by the company in respect of each dialysis session.

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the total cost of providing the renal dialysis unit at Carmarthen, Dyfed;

(2) how much was his Department's contribution to the renal dialysis unit at Carmarthen.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The capital cost of providing this unit was met by the company providing the service and the information requested is not held by the Department. The Department pays the charge levied by the company in respect of each dialysis session.

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the total cost of providing the renal dialysis unit at Swansea, West Glamorgan;

(2) how much was his Department's contribution to the renal dialysis unit at Swansea.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The total capital cost of providing the renal dialysis unit at Morriston hospital, Swansea was £561,000, all of which was provided by the Department.

Medical Genetics Centre, Cardiff

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the total cost of providing the medical genetics centre at Cardiff;

(2) what was his Department's contribution to the medical genetics centre at Cardiff.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The total capital cost of providing the medical genetics centre at Cardiff is £1,168,000, of which the Welsh Office contribution is £868,000.

Rates

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he proposes to lay the Rate Limitation (Designation of Authorities) (Exemption) (Wales) Order relating to the totals of relevant expenditure included in the Welsh rate support grant reports for 1986-87 and 1987-88.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The passage of the Local Government Finance Act 1987 has clarified the definition of total and relevant expenditure and enables me to make these orders. I propose to lay the first order shortly. The second order will be laid as soon as practicable thereafter. No local authority in Wales is subject to rate limitation in either 1986-87 or 1987-88.

Lucas Factory, Ystradgynlais

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will receive a deputation from the Lucas factory at Ystradgynlais in South Wales to discuss the proposed redundancies at the plant; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what measures he proposes to take to stimulate new employment in the Ystradgynlais area in the light of the redundancies proposed at the Lucas plant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: No redundancies have been announced at the Lucas Electrical factory at Ystradgynlais. All involved are working actively on possibilities to maintain employment. A meeting would not be appropriate. Mid Wales Development and my own Department are continually working to stimulate new employment in the area. I was particularly pleased to see the recent announcement by Clifford Williams and Son Ltd. of plans to double their work force at Ystradgynlais to 200 by the end of next year.

Radioactivity

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide a breakdown of expenditure to date relating to the costs in Wales of the Chernobyl accident in the following categories (i) farmers' compensation schemes, (ii) additional equipment purchased for monitoring purposes, (iii) additional staff time spent on radiation monitoring and administering the compensation scheme for farmers and (iv) additional staff time spent on informing the public on the Chernobyl accident and its effects.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The available information, at 28 April 1987, is as follows:

i. £2·64 million.

ii. Approximately £75,500 for the purchase of live monitoring equipment and for paint used in connection with the mark and release scheme. In addition approximately £240,000 has been spent on purchasing sheep for sampling purposes and in meeting the costs of the laboratory analysis to establish their levels of radiocaesium.

iii and iv. The information is not available in the form required.

Queen's Award

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many companies in Wales received the Queen's award (a) between 1975 and 1980 and (b) between 1980 and the latest available date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Welsh Office records show that the numbers of companies with factories in Wales which received the Queen's awards for exporting or technological achievement were as follows:

	Number
1975-80	22
1980-87	29

This double-counts the four awards in 1980.

YTS

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take the appropriate steps to investigate the financial operation of the YTS scheme administered by the Development Board for Rural Wales; why the scheme is to be transferred to the Mid Wales training unit; and if he will arrange for an independent audit into the scheme covering the period 1983 to 1987.

Mr. Wyn Roberts [pursuant to his reply, 9 April, c. 375]: Adequate audit arrangements already exist and I know of no reason for further financial investigation of the scheme. Any transfer to a new management would require the approval of the Manpower Services Commission, which has received no request for such approval.

Council housing

Mr. Coleman asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many new council houses were built in the financial year 1978-79 in (a) Wales and (b) Neath, respectively; and what was the corresponding position in the financial year 1986-87.

Mr. Mark Robinson [pursuant to his reply, 27 April]: The numbers of local authority dwellings completed in Wales in 1978-79 and 1986-87, (including completions by new town corporations), were 3,869 and 828 respectively. The corresponding figures for Neath are 137 and 28.

PRIME MINISTER

Unitary Taxation

Mr. Grylls asked the Prime Minister if she raised the subject of unitary taxation at her meeting with the Governor of California on Thursday 9 April; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The matter was discussed. I welcomed the progress which California had made, but said that we hoped the further steps needed to meet our concern would also be taken.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister what steps are taken to ensure that Ministers have sufficient contact with the Data Protection Registrar during the design stage of major Government computer projects which process large volumes of personal data.

The Prime Minister: Under section 38 of the Data Protection Act 1984, each Government Department is treated as separate from any other Government Department. It is accordingly for individual Ministers to decide how much contact they need to make with the Data Protection Registrar at the design stage of major computer projects for their department. The Data Protection Registrar welcomes close contacts with Departments in these matters at an early stage.

Civil Servants

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will publish in the Official Report the total numbers of full and part-time civil servants employed in each year since 1970 up to the most recent date for which figures are available, indicating in percentage terms the proportion that each figure represents of the total working population; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The figures are as in the following table:

Civil Servants in Great Britain

1 January dates	Full-time	[1]Part-time	Total Civil Service as a percentage of
			2 the employed labour force	3 working population
1970	686,600	28,100	2·9	2·9
1971	690,100	26,200	3·0	2·9
1972	688,100	27,600	3·0	2·9
1973	679,900	25,500	2·9	2·8
1974	680,800	27,100	2·9	2·8
1975	679,500	28,800	2·9	2·8
1976	729,200	31,800	3·1	3·0
1977	730,600	31,100	3·1	3·0
1978	722,900	30,100	3·1	2·9
1979	718,400	29,600	3·0	2·9
1980	693,200	28,800	2·9	2·8
1981	681,400	27,300	2·9	2·7
1982	662,800	25,200	2·9	2·6
1983	641,200	22,700	2·9	2·5
1984	622,000	21,200	2·8	2·4
1985	608,900	21,300	2·6	2·3
1986	584,200	24,700	2·5	2·2
1987	585,700	27,500	2·5	2·2

[1] Part-time staff are shown as whole units and are treated as such in the calculation of the column of percentages. The more usual practice for Civil Service manpower counts and targets is to treat them as half units.

[2] Figures for the employed labour force include employees, the self-employed and members of Her Majesty's Forces but exclude the unemployed. For all years Department of Employment estimates for the previous mid-December dates have been used.

[3] Figures for the working population represent the employed labour force plus the unemployed. Estimates for the previous mid-December dates have been used.

Note:

Machinery of Government changes affect the comparability of figures throughout the period shown. Details are given in the 1986 and earlier editions of Civil Service Statistics, copies of which are available in the House of Commons Library.

Citizenship Applications

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Prime Minister what has been the outcome of the examination of statements made by certain persons alleged to have been involved in war crimes following their arrival in the United Kingdom and subsequently when applying for citizenship.

The Prime Minister: Last month, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary invited the Simon Wiesenthal Centre to supply the evidence on which its list of alleged war criminals was based. Until this evidence is available to us, it will not be possible to tell whether it calls into question the truth of the statements to which the right hon. Member refers.

Northern Ireland (Terrorism)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Prime Minister what policy steps she intends to take to counteract the increasing violence and deaths caused by republican terrorism in Northern Ireland since 1 January; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend has already reviewed the present security situation with his advisers, including the Chief Constable and the General Officer Commanding and is urgently considering what further measures and resources may be necessary to reinforce the campaign against terrorism in Northern Ireland.

EMPLOYMENT

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Paymaster General what are the latest figures for the number of people who have had their claims for unemployment benefit suspended since the availability for work tests were introduced in (a) South Humberside, (b) Lincolnshire and (c) each unemployment office in these two areas.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Under long-standing legal rules adopted by successive Governments, it has always been the practice that, wherever a doubt arises as to whether a benefit claimant is available for work, payments are suspended until the independent statutory adjudicating authorities decide entitlement. Those rules have not been changed in recent years.

Deptford Skillcentre

Mr. Cartright asked the Paymaster General if he will set out the number of applicants waiting for each of the courses offered at the Deptford skillcentre at the most recent convenient date, together with the estimated waiting period in each case.

Mr. Trippier: The waiting period for skillcentre courses can vary depending on the length of the course, which can range from two to 52 weeks, and on whether it recruits as vacancies become available or by block entry, for example to meet particular examination dates set by external bodies. The latest available information for courses running at Deptford skillcentre in 1987-88 is as follows:

Class	Number on waiting list at 24 April	Estimated waiting period (months)
Bricklaying	28	8
Carpentry	60	12
Commercial Technology	36	3
Commercial Technology (Intermediate)	7	2
Group Electronics	9	5
Kitchen Fitting	15	5
Office Machinery	20	5
Painting and Decorating	50	12
Plastering	43	5
Plumbing	4	[1]
Screen Process Printing	26	7
Work Related Skills (Commercial)	47	4
Work Related Skills (Manual)	16	4

[1] This course requires a block entry of 12 trainees, so the waiting period cannot be estimated.

In addition to these, Deptford Skillcentre has been accepted as a managing agent for the new job training scheme, for which it expects an annual throughput of 1,200 trainees. Recruitment for the new scheme has just begun.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Paymaster General whether he will publish in the Official Report the number of employees covered by each column in tables 18.7 to 18.11 of the Monthly Digest of Statistics.

Mr. Lee: For industries within manufacturing industry at September 1986, the available information on the number of manual employees corresponding to tables 18.7 to 18.9 of the "Monthly Digest of Statistics" is shown in Table 1.10 of Employment Gazette, December 1986, a copy of which is in the Library.

Employment estimates for the nearest comparable industry groupings to those shown for the average earnings index in tables 18.10 and 18.11 of the "Monthly Digest of Statistics", at December 1986, are as follows:

Some of these estimates are subject to considerable estimation error due to the small number of employees in the industries concerned.

Unemployed Resource Centres

Mr. McKelvey asked the Paymaster General if he will place copies of the Manpower Services Commission internal memorandum concerning the withdrawal of funds from the unemployed resource centres in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The Manpower Services Commission has no internal memorandum on the withdrawal of funding from centres for the unemployed. All applications for the renewal of community programme projects, including those from centres for the unemployed, must meet normal community programme criteria.

Departmental Contracts

Mr. Mates asked the Paymaster General if he will list the contracts, with the subject of the assignment, awarded to management consultancy or accounting firms by his Department in 1986, with the name of the consultants concerned.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) on 18 February at column 611.

Job Training Scheme

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Paymaster General, pursuant to his answer of 10 April, Official Report, column 434, when he expects to be able to provide the relevant information on the job training scheme; and if he will consider publishing it in the Official Report.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Manpower Services Commission expects its area offices to have signed contracts with all new job training scheme managing agents by the end of May. Full details should be available at its head office by mid-June.

I will write to the hon. Member as soon as these details are available and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Textile and Clothing Industries

15. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next plans to meet the Trades Union Congress textile committee to discuss the future of the textile and clothing industries.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to a similar question of his on 10 December last. I have no plans at present to meet the Trades Union Congress textile committee.

Schools (Computers)

18. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the number of computers paid for by his Department in schools.

Mr. Butcher: Yes, Sir. My Department has made excellent progress towards the Government's objective of introducing and encouraging the use of computers in schools.

Since 1981, my Department's help towards the purchase of computers and related equipment by schools has included: Three Microcomputer in Schools schemes (June 1981-December 1984) whereby a total of £15·1 million was spent on providing 6,514 secondary schools and 27,407 primary schools with a half-price micro system plus monitor; in March of this year, a grant of £3·5 million allocated to local education authorities and the independent sector, which resulted in the purchase of over 2,000 computers in addition to other peripheral IT equipment. Assistance to enhance the capabilities of existing computers has included: the Support for Educational Software scheme with £3·5 million funding over three years (1985-86 to 1987-88) which encourages the purchase of additional software; and in March 1986 the Modems in Schools scheme, under which every middle and secondary school received a free modem to give them access to national databases.

Airbus

38. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on Government support for Airbus.

Mr. Pattie: Discussions with British Aerospace about its combined application for launch aid in respect of the Airbus A330 and A340 projects are continuing. We aim to reach a decision as soon as possible and an announcement to the House will be made thereafter.

Insider Dealing

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he has taken on information so far received from the inspectors appointed by him to inquire into insider dealing at the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Howard: I have received no information from the inspectors which calls for action on my part.

Steel Industry

22. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evidence is available to him that other steel producers in the European Economic Community are receiving state subsidies for steel production.

Mr. Giles Shaw: None. Almost all forms of state aid for steel have been banned since 1 January 1986 by unanimous decision of the Council of Ministers, and with my encouragement the Commission has been keeping a vigilant watch since then.

Regional Aid

23. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to review the current criteria for regional aid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I have no such plans.

Japan

24. Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress he has achieved in securing wider access for British exports to the Japanese market.

Mr. Channon: In the year ending February 1987, the United Kingdom visible trade deficit with Japan was £3.8 billion. Some progress has been made. I am glad to say that in 1986 United Kingdom visible exports to Japan increased by 18 per cent. to £1.2 billion.

30. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the value, for the most recent 12 months, of motor car exports to Japan; and what is the comparable figure for imports from that country.

Mr. Butcher: Motor car exports to Japan for the 12 months ending February this year amounted to £24 million; for the same period imports were £817 million.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will introduce forthwith an increase of 40 per cent. in the duty of Japanese leather imports to the United Kingdom;

(2) what action he intends to take in relation to the situation regarding Japanese leather exports to the United Kingdom being subject to duties not exceeding 7 per cent. compared with a tariff of 60 per cent. placed on almost all leather exports to Japan.

Mr. Alan Clark: Tariffs are a matter for the Community as a whole. The Government continue to seek better market access abroad for British exports rather than to reduce imports. With our Community partners we have made clear to the Japanese Government our concern about excessive protection by Japan of its leather industry. We look to Japan to make early and substantial improvements in existing arrangements, to the benefit of British and other Community exporters.

Manufactured Goods

25. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to what factors he attributes the decline in the United Kingdom's share of manufactured exports and the trend of the United Kingdom's export performance in comparison with other European manufacturing nations.

Mr. Pattie: Our share of world exports of manufactured goods reflects a variety of factors including both price and non-price competitiveness and the geographical and commodity composition of our exports. United Kingdom exports of manufactures were again at record levels last year since 1981 the United Kingdom volume share of main manufacturing countries' exports of manufactures has been maintained, halting years of decline.

33. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next intends to meet the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the trade deficit in manufactured goods.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend meets the CBI regularly at the National Economic Development Council and on other occasions. At present he has no plans for a special meeting on this subject.

50. Mr. Cunliffe asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will indicate the nature and size of the current deficit in the balance of trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Giles Shaw: In the first two months of 1987, there was a deficit in trade in manufactures of £0·5 billion.

Children's Nightwear

26. Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the value of imported children's nightwear; how many tests for flammability were carried out on such garments in the last year for which statistics are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The total value of imported nightwear in 1986 was £37·3 million. Children's nightwear is not separately identified in the overseas trade statistics.

The 1967 regulations, which remained in force until 28 February 1987, required only children's nightdresses to pass a fammability test. No information is available on the number of tests carried out by suppliers for assessing the flammability of the material or by local authority trading standards departments for enforcing the regulations.

Cars (Local Content)

27. Mr. Dickens asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the level of local content and United Kingdom sourcing by multinational car manufacturers based in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Butcher: There is clear evidence of welcome improvements, both actual and planned, in the levels of local content and local sourcing achieved by the multinational car producers, but the Government always want to see them do more.

United States of America

28. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the balance of trade with the United States of America was in 1986.

Mr. Butcher: In 1986, our exports to the United States were worth £10 billion, compared with imports of £8 billion. There was thus a crude balance in our favour of some £2 billion.

Research and Development

29. Mr. Clelland asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next intends to meet the National Economic and Development Council to discuss research and development funding.

Mr. Pattie: My right hon. Friend attended the meeting of the National Economic Development Council on 1 April at which industrial innovation, including funding for research and development, was discussed.

I expect that the council will discuss this subject at future meetings in view of its importance for the improvement of industrial competitiveness.

Manufacturing Technology

31. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received with regard to advanced manufacturing technology; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: My Department receives advice on a continuing basis from the Advanced Manufacturing Technology Committee, which also has responsibilities towards the Science and Engineering Research Council. The committee has recently provided advice on a number of topics. These included the IT86 report on information technology and the Department's priorities for expenditure on science and technology in the field of manufacturing. The Department's officials also have a continuing dialogue on advance manufacturing technology with a wide range of organisations, including institutions and industrial companies.

Merchant Shipbuilding

32. Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the prospects for the merchant shipbuilding industry.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The market for merchant shipbuildings remains highly competitive but the success of British Shipbuilders in China, which will be most welcome to the hon. Member's constituents, shows that we mean what we say about giving all the support we can in the battle for new orders.

National Quality Campaign

34. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress of the national quality campaign.

Mr. Butcher: Since its launch in April in 1983, the campaign has reached over 50,000 firms. There are now around 9,000 entries in the latest edition of the "Register of Quality Assessed United Kingdom Companies". It is clear that more and more firms are adopting a companywide approach to quality which is vital to their competitiveness. The progress must be maintained, however, and the commitment of all sectors of industry and commerce to quality in the goods and services they provide is essential. The campaign is being extended, for example, on a regional basis and a quality activity programme is planned for the slough area later in the year.

European Technical and Research Collaboration

35. Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on European technical and research collaboration.

Mr. Pattie: I believe that European technical and research collaboration can play an important role in improving the technological base and competitive position of United Kingdom industry.

My Department therefore supports specific collaborative activities where there is clear added value to United Kingdom industry in doing so. This is demonstrated by the importance we attach to, for example, the European Space Agency, ESPRIT and EUREKA.

Manufacturing Investment

36. Mr. Blair asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his latest estimate of the fall in the real value of manufacturing investment in the north since 1979.

Mr. Giles Shaw: When the world recession hit a sector suffering from poor competitiveness, resulting from years of high inflation, low productivity growth and poor rates of return on investment, there was a sharp fall in manufacturing investment, which continued up to 1982. Since that date, with industry becoming more competitive and better adapted to the demands of a modern economy, investment in the north has steadily increased. Excluding leased assets, for which no regional data are available, manufacturing investment in the north fell from £613 million in 1979 to £256 million in 1982 and rose to £403 million in 1985 at 1979 prices.

General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade

37. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress in the current general agreement on tariffs and trade round.

Mr. Butcher: The Uruguay round is scheduled to take four years from its launch last September. The various negotiating groups have completed their initial series of meetings and further work will be done during 1987 on defining problems and proposing solutions to them. Negotiations on detailed proposals will begin in 1988.

Manufacturing Industry

21. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans the Government have to increase investment in manufacturing industry this year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Investment decisions are for industry. The best stimulants are confidence in the future and the prospects of good profits. Our sound economic policies, which have brought sustained growth in the economy, improved profitability and low inflation, are the best guarantees of favourable conditions for further investment.

39. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next intends to meet the Trades Union Congress to discuss investment in manufacturing industry.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. Friend meets the TUC regularly at the National Economic Development Council, where matters relevant to improving industrial performance are discussed. I have no plans for a separate meeting on the subject, but I met the steel committee representatives on Thursday 26 February.

40. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the most recent figure for output in manufacturing industry; and how this compares with the figure for the same month 13 years ago.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The hon. Member will appreciate that monthly data can be erratic. However, since the trough of the recession in 1981, manufacturing output has increased by over 15 per cent. to reach a level of 107·6 in February 1987, based on 1980 equal to 100. This was about 1½ per cent. lower than the level of output in February 1974.

41. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the current level of investment in manufacturing industry.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Investment in manufacturing industry was nearly 20 per cent. higher in 1986 than in 1983. The underlying determinants of manufacturing investment—sustained growth in the economy, improved profitability and a low rate of inflation—are very favourable, and forecasters expect a further significant increase in manufacturing investment in 1987.

Protectionism

42. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the effects on the United Kingdom economy of trade protectionism.

Mr. Alan Clark: Protectionism is a short-range and essentially short-term response to economic and international trade developments and it undermines the open world trade system created by GATT rules. It must be distinguished from protection, which can be legitimate and operated fairly. Governments have social, economic and political priorities which require the protection of some types of economic activity, and this is recognised by GATT. Protectionism raises prices, reduces choice and encourages an inefficient allocation of resources. Were it to proliferate, it could weaken world trade and damage prospects for world economic growth, including the growth of the United Kingdom economy.

Share Dealing

43. Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many prosecutions have been undertaken since 1979 under part VI of the Companies Act for the organisation of a concert party.

53. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many prosecutions have been undertaken since 1979 under part VI of the Companies Act for the organisation of a concert party.

Mr. Howard: None.

USSR

44. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the latest prospects for Anglo-Soviet trade.

Mr. Butcher: During her visit to Moscow, the Prime Minister agreed with Soviet Prime Minister Ryzhkov to work together to achieve by 1990 a volume of 2·5 billion roubles in our bilateral trade, which would mean a 40 per cent. increase in rouble terms. A good start has been made towards this target, with contracts and letters of intent worth nearly £400 million signed during or since the visit. Officials of the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Trade are in London this week for discussions about the development of our trade. Despite the low oil price, which limits the Soviet Union's purchasing power, I believe there is now a good prospect of considerable growth in two-way trade over the next few years.

Steel Industry

45. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he is taking to ensure that any renewal of the quota system for the steel industry within the European Economic Community will be followed by the provision of the same level of national and official support for the industry in the United Kingdom as in the other member states.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Whether or not the production quota system is renewed, it is essential that the Commission vigorously enforces the strict code banning almost all state aids for the steel industry which was introduced on 1 January 1986 with the unanimous support of the Council of Ministers. The British steel industry does of course have my full support.

Exports

46. Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the value of total exports won with the assistance of aid and trade provision since 1979.

Mr. Butcher: Since 1 January 1979, orders for £2·1 billion-worth of United Kingdom exports have been won with the assistance of £460 million under the aid and trade provision.

Industrial Prospects

47. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met the president of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the prospects for British industry.

Mr. Channon: I met the president of the Confederation of British Industry at a meeting of the National Economic Development Council on 1 April, where a number of matters related to the prospects for British industry were discussed.

Guinness plc

48. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has received any representations from the inspectors appointed by him to inquire into the affairs of Guinness requesting more resources.

52. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has received any representations from the inspectors appointed by him to inquire into the affairs of Guinness requesting more resources.

Mr. Howard: No. In accordance with usual practice in company investigations, the inspectors are using support staff from the accountant inspector's firm. There are no contraints on resources in the investigation, either in terms of money or manpower.

Efficiency and Productivity

49. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's present position in the efficiency and productivity leagues of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries.

Mr. Butcher: The United Kingdom's productivity growth in manufacturing industry has been the fastest of all major OECD countries since 1979 and the prospects for further growth are excellent. This compares with the period 1973 to 1979 when the United Kingdom was at the bottom of the productivity growth league.

Telecommunications Equipment

51. Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress he has made in pursuit of collaborative and marketing arrangements for British telecommunications equipment manufacturers.

Mr. Pattie: The initiatives for such commercial arrangements must lie with companies. The role for Government is in support of their efforts. To this end my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has met many of his European counterparts. I am encouraged by the number of companies successfully developing arrangements of this kind.

South Korea (Scotch Whisky)

54. Mr. Pollock asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he proposes to take to secure the removal of trade barriers against the sale of bottled-in-Scotland Scotch whisky throughout South Korea.

Mr. Butcher: We will continue to press the Korean Government, bilaterally and with our European partners, for the early removal of restrictions on imports of bottled-in-Scotland Scotch whisky.

Inward Investment

19. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he takes to ensure that policies to encourage inward investment are carried out in co-ordination with the policies on promoting United Kingdom industries at home and abroad.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Successive Governments have encouraged inward investment for the benefits it brings to the economy. Applications for selective assistance for inward investment projects are assessed against the same criteria as domestic projects. One important factor in this assessment is the impact which the new investment will have on firms already established in the same sector.

Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who many jobs were created by inward investment into the United Kingdom in 1986.

Mr. Butcher: The Invest in Britain Bureau recorded 322 investment decisions taken by overseas companies during 1986. From the information provided by the companies themselves, these decisions are expected to create more than 16,500 new jobs and safeguard over 9,500 others. Further information is available from the Invest in Britain Bureau's annual report, copies of which I will place in the Library of the House.

SCOTLAND

Western Infirmary, Glasgow (Renal Unit)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the representations he has received from the western district Greater Glasgow health board local health council over the renal unit at the Western infirmary, Glasgow, about which the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill wrote to him on 31 March.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and learned Friend has received no representations from the greater Glasgow west local health council on this matter. The local health council has made a submission to a panel of inquiry set by the greater Glasgow health board and, as my noble Friend the Minister of State explained in his reply of 23 April to the hon. Member's letter, it would not be appropriate for Ministers to comment on that submission.

Radioactivity

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to publish a further bulletin with the results of the official monitoring for environmental radioactivity in Scotland.

Mr. Ancram: Scottish Development Department statistical bulletin Number 1(e) 1987 ("Environmental Monitoring for Radioactivity in Scotland: 1981-1985") was published today and copies have been placed in the Library.

Shotgun Certificates

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now undertake a review of the present requirements for applications for new shotgun certificates.

Mr. Lang: No.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the statistics for each police authority in Scotland for each year since 1979 showing the number of assaults reported when the victim of the crime was over retirement age in absolute numbers and expressed as per thousand head of population in the police authority area, together with the percentage clear-up rate of these crimes in each area.

Mr. Lang: This information is not available.

Agency Nursing

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to furnish information, similar to that available to the Department of Health and Social Security in England and Wales, concerning the total expenditures by each health board on agency nursing to fill staff shortages.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers of agency nurses employed by the Health Service in Scotland are very small. Over the quarter to 30 September 1986, the total hours worked by agency nurses equated to 145 whole-time equivalent staff, this being about 0·4 per cent. of total qualified nursing staff. In view of these numbers, the considerable effort to collect the expenditure information requested cannot be justified.

Forestry

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many forestry grant scheme applications are currently being considered which affect land within Caithness and Sutherland; and if he will list them and the hectarage involved.

Mr. John MacKay: The Forestry Commission is currently considering 28 such applications, as follows:

Name of Property	Area (Hectares)
Forestry Grant Scheme
Cnoc Moine Na Caillin	284·4
Braelangwell	629·7
Limekiln and Whitewell	1,431·5
Torrish	220·1

Airdens-Innish	0·8
Migdale Mill Farm	1·6
Strathmore Lodge Woods	0·7
Forss House	1·3
Ackergill Woods	1·3
Cnoc Bacach	9·8

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total area of land which was referred to the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland by the Forestry Commission under forestry grant consultation procedures during the years ended 31 March 1986 and 31 March 1987; and if he will list in the Official Report by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland area offices, the area of land in relation to which the Department advised it was (a) acceptable to award forestry grant and (b) inappropriate to offer grant on agricultural grounds.

Mr. John MacKay: During the period 1 April 1986 to 31 March 1987, a total of 49,895 hectares of land was referred to the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland by the Forestry Commission under the procedures for consultation on forestry grant scheme applications. The detailed information requested is as follows:

Area Ofice	Area Referred (in hectares)	Area Cleared (in hectares)	Area Not Cleared (in hectares)
Aberdeen	675	593	82
Ayr	9,027	8,153	874
Galashiels	2,767	1,921	846
Dumfries	7,010	6,085	925
Dundee	678	602	76
Edinburgh	768	669	99
Glasgow	6,020	5,708	312

Stirling	4,245	2,221	2,024
Thurso	6,045	5,774	271
Total	49,895	43,676	6,219

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the total areas of land which the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland advised the Forestry Commission were acceptable for award of forestry grant aid in each of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland area offices in each of the LCA classes 4, 5 and 6 in the year commencing 1 April 1986.

Mr. John MacKay: I regret that this information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will instruct the Foresty Commission (a) formally to acknowledge and respond to all comments or objections from statutory consultees over applications for forestry grant aid, and (b) inform statutory consultees of the outcome of all applications it has commented upon; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: In order to keep down administrative costs, it is the Forestry Commission's normal practice only to acknowledge or respond to comments or objections from statutory authorities consulted over forestry grant applications when there are issues which need to be resolved in discussion with the authorities concerned. The commission always informs authorities of the outcome of the application in such circumstances, as it does in other cases if requested to do so. I do not see any need to instruct the commission to change this fair and reasonable procedure.

Parole Policy

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has now completed his consideration of the implications for Scotland of the European Court of Human Rights' judgment in the case of Robert Weekes and the English High Court judgment in the case of Brian Handscomb; and what changes in parole policy he now intends to implement.

Mr. Rifkind: The Divisional Court judgment in the case of Handscomb and others was critical of certain aspects of the arrangements in England and Wales for setting the date of the first formal review by the parole board machinery for those cases in which a life senntence is not mandatory. The arrangements which operate in Scotland are rather different and do not appear to be open to the same criticism. I shall, however, consider what implications the judgment may have for our system, in the light of the conclusions on which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has announced that he will make a statement shortly.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has also announced today his decision in the case of Mr. Robert Malcolm Weekes, who was also subject to a discretionary life sentence. I shall be considering further with my right hon. Friend the implications of the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in this case for our domestic law, and shall review Scottish practice in the light of this judgment, which does not refer to life sentence prisoners in general.

Health Service (Contracts)

Mr. Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of all contracts which have been put out to public tender since 1983 in the Health Service, together with any resulting savings.

Mr. John MacKay: Details provided by Scottish health boards and the Common Service Agency of contracts which have been put out to public tender since 1983 to end 1986 and estimates of resulting savings where these could be calculated are given in the table below:

Health Board/CSA	Total number of contracts let	Savings over previous costs £000's
Ayrshire and Arran	8	61
Borders	1	41
Fife	2	19
Forth Valley	2	8
Lanarkshire	2	29
Tayside	8	283
CSA	5	18
Scotland Total	28	459

Speed Limits

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland in what circumstances he will prevent a local transport authority from imposing a speed limit when the proposal meets his own environmental and accident criteria.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend never refuses consent for a speed limit if he is satisfied that the relevant criteria are fully met.

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what weight he attaches to the recommendations of the relevant chief constable that a speed limit should be imposed upon a particular stretch of road.

Mr. Ancram: The chief constable's view is one of several factors which are taken into account when determining whether consent should be given to the imposition of a speed limit.

Prisons

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether reports have been received from Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons for Scotland on Barlinnie prison, Barlinnie special unit and social work units in Scottish prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: I have received reports by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons for Scotland on his inspections of Barlinnie prison, Barlinnie special unit and social work units in Scottish prisons. I have today placed copies of the reports in the Library, together with my responses, and I am sending a copy to the Member in whose constituency the establishments are located; to the Chairman of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs and the Chairman of the Scottish All-Party Penal Affairs Group and to other interested bodies. Copies may also be purchased from my Department.

AIDS

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what research proposals his Department has received for studies into the relationship between drug abuse and AIDS and HIV infection in Edinburgh and Lothian region, and into the transmission of HIV infection to babies; and what response his Department has made to those proposals to date.

Mr. John MacKay: The Scottish Home and Health Department has received, and is at present funding, five research projects costing in total £160,000 relevant to the relationship between drug abuse and AIDS and HIV infection. The Department has received one application relating to the transmission of HIV infection to babies for which funding was not recommended by the Chief Scientist's biomedical research committee on the grounds of scientific merit.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he has taken to ensure that staff of his Department are warned about those homosexual and other activities which are deemed to involve a high risk of AIDS infection.

Mr. Rifkind [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 383]: In June 1986 the staff of my Department were issued with comprehensive guidance on AIDS which was based on material provided to all departments by the Management and Personnel Office and the Civil Service Occupational Health Service. Further guidance, based on the Department of Employment-Health and Safety Executive booklet "AIDS and Employment", is currently being prepared for issue to staff.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether any current or former staff of his Department have been found to have developed AIDS or antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Rifkind [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 383]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on Wednesday 22 April.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any plans to arrange for staff of his Department to be screened for antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Rifkind [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 383]: No.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Tied Cottages

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications by landlords for repossession under the terms of the Rent (Agriculture) Act 1976, of an agricultural tied cottage there have been since the Act came into force; and how many alleged offences under section 28(11) and 28(14) of that Act there have been, together with details of the number of prosecutions subsequently brought, and the average fine imposed.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Dialysis Treatment

Mr. Tom Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if there are any plans for the inmate of Wandsworth prison now receiving dialysis treatment to be given a kidney transplant;

(2) for how long the present private dialysis treatment now being given to an inmate of Wandsworth prison is planned to last;

(3) how many prison officers escort the inmate from Wandsworth prison for dialysis treatment; how many hours are involved in this work per week; and what is the total cost;

(4) who gave permission for an inmate at Wandsworth prison to receive private dialysis treatment; what is the weekly cost of this treatment; and who is responsible for paying it.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Association of Chief Police Officers (Legislative Guidelines)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines have been issued by the Association of Chief Police Officers on the Public Order Act and the Police and Criminal Evidence Act; and if he will arrange for copies to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am not aware of any guidelines issued on these Acts by the Association of Chief Police Officers, although the association has produced forms for use in connection with procedures required by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Guidance on the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 has been issued by the Home Office in circulars 88/1985 (which has the ACPO forms as an appendix) and circular 89/1985; and on the Public Order Act 1986 in circulars 77/1986 and 11/1987. Copies are in the Library.

Police Officers (Lost Hours)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate for each of the last 10 years the numbers of police hours lost by officers (a) attending criminal courts on days when the cases did not call in court, (b) when the accused person changed his or her plea or (c) when the prosecution deserted the case.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I regret that the information from which any such estimates might be made is not available.

Crime Prevention

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about Her Majesty's Government's crime prevention initiatives; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We receive a steady flow of correspondence about our crime prevention initiatives, which demonstrates a high level of public interest. My hon. Friend's letter of 13 April is one example. That letter proposed the early promulgation of results of our local crime prevention project in Bolton and that the lessons learnt should be put into practice promptly. I welcome my hon. Friend's continued support for this project and shall write to him shortly.

Parole

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has now completed his consideration of the judgments of the High Court in the case of Brian Handscomb and the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Robert Weekes; and what changes in parole policy he now intends to implement.

Mr. Hurd: The Divisional court judgment in the case of Handscomb and others, delivered on 2 March, upheld the lawfulness of the policy for the release of life sentence prisoners announced in reply to a question by the hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) on 30 November 1983. Indeed, it described that policy as unassailable. The judgment was, however, critical of certain aspects of the application of that policy in relation to the setting of the date of the first formal review by the Parole Board machinery of those cases in which a life sentence is imposed at the discretion of the trial judge, that is, for offences other than murder (for which the life sentence is mandatory). I am discussing with the Lord Chief Justice the arrangements necessary to take account of the judgment and I shall make a full statement shortly. The case of one of the applicants, Mr. Brian Handscomb, is now being reviewed by the Parole Board machinery in accordance with the relief offered to him by the Divisional court.

Robert Malcolm Weekes was sentenced to life imprisonment in 1966, at the age of 17, having pleaded guilty to a number of offences, including armed robbery. This offence was committed in a pet shop, using a starting pistol loaded with blank cartridges. He stole the equivalent of 35p, which he dropped as he left. The trial judge said that he regarded Mr. Weekes as a very dangerous young man and explained that he regarded a wholly indeterminate sentence as appropriate so that the Secretary of State could release him when he had become responsible. The sentence was upheld by the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Weekes was released from prison in March 1976 and recalled in June 1977, having behaved in such a way as to suggest that he represented a potential danger to others and to himself. He was released again in October 1982 and further detained in April 1985, because he had been out of touch with the probation officer supervising him under the terms of his life licence. He was released in September 1985.

Mr. Weekes' application to the European Commission of Human Rights related to his recall to prison in 1977 and his continued detention. He alleged a breach of article 5, paragraph 1, of the European convention on human rights, which provides that no one shall be deprived of his liberty save in prescribed circumstances, such as lawful detention after conviction by a competent court, and in accordance with a procedure prescribed by law. He also alleged a breach of article 5, paragraph 4, which provides that everyone who is deprived of his liberty by arrest or detention shall be entitled to take proceedings by which the lawfulness of his detention shall be decided speedily by a court and his release ordered if the detention is not lawful. The Commission, having reported on the case in December 1984, referred it to the European Court of Human Rights. The court delivered judgment on 2 March and found that there had been no breach of article 5, paragraph 1, and that Mr. Weekes' detention had been lawful. However, the court found that there had been a breach of article 5, paragraph 4, in the circumstances of Mr. Weekes' case.

The court's judgment accepts that, for the purposes of article 5, paragraphs 1 and 4 of the convention, where a life sentence is imposed because of the gravity of the offence, supervision of the lawfulness of detention, including any subsequent decision to recall the prisoner following release on licence, is incorporated at the outset in the original trial and appeal. On the other hand, it suggests that different considerations may apply where it is apparent that a life sentence has been passed, not so much as punishment, but primarily so that the indeterminate sentence enables the offender's progress to be monitored so that he can be released when it is safe to do so. This distinction is not recognised in our law, and the court itself observed that it may be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to disentangle elements underlying a particular sentence and to determine which of those elements was accorded more importance by the sentencing judge.

However, the court found that

"the clearly stated purpose for which Mr Weekes' sentence was imposed, taken together with the particular facts pertaining to the offence for which he was convicted . . . places the sentence in a special category";

one in which the lawfulness both of the continuing detention and the recall of the prisoner following release on licence must be subject to review by a body with the powers of a court. The court found that the current review procedures of the Parole Board did not fulfil the necessary requirements of the convention in that respect.

I agree with the court's view that the circumstances of the offence of which Mr. Weekes was convicted make his a highly exceptional case. We have no domestic review procedure which fulfils what the court decided were the requirements of article 5, paragraph 4, in his case. Moreover, I am satisfied that there is no evidence that Mr. Weekes now represents a danger to the public such as was the concern of the trial judge over 20 years ago. In these quite exceptional circumstances I have decided that it would be right to recommend Her Majesty to remit the remainder of Mr. Weekes' life sentence. This will have the effect that he will no longer be liable to supervision or recall to custody.

We shall consider the implications of the relevant provisions of the convention for domestic law and practice in the light of this judgment, which does not, however, apply to life sentence prisoners in general. The "Special Category" into which the European Court concluded that the case of Mr. Weekes fell is in any view strictly limited.

Waltham Forest (Meeting)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Metropolitan Police Commissioner on the meeting held outside Waltham Forest town hall on the evening of 9 April, in particular as to whether any charges have been brought in relation to any of the speeches on the grounds that they allegedly transgressed the law on racial abuse, constituted incitement to racial harassment or incitement to violence.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner that this was a peaceful meeting attended by over 5,000 people and that no one present has been charged.

Police Station, Oakham

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Department has now received the letter dated 1 April from Mr. Robert Angrave, chairman of the Leicestershire police committee, regarding the provision of a new police station in Oakham; and what response he intends to make to it.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In reply to his letter of 1 April, we informed the chairman of the Leicestershire police committee that, as I told my hon. Friend on 5 March, at column 1021, we hope to be able to give approval next year for work on the new Oakham police station to start in 1991-92.

Metropolitan Police (First Aid)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements are being made for future first aid training for police officers within the Metropolitan police area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that all officers obtain the St. John Ambulance certificate during their initial training. Uniformed sergeants and constables then have a two-day course every three years until they have completed 22 years service. Officers working on some specialist duties receive additional training. There are no plans at present to extend this, but first-aid training is kept constantly under review.

Waltham Forest (Petrol Bomb Attack)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the petrol bomb attack on 10 April on the home of the leader of Waltham Forest council, dealing, inter alia, with the question whether there was any connection between this event and the demonstration held on the previous evening outside Waltham Forest town hall.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am informed by the Commissioner that the police investigation has not revealed any such connection. The person or persons responsible for this attack have not so far been traced.

Women's Rights

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the ministerial group on women's issues has completed its review of the Government's response to the forward looking strategies for the advancement of women drawn up at the Nairobi conference which marked the end of the United Nations decade for women.

Mr. Waddington: The ministerial group has completed its review and I am placing copies of the group's report in the Library.

During the course of the review we looked at all areas of policy covered by the forward looking strategies, and the report brings together a great deal of information which will be helpful to women and their representatives organisations. We shall be making copies of the report widely available.

The report demonstrates that our policies fully comply with the spirit of the forward looking strategies, and indicates the strength of our commitment to equality of opportunity between men and women. We shall maintain our commitment and continue to develop our policies in the light of the goals laid down in the forward looking strategies.

ENVIRONMENT

Community Charge

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the likely level of the community charge in north-west England.

Dr. Boyson: Since we published illustrative community charge figures on 1 April we have received three representations about the likely level of the community charge in north-west England.

Rate Capping (Ealing)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will announce whether Ealing council is to be rate-capped in 1988.

Dr. Boyson: In line with the usual timetable, my right hon. Friend expects to make an announcement about selective rate limitation for 1988-89 in July.

Sewers

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has regarding the number of sewer collapses in the area covered by each water authority since 1979.

Mr. John Patten: The main sources of information on sewer collapses and other failures since 1979 are: a series of reports produced by the water research centre covering the period 1981-1985; and summary information in water authorities' corporation plans. The WRC survey indicated that the total number of failures requiring excavation in England and Wales is running at between 4,000 and 8,000 per year and that over half of these were collapses.

Figures of significant sewer failures for 1985-86, as given in plans, are as follows:

	Numbers
Anglian	290
North West	1,140
Northumbrian	230
Severn Trent	420
South West	220
Southern	510
Thames	650
Wessex	280
Yorkshire	1,340

Figures for earlier years were provided in an answer to the hon. Member for Newcastle-upon-Tyne, North (Mr. Brown) on 15 January 1986, but because of varying and improving reporting methods, caution is at present needed in making any comparisons between authorities or over time.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to review his policy on the extension of enterprise zones.

Mr. John Patten: We expect soon to receive a report from consultants commissioned to conduct a survey on the enterprise zone experiment. We will consider whether to review our policy in the light of that respect.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report those local authorities which have requested consideration for (a) a new enterprise zone and (b) an extension to an existing enterprise zone.

Mr. John Patten: Since the announcement of the choice of present zone authorities, the following have been received from English local authorities:

(a) Requests to extend existing enterprise zones
- Burnley borough council
- Hartlepool
- Middlesbrough borough council
- Rossendale borough council
- Rotherham metropolitan borough council
- Wellingborough council
- Wrekin council

(b) Request for new enterprise zones
- Camborne town council
- Canterbury city council
- Dover district council
- Kettering borough council
- Shepway district council
- Thanet district council

"Paying for Local Government"

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many responses he has received on the Green Paper, "Paying for Local Government".

Dr. Boyson: One thousand, two hundred and seventeen responses were received before the consultation period ended on 31 October 1986. A summary of responses has been placed in the Library. We continue to receive representations about our detailed proposals.

Urban Development Corporations

Mr. Spencer Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on what criteria he selects areas for the creation of urban development corporations.

Mr. John Patten: The criteria adopted have been the level of unemployment, the amount of derelict-vacant land and the extent to which public sector funds will lever private sector investment to regenerate the area.

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to create any urban development corporations in the Yorkshire and Humberside region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: No, but the suggestion is firmly lodged with me.

Acid Rain

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the latest figures from Warren Spring laboratory on acidic deposition in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. An analysis of measurements made in the period 1981-1985 will shortly be published in the second report from the review group on acid rain. Results for 1986 from the Department's national acid rain network are now being analysed by Warren Spring laboratory and will be published later this year.

Sulphur Emissions

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 17 December 1986, Official Report, column 1192, about sulphur emissions, what will be the total cost of reducing sulphur emissions to 70 per cent. of their 1980 level; how this will be done; what other harmful chemicals are present in emissions from power stations; and what measures are being considered, and at what cost, to remove these chemicals.

Mr. Waldegrave: The cost will depend critically on the future level of energy demand. To help ensure that we meet this goal, despite an increase in energy consumption associated with higher economic growth, we have authorised the CEGB to retrofit three power stations with flue gas desulphurisation equipment, at an estimated capital cost of £780 million. All new coal-fired power stations will be fitted with such equipment, or whatever better technology is available, to the requirements of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution. In the meantime, the CEGB and British Coal continue to research other cleaner methods of burning coal, including the development of pressurised fluidised bed combustion.

Other substances emitted to air in significant quantities from power stations include nitrogen oxides, hydrogen chloride and particulates. Particulate emissions have for many years been subject to stringent controls achieved, in the case of coal-fired plant, through the use of electrostatic precipitators. HMIP is currently consulting the industry on future standards for acid gas and particulate emissions from large burners and furnaces. The results of full-scale trials of low NOx burners now taking place at two existing power stations, Fiddlers Ferry and Eggborough, are also being evaluated by the CEGB.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures are currently being undertaken to reduce the discharge to the sea of radioactive waste from Sellafield; when these measures will be completed; and what will be the total cost involved.

Mr. Waldegrave: British Nuclear Fuels plc has a site development programme for the further reduction of the radioactive content of liquid discharges from Sellafield by the early 1990s.

This programme includes additional treatment of effluent streams and the construction of the enhanced actinide removal plant. During the last six years about £200 million has been spent on installations such as the site ion exchange extraction plant and the salt evaporator designed to reduce the radioactive content of discharges. BNFL will spend a further £500 million during the next six years.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why, further to his answer of 6 April, Official Report, column 29, he does not consider it appropriate to release details of sites considered for the disposal of low-level nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: It would cause unnecessary anxiety in the communities concerned.

Southern Water Authority

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received responses from the Southern water authority and the six water companies concerned, to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on water supply in the Southern water authority area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The Commission's report has been studied carefully by Southern Water and the six water companies. The MMC, while giving a clean bill of health of the quality of service provided, and concluding that Southern Water is on the whole effectively managed and compares well with the general run of public sector bodies", drew attention to a number of areas where management could be improved, particularly by the companies. Southern and the six companies broadly accept these overall conclusions although they show rather greater enthusiasm for some of the MMC's individual recommendations than others.

I note that Southern Water has now completed its review of its service standards and target levels of compliance as suggested by the MMC. However, I think it does need to continue to follow up the MMC recommendations on the development of its project appraisal techniques and on the management of capital projects, management information systems, and arrangements for consumer representation.

I welcome the generally positive attitude the companies have taken to the criticisms the MMC made on the way they ran their operations. They are setting more precise targets for meeting service standards and for operating costs. I like too the progress they are making to develop their corporate planning. The MMC mentioned incomplete or insufficient application of investment appraisal techniques by the companies. The companies are clearly doing something to remedy that.

I shall be following up the responses Southern and the companies have made, and will expect a second response from them on action they have taken and results achieved in the autumn. I have placed their first responses in the Library.

Palace Chambers, Bridge Street

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, when the demolition of Palace Chambers, Bridge Street, will be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Demolition has now been completed down to first-floor level. This has removed the danger from overstressing of the supporting structure which had necessitated early demolition of the building. I propose to retain what remains temporarily, and to allow shops to continue trading on the ground floor, while plans for a new building are under consideration.

Slum Clearance Subsidy

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has made to the efficiency scrutiny of slum clearance subsidy carried out in 1986.

Mr. Patten: I have placed in the Library a copy of the action plan containing our responses to the scrutiny and its recommendations. The scrutiny reported on the effectiveness of slum clearance subsidy as a policy instrument and identified the main issue as how to encourage good decisions at local level about clearance and renovation of very poor housing. In the action plan, we have accepted the key findings of the scrutiny. In particular we agree the importance of an area-based approach, with systematic review of all the options and the involvement of the private and voluntary sectors wherever possible. We propose to pilot test the approach to neighbourhood renewal assessment suggested and to consider what advice we can give to local authorities in the meantime on the renewal of private housing within the present financial and legislative system.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 8 April, Official Report, column 257, whether he will publish in the Official Report (a) figures on the same basis for the metropolitan districts and (b) figures on the same basis for the London boroughs excluding rate support grant for the metropolitan police from both years.

Mr. Chope: I shall answer this question shortly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members (Allowances)

Mr. Forth asked the Lord Privy Seal whether he will publish the Top Salaries Review Body report about Members' secretarial, research and office equipment allowances; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: The Top Salaries Review Body report about the secretarial, research and office equipment allowance for Members and the allowance for peers' secretarial costs, postage and certain additional expenses and the secretarial allowance for Ministers and other paid office holders in the House of Lords is published today. Copies are now available in the Vote Office. The Government are grateful to members of the review body for their report and the time and care which they have put into its preparation. Some of the recommendations would involve changes in the procedures for handling claims against the allowances which, as the review body points out, require consultations with the parties concerned. The Government would welcome the views of Parliament about the recommendations in the report before announcing firm views. They will announce decisions on the report and propose resolutions, as appropriate, to implement them in the light of those consultations.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Liverpool Free Port

55. Mr. Alton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the recent performance of Liverpool free port and its future prospects as a centre of trade.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my written answer given on 12 January 1987 at column 90. We have no further information at the present time.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the loss of revenue from a reduction of 1p in the standard rate of income tax in 1987-88 before counting allowances and reliefs other than the personal allowances; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing (i) the loss on earned and unearned income, respectively, (ii) the estimated saving in each allowance and relief, (iii) the net loss to the Exchequer and (iv) the distribution of the benefit by range of income and tax category.

Mr. Norman Lamont If the basic rate of income tax were changed on income before deduction of tax reliefs, the direct revenue cost of reducing the rate by 1p would be about £1·5 billion in a full year at 1987-88 income levels. This estimate assumes that reliefs (such as capital allowances) which are taken into account in arriving at taxable profits for schedule D would continue to be deductible. The table shows the cost by ranges of gross income of taxpayers. Further information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Tax Unit's[1] Gross Income £ per annum	Direct Revenue Cost £ million

20,000-30,000	280
Over 30,000	160

Mr. Richard Page asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list, for each state enterprise, the profits or losses for the three years before they were moved into the private sector and the profits or losses since privatisation.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information requested is given in the table below for 11 major privatised companies.

Note: All figures to nearest number.

Mr. Richard Page asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list all the state enterprises that have been moved into the private sector since 1979, together with the receipts obtained and the percentage shareholding that is still retained in any of those enterprises by the public sector.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information on privatisation proceeds for 1981-82 to 1985-86 is set out in table 2·2 of the 1987 public expenditure White Paper, Cm 56-II. Figures for 1979-80 and 1980-81 are given in table 2·14 of the 1985 public expenditure White Paper, Cm 9428-II. In 1986-87, British Gas and British Airways were privatised. Total net receipts are £7,535 million from British Gas and £828 million from British Airways; both figures include instalment payments not yet made.

The Government retain holdings of ordinary shares in British Telecom (49·8 per cent.) and BP (31·7 per cent.)

Personal Incomes

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the forecast number in each personal category above and below the age of 65 years by total income bands of £1,000 to £20,000, by £2,000 to £30,000 and £5,000 up to £100,000, together with the number in excess of that amount.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to the reply on 8 April 1987 at columns 264-66.

VAT

Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many businesses have (a) registered for value added tax purposes and (b) de-registered for value added tax purposes in each of the last five years in (i) Burnley constituency and (ii) Pendle constituency.

Mr. Brooke: For reasons of cost, separate statistics are not maintained for individual constituencies, but all of the Burnley constituency and nearly all of the Pendle constituency are covered by the value added tax office at Accrington. The number of VAT registrations and deregistrations dealt with by that office in each of the calendar years 1982-1986 was:

	Registrations	Deregistrations
1982	1,294	1,268
1983	1,362	1,167
1984	1,367	1,330
1985	1,997	2,081
1986	2,115	2,229

Customs and Excise estimates that in each of the last two years about 13 per cent. of these businesses were located in the Burnley constituency area and about 12 per cent. in the Pendle constituency area.

Mr. Shersby asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress is being made towards a review of his value-added tax penalty provisions and the justice of these provisions, in accordance with the commitment contained in "Building Businesses . . . not Barriers", Cmnd. 9794; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: In accordance with the commitment given in "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" the system of civil penalties, default surcharge and repayment supplement will be reviewed by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer before the 1988 Budget, after a full year's practical experience of those parts of the system which came into effect only on 1 October 1986. In the meantime, as part of the background to the review, Her Majesty's Customs and Excise is monitoring the operation of each part of the system and its impact on business, taking account of the views expressed by hon. Members and by all interested parties outside the House.

Unearned Income

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the gain to the Exchequer from raising the standard rate of tax on unearned income to 35 per cent.; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the distribution of the gain for those over and under age 65 by total income band and personal category.

Mr. Norman Lamont: This would depend on the detailed rules and thresholds for calculating the extra tax, for example in the case of a higher rate taxpayer with both earned and unearned income.

Government Advertising

Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total expenditure on Government advertising in each of the last five years; and how much was spent on (a) television, (b) national newspapers, (c) local newspapers, (d) posters, (e) radio and (f) other media.

Mr. Brooke: Expenditure by the Central Office of Information on behalf of all Government Departments[1] in 1986-87 is listed below.

	£ 000's
Television advertising	54,200
Radio advertising	3,800
Press advertising:
National newspapers	23,006
Local newspapers	3,836
Other press	7,041
Other promotional material	16,070

[1] Excluding Department for National Savings.

The figures for the years 1982-83 to 1985-86 are contained in the answer to a question from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 25 November 1986 at column 240-1. The breakdown of expenditure on advertising in national and local newspapers for those years is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Data Network

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why Plessey has been dropped from the shortlist for the contract for the Government data network; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: After a review of the four responses received, it was decided not to proceed further with the proposal from Plessey/CAP Network Services Ltd. For reasons of commercial confidentiality it would not be proper for details of the evaluation to be made public but in accordance with normal practice the members of the unsuccessful consortium have been debriefed by the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency.

Personal Allowances and Expenses

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to which taxpayers the explanatory note Cyllid Y Wlad Treth Incwm, ref 510 (1987), has been issued; how many have been issued; and at what cost.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Isle of Man

Mr. Hancock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what contribution the Isle of Man makes to the Exchequer to cover the cost of services provided for it.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Land (Capital Gains Tax)

Mr. MacLennan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was the amount of revenue forgone in each financial year since 1981-82 as a result of conditional exemption from capital taxes on land allowed folllowing agreement between the Nature Conservancy Council and the owner;

(2) if he will state the total acreage of land (a) in Scotland and (b) in the United Kingdom exempted from capital gains tax in each financial year since 1981-82 under agreements reached between the owner and the Nature Conservancy Council providing for reasonable public access.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 27 April 1987, c. 53]: This information is not maintained centrally and could not be produced without a disproportionate expenditure of time and resources.

Income Tax

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent evidence the Treasury has compiled on the effect on total revenue of marginal reductions in the lower rates of income tax.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Since 1978-79, the basic rate of income tax has been reduced from 33p to 27p and the total yield of income tax is expected to be over £1 billion higher in real terms in 1987-88. Tax revenues have therefore remained buoyant over this period when tax rates have been reduced.

Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the relationship between levels of income tax and total tax yield.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Income tax is expected to be 25·6 per cent. of total direct and indirect taxes in 1987-88 compared with 26·3 per cent. in 1986-87 and 32·8 per cent. in 1978-79.

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has for each year from 1979 to 1986 about the top rates of income tax and the basic rates of income tax, in the United States of America, Japan, and, each of the member states of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information requested on the top rates of income tax is given in the table. Amongst the countries concerned, the concept of a basic rate of income tax, as such, exists only in the United Kingdom and Ireland. The basic rates there have been:

United Kingdom
1979-80: 33 per cent.
1979-80 to 1985-86: 30 per cent.
1986-87: 29 per cent.

Ireland
35 per cent. throughout.

(2) The rates are those applicable to a married couple. Higher rates apply to a single person in Portugal.
(3) The figures include local income taxes in Belgium, Denmark, Japan and the United States of America, at the following rates:
Belgium, Japan: those payable by the majority of the population
Denmark: Copenhagen; United States of America: California: rates typical of the whole country

NORTHERN IRELAND

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has any plans to arrange for staff of his Department to be screened for antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to the reply, 30 March, c. 385]: No.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether any current or former staff in his Department have been found to have developed AIDS or antibodies to HIV.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to the reply, 30 March, c. 385]: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister of Health on Wednesday 22 April, at columns 627-8.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he has taken to ensure that staff of his Department are warned about those homosexual and other activities which are deemed to have a high risk of AIDS infection.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to the reply, 30 March, c. 385]: In April 1986, the Management and Personnel Office, after consulting the Chief Medical Officer DHSS, circulated all Departments with guidance to managers and model letters to staff.

Relevant guidance and information has been given to staff whose duties may put them in contact with AIDS sufferers or samples containing the AIDS Virus. Information has also been provided to personnel management and welfare staff.

The need for wider guidance is being kept under review.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Hospitals (Exeter)

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the capital expenditure on hospitals in Exeter for each of the years 1975 to 1986.

Mr. Newton: Information is not held centrally in this precise form. Total capital expenditure on hospital and community health services in the Exeter district was:

	£ million
1982-83	3·7
1983-84	4·7
1984-85	5·0
1985-86	5·4

Notes.—The figures are those shown in the annual financial accounts of the Exeter health authority, together with capital expenditure specifically on behalf of the district shown in the annual accounts of the South Western regional health authority.

Before 1 April 1982, Exeter was part of the area of the Devon area health authority and information on a district basis was not collected centrally. If my hon. Friend wishes to seek further information, I suggest that he contacts the chairman of the Exeter health authority.

Pensioners

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioners in Cleveland receive retirement pension without also receiving supplementary benefit, or housing benefit supplement, broken down into the following offices (i) Hadrian house, Eston, (ii) Crown house, Hartlepool, (iii) Royal house, Middlesbrough, (iv) Dawson house, Redcar and (v) Bridge street, Stockton.

Mr. Lyell: Information is not available about the number of retirement pension recipients in any particular locality.

Single Payments

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of single discretionary payment claimants have been refused in each of the last three years.

Mr. Lyell: The percentage of single payments refused in each of the last three years is as follows:

Year (May-April)	Percentage
1984-85	18
1985-86	20
1986-87	[1]32

[1] Provisional figures for period May to March only.

Single-parent Families

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate the number of single-parent families in (a) Burnley and (b) Pendle constituencies where the head of the household was unemployed in 1979 and each subsequent year.

Mr. Lyell: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Benefits

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average amount per household paid in supplementary benefit in the area covered by the Burnley benefit office in January and equivalent dates since 1979.

Mr. Lyell: I regret that this information is not available.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many recipients of supplementary benefit there were in (a) Burnley and (b) Pendle constituencies in each year, respectively, from 1979 to 1986; and in each case how many were single-parent families.

Mr. Lyell: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 26 February 1987 at columns 395-96. I regret that separate figures for single-parent families are not available.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in (a) Burnley and (b) Pendle constituencies in 1986 were in receipt of supplementary benefit; and what percentage were (i) pensioners and (ii) families with children.

Mr. Lyell: Information is not available in precisely the form requested. The constituencies of Burnley and Pendle are covered by the Department's local office at Burnley. The table shows the number of people receiving supplementary benefit from that office on 12 February 1986. Separate figures for the Burnley and Pendle constituencies cannot be provided.

	Number	Per cent.
Over pension age	5,851	(35·5)
Unemployed	5,937	(36·1)
Others	4,675	(28·4)
Total	16,463	(100·0)

Board and Lodging

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the number of people in each Lancashire district living in hotel bed and breakfast accommodation at the latest date for which figures are available;

(2) how many claimants (a) in Burnley and (b) in Pendle were living in ordinary board and lodgings at the latest date for which figures are available; and how many of these were having to pay more for their accommodation then the current upper ceiling laid down by regulations;

(3) how many claimants living in ordinary board and lodgings in (a) Burnley and (b) Pendle are 25 years of age or younger.

Mr. Lyell: I regret that the information requested is not collected by individual local offices and could be obtained only disproportionate cost.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the number of hospital beds in the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale health authority area on 30 November 1976, and each subsequent year at the same date.

Mrs. Currie: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks. It is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale district health authority for the information he requires.

Private Patients

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number of beds occupied by private patients by district health authority area in National Health Service hospitals in the North-Western regional health authority area at 1 December 1986.

Mrs. Currie: For the latest information available centrally, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 19 December 1986 at columns 799-808. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of the North Western regional health authority for the more recent information he requires.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients have been carried per division by the Lancashire ambulance service (a) as emergencies and (b) as hospital transport in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement regarding the effects of the quota system.

Mrs. Currie: The available information in respect of the whole of the Lancashire ambulance service is given in the table. Figures for 1986 are not yet available.

Lancashire ambulance authority
Number of patient-journeys[1]

	Emergency	[2]Non-emergency
1979	53,758	601,593
1980	53,378	593,229
1981	53,181	564,131
1982	54,320	589,269
1983	54,959	624,547
1984	56,224	618,061
1985	56,888	621,404

[1] One patient-journey means one patient carried in one direction, either to or from hospital.
[2] Includes agency services, supplementary services, rail and air.

Information is not collected centrally by division of the ambulance service. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the Preston health authority which is responsible for managing the Lancashire ambulance service.

Information on the operation of the quota system introduced in 1976 which applies to non-emergency patient journeys only can also be obtained from the Preston health authority.

Drug-resistant Germs

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the dangers posed by the drug-resistant germ methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus bacteria, its estimated incidence at present and expected future incidence; what estimates he has made of the likelihood of an epidemic of methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus; what efforts and expenditure are being devoted to combating it; and if guidelines are being issued to discourage constant use of broad-spectrum antibiotics.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) at columns 230-1 on 11 March, in which the measures being taken to combat staphylococcus aureus were described. Staphylococcus aureus is a pathogenic micro-organism which can cause skin infections, abscesses, osteomyelitis or other infections. At least one third of healthy people are carriers of some strain of staphylococcus aureus. There are now some strains of staphylococcus aureus which have become resistant to antibiotics; MRSA, the methicillin resistant strain, is an example. Outbreaks of MRSA appear to occur only in hospitals, where it can be a cause of post-operative wound infections.

In 1986, MRSA was reported by 170 hospitals participating in a national survey. The survey shows that 1,891 cases of MRSA were reported from England, Wales and the Channel Islands in the last nine months of 1986. Two thirds of these cases were from the Thames regions. Particular strains which spread more easily than others and have therefore been described by the term "epidemic MRSA" account for much of the incidence in the Thames regions.

It is not possible to forecast the future incidence of spread of MRSA. In some hospitals, outbreaks have been restricted and MRSA eradicated.

Doctors have been advised to avoid the constant use of broad-spectrum antibiotics. Articles in the medical press and in prescribers' journals have taken a similar line.

I am placing an updated fact sheet on MRSA in the Library.

Hay Fever

Mr. Ames asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the number of people who suffer from hay fever.

Mrs. Currie: The Department does not collect figures on the incidence of hay fever. It has been estimated that 10 per cent. of the population may be affected.

Nurses

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each district health authority and for each year since, and including 1983 (a) the total number of whole time nursing staff in post, excluding agency staff, expressed as whole time equivalents, (b) the normally-funded establishment of nurses expressed as whole-time equivalents and (c) the total number of staff in post expressed as a percentage of the normal establishment of nurses.

Mr. Newton: Information on funded establishments is not collected centrally and our funding of regional health authorities, which in turn decide allocations to districts is not on the basis of staff numbers at establishments but reflects an assessment of their relative population need in accordance with the principles set out by the Resource Allocation Working Group.

The table shows a breakdown of nursing and midwifery staffing totals into full-time numbers, part-time numbers, part-time whole-time equivalents and total whole-time equivalents. This information is not readily available centrally at district health authority level, and would be disproportionately expensive to obtain.

(2) Includes qualified nurses and midwives, learners and unqualified staff.
(3) Whole-time equivalent numbers of staff are calculated as the number of full-time staff, plus the total hours or sessions per week contracted by part-time staff divided by the number of hours or sessions in the appropriate standard working week for each group.

Chronically Sick and Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will extend and update, using the same format, the information given in the answer of 24 May 1985, Official Report, columns 587-88, relating to expenditure by his Department on benefits and services for the chronically sick and disabled, to cover additionally the years 1985-86 and 1986-87, taking 1986-87 as the price base for the information relating to expenditure at constant prices.

Mr. Major: The spending on benefits and on services provided directly by the Department for long-term sick and disabled people in the years 1970-71 to 1986-87 is given in the table. Information on the provision of services by health authorities and by local authorities specifically to this group is not available.

[1] Comparable figures are not available as there were no benefits specifically for long term sick and disabled people.
[2] Not fully comparable with later years as invalidity benefit was introduced part way through the year.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will tabulate, at current and at constant 1986-87 prices, annual expenditure on social security benefits for the long-term sick and disabled in each year since 1974-75.

Mr. Major: Expenditure on benefits paid in consequence of long term sickness or disability is set out in the table.

War Widows

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether his Department has carried out a comparative survey of the pension and benefits paid to war widows by the countries which took part in the second world war.

Mr. Lyell: Information obtained about the pensions and benefits paid to war widows in other countries has shown that it is extremely difficult to make any valid comparisons because different countries' schemes and benefits vary so substantially.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how much pension is paid by his Department to the widow of a private soldier killed in the Falklands war;

(2) how much pension is paid by his Department to the widow of a private soldier killed in the second world war.

Mr. Lyell: Pensions paid to war widows under the war pension scheme are the same irrespective of the date of bereavement or the conflict in which the service man gave his life. Under the scheme, the widow of a private soldier receives a tax-free basic pension of £51·35 a week, plus an age allowance of £5·50 a week at age 65, rising to £11 at 70 and £13·85 at 80. Widows with dependent children also receive child allowances of £11·60 a week for each child, and may receive education and rent allowances. In addition, a war widow may also receive other benefits, such as a retirement pension if she has paid national insurance contributions.

Overseas Pensions

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the most recent available estimate of (a) the number of retired people, by country of residence, living abroad in a country with which Britain has no reciprocal social security agreement, and who would otherwise be receiving a state retirement pension and (b) the cost of paying a state retirment pension to these people.

Mr. Major: British retirement pensions are payable anywhere in the world. Cost-of-living increases are paid, however, only where there is a reciprocal agreement with the country concerned to provide for this.

The number of retirement pensioners who are living in a country with which the United Kingdom has no reciprocal social security agreement to provide for payment of the increase is as follows:

The annual cost of paying these retirement pensions was £168 million in November 1985. Payment at the full November 1985 rates would have cost an additional £166 million.

Severe Weather Payments

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will extend the deadline for claiming severe weather payments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: The Supplementary Benefit (Single Payments) (Amendment) Regulations 1986 provide for claims to be made within 13 weeks of the end of a period of exceptionally cold weather. The period was increased from 28 days in the original proposals following consultation with the Social Security Advisory Committee. We have no plans to amend the regulations.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many cold weather payments have been made in 1987 at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Major: Up to 10 March, the latest date for which information is available, approximately 2 million exceptionally cold weather payments of £5 had been made.

Waiting Lists

Sir Julian Ridsdale asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement about the allocation of waiting list funds to the North East Thames regional health authority, and the North East Essex health authority; and what effect he estimates this allocation of funds will have on waiting lists.

Mr. Newton: North East Thames regional health authority has received £2·070 million from the waiting list fund in 1987-88. This will support some 31 separate projects, enabling hospitals in the region to treat 7,000 extra waiting list cases, and reduce waiting times for some first out-patient appointments. North East Essex district health authority will receive £39,000 from the region's allocation for a project to purchase a laser which will treat 150 extra ophthalmic out-patients and reduce in-patient waiting lists.

Member's Letters

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. and learned Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) will reply to the letter passed to him on 5 March by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne on behalf of Mr. R. W. W. Flynn, of 21 Penmayne parc, Lanner, Redruth, Cornwall.

Mr. Lyell: I have written to my hon. Friend today.

TRANSPORT

Public Transport (Country Visits)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that public transport facilities exist to enable those who do not own, or have access to, a car to visit the countryside for the purpose of informal outdoor recreation, especially at weekends, as recommended by Countryside Commission.

Mr. David Mitchell: The aim of the Government's policy is to enable bus and coach operators to respond to public demand, for both work and recreational journeys. I have no reason to doubt that they will be eager to respond to the Countryside Commission's initiatives to promote wider enjoyment of the countryside by providing services to meet any new demand.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will make available in the Library the draft loan arrangement document for the financing of the Channel tunnel, which was referred to by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Hampshire, North-West (Mr. Mitchell) on 3 February, Official Report, column 870; and if he will make a statement;

(2) on what date the terms of the draft loan arrangement document for the financing of the Channel tunnel were first made public; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The draft loan arrangement document to which I referred on 3 February, at column 870, is a private document, but a summary of it was included as appendix IV of the Eurotunnel prospectus produced in October 1986, copies of which were provided to members of the Standing Committee which considered the Channel Tunnel Bill. That summary includes, at page 70, a reference to the loan from the European Investment Bank, which was under discussion at column 870.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement setting out the manner in which Her Majesty's Government communicated to British Rail the undertaking set out by the Minister of State on 3 February, Official Report, column 863, requiring British Rail to omit any provision for advance toll payments from the final usage contract for the Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: In October 1986 British Rail was instructed by letter to omit any provision for advance toll payments from the final rail usage contract for the Channel tunnel, because to the extent that such payments were made from Government funds they would be contrary to article 1 of the Channel Fixed Link Treaty. As I explained to the House on 3 February, at columns 863-64, clause 40 was introduced into the Channel Tunnel Bill to prevent payment of Government grant to British Rail for Channel tunnel services. There is thus no longer any risk of breach of the treaty, so the instruction to British Rail has been rescinded.

Light Dues

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in the light of representations he has received, he will now withdraw his proposals to extend light dues liability to fishing vessels.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No.

Rail Commuter Services

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the percentage increase in use of commuter services by rail for each of the past five years for the London and home counties area.

Mr. David Mitchell: The annual percentage change in the number of commuters using British Rail's Network South-East services for each of the past five years is as follows:

	Percentage
1982	−1·0
1983	−1·5
1984	+0·5
1985	+3·8
1986	+4·7

Planning Consents

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received opposing the Government's intentions to seek to end the right of highway authorities to oppose planning consents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We have received nine representations against the proposal, together with 91 submitted by hon. Members on behalf of county highway authorities. Concern has been expressed that if the power of direction is removed developments may be allowed which would lead to road accidents or that developers will no longer make payments to highway authorities where road improvements or other changes are needed to accommodate their developments.

These fears are not justified. Local highway authorities will have the right to be consulted on development proposals and to put their views to planning authorities. The latter will also be in a position to ensure that in appropriate cases arrangements are made by developers for payment of or a contribution towards the costs of highway works needed in connection with their developments.

A12

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has yet appointed consultants to consider the upgrading of the A12 trunk road; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A further study of the future needs of the A12 between M25 and Chelmsford was announced in the White Paper—"Policy for Roads in England: 1987"—published yesterday. Consultants will be appointed in due course.

Road Deaths

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the percentage increase or decrease in road deaths in the eastern area based on Bedford for the latest period for which statistics are available; how this compares with the national figure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is given on page 37 of "Road Accident Statistics English Regions 1985", a copy of which is in the Library. Eastern region deaths fell by 3 per cent. between 1980 and 1985, compared with a 13 per cent. fall in England as a whole. Part of the reason for this may be the higher than average traffic growth in eastern region. This is shown in "Statistics Bulletin (87)31", which is also in the Library.

Bus Services

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received any representations concerning bus services in Bexley and in particular proposed route T1; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received representations from residents of Hythe avenue, Bexleyheath about the proposed use of the road by London Regional Transport for the proposed T1 bus route. I understand that the revised proposals for changes to bus services in the Bexleyheath area are currently subject to formal consultation by London Regional Transport with the police, local authorities, London Regional Passengers' Committee and other interested parties.

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied with consultation procedures adopted by London Regional Transport in connection with changes to bus services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Where London Regional Transport proposes to provide, or secure the provision of, a new London bus service or vary an existing one it is required by the Transport Act 1985 first to consult the police, the local authorities affected, the London Regional Passengers' Committee, and any other person it thinks fit. It must be a matter for LRT's judgment as to which other persons to consult in particular cases, but it is its normal practice where major changes are contemplated also to undertake a wider preliminary consultation exercise involving passengers' and residents' groups and affording widespread local publicity of the proposals. I am satisfied that these procedures generally work well.

Woolwich Ferry and Tunnel

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what interruptions to the operation of lifts serving the Woolwich to North Woolwich foot tunnel have occurred in the last three months; and what steps he is taking to ensure that this service will be fully effective in future.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The London boroughs of Greenwich and Newham assumed responsibility for the Woolwich foot tunnel on 1 April 1986. Questions on its operation are a matter for them.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport what services were planned for the Woolwich free ferry for the weeks commencing 20 and 27 April, respectively; what services were run; and what cancelled to date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A normal two-boat service was planned. There was a normal service on 20 April, a reduced one-boat service on 21 to 24 and 27 to 28 April and no service on 25 and 26 April.

Road Maintenance (Shropshire)

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the expenditure on road maintenance in the county of Shropshire for each year from 1978-79.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Expenditure on county roads in Shropshire for the years before 1982-83 cannot be provided without disproportionate expenditure of staff effort.

The expenditure on maintenance of all roads in Shropshire, including trunk roads, for subsequent years was:

	£ million
1983-84	8·767
1984-85	9·723
1985-86	10·317
1986-87	12·099

DEFENCE

Reserve Forces

Miss Fookes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the strength of reserve forces; and what changes are planned for the future.

Mr. Freeman: The reserve forces make anessential contribution to our defence effort and a continuing expansion is in hand. Details of the strength if the reserves are published in volume II of the annual defence White Paper. The latest available figures, 1 January 1987, are as follows:

	'000
Royal Navy/Royal Marines
Regular Reserves	26·7
Volunteer Reserves and Auxiliary Forces	6·6
Army
Regular Reserves	158·8
Territorial Army	77·9
Ulster Defence Regiment	6·6
Home Service Force	3·3
RAF
Regular Reserves	32·5
Volunteer Reserves and Auxiliary Forces	1·3

Cruise Missiles (Molesworth)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's estimate of the cost of deploying Cruise missiles at Molesworth; and how much has been spent so far.

Mr. Stanley: It is estimated that the total cost of constructing the Cruise missile base at RAF Molesworth will be some £45 million, of which about 70 per cent. has already been spent. A further £5 million (of which 80 per cent. has already been spent) is required to fund outer perimeter fencing for the base, the construction of a base perimeter road and local road improvements.

NATO and Warsaw Pact Forces

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the current balance of nuclear and conventional and chemical forces between North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the Warsaw Pact.

Mr. Stanley: I refer my hon. Friend to annex A of volume I of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1986" (Cmnd. 9763).

Military Bases

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many military bases in the United Kingdom are (a) under United Kingdom command (b) under United States command and (c) under joint command.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 22 April 1987, c. 594]: There are approximately 700 principal military bases and facilities in the United Kingdom wholly under United Kingdom command. There are a further 66 military bases and facilities in the United Kingdom made available for use by United States forces under United States national command. The United States authorities are largely responsible for the administrative control of these bases and facilities, but for the great majority of United States military installations there are RAF station commanders who have the responsibilities set out in my answer to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strong) on 26 February 1986 at columns 360-61. In addition, there are two NATO armament depots under United Kingdom command but providing a service for the United States forces. There are no military bases or facilities under joint United Kingdom/United States command.

Defence Export Services Organisation

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many people are employed by the Defence Export Services Organisation; and what proportion of them travel abroad in a representational capacity.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Two hundred and forty six people are employed by the DESO, including 19 service personnel. Of these some 35 per cent. travel abroad in a representational capacity.

Liquid Fuels

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the latest estimate of outturn expenditure on liquid fuels, net of appropriation in aid, for the financial year 1986-87;

(2) on what assumption for (a) the world oil price in dollars and (b) the exchange rate between the pound sterling and the dollar, his Department has estimated spending on liquid fuels for the financial year 1987-88;

(3) what was the level of consumption of liquid fuels in petajoules, by his Department in (a) 1984-85, (b) 1985-86, (c) 1 April to 31 December 1985 and (d) 1 April to 31 December 1986;

(4) what is the estimated level of consumption of liquid fuels in particular by his Department in (a) 1986-87 and (b) 1987-88;

(5) what savings in the annual consumption of liquid fuels in petajoules his Department has achieved as a result of the opening of the Mount Pleasant airport and other investments in the Falklands.

Mr. Freeman: I shall answer shortly.

Trident

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much of the money already spent on Trident is with United States companies.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: About £300 million.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the Trident budget is allocated to the capital costs of the servicing of Britain's Trident submarines and missiles at Kings Bay, Georgia.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given at column 199 on 13 February 1985. At current prices, this amounts to some 1 per cent. of the total United Kingdom Trident budget.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the terms of the cancellation clauses for the Trident project which apply specifically to commitments entered into with United States suppliers; and what is his estimate of the total sum which would be payable to those United States suppliers in the event of cancellation.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The contracts entered into with United States suppliers which cover work for the United Kingdom Trident project provide for the contracting authority to terminate the contract at any time, with payment to the contractor of properly incurred liabilities.

The current contractual commitment in the United States for the United Kingdom Trident project is some £700 million. A lesser sum should be payable in the event of cancellation.

Engineering Apprenticeships (Women)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what restrictions apply to women seeking to take an engineering apprenticeship with the armed services.

Mr. Freeman: Women are not eligible for engineering apprenticeships with the armed services. A range of technical trades are, however, open to women, and their successful completion leads to qualifications which are recognised by the appropriate technical bodies.

War Widows

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much money is paid by his Department each year to the widow of a private soldier killed in the Falklands war.

Mr. Freeman: The widow of a private soldier killed in the Falklands war would, at current rates, receive a pension of £2,709 per annum from my Department under the armed forces occupational pension scheme. A war widow's pension would also be paid by the Department of Health and Social Security.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much money is paid by his Department each year to the widow of a private soldier killed in the second world war.

Mr. Freeman: The widow of a private soldier killed in the second world war would not receive a pension from my Department under the armed forces occupational pension scheme. A war widow's pension would, however, be paid by the Department of Health and Social Security.

Cyprus (Visit)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will report on his recent visit to military bases in Cyprus.

Mr. Younger: On 22-23 April I paid a short routine visit to British forces and installations in Cyprus. The visit had been planned for some time as a follow-up to my previous visit to Cyprus in February. In speaking to senior officers and indeed to service men of all ranks, I found that, despite the additional commitments imposed by the requirements of security following the terrorist attack in Akrotiri last August and more recently the shooting attack on 20 April, morale remains high. The troops are still able to take advantage of the adventurous training and sporting opportunities in Cyprus.

While in Cyprus I was able to visit the two casualties of last week's shooting. The driver has now been discharged from hospital and the condition of his passenger, the daughter of another British service man, is much improved. I take this opportunity to commend once again the courage and quick thinking of the driver, Corporal Bailey, whose evasive action almost certainly prevented fatalities. I also wish to express my appreciation for the skill of the Cypriot police in making two early arrests in connection with this incident. We will continue to provide them with every assistance in their investigation.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Overtime (West Midlands)

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the west midlands as to the number of hours of overtime worked, together with the annual costs, for each year since 1978 within H Division (Walsall) of the West Midlands police authority.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the chief constable of the west midlands that the information for each of the financial years 1978-79 to 1985-86 is as follows:

Financial year	Number of hours of overtime worked	Annual cost approximate
1978-79	73,330	[1]n.a.
1979-80	79,754	[1]n.a.
1980-81	77,705	370,000
1981-82	60,410	320,000
1982-83	49,721	300,000
1983-84	[2]50,761	330,000
1984-85	[3]45,119	320,000
1985-86	47,149	350,000
1986-87	[4]39,250	310,000

[1] Not available.
[2] Does not include overtime in connection with policing the miners' dispute.
[3] Does not include overtime in connection with the Handsworth disturbance.
[4] Does not include overtime in connection with the Wolverhampton disturbance.

Police Employment (West Midlands)

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the west midlands as to the number of police officers employed at H Division (Walsall) of the West Midlands police authority for each year since 1978, together with the authorised establishment.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested has been obtained from the chief constable and is as follows:

H Division (Walsall)

On 31 December	Establishment[1]	Police strength
1978	423	384
1979	423	400
1980	423	419
1981	421	427
1982	419	429
1983	419	423
1984	419	413
1985	417	415
1986	424	408
On 31 March 1987	424	421

[1] As set by the Chief Constable.

Murder (Life Sentences)

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are currently serving life sentences for murder; and what is the average cost per week of their upkeep.

Mr. Mellor: On 28 February 1987, the latest date for which figures are readily available, it is estimated that 1,775 prisoners were serving life sentences for murder in prison department establishments in England and Wales. Detainees during Her Majesty's pleasure and persons sentenced to custody for life are included. Estimates of average costs per inmate are not available for specific types of prisoner but detailed information on average weekly costs for establishments was published in the "Report on the Work of the Prison Department 1985/86" (Cm. 11, appendix 3, tables E, F).

Burglary

Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to deal with the rise in the number of acts of burglary over the past eight years.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are aware that a number of chief officers of police, who are responsible for deciding how their available resources should be deployed, have decided to target "burglaries" in their strategies for 1987. But most burglaries are opportunist; some 25 per cent. do not even involve forced entry. There is therefore, much scope for preventive action to reduce their incidence and, in particular, for extending such crime prevention activity as the community programme crime prevention inititative, which is already responsible for 73 lock fitting schemes, and neighbourhood watch. In addition, the guidance notes issued by the British Standards Institution and the National House Building Council should help to ensure that new homes are built to a standard of security which will be a further deterrent to potential burglars.

Naturalisation

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average time now taken in dealing with an application for naturalisation.

Mr. Waddington: Applications for naturalisation as a British citizen granted in March 1987 had taken an average of 16 months to complete. Very much less time is taken to complete applications for registration. Applications for registration completed in March 1987 had taken on average five months to complete.

Infant Life Preservation Act 1929

Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received seeking amendments to the Infant Life Preservation Act 1929; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: In the last two months, we have received representations from five right hon. or hon. Members on behalf of constituents, and two letters from members of the public, about the Infant Life (Preservation) Act 1929 and the recent court decision in the case of C v. S.

Leeds Prison

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his latest estimate of the date when new accommodation will be available at Leeds prison.

Mr. Mellor: Two new living blocks are due to be started in August 1989 and to be completed in August 1991. These will provide an additional 476 places, but as the existing wings require refurbishing, the new blocks will be used in the first instance to accommodate prisoners from these wings, which will be decanted two at a time to allow the refurbishment to be undertaken. The refurbishment is at present planned to be carried out over a five-year period from November 1991 to December 1996.

Broadcasting

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to provide for a mandatory system of licensing of new audio and audio-visual recordings for broadcasting or public performance.

Mr. Mellor: We see no necessity in view of the controls which already exist under broadcasting legislation, the Video Recordings Act 1984 and the Obscene Publications Act.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the playing of obscene, indecent or violent records by radio stations; and will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: None. The IBA and the BBC are responsible for ensuring that their respective broadcasting services meet acceptable standards.

Rape Victims

Dame Peggy Fenner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the county constabularies which have complied with his Department's guidelines on the provisions and procedures for interviewing victims of rape;

(2) if he will list the county constabularies which have not yet complied with his Department's guidelines on provision and procedures for interviewing victims of rape;

(3) if he is satisfied with progress towards complying with his Department"s guidelines to chief constables, in respect of provisions and procedures for interviewing victims of rape; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The guidance contained in Home Office circular 69/1986 on violence against women was issued last October after consultations with chief officers of police and deals with operational matters which are their responsibility. We have no authority to issue instructions to chief officers in these matters but Her Majesty's inspectors of constabulary discuss with them progress in implementing the circular's recommendations during the course of their annual inspections. The indications so far are that chief officers are responding positively to the circular"s recommendations.

Suspects (Identification)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the police authorities that now have one-way viewing screens installed at police stations for the identification of suspects as provided for in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The installation of screens for use in identification parades is a matter for individual police forces. No information about their numbers is held centrally.

Nuclear War (Contingency Plans)

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions with local authorities and others he has had on contingency plans in the event of a nuclear war.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Plans against nuclear attack are part of a broad range of civil protection arrangements, which are the subject of frequent discussions between the Department, local authorities and other bodies.

Terrorism

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the light of the comments sent him by Mr. Robert Kee on his decision announced in the House on 20 January to refer the Birmingham pub bombings case to the Court of Appeal, he will reconsider his decision not to make a similar reference of, or appoint an appropriate inquiry into, the Guildford and Woolwich pub bombings case and that of Mrs. Anne Maguire, the late Patrick "Guiseppe" Conlan and their co-defendants.

Mr. Mellor: We have already said that we are considering a number of matters raised in Yorkshire Television's "First Tuesday" programme on 3 March, and other material sent to us about the Guildford and Woolwich pub bombings case. We have asked the chief constable of Surrey constabulary for his comments on a specific point which has been raised about the case of Mrs. Anne Maguire and her co-defendants.

Nuclear Disasters

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Cumbria as to, in the event of a civil nuclear disaster at Chapelcross (a) what evacuation time estimates have been prepared for the evacuation of the most populated 22½ deg sector from the power station out to (i) five miles, and (ii) 10 miles, (b) what time estimates have been prepared for the evacuation of the population within (i) five miles, and (ii) 10 miles of the power station, (c) what time estimates have been made for the evacuation of the population of Carlisle, (d) what time estimates have been made for the evacuation of high risk groups from Carlisle, (e) what time estimates have been made for the evacuation of low mobility groups from Carlisle, and (f) what time estimates have been made for the distribution of potasium iodate tablets to the population of Carlisle; and if he will arrange for the basis and calculation of any such time estimates to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [pursuant to his reply, 7 April 1987, c. 130]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Energy on 22 April at column 550.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing stock

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimate of the value of the housing stock in England and Wales in April 1986 and of the percentage increase in value since then; what are the comparable rateable values; and what is his estimate of the amount collected in rates on dwellings in the year 1986-87.

Mr. Tracey: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Nitrogen Dioxide

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the levels of nitrogen dioxide at roadside monitoring sites in London; and what information he has about comparable EEC air quality standards.

Mr. Waldegrave: The results of kerbside monitoring in London of levels of nitrogen dioxide are published annually as a supplement to the "Digest of Environmental Projection and Water Statistics" and placed in the Library of the House. Data over the last four years for kerbside site 1 are given here and include figures for 1985 due to be published in May.

NO_2, Concentrations Expressed as Parts Per Billion

	1982	1983	1984	1985
Annual Average	46	65	49	48
Maximum Monthly 99th Percentile of hourly average concentrations	220	330	158	200

Monitoring for the purposes of EEC directive 85/203/EEC, air quality standards for nitrogen dioxide, should be as far as possible representative of the individual risk of exceeding the limit value. (98th percentile of hourly average NO_2 concentrations per year of 200 micrograms per cubic metre, 104·6 parts per billion). Because the general public spend only a limited amount of time at the kerbside such areas are not considered relevant for monitoring with regard to the directive.

Estate Agents (Boards)

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has received any request from the London borough of Camden under the 1984 advertising regulations for power to control estate agents boards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: No; I have received no such request.

Regulation 15(1) of the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1984 enables the local planning authority to make representations to my right hon. Friend in favour of a direction that the provisions of regulation 14 for display, with "deemed consent", of certain types of outdoor advertisement (including estate agents' boards) shall not apply in a particular area or case. My right hon. Friend will naturally consider any such request which the council of the London borough of Camden may submit to him.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if any research has been undertaken into public attitudes to radioactive waste management.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Social Community Planning Research Council has today published a report, "Radioactive Waste Disposal: The Public's View", of research commissioned by my Department, involving a study of public perceptions of, and attitudes to, radioactive waste management in England and Wales. Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Philip Oppenheim asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the first rate support grant supplementary report 1978-88 will be published.

Mr. Ridley: I have laid this report before the House today.

The main purpose of the report is to honour the undertaking given on 30 October in the House of Commons by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education to increase the expenditure provision for local authorities by £460 million and block grant by £183 million to cover the increased cost of school teachers' pay. The report would also make a small number of changes to authorities' grant-related expenditure assessments to take account of new information on capital allocations for personal social services and waste disposal, and boundary changes made on 1 April 1986 and 1 April 1987.

My Department is sending a copy of the report and tables showing exemplifications of likely revised grant entitlements to all local authorities and the local authority associations. Copies are being placed in the Library of the House of Commons and in the Vote Office.

Bathing Waters

Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish the interim results of the survey of the quality of bathing waters he announced on 3 December 1985; and if, in the light of these results, he is satisfied with the quality of the United Kingdom's bathing waters.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his answer, 9 April 1987, c. 388]: The results for the 1986 bathing season of the survey which I announced on 18 December 1985, are now available, and are set out in summary form for England, Wales and Northern Ireland. The opportunity has been taken to include results for the extra waters included in my announcement of 3 February and also for two further waters.

The individual results indicate compliance with the bacteriological parameters total and faecal coliforms specified by the bathing water directive. They show that 228 out of 368 bathing waters in England, Northern Ireland and Wales—62 per cent.—meet the directive's standards, although I am advised that the conclusions, drawn only from the first year's monitoring results, should be regarded as provisional.

Nevertheless, the results are encouraging and indicate that with the improvement schemes now being undertaken or planned by water authorities, we are well on the way towards achieving our target that all identified waters should meet the directive's standards.

I shall arrange for a more detailed summary of the results to be placed in the Library. The results will also be sent to the Commission in accordance with article 13 of the bathing water directive.

National Parks (Planning Applications)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to take account of the principles enunciated in the statement made by the Minister of State for Town and Country Planning in the House on 31 March 1949 on planning applications in national parks, known as the Silkin test, when considering the appeal for planning permission by Mercury Communications Limited to construct a telecommunications mast at Arncliffe wood, Beacon hill in the north York moors national park; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The statement to which the hon. Member refers related to mineral working in national parks. Our policy on this was set out in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) on 9 April 1987, at column 393-94. On other types of development, our policy is that development control policies should be more stringent in national parks than in the countryside generally. This is reflected in the relevant structure plans which have been approved by my right hon. Friend and which, with the general policy, must be taken into account in individual cases wherever they are material considerations. The appeal to which the hon. Member refers will be determined on its merits, having regard to all the material considerations.

County Hall, Wakefield

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has had discussions with the West Yorkshire residuary body about how much has been expended to date on the advertising for the sale of county hall, Wood street, Wakefield, West Yorkshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: No. This is a matter for the West Yorkshire residuary body.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Straw asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report for each local authority in England in order of magnitude (a) its increase in block grant from 1986-87 to 1987-88, in percentage terms, together with the entitlements for each year in £ millions, (b) its increase in total expenditure from 1986-87 to 1987-88 in percentage terms together with the expenditure figures for each year in £ millions and (c) its 1987-88 block grant as a percentage of its 1987-88 total expenditure, on the basis, in each case, of the 1986-87 figures used in the First Supplementary Report.

Mr. Chope: The information requested by the hon. Gentleman has been made available in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 8 April, Official Report, column 257, whether he will publish in the Official Report (a) figures on the same basis for the metropolitan districts and (b) figures on the same basis for the London boroughs excluding rate support grant for the Metropolitan police from both years.

Mr. Chope [pursuant to his reply, 29 April 1987]: The figures requested at (a) have been placed in the Library. As explained in the notes to my answer of 8 April, Official Report, column 257, in 1981-82 metropolitan police entitlements were paid direct to the rating authorities so the comparison sought at (b) is not possible.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent evidence he has that Nicaragua is supporting guerrilla movements in neighbouring countries.

Mr. Eggar: Nicaraguan leaders have advocated the spread of revolution to other Latin American states. We have no reason to doubt reports and complaints by neighbouring democratically elected Governments that Nicaragua supports guerrilla groups who have taken up arms against them.

Central America

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what stage the Contadora process in central America has now reached; and what further action Her Majesty's Government intend to take to help it to a successful conclusion.

Mr. Eggar: Contadora and Support Group Foreign Ministers recently expressed support for the Costa Rican peace proposals, as a means of restarting the Contadora negotiations, and for the summit of central American Presidents in Esquipulas, at which the proposals will be considered further. We and our European partners continue to urge all the countries of the region to persevere in their efforts to reach a negotiated solution.

Northern Ireland (Duty-free Goods)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations he has made to the European Economic Community following the recent ban by the Republic of Ireland on purchases of duty-free goods in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has made to the Government of the Republic of Ireland following its recent restriction on residents purchasing duty-free goods in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The restriction of duty-free allowances announced by the Irish Finance Minister on 31 March appears to be inconsistent with EC legislation. On 2 April, the Government accordingly asked the Commission what action it planned to take. On 14 April, the Commission indicated that it intended to open infraction proceedings against the Irish Government.

Chile

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is continuing to monitor the situation regarding Oscar Rojas Cuellar, who disappeared on his return to Chile from the United Kingdom in 1981.

Mr. Eggar: Yes; but neither Her Majesty's embassy in Santiago nor the Chilean Vicaria de la Solidaridad human rights group has any fresh evidence about Senor Rojas' case.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Chilean Government on the case of Ledy Castro Urra, formerly employed at Exeter university and now detained without trial in Chile

Mr. Eggar: We have no formal standing to intervene with the Chilean Government on behalf of Senora Castro. However, we monitor her case closely and make clear to the Chilean authorities our concerns about continuing violations of human rights, as for example on 12 March when we supported a consensus resolution at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes) of 21 January, Official Report, column 592, if he will now list the visits made by British diplomats to human rights organisations in Chile in 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Eggar: No central record of such visits is available. Her Majesty's embassy staff have frequent and varied contact with human rights organisations in Chile through visits and meetings, social encounters and telephone conversations.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make it his policy to seek assurances from the Chilean Government that exiles returning from the United Kingdom will not be subject to intimidation, imprisonment, torture or murder;

(2) if his Department intends to monitor the situation of exiles from Chile who have been resident in United Kingdom now returning to Chile.

Mr. Eggar: Her Majesty's embassy in Santiago has already sought such assurances from the Chilean authorities. We shall monitor closely the experience of returning exiles, following the welcome removal of most names from the list of those officially banished. We shall also continue to press the Chilean Government for the full restoration of fundamental human rights.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department has been approached over the past three months for advice from Chilean exiles resident in the United Kingdom who are considering returning to Chile.

Mr. Eggar: We have received two such approaches.

Human Rights

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many specific cases of human rights abuse he has raised with the Governments of (a) the Soviet Union, (b) Romania, (c) Poland, (d) Czechoslovakia, (e) East Germany and (f) Hungary in the last three years; and if he will list the names of the persons involved.

Mr. Renton: Several hundred human rights and personal cases have been raised with the countries concerned, though none with Hungary, over the past three years. Lists of such cases are not kept and could only be produced at a disproportionate cost.

Unitary Taxation

Mr. Grylls asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he raised the subject of the implications for Anglo-United States relations of unitary taxation at his meeting with the Governor of California on Monday 13 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Unitary taxation was discussed during my right hon. and learned Friend's meeting with the Governor of California. The governor was told of our hopes for further reform of California's unitary taxation. He invited the United Kingdom private sector to put its views to the California franchise tax board.

Pakistan and Bangladesh

Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the de-oxyribose nuclei acid pilot scheme now taking place in the sub-continent is being confined to Pakistan and Bangladesh; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: DNA testing in immigration cases is useful only if the claim depends on a parent-child relationship which is not proved by existing procedures. The only outstanding cases at the time of the pilot scheme involved people already in the United Kingdom, or these two countries. We recognise, however, that DNA testing is potentially of value in considering applications from other countries. Decisions on the incorporation of DNA testing into our immigration control procedures will be made in the light of the outcome of the pilot scheme.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report a statement on forthcoming business in the European Community Council of Ministers.

Mrs. Chalker: The usual forecast was deposited in the House earlier today. At present, nine meetings of the Council of Ministers are planned for May.

The Fisheries Council will meet on 5 May and is likely to discuss annual catch quotas for the North Atlantic Fisheries Organisation; fishing rights in the Svalbard region; fish import policy and EC aid for fisheries control facilities.

The Economic and Finance Council will meet on 11 May. It is expected that the agenda will include the Commission's recent proposals on the future financing of the Community, the reference framework for the 1988 Community budget, and directives on prospectuses to be published when securities are offered to the public and mutual recognition of listing particulars for admission of securities to official stock exchange listing.

The Education Council will meet on 14 May. The agenda is not yet available, but it is likely to include discussion of the ERASMUS student mobility programme.

The Health Council is to meet on 15 May. It will discuss the draft conclusions on appropriate use of medicinal products, implementation of the emergency health card, the Europe against cancer programme and AIDS.

The Agriculture Council will meet on 18/19 May to continue its discussions on the 1987 price-fixing proposals, which will include reviews of the green currency system and the oils and fats regime.

The Development Council will meet on 21 May to discuss public awareness of development issues, the implementation of Lomé 3, action against AIDS, environment and development and preparation for UNCTAD 7.

The Environment Council meets on 21 May. The agenda will include large combustion plants, vehicle emissions and leaded petrol, the export of dangerous chemicals, chlorofluorocarbons, the ACE programme of community action relating to the Environment, and the discharge of dangerous substances in the aquatic environment.

The Foreign Affairs Council will meet on 25-26 May. Discussions will cover the future financing of the Community; Community relations with Japan and the United States; progress of the Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations; moves towards closer co-operation between the EC and EFTA and relations with Latin America. A meeting of the EC/Tunisia Co-operation Council will also be held in the margins of the Council.

The Labour and Social Affairs Council will meet on 26 May. Ministers are expected to consider a decision on youth training, conclusions on adult training and a communication on protective legislation for women.

Western European Union

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the meeting of the Western European Union Foreign and Defence Ministers in Luxembourg on 27 April.

Mrs. Chalker: WEU Ministers at Luxembourg on 27-28 April held a useful exchange of views on subjects of concern to Europe in the security field. Our main focus was on East-West relations and arms control, particularly INF. We discussed the implications for security of Soviet proposals to eliminate intermediate-range systems down to a range of 500 km. Decisions on this question will be taken in the Alliance, but Ministers stressed that western security must continue to be based on an appropriate mix of conventional and nuclear forces which together provide a credible deterrent to aggression. They also agreed that the presence of United States nuclear forces and United States troops in Europe remains indispensible for the security of the whole alliance and that reductions in nuclear weapons would increase the importance of removing the conventional superiority of the Warsaw pact and eliminating chemical weapons. Ministers underlined that a successful outcome of the current East-West negotiations depends on the continued solidarity between Europe and the United States. On other matters, Ministers agreed that work should continue on the development of a set of principles for European security which should be examined at our autumn meeting, with a view to possible publication. Ministers approved further study of the WEU institutional structure, particularly that of the Paris agencies, including the question of possible co-location. They also held an informal exchange of views on the Assembly budget, and on WEU enlargement.

A copy of the communiqué of the meeting has been placed in the Library of the House.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Expenditure (Shropshire)

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give the expenditure per pupil in the local education authority area of the county of Shropshire for each year from 1978-79.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is given in the following table:

Net Institutional Recurrent Expenditure per Primary and Secondary Pupil

	Cash Terms (£)
1978-79	405
1979-80	465
1980-81	610
1981-82	705
1982-83	765
1983-84	825
1984-85	885
1985-86	945

Astronomy (South Africa)

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many grants have been given to astronomers and to the institutions within which they work for visits to use telescopes in South Africa since the Science and Engineering Research Council suspended the agreement with the South African Government on joint management of the South African astronomical observatory.

Mr. Walden: The Science and Engineering Research Council has awarded five research grants to provide for seven United Kingdom observers to visit South Africa to use the telescopes since the agreement was suspended on 30 June 1986. The grants were awarded to four different universities.

School Governors (Meetings)

Mr. Michael Cocks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what provision the Government have made for funding the cost of advertising of governors' meetings, provision of public facilities and production of reports for parents, including the cost of providing translations, where needed.

Mr. Dunn: The plans for local authority current spending on education for 1987-88 represent a cash increase of nearly 19 per cent. over those for last year. This level of provision should enable authorities to absorb without difficulty any additional expenditure arising from the Education (No. 2) Act 1986.

Freshwater Biological Association

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has as to how many staff have been made redundant both voluntarily and compulsorily by the Freshwater Biological Association in the last two years; what redundancies are proposed for the current financial year; and what percentage of the total staff each figure represents.

Mr. Walden: No compulsory redundancies have occurred at the Freshwater Biological Association (FBA) in the years 1986-87 and 1985-86. Two individuals took voluntary premature retirement in 1986-87 and five in 1985-86. The voluntary retirements represent 2·9 per cent. and 4·5 per cent. of the respective staff in post figures (104·5 1986-87 and 112 1985-86).

I understand that the FBA council has proposed that there should be losses of between 25 and 30 staff in the financial year 1987-88. This represents between 25·3 per cent. and 30·5 per cent. of the current staff in post figure of 98·5.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what criteria are used by the Natural Environmental Research Council in deciding to reduce the grant-in-aid awarded to a particular research body; what weight the Natural Environment Research Council attaches to the ability of such bodies to attract commissioned research funding from the private and public sectors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: The NERC policy for the allocation of funds between the various bodies which it supports is set out in the NERC corporate plan, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. Current policy includes increasing the council's support of universities. The funding of all the council's institute and grant-aided associations is being reduced as a consequence.

NERC establishments are permitted to retain the whole of any commission research income earned and are encouraged to increase this source of funds.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to implement the commitment to environmental research, with particular reference to freshwater biology, expressed in its response to the World Conservation Strategy report, contained in the document "Conservation and Development — The British Approach"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what priority Her Majesty's Government attach within their overall research programme to research into freshwater biology, with particular reference to river management, pollution assessment and nature conservation; how this priority is reflected in the current and projected level of funding from Government sources for this area of research; what representations he has received about the level of funding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: Research into freshwater biology, with other environmental issues, is among a range of priority areas to be funded from within the resources available. Representations on this matter have been received from the staff of the Freshwater Biological Association.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the grant-in-aid from the Natural Environment Research Council to the Freshwater Biological Association in each of the last five years expressed at constant 1986-87 prices; what grant-in-aid is proposed for the current financial year and what percentage change this represents; and what information he has as to the proportion of its total funding which the Freshwater Biological Association attracted in the form of commissioned research from private and public sources in each of these years.

Mr. Walden: The information on the Freshwater Biological Association's grant-in-aid and its commissioned research income over the past five years expressed at 1986-87 prices, together with the commissioned research income (CRI) expressed in terms of the percentage of the total income, is as follows:

	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87
Grant-in-aid (£,000)	1,634	1,724	1,595	1,622	1,955
CRI (£,000)	489	428	460	617	848
Total Income (£,000)	2,123	2,152	2,055	2,239	2,803
Percentage of CRI included in total income	23·0	19·9	22·4	27·6	30·3

The grant-in-aid for 1987-88 has yet to be finally decided, but it is expected to be about £1,443,000 at 1986-87 prices. This represents a reduction of 26 per cent. over the total grant-in-aid for 1986-87. However, the grant-in-aid for 1986-87 contained £300,000 for the net capital cost of the move of the culture collection of algae and protozoa from Cambridge to the FBA's Windermere station. After taking this into account, the reduction is 13 per cent.

Research

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many Medical Research Council projects have been funded in each of the last three years; and what is the extimate for 1987-88.

Mr. Walden: The number of new project grants funded by the MRC has been as follows:

Academic year
1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
473	440	439

The figure for the current award year 1986-87 will not be available until August. It is not possible to make estimates for future award years.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many Medical Research Council projects have been alpha-rated in each of the last three years; and what is the estimate for 1987-88.

Mr. Walden: The number of new project grant applications alpha rated by the Medical Research Council has been as follows:

Academic year
1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
672	527	529

The figure for the current award year 1986-87 will not be available until August. It is not possible to make estimates for future award years.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he has of the number of researchers and scientists, previously involved in Medical Research Council funded projects, who left to work overseas in each of the last five years; and if he will provide a forecast for 1987-88.

Mr. Walden: I understand that the Medical Research Council can only provide numbers of staff who have been employed by the council. Numbers of permanent scientific staff who have left to work overseas have been:

	Number
1982	3
1983	0
1984	3
1985	4
1986	2

It is not possible to forecast numbers for 1987 and 1988.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what estimate he has of the number of researchers and scientists, trained from public funds, who left to work overseas in each of the last five years; and if he will forecast the numbers for 1987-88.

Mr. Walden: This information is not collected centrally.

Student Grants

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement about the rates of allowance that will be payable to students in 1987-88.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend announced the main rates of grant for 1987-88 on 30 January this year. Subject to Parliament's approval of the necessary regulations, the supplementary grant rates will be increased broadly in line with the main rates, and there will be certain other improvements in the grant arrangements.

Particular improvements include:

disabled students will be able to claim up to £700 for extra expenses: a rise of 24 per cent.;

for students claiming the older students' allowance, taxable benefits from periods of unemployment will count towards the £12,000 of earnings needed to qualify; and the qualifying figure of £12,000 set last year will not be increased;

students will be able to receive up to £2,000 a year from sponsorships or scholarships without any reduction in their grant.

The full list of rates and allowances has been placed in the Library.

Pupil Expenditure

Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing expenditure per pupil since 1974-75 in (a) primary schools, (b) secondary schools and (c) special schools in cash terms and at constant prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The following table gives the information requested:

Net institutional recurrent expenditure per pupil, England pounds per pupil

	Primary schools		Secondary schools		Special education
Financial year	Cash terms	Real terms[1]	Cash terms	Real terms[1]	Cash terms	Real terms[1]

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 30 April.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 30 April.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 30 April.

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 30 April.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 30 April.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Sir Maurice Oldfield

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will refer to the Security Commission recent allegations relating to the conduct of the late Sir Maurice Oldfield.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) on 23 April, at columns 656-57.

Council of Europe

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Prime Minister if she will announce the composition of the United Kingdom delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe.

The Prime Minister: The Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe will be meeting in Strasbourg from 4-8 May. I have appointed 18 delegates from the Parliament of the United Kingdom. The delegation this year will consist of 12 members of the Conservative party, five members of the Labour party and one member of the Liberal party. I have also appointed a number of substitute delegates.

The appointments of representatives and substitutes have been made on the basis of nominations by the Leaders of those parties concerned.

The same delegation will be representing the United Kingdom Parliament at the Assembly of the Western European Union.

Representatives from the Government Benches will be:

The right hon. Member for Torbay (Sir F. Bennett), who will act as leader.

The hon. Members for
Hampstead and Highgate (Sir G. Finsberg)
Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant)
Norfolk, South-West (Sir P. Hawkins)
Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill)
Twickenham (Mr. Jessel)
Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight)
Sheffield, Hallam (Sir J. Osborn)
Harrow, West (Sir J. Page)
Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith)
Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) and the Earl of Kinnoull.

Representatives from the Labour party will be:

The hon. Members for
Neath (Mr. Coleman)
Wallsend (Mr. Garrett)
Wentworth (Mr. Hardy)
East Kilbride (Dr. Miller) and the Lord Hughes.

Representatives from the Liberal party will be:
The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross).

The following substitutes have been appointed to act as necessary on behalf of the delegates.

From the Government Benches:
The right hon. and learned Member for Dover (Mr. Rees).
The hon. Members for:
Cunninghame, North (Mr. Corrie)
Northampton, South (Mr. Morris)
Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy)
Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes)
Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki)
Poole (Mr. Ward)
The Lord Newall and the Lord Rodney.

From the Labour party:
The right hon. Members for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson)
Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan)
The hon. Members for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Brown)
Tooting (Mr. Cox)
Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Edwards)
Makerfield (Mr. McGuire)
Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry)
Hemsworth (Mr. Woodall)

From the Liberal party:
The Lord Mackie.

ENERGY

Nuclear Accidents (Compensation)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Murphy) on 19 January, Official Report, columns 361-2, how many compensation claims have been received, how many have been paid, and what amount has been paid to (a) leukaemia victims and their families, (b) workers at nuclear installations and their families and (c) others, in respect of nuclear accidents or radiation leaks.

Mr. Goodlad: I apologise for the delay in answering. There have been no claims under the Nuclear Installations Act 1965 resulting directly from a nuclear accident. Two claims have been submitted to the CEGB, one by a contractor's employee in respect of cancer, the other by one of the CEGB's own employees in respect of leukaemia. No compensation has been paid.

Nuclear Incidents

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement about the arrangements for reporting nuclear incidents; and whether all such incidents can be published.

Mr. Goodlad: During a debate on nuclear matters on 13 May last year, the then Secretary of State for the Environment, my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), said that the Government would consider the existing reporting arrangements to see whether changes were desirable.

I am now able to announce new procedures which will extend the present arrangements, and will provide for the publication by the nuclear industry of reports of all occurrences, however minor.

Arrangements hitherto have required all incidents having significance, or potential significance, for the health and safety of the work force or the general public which are reported to the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate to be reported promptly to interested Departments and their Ministers. All such reports are published quarterly by the Health and Safety Executive. These formal reporting arrangements were explained to the House by the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy, my right hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Moore) on 26 July 1982. They are now being broadened, among other things, to require confirmed or expected breaches of discharge authorisations issued under the Radioactive Substances Act 1969 to be included in the formal reporting arrangements and to be reported directly to interested Departments and their Ministers. I am placing a note on the revised reporting criteria in the Library of the House.

Nuclear operators are required to record in a site log or register all incidents, whether formally reportable or not, which occur at nuclear sites. Many such occurrences are already reported to Departments and are the subject of public statements. In future, nuclear operators will publish details of all such occurrences which are recorded in site logs, generally in weekly or fortnightly site newsletters. These local newsletters will be circulated to members of local liaison committees, to local Members of Parliament, to local news media and to interested Departments. Arrangements will also be made for copies to be placed in the Library of the House.

These arrangements will ensure that the fullest possible information is made available at all times to the House and to the public about occurrences, however insignificant, at nuclear sites.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Envelopes

Mr. Speller asked the Lord Privy Seal, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Devon, North on 27 April, Official Report, column 15, if he will now list the representations he has received regarding the quality of franked brown manilla envelopes supplied for use in the House.

Mr. Biffen: I have received no representations regarding the quality of franked brown manilla envelopes but understand that, since the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee meeting on 19 May last year, two hon. Members have been in correspondence with the Serjeant-at-Arms about the matter.

WALES

National Health Service

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what were the numbers of medical and dental staff employed in the National Health Service in Wales (a) in the years 1970 to 1975, (b) 1975 to 1980 and (c) in the years 1980 to 1985, expressed as actual numbers, and discounting changes in rota systems;

(2) what were the numbers of nurses and midwives employed in the National Health Service in Wales (a) in the years 1970 to 1975, (b) in the years 1975 to 1980 and (c) in the years 1980 to 1985, expressed as actual numbers, and discounting changes in rota systems;

(3) what were the numbers of front-line staff employed in the National Health Service in Wales (a) in the years 1970 to 1975, (b) in the years 1975 to 1980 and (c) in the years 1980 to 1985, expressed as actual numbers, and discounting changes in rota systems.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The required information which is only available in the form of whole-time equivalents, is given in the following table.

Average whole-time equivalents employed[1]

Period (six years inclusive)	Medical and Dental	Nursing and Midwifery	Front-line staff[2]
1970-75	1,675	[3]19,724	23,572
1975-80	2,064	[4]22,450	[4]27,878
1980-85	2,364	[4]25,847	[4]32,357

[1] Based on whole-time equivalents employed at 30 September each year.

[2] "Front-line staff" includes medical and dental, nursing and midwifery and professional and technical staff groups.

[3] Nursing and midwifery figures for 1970 are not wholly separable from professional and technical staff figures, and therefore the average is based on the five-year period 1971-75 inclusive.

[4] Figures for 1980 onwards have not been adjusted to allow for the reduction which took place in contract hours for nursing and midwifery staff, from 40 to 37½ hours per week.

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales who will make the appointment of non-executive members of the Health Policy Board appointed on a non-representational basis referred to in the corporate management programme for the "Health Service in Wales" consultation paper; and who will qualify for appointment.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My right hon. Friend appoints non-executive members to the board entirely at his discretion.

Hospitals

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many community hospitals are under construction at the present time in Wales;

(2) how many community hospitals are planned to be built in Wales (a) in the next five years and (b) in the next 10 years.

Mr. Mark Robinson: New community hospitals have been opened in Mold in 1984 and Ystradgynlais in 1986. None is currently under construction. I understand that currently district health authorities have plans for seven community hospitals in the next five years and a further four in the five years after that.

Health Policy Board

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the anticipated eventual capital costs in setting up the Health Policy Board for Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Nil.

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the anticipated eventual revenue costs in setting up the Health Policy Board for Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Revenue costs directly attributable to the running of the Health Policy Board are confined to the fees and travel and other expenses of non-executive members. In 1986-87, this expenditure totalled £1,400. Welsh Office staff participate in board meetings and provide secretarial support in the normal course of their duties.

Health Common Services Authority

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what are the anticipated eventual capital costs in setting up the Welsh Health Common Services Authority:

(2) what are the anticipated eventual costs in operating the Health Welsh Common Services Authority.

Mr. Mark Robinson: No additional capital costs were incurred in establishing the Welsh Health Common Services Authority. The revenue allocation to the authority for financial year 1987-88 is £5·724 million. The revenue and capital costs incurred by the WHCSA in any financial year are attributable to the level of service it is required to provide for the NHS in Wales.

Mental Handicap

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the expenditure on providing community care for mentally handicapped people in Wales (a) in the years 1970 to 1975, (b) in the years 1975 to 1980 and (c) in the years 1980 to 1985 expressed in actual and in 1975 adjusted terms.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Information prior to 1975-76 is not separately identifiable for Wales. Between 1975-76 and 1979-80, expenditure was £22·83 million (£17·34 million at 1975-76 prices); between 1980-81 and 1984-85 expenditure was £52·34 million (£22·61 million at 1975-76 prices). These figures include expenditure on residential care for children and adults, day care at adult training centres, and the all-Wales mental handicap strategy. Figures for community health services and special education provision are not separately available.

Health Building, Bangor

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the present status of litigation in respect of health building schemes at Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor with Hospital Design Consortium.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Official Referee has set the date of hearing in this action for April 1988.

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the present status of litigation in respect of health building schemes at Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor with Haden Young Ltd.

Mr. Mark Robinson: A preliminary issue in this action is to be heard in the High Court from 28 April 1987.

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the terms of the settlement reached on the litigation arising from health building schemes at Prince Charles hospital.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Welsh Health Common Services Authority and the sub-contractor, CED Services Ltd., agreed to pay R. M. Douglas (Construction) Ltd.

£932,500 and £632,500 respectively, with each party bearing its own costs. Third party proceedings were withdrawn on the third parties' agreement to waive certain outstanding fees and to bear their own costs of the action.

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the present status of litigation in respect of health building schemes at Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor with IDC Ltd.

Mr. Mark Robinson: IDC Ltd. is a third party in a claim brought by the Welsh Health Common Services Authority against Haden Young Ltd. A preliminary issue in this action is to be heard in the High Court from 28 April 1987.

Mental Illness and Mental Handicap

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received on the adequacy of community care provision for hospital discharged mentally ill and mentally handicapped patients in each of the Welsh health authority areas.

Mr. Mark Robinson: In pursuance of its various policy initiatives directed towards the development of new patterns of care in the community, the Department consults and receives representations from a wide range of interests throughout Wales. It is not possible to give details without incurring disproportionate costs.

Consultant Posts

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many consultant posts in Wales have been unfilled for three months, six months and one year in each of the recognised specialties for each health authority in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information requested is not centrally available.

Small Farmers

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions representatives of his Department have had with officials responsible for the common agricultural policy of the EEC concerning the possibility of a small farmers' direct income aid scheme; and what is his policy on such a scheme for small farmers in Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Full consultations and discussions will take place once the Commission publish its formal proposals on direct income aids.

"A Good Old Age"

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report a list of the bodies and organisations with which he consulted prior to drawing up his consultation paper "A Good Old Age."

Mr. Mark Robinson: There was no formal consultation with any bodies or organisations before "A Good Old Age" was published; extensive consultation took place after publication.

Teachers' Pay

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he will make additional resources available to local authorities following the recent pay award to teachers.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I am today laying before the House of Commons the Welsh rate support grant supplementary report 1987-88 which makes provision for additional expenditure by local authorities and for additional rate support grant in respect of the recent pay award to teachers.

DEFENCE

Pipeline Assembly Yard, Rosshire

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state his Department's current policy towards the proposed pipeline assembly yard at Morrich Mhor, near Tain, Rosshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: My Department was approached in September 1985 by Land and Marine with a request to use a strip of land at the edge of the RAF range at Tain as the site for a pipeline assembly yard. My Department considered the proposals and was satisfied that by the application of stringent safety procedures the construction work could be accommodated as had been requested.

I understand that Land and Marine's application for planning permission is with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Defence Estate Steering Group

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the names and qualifications of the current membership of the Defence Estate Steering Group; what recommendations it has made as to the maximum utilisation of the defence estate since it was established in 1985; and what are its recommendations currently as to the disposal of surplus assets.

Mr. Freeman: The current membership of the Defence Estate Steering Group is as follows:

Ministry of Defence

Chairman:

Mr. Roger Freeman, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces.

Members:

Air Chief Marshal Sir Michael Armitage, Chairman of the Principal Administrative Officer Committee.
Mr. J. M. Stewart, Deputy Under Secretary (Personnel and Logistics).
Rear Admiral A. J. Richmond, Assistant Chief of Defence Staff (Logistics).
Captain R. J. Wright RN, Director of Quartering (Navy).
Brigadier M. A. Gardner, Director of Army Quartering.
Air Commander B. L. Robinson, Director of Organisation and Quartering (RAF).
Mr. R. P. Hatfield, Head of PL (Defence Lands).
Mr. P. A. Crowther, Head of Establishments and Research Administration 1.

Property Services Agency

Mr. H. P. Johnston, C Eng, MIEE, FCIBSE, Deputy Chief Executive 2, PSA.
Mr. M. D. Clarke, LLB, ARICs, Head of Defence Estate Services Division, PSA.
Mr. C. D. D. Duncan, Head of PL (Logistics).

The composition of the group recognises the need for a tri-service approach to the management of the defence estate whilst taking account of the executive responsibilities of each of the services and the Procurement Executive. Professional advice is provided by the Property Services Agency though the DESG is also empowered to seek advice from the private sector as it sees fit.

The first major project of the DESG was a study of the scope for rationalisation of defence facilities in north and west London. As a result of this study, it has been decided to concentrate a number of Army and Air Force facilities on RAF Northolt and RAF Uxbridge, enabling the disposal of sites at Mill Hill, Stanmore Park, Hounslow, West Drayton and of service housing at Hendon and Mill Hill. As a second major project, the DESG commissioned a survey of 75 smaller but potentially valuable sites throughout the United Kingdom. The survey, which incorporated advice from outside consultants, was completed in 1986 and its recommendations are now being followed up in detail site by site. A number of sites are already in the process of disposal and it is expected that further disposals will result from this study during the next few years. In addition, the DESG has considered a number of individual cases, and sites at Camberley, Portsmouth, Brighton, Winchester and Arborfield have been disposed of or are in the process of disposal.

Defence Expenditure

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much has been spent in total on defence since 1979 to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Total defence spending from 1979-80 to 1986-87 inclusive was the cash sum of about £117 billion.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Member's Correspondence

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) hopes to reply to a letter from the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne, dated 25 February, on behalf of Mr. J. K. Miln, of Hard to Come By Farm, Budock, Falmouth.

Mr. Howard: I replied to my hon. Friend's letter on 29 April.

Bureaux de Change

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to regulate the amount of commission which may be charged by bureaux de change; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I have no plans for legislation to control the level of commission charges, but a code of practice issued by my Department early last year calls on banks and bureaux to display their commission and exchange rates prominently. Many banks and bureaux are already complying with these requirements, to which the Consumer Protection Bill, if enacted, will give statutory backing.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General (1) what has been the net gain or loss of jobs in the service sector since 1983 in (a) the north-west region, (b) Lancashire, (c) Greater Manchester, (d) Merseyside and (e) Cheshire;

(2) what has been the change in jobs in the manufacturing sector since 1983 in (a) the north-west region, (b) Lancashire, (c) Greater Manchester, (d) Merseyside and (e) Cheshire.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The latest estimates show an increase of 10,000 in the number of jobs in the north-west region between December 1983 and December 1986. This increase resulted from a net increase of 27,000 employees in the service industries; a net decrease of 40,000 employees in manufacturing industries; a net decrease of 8,000 employees in other industries and a net increase of 31,000 people in self-employment. Some of the apparent movement from manufacturing to service employment in these figures will be due to the reclassification of jobs such as industrial cleaning, catering, computer services and road haulage previously done by manufacturers' own employees, now done by subcontractors outside the manufacturing sector.

Figures for counties and smaller areas are not available except from censuses of employment taken triennially since 1978.

Mr. Batiste asked the Paymaster General what proportion of the population between the ages of 16 and 18 years of age were (a) engaged in full-time education, (b) engaged in training, (c) in employment and (d) unemployed at the latest date for which records are available.

Mr. Trippier: The information is not available in the form requested. In January 1986, of young people in Great Britain aged 16 to 18 on 31 August 1985, 31·2 per cent. were in full-time education, 10·4 per cent. were on YTS, and 15·4 per cent. were claimant unemployed. Most of the remaining 43 per cent. will have been in employment outside YTS. However, some will have been unemployed but not claiming benefit, some neither seeking work nor claiming benefit and some on Government schemes other than YTS.

Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General (1) how many people have been unemployed for 12 months and more; if he will give the equivalent figure for May 1979; and if he will give the same information on the basis of the counting methods in use in May 1979 and the percentage increase in the latter case;

(2) if he will state the number unemployed for 12 months or more in (a) the west midlands, (b) the black country area of the west midlands and (c) the Walsall travel-to-work area; what were the comparable figures for May 1979; and if he will give the same information on the basis of the counting methods in use in May 1979, and the percentage increase in the latter case.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: On 8 January 1987, the latest date on which analysis of unemployment by duration is available, the number of claimants in the United Kingdom who had been unemployed for over 12 months was 1,334,430. The corresponding number of unemployed registrants in April 1979 (not available for May 1979) was 366,711. It is not possible to give a reliable estimate of long-term unemployment now on the method used in 1979.

For unemployment figures for the west midlands, the black country area of the west midlands and the Walsall travel-to-work area, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by my hon. Friend on 19 February 1987 at column 769.

Redundancies

Dr. David Clark asked the Paymaster General if he will list in the Official Report, the number of redundancies notified to his Department in the South Shields constituency in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: Information relating to confirmed redundancies is given in the following table:

Redundancies confirmed as due to occur in South Shields

Year	Number
1979	350
1980	735
1981	702
1982	1,369
1983	521
1984	1,531
1985	405
1986	537

Bureaux de Change

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Paymaster General what representations he has received regarding the effects on the tourist industry and the numbers of visitors to the United Kingdom of overcharging by bureaux de change.

Mr. Trippier: My Department has received complaints about various practices adopted by certain bureaux de change operators and I recognise that a poor impression can be created for overseas visitors. The Government would not seek to control exchange rates or commission charges but we are concerned that these should be clearly displayed so that prospective customers are aware of the terms before they commit themselves. The British Tourist Authority introduced a voluntary code of practice in 1986 requiring prominent display of both rates and charges and this has been widely adopted. The proposed Consumer Protection Bill will include a statutory code of practice in this respect and a number of operators have already agreed to adhere to its proposed provisions on a voluntary basis in the meantime.

SCOTLAND

High Court (Jedburgh)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of occasions over the last 10 years when the High Court of the justiciary sat in Jedburgh.

Mr. Lang: Sittings of the High Court at Jedburgh over the last 10 years have been as follows:

	Number
1977	1
1978	3
1979	Nil
1980	Nil
1981	2
1982	4
1983	3
1984	1
1985	Nil
1986	Nil

Crime Statistics

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the number of persons convicted in each of the last 10 years of criminal offences in Scotland while on bail for an earlier offence.

Mr. Lang: The information below relates only to persons for whom reoffending while on bail was the charge which attracted the most serious penalty. In other cases, the offender will be classified under the actual crime committed while on bail and statistics on such offenders cannot be separately identified. Before 1983, reoffending while on bail was not distinguished from other bail offences.

Persons with main charge proved of reoffending while on bail—Scotland

Criminal Assaults (Elderly People)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what practical steps he proposes to take to reduce the incidence of criminal assault on elderly people attacked while in their own homes.

Mr. Lang: A number of measures currently being taken to reduce the incidence of housebreaking and crime generally should help with this problem. Specific developments include (a) the recently launched campaign to promote neighbourhood watch, which is aimed at preventing housebreaking and vandalism by means of improved physical security, watchfulness and mutual help within the community, and (b) the national initiative by my Department and the Manpower Services Commission, under the community programme, to promote crime prevention projects, a specific aim of which is to provide the elderly, the disabled and the disadvantaged with practical improvements in home security. In addition, an architectural design competition is being held to encourage architects to incorporate good crime prevention and design features in housing developments. More generally, police forces are always ready to advise individual householders about appropriate security measures, use of which will reduce the opportunities for this type of crime.

Meningitis Research (Edinburgh)

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what funding the Department of Health has been giving to meningitis research in Edinburgh in each of the last five years.

Mr. Rifkind: The Scottish Home and Health Department has not funded any research projects relating to meningitis in this period.

Speed Limits

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, in how many cases he has rejected proposals submitted in the past 15 months from the Highland regional council to impose speed limits where the environmental or accident criteria were met; and if he will give his reasons for refusing each application.

Mr. Ancram: My right hon. and learned Friend has not turned down any applications in the past 15 months from Highland regional council where both the environmental and accident criteria were met. Satisfaction of one of these criteria on its own is not a sufficient reason for imposing a speed restriction. In any case, there are three other criteria to be taken into account.

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what consultations he has had with local authorities about the existing criteria for speed restrictions; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what consultations he has had with the police about the existing criteria for speed restrictions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: In 1979 a draft circular was issued for comment to several representative bodies, including the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the Association of Chief Police Officers (Scotland). Following these consultations, the Scottish Development Department issued circular No.18/80, which sets out the criteria.

Marine Farming

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what planning proposals he has to reduce potential conflicts of interest between marine farming and other fishing users of inshore waters.

Mr. Ancram: The Government do not consider that planning legislation would provide an appropriate framework for exercising control of sea-based fish farming developments. We do however recognise the need to ensure that the rapidly growing fish farming industry in Scotland is developed in a balanced and sensible way and that in its consideration of applications for leases the Crown Estate Commissioners takes account of both the needs of the industry itself and the views of others who could be affected by the overall growth of fish farming or by individual developments. A consultative paper containing proposals for new consultative procedures was issued by the Scottish Development Department in March 1986, and revised procedures were introduced last October. They will be kept under review and if significant changes are thought necessary the procedures will be further adjusted.

Unemployment

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what special initiatives to tackle unemployment have been set up by the Scottish Development Agency or other public authority in Scotland; what travel-to-work area(s) each covers; and what is the unemployment level in that area.

Mr. Lang: There are five major area initiatives currently in operation which were set up by the Scottish Development Agency in conjunction with local authorities and the private sector. These are at Clydebank, Coatbridge, Dundee, Inverclyde and Motherwell. While measures to tackle unemployment are a major component, the initiatives also have wider economic and environmental objectives. The travel-to-work areas covered by the initiatives and relevant unemployment rates are set out below.

Initiative	TTWA	Unemployment rate (12 March) per cent.
Clydebank	Glasgow	17
Coatbridge	Lanarkshire	21
Dundee	Dundee	16·2
Inverclyde	Greenock	20·3
Motherwell	Lanarkshire	21

Children's Panels

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what are the powers of the children's panels in relation to access to all relevant files on the children appearing before them, or their families; on whose discretion panel members are given access to such files; and what is the authority for this arrangement;

(2) for what purpose he introduced rule 13 on the conduct of children's panels relating to the custody of persons by police or prison officers; and on what date it became effective;

(3) for what reasons he did not reappoint to the children's panels in Ayrshire Mr. Alexander Baird and Mr. Ian Bigham; on what date this action became effective; and what representations he has received on this matter.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Housebuilding

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many new private and local authority houses were constructed in (a) Cumnock and Doon Valley and (b) Kyle and Carrick in each year from 1979 to 1986.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is set out in the table below:

Number of new buildings completed

Year	Cumnock and Doon Valley district		Kyle and Carrick district
	Private	Local Authority	Private	Local Authority
1979	83	26	268	136
1980	62	47	173	119
1981	44	43	149	56
1982	50	6	107	17
1983	49	—	255	91
1984	77	14	305	35
1985	77	—	273	71
1986	58	2	187	28

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the waiting lists and waiting times for operations in each specialism in (a) Ballochmyle, (b) Ayr County, (c) Heathfield and (b) Seafield hospitals.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible, and will arrange for a copy of my letter to be placed in the Library.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the gross figures for those claiming unemployment benefit, and the percentage of the work force this represents for (a) Ayr travel-to-work area, (b) Cumnock and Sanquhar travel-to-work area and (c) Girvan travel-to-work area for each month since May 1979 to the latest available date.

Mr. Lang: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Bypasses

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the latest expected dates of the various stages in the planning and construction of (a) Cumnock and Auchinleck, (b) New Cumnock, (c) Maybole and (d) Girvan bypasses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

Scheme	Draft road orders published	Earliest possible works start
(a) Cumnock and Auchinleck Bypass	June 1986	Spring 1988
(b) New Cumnock Bypass	January 1987	Autumn 1988
(c) Maybole Bypass	Autumn 1987	Spring 1990

Start dates depend on completion of statutory and design procedures and on the availability of funds. In each case, construction is expected to take about two years.

The Scottish Development Department is still awaiting the results of a feasibility study into a Girvan bypass. I cannot at this stage say whether such a scheme would be justified.

Polychlorinated-biphenyls

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the outcome of the study commissioned by him into the background levels of polychlorinated-biphenyls and their derivatives in soil; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Samples of soil have been taken on a 20 km grid from 36 locations between Girvan in the south-west and Stonehaven in the north-east. These samples have been analysed by the laboratory of the Government chemist for polychlorinated-biphenyls, polychlorodibenzo-p-dioxins and polychloro-dibenzo-furans.

Only four of the samples show a polychlorinated-biphenyl content above the limit of detection. The highest result, 100 parts per billion, is not exceptional having regard to the normal background levels in soils generally.

Few of the results for dioxins and furans are above the limit of detection, except for tetrachloro-dibenzo-furan, where most of the results are in the range of 0·01-0·06 parts per billion. Two results, of 0·1 and 0·4 parts per billion, have been found in samples from locations near Girvan and Coylton in Ayrshire. I have asked that further samples be taken from these locations for analysis.

The United Kingdom does not set a lim[illegible]dioxin levels; it is however of interest to note tha[illegible] United States centre for disease control has set a limit of 1·0 parts per billion in soil for the most toxic of the dioxins, 2378 tetrachloro-dibenzo-dioxin, in soil. None of the results obtained exceeds a hundredth of that figure.

Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, in the light of the reply of 10 April, Official Report, column 467, to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) whether he is now in a position to make a further statement on the implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: Following discussion with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, my right hon. and learned Friend has decided to implement sections 9, 10, 11, 12 and 14 of the Act from 1 June 1987 and sections 4 and 8(1) from 1 October 1987. Further discussions will be held with the convention on the cost implications of section 13, with a view to implementing this section as well later in 1987-88.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Veal Crates

Mr. Craigen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any plans to bring forward the date for the phasing out of veal crates.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My Department is considering representations from interested organisations on our proposal to phase out veal crates.

Agricultural Land

Dr. Cunningham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from organisations or individuals about the effect the Chernobyl fallout has had on the ability of people to sell agricultural land; what replies he has sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Representations have been recieved by me, or by my Department, from the Country Landowners Association, National Farmers Union and individuals about compensation for farms "blighted" because of the restrictions imposed following the Chernobyl accident.

All have been informed, or will be informed, that various factors are combining to make land prices weak at this time but that there is no reason why the sheep restrictions should place a farmer in a worse position than other farmers who wish to sell their property. In designing these restrictions we have sought to ensure that farmers are able to carry out their normal husbandry so far as possible, and compensation arrangements designed to cover market losses on marked sheep and certain direct losses resulting from the impact of the restrictions were introduced. The arrangements to allow sheep to move from restricted farms and associated compensation arrangements should ensure that farmers suffer no significant loss in the operation of their businesses. In these circumstances there ought not to be any loss in the capital value since the farm's earning potential is not affected and its normal husbandry practices are not impeded.

Food (Dyes)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy that no dyes be added to food intended for children aged one to three years; what steps he has taken to ensure that food manufacturers do not add dyes in such food; and what penalties are involved in the event of dyes being added.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I have already circulated proposals to amend the Colouring Matter in Food Regulations 1973 so as to provide inter alia that:

"No food specially prepared for babies and young children shall have in it or on it any added colouring matter other than any of the following added permitted colouring matters:

Riboflavin or Lactoflavin E 101
Riboflavin-5'-phosphate
beta Carotene E160(a)."

The proposals do not define "young children" so as to avoid limiting the extent of the prohibition.

The riboflavins and beta-Carotene would be permitted because they are valuable vitamins or vitamin sources which also have colouring characteristics.

Persons contravening the Colouring Matter in Food Regulations are liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £2,000.

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Mr. McLoughlin asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Council of Agriculture Ministers' meeting held in Luxembourg on 27-28 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I represented the United Kingdom at this Council, which was devoted entirely to a further discussion of the Commission's proposals for agricultural prices and support measures for 1987-88. There remains considerable divergence between member states' views on a number of crucial issues, including the degree of price restraint to be applied, agrimonetary measures and the proposed tax on oils and fats. I took the opportunity to make clear that I would be looking for a green pound devaluation larger than that proposed by the Commission.

The Council will resume its discussions on 18 May.

Fishing Industry

Sir Michael Shaw asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when Fisheries Ministers have decided on new schemes for providing financial assistance to the fishing industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Following consultation with representatives of the fishing industry, my right hon. Friends and I are proceeding with the preparation of national schemes to implement the main provisions of EC regulation 4028/86 which was agreed by the Council of Fisheries Ministers at the end of last year. Orders under the Fisheries Act 1981 will be laid before Parliament shortly with a view to them coming into operation at the beginning of June. The orders will continue schemes for grants to assist vessel construction and modernisation, and the development of aquaculture, and to provide a limited measure of support for exploratory voyages and joint ventures. We do not, however, propose to continue with schemes for the decommissioning or laying-up of vessels, our view being that the limited financial resources available should at this stage be directed towards the modernisation of the fleet. With this in mind, priority under the new scheme will be given to vessels replacing those lost, urgent modernisation, and the replacement of vessels over 15 years of age.

Rates of grant available to vessels of less than 33m will generally be at the maximum rate of 30 per cent. permitted by the Council regulation, subject to the maximum grant payable in respect of any vessel being £250,000. However, in the case of applications for vessels over 24m from Northern Ireland and the west of Scotland, which also receive a grant from EC funds, the national grant will be abated so that the combined rate of grant received by such vessels in those areas exceeds that elsewhere by no more than 5 per cent. This will help to ensure that the financial advantage provided for in the Council regulation is principally for the benefit of local vessels. Rates of grant for larger vessels, greater than 33m in length, will be generally 10 per cent., subject again to a maximum of £250,000 for any one vessel. The detailed rates of grant for vessels up to 33m are set out in the annex.

These measures will continue the process of the adaptation of the fleet to future fishing opportunities and will concentrate grant aid where it is most needed.

Proposed rates of grant in the West of Scotland, Northern Ireland and other regions (per cent.)

	Community Aid	National Aid	Potential Combined Aid
	Vessels under 24 metres
West of Scotland and Northern Ireland	35	30	65
Other regions	20	30	50
	Vessels 24 metres and over up to 33 metres
West of Scotland and Northern Ireland	35	[1]20/30	55
Other regions	20	30	50

[1] 30 per cent. if no Community aid.

Note—The total amount of grant under the national scheme, payable in respect of a vessel under the same ownership, will be limited to £250,000.

Fisheries Policy

Mr. Pollock asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the Fisheries Ministers have completed their review of the restrictive licensing arrangements for pressure stocks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The Fisheries Ministers have thoroughly reviewed the restrictive licensing arrangements for pressure stocks which were originally introduced in 1984 for an initial three-year period. We have taken full account of the views expressed by the main organisations representing the fishing industry and of our experience of managing United Kingdom fisheries within the framework of the common fisheries policy as well as of the prospects for the years immediately ahead so far as these can be discerned.

Ministers have concluded, with the broad support of the fishing industry, that, given the likelihood of continuing pressure on the United Kingdom quotas for at least the 32 stocks currently designated as pressure stocks, the system of restrictive licensing for pressure stocks should continue and that certain steps should be taken to ensure that the system imposes greater restraints that hitherto on the growth of effective fishing capacity. We are, however, conscious that measurement of effective fishing capacity is a complex matter, involving a variety of factors and reflecting differences between different categories of vessel, and that no reliable measures of effective fishing capacity applicable to the United Kingdom fleet are currently available. We have accordingly decided to set in hand, in consultation with the industry, further work on this aspect.

In the meantime, we have decided that the further restriction on the transfer of pressure stock licences by reference to vessel length already introduced last November in respect of the area VII whitefish pressure stocks should now be made applicable to pressure stocks generally. Consequently, as from today, pressure stock licences will not be transferable from a vessel under 80 ft. in registered length to a vessel of 80 ft. or over. This restriction will apply in addition to the existing restriction on transfers from vessels under 40 ft. to vessels of 40 ft. or over and will thus create a system of three length bands for the purposes of pressure stock licensing. Consideration will be given on a case-by-case basis, in the light of the overall objective, to cases where the immediate application of this additional restriction would cause hardship as a result of financial commitments already entered into.

We have decided that, further to the measure announced earlier this year to withdraw pressure stock licences from inactive vessels, provision needs to be made on a continuing basis to prevent the licences of inactive or obsolete vessels being made available for transfer and thus increasing the effective capacity of the fleet. The details of such a provision will be the subject of further consultation with the industry.

When the restrictive licensing arrangements were introduced in 1984, provision was made on an exceptional basis for persons who were at that time "between boats", including owners of shipwrecked vessels, to be granted pressure stock licences for replacement vessels; provision was also made for owners of under 10m vessels with a record of pressure stock fishing in 1983-84 to be able to obtain a pressure stock licence for a replacement vessel of over 10m and under 40 ft. We consider that these two derogations, which were essentially of a transitional nature, have now served their purpose and should cease with effect from 1 January 1988.

We have also reviewed the additional special licensing restrictions, introduced in July 1985, applying to beam trawlers in area VII and have concluded that, in view of the continuing pressure on the quotas, particularly for sole and plaice in area VII, these restrictions should remain in force. We have, however, concluded that to assist owners of smaller beam trawlers in need of replacement a strictly limited element of relaxation can be allowed without jeopardising the overall purpose of the restrictions. We will therefore permit beam trawlers replacing existing licensed vessels in the under 80 ft category to exceed the registered length of the existing vessel by a margin of up to 10 ft, provided that the replacement vessel itself remains under 80 ft: to permit this relaxation to be effective the tonnage restriction will not apply in these cases, but the engine power of the replacement vessel will continue to be restricted to that of the existing vessel.

The additional special licensing restrictions applying to purse-seiners and freezer trawlers in the pelagic fisheries will remain in force on the basis announced earlier this year.

Ex-Spanish Fishing Vessels

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many ex-Spanish fishing vessels are now on the British register; and what was the total on 1 January.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 27 April 1987, c. 24]: Out of some 15,000 fishing vessels registered in the United Kingdom, 50 are ex-Spanish fishing vessels. A further 70 United Kingdom-registered fishing vessels formerly in British ownership are believed now to be beneficially owned in large part by Spanish interests.

At 1 January 1987, 50 ex-Spanish vessels had United Kingdom registration in addition to 49 other vessels which were believed to be beneficially owned largely in Spain.

EC (Food Sales)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the price at which butter, beef and sugar, respectively, were made available to traders, after the payment of export refund, to the Soviet Union, expressed in pound sterling per pound, at the most recent date for which figures are available.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 23 April 1987, c. 698]: The most recent sale of butter to the USSR was on 15 April. None was sold from the United Kingdom. Had any sales taken place from the United Kingdom the price to United Kingdom traders would have been nearly 20p per lb.

The most recent prices in sterling terms at which beef would have been made available to United Kingdom traders for sales to the USSR are:

bone-in forequarters—29p per lb.
bone-in hindquarters—45p per lb.
boneless cuts—38p to 56p per lb depending on the cut.

No sales have taken place from the United Kingdom for over a year.

The last export tender competition for sugar intervention stocks took place on 21 January. The free-on-board price was equivalent to around 7p per lb. There are currently no intervention stocks of sugar held in the United Kingdom.

Those prices are inclusive of export refunds and United Kingdom MCAs where applicable; the prices at which sales to the USSR are concluded are a matter for the traders concerned.

Tied Cottages

Mr. Strang asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications by landlords for repossession under the terms of the Rent (Agriculture) Act 1976, of an agricultural tied cottage there have been since the Act came into force; and how many alleged offence under section 28(11) and 28(14) of that Act there have been, together with details of the number of prosecutions subsequently brought, and the average fine imposed.

Mr. Donald Thompson [pursuant to his reply, 29 April 1987]: I regret that the information sought in the first part of the hon. Member's question is not kept centrally in the form requested. However, the following table shows the number of requests for agricultural dwelling house advisory committees (ADHACs) received in England since the Rent (Agriculture) Act 1976 came into operation.

Number of requests for ADHACs received 1976-86 in England

Year	Number
1976	n/a
1977	920
1978	876
1979	937
1980	711
1981	639
1982	644
1983	620
1984	567
1985	567
1986	496
Totals	6,977

Responsibility for prosecutions under section 28(11) and 28(14) of the Act lies with the housing authorities.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Care in the Community

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to his answer of 3 April, Official Report, columns 652-3, he will publish information available to him as to how many (a) mentally ill, (b) mentally handicapped and (c) elderly people have been discharged from hospitals on a regional health authority basis under the care in the community programme for each year since it was introduced.

Mrs. Currie: A breakdown by regional health authority of the figures supplied in my earlier reply is given in the table.

Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many representations he has received in 1987 from (a) hon. Members and (b) other people, concerning the timetable for implementing the full provisions of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: 216 representations have been received from hon. Members and 15 from other people or organisations since the beginning of 1987 about the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986. The majority of these have been concerned with implementation.

Tattoos

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for each health authority what is the average waiting time for an operation to remove a tattoo; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend the information he seeks. It is not held centrally.

Hospitals

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the costing returns submitted by health authorities in England showing total current expenditure on hospitals categorised as pre-convalescent and convalscent for each year from 1979 to date.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Social Service Departments

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the extent to which each local authority social service department is currently below its grant-related expenditure allocation; and how large a penalty they will incur in each case if they reach their grant-related expenditure allocation.

Mr. Newton: We do not collect information in a way which would enable valid comparisons to be made between individual authorities' actual expenditure on the personal social services and the relevant grant-related expenditure allocation levels. GREs for individual services are not designed as a basis for budget setting, but in aggregate with GREs for other services represent an assessment of the cost to each authority of providing a common standard of service, allowing for differences in the characteristics and needs of the different areas. It is for local authorities to determine spending on particular services in the light of their priorities and particular financial circumstances.

Hospital and Community Health Services

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate, for the year 1986-87, what the hospital and community health services gross current expenditure percentage change was after National Health Service pay and prices; and what was the percentage increase in demographic demand for that year.

Mr. Newton: Outturn expenditure figures for 1986-87 are not yet available.

Research Budget

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to his reply of 20 March to the hon. Member for Caernarfon, Official Report, columns 671-72, on his Department's research budget, he now intends to make an increase in his Department's research budget to meet the pay settlement for university research staff.

Mr. Newton: The implications of the pay settlement for non-clinical academic staff for the Department's research programme are still under consideration.

Sick Pay

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what will be the statutory sick pay of a person currently earning £75 per week who is in receipt of statutory sick pay for the first time this week; what would have been his statutory sick pay had such a person been taken sick in March 1987 or been eligible for statutory sick pay that month; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS Property (Norwich)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all National Health Service property within the Norwich health authority district stating acreage and value in each case and also giving the overall acreage and value.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 22 April 1987, c. 626]: The individual and total acreages of all the major properties held by the Norwich district health authority are set out as follows. In addition, the authority is responsible for a large number of much smaller sites currently used for such purposes as health centres, clinics and residential accommodation for staff.

	Acreage

TRANSPORT

Search-and-rescue Helicopter

Mr. Mackenzie asked the Secretary of State for Transport what, pursuant to his answer of 23 April, Official Report, column 684, is the range, carrying capacity and auto-hover capability of the new search-and-rescue helicopter to be based at Stornoway.

Mr. Moore: The aircraft to be based at Stornoway will be similar to the Sikorsky S61N Mark II provided under contract to the Department of Transport by Bristow Helicopters Ltd. for search and rescue (SAR) and based at Sumburgh, Shetland Isles. This aircraft is among the most advanced SAR helicopters in service anywhere. It will have full auto-hover and infra red detection capabilities. Its range and carrying capacity are largely interdependent and related to the aircraft weight including fuel at take-off and any time thereafter. In general, the aircraft should be capable of recovering about 15 survivors at a range of 150 nautical miles and returning to base.

However, until the Stornoway aircraft can be fully fitted out and to achieve the earliest possible operational date for the Hebrides base, a standard S61N is being provided in early May as an interim measure. The aircraft will have normal SAR capability but only limited effectiveness at night.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Inflation

1. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received regarding his policy towards inflation.

Mr. Lawson: The Government's success in bringing down inflation has been widely welcomed.

48. Sir John Farr asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the average rate of inflation for the past two years; and how this compares with the figures for the period 1977 to 1979.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The average rate of inflation for the past two years has been 4·1 per cent. at an annual rate. This compares with an average of 12·5 per cent. over the period 1977 to 1979.

Unemployment (Scotland)

2. Mr. David Marshall asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will prepare an estimate of the effect of the Budget on present levels of unemployment in Scotland.

Mr. MacGregor: The Budget continues the Government's policies creating a vigorous and expanding economy which is the surest route to increasing employment in all parts of the country, including Scotland. The reduction in taxation which my right hon. Friend announced improves incentives, and, if reflected in lower pay settlements, will make it easier for employers to take more people on. The reduction in borrowing maintains the conditions which have allowed inflation to fall to levels not seen for two decades, and which create an environment where industry can invest and enterprise can flourish.

Small Businesses (VAT)

4. Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received about his Budget proposals for help for small businesses over value added tax accounting; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The measures contained in my right hon. Friend's Budget Statement have been warmly welcomed.

Exchange Rate

11. Mr. O'Brien asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the present level of the exchange rate of the pound.

Mr. Lawson: The sterling index at noon today stood at 73·2.

Opposition Parties Policies (Costs)

12. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what resources are employed by Her Majesty's Treasury in costing spending programmes proposed by Her Majesty's Opposition.

38. Mr. Maclean asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what resources are employed by the Treasury in costing spending programmes proposed by Her Majesty's Opposition.

Mr. MacGregor: No additional resources are employed in the costings.

24. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will prepare estimates of the cost of the programmes announced by the Opposition parties.

43. Mr. Hind asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will prepare estimates of the cost of the programmes announced by the Opposition parties.

52. Mr. Forth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will prepare estimates of the cost of the programmes announced by the Opposition parties.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer my hon. Friends to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims).

Budget Proposals (Unemployment)

19. Dr. Godman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates he has made of the effect of the Budget on the latest level of unemployment.

20. Mr. Evans asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received regarding his estimate of the effect of his Budget measures on the level of unemployment in Britain.

Mr. MacGregor Unemployment has fallen by 180,000 over the past eight months and my right hon. Friend's Budget will maintain the conditions which enabled this welcome fall to occur.

Payroll Giving

21. Mr. William Powell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has about the response to the new payroll giving schemes.

23. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a further statement about the implementation of payroll giving schemes.

Mr. Ian Stewart I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) earlier today.

Economic Growth

22. Mr. Philip Oppenheim asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what detailed information he has as to how his forecast of growth in the British economy in 1987 compares with expected growth in other major economies.

Mr. Lawson: I expect the United Kingdom economy to grow by 3 per cent. in 1987. The latest IMF forecasts indicate that this will be a higher rate of growth than in any other major industrial country.

28. Mr. Forman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what detailed information he has as to how his forecast of growth in the British economy in 1987 compares with expected growth in other major economies.

29. Mr. Lawrence asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what detailed information he has as to how his forecast of growth in the British economy in 1987 compares with expected growth in other major economies.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer my right hon. Friend the Chancellor gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Mr. Oppenheim).

31. Mr. Hirst asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the most recent estimate of the underlying growth rate of the British economy.

58. Mr. Cockeram asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the most recent estimate of the underlying growth rate of the British economy.

59. Mr. Hayward asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the most recent estimate of the underlying growth rate of the British economy.

Mr. MacGregor: Measured at 1980 prices, the average estimate of gross domestic product at factor cost is provisionally estimated to have risen by ¾ per cent. in the year to the fourth quarter of 1986.

Local Authority Expenditure

25. Mr. Sackville asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he proposes to revise his estimates of public expenditure in 1987-88 in the light of budgets announced by local authorities.

32. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he proposes to revise his estimates of public expenditure in 1987-88 in the light of budgets announced by local authorities.

35. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the impact on the economy of the level of local authority rates and spending now announced for 1987-88.

40. Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he proposes to revise his estimates of public expenditure in 1987-88 in the light of budgets announced by local authorities.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave earlier today to my hon. friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt).

Unemployment

26. Mr. Kennedy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the matter raised in his reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye concerning the average per capita cost per annum of unemployment in that constituency as calculated by the unemployment unit.

Mr. MacGregor: I have nothing to add to the letter which I have sent the hon. Member. The estimates of benefit expenditure are consistent with those given to the House on previous occasions, but include housing benefit, which can be paid to people in work. The estimates of revenue foregone are so over-simplified as to be meaningless.

37. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will prepare an estimate of the total cost of unemployment to the Exchequer.

44. Mr. Clelland asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will prepare an estimate of the total cost of unemployment to the Exchequer.

Mr. MacGregor: The latest estimate of the cost of unemployment and supplementary benefit which will be paid to the unemployed in 1987-88 is £6·05 billion. In addition, it is estimated that £1·3 billion will be paid in housing benefit, a benefit which can continue to be paid if the recipient finds employment. It is not possible to estimate the revenue forgone.

Profit-Related Pay

27. Mr. John Browne asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what response he has received to the proposals for profit-related pay announced in his Budget.

30. Mr. Bright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what response he has received to the proposals for profit-related pay announced in his Budget.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to my hon. Friend the Member for Glandford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet).

Hospital Broadcasting (VAT)

33. Mr. Ancram asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the National Association of Hospital Broadcasting Organisations regarding the zero-rating of value added tax on its equipment purchases.

Mr. Brooke: I have received no representations directly from the National Association of Hospital Broadcasting Organisations. My colleagues and I have, however, received about 90 letters from local hospital radio organisations and their members.

Economic Performance

34. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the recent performance of the economy.

47. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received about the performance of the economy.

57. Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received about the performance of the economy.

62. Mr. Watts asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received about the performance of the economy.

Mr. MacGregor: The marked improvement in the United Kingdom's performance on productivity, growth and inflation, leading to the generation of over one million new jobs since June 1983, has been widely recognised and welcomed.

Payroll Giving

36. Mr. Pawsey asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a further statement about the implementation of payroll giving schemes.

45. Mr. Conway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has about the response to the new payroll giving schemes.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer my hon. Friends to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford on Avon (Mr. Howarth) earlier today.

Interest Rates

39. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of interest rates.

42. Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on United Kingdom interest rates.

55. Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will make a statement on the recent movement of interest rates.

60. Mr. Spencer asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received about the level of interest rates; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Bank base rates are 9½ per cent.

61. Mr. Hardy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how current interest rates in the United Kingdom compare with similar rates in the United States of America, West Germany, France and Japan.

Mr. Ian Stewart: In the United Kingdom, just as in the other G5 countries, interest rates are held at the level necessary to maintain appropriate monetary conditions.

Bank Lending

41. Mr. Adams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the present levels of bank lending.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The latest published figures are those for the end of December 1986, at which time banks' sterling lending outstanding to the non-bank private sector was around £170 billion.

Consumer Spending

46. Mr. Maxton asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the present levels of consumer spending.

Mr. MacGregor: Consumers' expenditure is forecast to grow at around 4 per cent. in real terms in 1987.

Value Added Tax

49. Mr. Harrison asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to extend the base of value added tax.

Mr. Lawson: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given earlier today to the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary.

66. Mrs. Ree asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were total value added tax revenues in 1985-86; and what is the latest estimated outturn for 1986-87.

Mr. Brooke: VAT revenue for 1985-86 was £19,331·4 million. The latest estimate for 1986-87 is £21,500 million.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

50. Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest forecast outturn for the public sector borrowing requirement for 1986-87.

Mr. MacGregor: The public sector borrowing requirement for 1986-87 is provisionally estimated at £3·3 billion, between ¼ and 1 per cent. of GDP.

Unemployment (Cost)

51. Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a further statement on his policy towards providing regional estimates of the cost to the Exchequer of unemployment in the light of the study on the subject by Sinfield and Fraser of Edinburgh University, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. MacGregor: No. Although the study to which the hon. Gentleman refers uses estimates of benefit expenditure which are consistent with those given to the House on previous occasions, they include housing benefit which can be paid to people in work. The estimates of revenue forgone, however, are so over simplified as to be meaningless.

Personal Equity Plans

53. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are his latest estimates of the full year cost of the personal equity plans.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The cost of the tax reliefs for personal equity plans will depend on the number of plans, the amounts invested, and the performance of the equities held. Costs in 1987-88 are expected to be about £25 million. Costs will build up in future years as investors take out more plans.

Council of Finance Ministers

54. Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when is the next meeting of European Economic Commission Finance Ministers.

64. Mr. Dykes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the items he proposes to discuss at his next meeting with his counterparts in the European Economic Community Finance Council.

Mr. Brooke: The next meeting of the EC Council of Economic and Finance Ministers is on 11 May. It is expected that the agenda will include the Commission's recent proposals on the future financing of the Community the reference framework for the 1988 Community budget; the directive on prospectuses to be published when securities are offered to the public; and an amendment to the directive on mutual recognition of listing particulars for admission of securities to official stock exchange listing.

Research and Development

56. Mr. Strang asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much the Government spent on research and development in 1986; and what proportion this represented of total Government expenditure.

Mr. MacGregor: Details of Government spending on research and development are contained in the 1986 annual review of Government-funded research and development which is published by HMSO. The information is available for financial years only and the estimated outturn for 1985-86 for total Government spending on research and development is £4,582·1 million which represents about 4·6 per cent. of central Government expenditure.

Income Tax and National Insurance

63. Mr. Chapman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of his gross earnings a single person earning half average industrial earnings will be paid out in income tax and national insurance contributions as a result of the Budget proposals; and how this compares with 1986-87 and 1978-79.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information for a single person on half average male, full-time manual earnings is as follows:

	Gross Earnings £ per week	Income tax and NIC per cent.
1978-79	42·40	22·0
1987-88	96·15	20·9

The earnings figures for 1986-87 and 1987-88 are provisional and are calculated by assuming increases of 7½ and 6½ per cent. respectively over the previous year (in accordance with the assumptions given to the Government Actuary for reviewing national insurance contributions in the autumn statement). It is assumed that national insurance contributions are paid at contracted in rates and that the only tax relief or allowance available to the taxpayer is the single person's allowance.

Manufacturing Industry

65. Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the wealth-producing sector of the economy was represented by manufacturing industry for each of the last eight years.

Mr. MacGregor: The information requested can be derived from table 2.1 or table 3.7 of the 1986 edition of "United Kingdom National Accounts" (the CSO "Blue Book"), a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Mortgage Interest Tax Relief

67. Mr. Jessel asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it remains his policy to allow mortgage tax relief to individuals purchasing houses.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Government have made it clear on many occasions that they have no intention of abolishing mortgage interest relief.

Stamp Duty

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what he ascribes the difference between the 1986 Budget estimate and the latest estimate of the revenue from stamp dutis in 1986-87; and if he will break down the figures in table 6B.3 of the financial statement and Budget report 1987-88 to show where the latest estimate diverged from the original forecast and where the forecast for 1987-88 differs from the latest estimate for 1986-87.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The difference can be ascribed mainly to increased turnover and prices in the property and stock markets. The breakdown of the figures requested is as follows:

(£ million)

	1986-87		1987-88
	Budget	[1]Outturn	Forecast
Land and buildings	605	710	875
Shares	590	850	890
Other duties	230	290	310
TOTAL (rounded)	1,430	1,850	2,100

[1] Latest estimate.

Ministers (Tax Affairs)

Mr. Canavan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any guidance has been given to Inland Revenue staff about handling requests from Ministers for advice about their own tax affairs.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No special guidance has been given. Ministers have the same rights as other taxpayers to receive assistance from the Inland Revenue in relation to their own tax affairs.

Controller of Stamps (Legal Advice)

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when the legal advice to which the Controller of Stamps referred in his letter of 19 February to Messrs Mosley, Chapman and Skemp, solicitors of Bore Street, Lichfield, for Mr. and Mrs. N. J. Keay of 13 Wissage road, Lichfield will be available;

(2) what are the reasons for the delay in conveying the definite decision on the stamp duty position as mentioned in the final paragraph of the Controller of Stamp's letter to Messrs Mosley, Chapman and Skemp, dated 2 November 1985 (ref: ADJ/45201/85/EMS);

(3) if he will make a statement setting out the reasons why the Controller of Stamps (Adjudication Section) at West Block, Barrington Road, Worthing, West Sussex has not resolved the matter first raised in a letter sent by Messrs Mosley, Chapman and Skemp, solicitors, of Lichfield, on behalf of Mr. and Mrs. N. J. Keay of 13 Wissage Lane, Lichfield in respect of stamp duty on a property transaction on 22 November 1985.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The delay has been due to the need for the Inland Revenue to take legal advice on this and a number of other similar cases. The Revenue hopes to be able to deal with the matter shortly.

Aviation Fuel (Iran)

Mr. Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will investigate the circumstances in which the oil tankers Paula Maersk and Ambio Fingo left Milford Haven laden with aviation fuel and ended up at Iran's Hormuz terminal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Unearned Income

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the annual saving to the Exchequer from unearned income paid abroad if the tax credit was raised from 27 per cent. to 35 per cent.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Building Societies

Mr. Bermingham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will introduce legislation to prevent the building societies from relying on a disclaimer in mortgage applications to avoid liability to purchasers of property for negligence on the part of the societies' own surveyor.

Mr. Howard: I have been asked to reply.
I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Isle of Man

Mr. Hancock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what contribution the Isle of Man makes to the Exchequer to cover the cost of services provided for it.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 29 April 1987]: The Isle of Man makes an annual contribution towards the cost of defence and other common services provided by the United Kingdom Government which in 1985-86, the last year for which figures are available, amounted to £1,004,166. The island also makes contributions in kind, notably the provision of military training facilities and a bombing range for the RAF; and pays the full costs of certain specific services for its residents, notably the provision of higher education and the accommodation of long-term prisoners (currently 10 in number).

Fee-charging Schools

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what have been the levels of public expenditure on fee-charging schools by (a) central Government and (b) local government in each of the last five years in constant 1986-87 prices.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The information requested is given in the following table:

Financial Year	DES expenditure (£m)	Local government expenditure (£m)
1982-83	15·0	136·0
1983-84	21·0	135·0
1984-85	27·0	132·0
1985-86	33·0	[1]125·0
1986-87	42·0	[2]125·0

[2] Estimated.

These figures do not include expenditure by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office or the Ministry of Defence on fee-charging schools. Such expenditure is the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and for Defence.

Science and Engineering Research Council

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much has been awarded in grants by the Science and Engineering Research Council to education institutions and others in each year since 1979: how much the council will disburse in the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden [pursuant to his reply, 8 April 1987, c. 220]: The question printed in the Official Report did not relate to the answer given. The question is as above; the answer remains as printed at column 220:

The information requested is as follows:

SERC research grants to education institutions and others

Financial year	Amount £ million (Cash)
1979-80	43·3
1980-81	56·2
1981-82	62·3
1982-83	67·6
1983-84	70·4
1984-85	78·8
1985-86	87·0
1986-87	[1]98·4
1987-88	[2]103·7

[1] Provisional outturn
[2] Estimates

The Science and Engineering Research Council's total grant-in-aid from the science budget in 1987-88 is £350 million. SERC's overall allocation is determined by my right hon. Friend in the light of advice from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils. The SERC is primarily responsible for deciding priorities within its overall allocation.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much has been disbursed by the Science and Engineering Research Council teaching in companies scheme in each year since the scheme was introduced; how much has been disbursed to (a) individuals and (b) companies in Yorkshire and Humberside in each year since this scheme was introduced; how much is to be disbursed to individuals and companies in Yorkshire and Humberside under the council's latest allocation; what representations about this allocation he has received; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden [pursuant to his reply, 31 March 1987, c. 447]: The answer printed in the Official Report is incorrect. The answer is as printed in the Official Report for 3 April at column 631:

The following table shows the information requested in the first part of the question:

Amount disbursed by SERC on teaching company scheme

£K

Financial Year	Net Expenditure[3]
1976-77	24·5
1977-78	81·5
1978-79	177·5
1979-80	231·5
1980-81	606·0
1981-82	663·5
1982-83	1,006·0
1983-84	1,600·0
1984-85	2,027·0
1985-86	2,452·5
1986-87	[1]2,760·0
1987-88	[2]3,585·0

[2] Estimates

[3] The teaching company scheme is jointly funded. Up to 1984-85, it was funded on a 50-50 basis by the SERC and the Department of Trade and Industry. Since 1985-86, the Economic and Social Research Council has contributed an additional £80,000 a year matched by the DTI. The Northern Ireland Department of Economic Development joined the scheme in 1986-87 when it contributed £20,000. Its estimated contribution in 1987-88 is £150,000.

Because of the way in which TCS records are held disproportionate cost would be involved in extracting figures for a particular region such as Yorkshire and Humberside. No representations about regional allocations have been received.

TCS grants are made to education institutes and not to individuals or companies.

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much has been awarded in grants by the Science and Engineering Research Council to (a) education institutions and (b) others in Yorkshire and Humberside in each year since 1979; how much the council will disburse in the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden [pursuant to his reply, 8 April 1987, c. 220]: The answer printed in the Official Report is incorrect. The answer is as printed in the Official Report for 31 March at column 447:

The Science and Engineering Research Council has been asked for this information. I shall reply as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

Community Charge

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the minimum level of the community charge to be paid by those on low incomes.

Dr. Boyson: We have received, and continue to receive, a substantial number of representations on this issue.

Council House Sales

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council dwellings were sold in the Corby district during 1986-87.

Mr. Tracey: Corby district has reported selling 229 council dwellings during the first nine months of 1986-87.

Litter

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the adequacy of the litter bins in (a) Kensington Gardens and (b) other royal parks; and if he will ensure that more and larger receptacles of decent design are provided before the summer season.

Mr. Waldegrave: We are currently reviewing our arrangements for litter collection in Kensington Gardens and the other royal parks. We are looking for improvements in both the collection arrangements and in the design and distribution of bins. We already provide extra bins for the summer season and bins are regularly emptied. But we are clearly not coping satisfactorily with removing the vast amounts of litter produced by visitors, particularly on warm weekends and bank holidays.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce legislation providing for fixed penalty fines for offences committed under the Litter Act 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government have no plans to introduce legislation providing for fixed penalties for littering. There are doubts about the practicability of applying such a system, bearing in mind the additional strain that it would place on the police and criminal justice system.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to empower traffic wardens to enforce anti-litter legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have no plans to introduce legislation to empower traffic wardens to enforce anti-litter legislation. The service is already fully stretched in performing the duties currently allotted to it, and to extend its range of activities would serve only to spread the scarce manpower resources more thinly and thus reduce the effectiveness of the service.

Flats

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the number of premises which contain 10 or more flats and which have 10 per cent. or more more vacant flats in (a) England and Wales and (b) London at the latest convenient date.

Mr. Tracey: This information is not available.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Fisheries (South Atlantic)

Mr. Warren asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the dates, locations and names of participants in the meetings with the Argentine Government, or their representatives, concerning the future of fisheries in the South Atlantic; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: There have been no such meetings.

Crown Agents Stamp Company

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy not to allow Volpone Investments to take over the Crown Agents Stamp Company.

Mr. Chris Patten: Any request which may be made for my consent for the sale by Crown Agents of the Crown Agents Stamp Company Ltd. will be carefully considered on is merits. No such request at present exists. It would be wrong for me to comment on particular companies in such circumstances.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals he has to ensure that staff transferred from the control of Crown Agents with the Crown Agents Stamp Company have their redundancy and transfer entitlements protected; and whether staff made redundant at a later date would be eligible to re-enter the Crown Agents or Civil Service.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Crown Agents are, of course, aware of their obligations to their staff, and will take full account of them in any detailed negotiations for the sale of the Crown Agents Stamp Company.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effects of the sale of the Crown Agents Stamp Company on its reputation for impartiality; what steps he has taken to ensure the maintenance of high standards in the operations of the Crown Agents Stamp Company following its sale; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The board of Crown Agents has concluded that it would be in the best interests of all concerned for both stamp companies (Crown Agents Stamp Company Ltd. and Crown Agents Philatelic Corporation) to be sold to an enterprise which would provide the commercial skills of an experienced private sector marketing organisation. No specific proposal for the sale of the companies has yet been put to me for consent under the 1979 Act. If and when one is, my decision will take into account factors such as those mentioned by the hon. Member.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Crown Agents or any other body will have a duty to ensure the proper conduct of the Crown Agents Stamp Company operation after the controlling interest is removed from the Crown Agents.

Mr. Chris Patten: Detailed terms and conditions of sale of a controlling interest in the Crown Agents Stamp Company have yet to be formulated. The Crown Agents board is well aware of the need to take account of the interests and concerns of its present clients.

WALES

Surgical Operations

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the number of surgical operations carried out in Wales in the years (a) 1970 to 1975, (b) 1975 to 1980 and (c) 1980 to 1985.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is as follows:

Number of surgical operations performed in Wales

	Numbers
1970	89,796
1971	92,788
1972	107,583
1973	104,860
1974	108,647
1975	104,231
1976	105,732
1977	122,066
1978	120,913

1981	130,184
1982	129,790
1983	159,911
1984	172,759
1985	173,445

Hospital Building

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many district general hospitals are under construction at the present time in Wales;

(2) how many district general hospitals are planned to be built in Wales (a) in the next five years and (b) in the next 10 years.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Major phases of construction are under way at four district general hospitals and are currently planned at seven. Two new district general hospitals are in the preliminary planning stage. Additionally, a large new hospital being built in Llanelli.

Mental Handicap

Mr. Rogers askded the Secretary of State for Wales what was the expenditure on providing (a) National Health Service residential and (b) other residential care for mentally handicapped people in Wales (a) in the years 1970 to 1975, (b) in the years 1975 to 1980 and (c) in the years 1980 to 1985, expressed in actual and in 1975 adjusted terms.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The readily available information is as follows:

Net expenditure on in-patients[1] at mental handicap hospitals

	Actual (£000's)	[2]1975-76 prices (£000's)
1976-77	8,775	7,753

Mental Illness

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the expenditure on providing (a) National Health Service residential and (b) other residential care for mentally ill people in Wales (i) in the years 1970 to 1975, (ii) in the years 1975 to 1980 and (iii) in the years 1980 to 1985 expressed in actual and in 1975 adjusted terms;

(2) what was the expenditure on providing community care for mentally ill people in Wales (a) in the years 1970 to 1975 (b) in the years 1975 to 1980 (c) in the years 1980 to 1985 expressed in actual and in 1975 adjusted terms.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The readily available information is as follows:

Net expenditure on in-patients[1] at mental illness hospitals

	Actual (£000's)	[2]1975-76 prices (£000's)
1976-77	21,745	19,212

Executive Committee NHS Directorate

Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what are the anticipated eventual capital costs in setting up the Executive Committee and the National Health Service Directorate for Wales;

(2) what are the anticipated eventual revenue costs in operating the Executive Committee and the National Health Service Directorate for Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The establishment of the Executive Committee of the Health Policy Board and the NHS Directorate are a consequence of a reorganisation of existing staff at the Welsh Office Health and Social Work Service Department following the implementation of the report of the Griffiths inquiry. The revenue costs of these staff in 1987-88 are expected to be about £1·75 million. There are no anticipated capital costs.

Cervical Carcinoma

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to reduce the maximum waiting time for in-patient treatment of cervical carcinoma at Singleton hospital, Swansea.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The radiotherapy and oncology service, including in-patient treatment of cervical carcinoma at Singleton hospital, Swansea, has been the subject of a review which has recently been completed. The results of this review are being considered.

M4 (Safety)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on road safety conditions on the M4 motorway between the junctions with the A470 and the A48(M); what steps he is taking to monitor traffic density on this stretch of the M4; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Accident records for the years 1984-86 indicate that road safety conditions on the M4 between junctions 29 and 32 compare very favourably with the rest of the motorway network. Traffic density on this stretch of the motorway is monitored by South Glamorgan county council and current indications are that traffic flows are well within its design capacity.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will improve the technological facilities available to general practitioners in Wales to enable them to provide up-to-date information to patients on waiting lists for hospital treatment everywhere in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Mark Robinson: GPs are private contractors and any improvement of technological facilities is therefore a matter for each practice to consider. The dissemination of hospital waiting list information is a matter for the district health authority. Generally in Wales such information is sent to GPs within the district, who are free to refer patients as they deem appropriate, both within and outside Wales, if the patients are willing to travel.

Mr. John asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list by hospital the waiting lists for in-patient and out-patient treatment in the South Glamorgan area health authority.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The requested information is given in the following table:

Total waiting list as at 31 December 1986

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Shareholders

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if, pursuant to his answer of 15 December, Official Report, column 345, on shareholders' lists, he will summarise the views of companies in relation to the supply of names and addresses of shareholders under section 356 of the Companies Act 1985.

Mr. Howard: The consultative document on "Delivery of Annual Accounts and Returns to the Registrar of Companies" raised a number of issues on registers of shareholders. It sought views on a proposal to change the requirement for companies annually to file a full copy of the register of shareholders at company registration offices, where they may be inspected or copied. It proposed, while retaining the duty of companies themselves to maintain full registers of shareholders and permit public inspection and copying of them, that filing of full lists be restricted to companies with fewer than 10 members; with other companies being required to file only the total number of shareholders together with a full list of those individually holding 1 per cent. or more of the company's shares. A majority of the 994 companies and representative organisations who responded favoured some change along the lines proposed, but there were mixed views about the degree of disclosure.

However, nearly all respondents agreed with a related proposal to raise the fees for inspection and copying of lists of members taken from company registers. Most also agreed that the Companies Act should be amended to allow these fees to be fixed by order.

House of Fraser

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the terms of reference of the inspectors appointed under the Companies Act to investigate the circumstances surrounding the acquisition of shares in House of Fraser during 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Howard: The inspectors were appointed under section 432 of the Companies Act 1985 to investigate and report on the affairs of House of Fraser Holdings plc. As I said in my answer of 27 April, at column 4, I have referred the inspectors in particular to the circumstances surrounding the acquisition of shares in House of Fraser plc in 1984 and 1985.

British Waterways Board

Mr. Bevan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the maintenance activities of the British Waterways Board will be published; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The report is published today.

The commission was asked to investigate the efficiency and costs of BWB's maintenance of its waterways. Particular aspects mentioned in the terms of reference included the scope for additional use of contractors or consultants, BWB's procedures for appraising maintenance requirements and assessing priorities, setting and implementing maintenance standards and estimating costs for in-house and contracted-out work. The commission was also asked to comment on how far BWB's maintenance operations were programmed to fit the current and future priorities of the leisure and freight departments.

The commission has made serious criticisms of much of BWB's management and procedures but noted that improvements in management and planning were taking place. The commission found that BWB was only just beginning to define national standards for maintenance. It needed to define maintenance tasks in detail as a step towards being able to compare in-house and contractors' costs systematically. These comparisons would help BWB to decide what work to do with its own labour force and what to contract out. The commission recommended that BWB should decide on the size and deployment of its labour force on the basis of a detailed assessment of work load, using the new definitions of maintenance standards and tasks, and of the cheapest ways of doing the work using reliable cost comparisons.

The commission considered that BWB's maintenance programme should reflect more closely the relative contributions of leisure and freight uses to revenue. It recommended that in appraising project proposals BWB should have regard to the relationship between income (or usage) and maintenance expenditure on individual waterways. While BWB's published objectives acknowledged that leisure use offered better prospects for increasing its income, the commission felt that this needed to have more practical recognition in the remit given to the area engineers about deciding what maintenance should be done.

The commission noted that BWB cannot in practice charge the users or beneficiaries for much of the maintenance work it does for public safety and health reasons, for drainage purposes and for some public leisure use. The commission suggested that the Department of the Environment should consider relating part of its grant to BWB to its costs arising from the public service aspects of maintenance. BWB's revenue from users, and its ability to increase such revenue, could then be more readily seen in the context of those costs relating to work done for users who could be charged.

Finally, as is usual in such references, the commission was asked to consider whether BWB is pursuing a course of conduct which operates against the public interest. It concluded that, in view of the difficult circumstances in which BWB had to operate, and its acknowledgement of the need for change, the shortcomings identified could not be judged to operate against the public interest. But the commission stressed the need for BWB to deal expeditiously with the report's recommendations and suggested that a further external review should take place in five years' time.

BWB will be producing its preliminary response to the commission's findings within three to four months, in the light of which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will make a statement.

PRIME MINISTER

Financial Management Initiative

Sir Philip Holland asked the Prime Minister when she expects the main programme of the financial management initiative in relation to non-departmental public bodies to be completed; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The programme of work I announced on 19 November 1984, at columns 57-58, has now largely been completed. The purpose of the programme was to produce progressive value for money improvements in executive non-departmental public bodies.

UN Environment and Development Report (Ministerial Speech)

Dr. David Clark asked the Prime Minister if the speech by the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Planning on the occasion of the launch of the United Nations world commission on environment and development report on 27 April represents Government policy; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Yes. My hon. Friend welcomed the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development on behalf of the Government. The report raises a number of complex issues which we are now studying in detail. In his remarks, my hon. Friend referred to the initiative taken by the Government on the problem of the debt burden of the poorest Sub-Saharan African countries which was announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the spring meetings of the World Bank and the IMF at the beginning of April.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Waltham Forest Demonstration

Mr. Deakins asked the Attorney-General if he intends to prosecute any of the speakers at a demonstration outside Waltham Forest town hall on 9 April for racial abuse, incitement to racial harassment or incitement to violence.

The Solicitor-General: No complaints of criminal offences arising out of this incident have been received by the Crown prosecution service or by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General.

Land Registry

Dr. David Clark asked the Attorney-General what plans the Government have to make the Land Registry more accessible to the public, in line with the 1985 Law Commission recommendations; and if he will make a statement.

The Solicitor-General: The Government will make a decision on the proposals contained in the Law Commission's report No. 148 on opening the land register when it has completed its consideration of the representations received.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the Commission has now brought forward proposals for the revaluation of the deutschmark for purposes of the common agricultural policy; and to what extent common agricultural policy prices for the United Kingdom will be affected.

Mr. Gummer: As part of the 1987 price fixing the Commission has proposed revaluation of the green deutschmark by 2·9 points for milk and milk products, 2·4 points for cereals, eggs and poultry, and 1·8 points for other sectors. Common agricultural policy support prices in the United Kingdom will not be affected by the adoption of this proposal.

Monetary Compensatory Amounts

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the result of his representations to the Republic of Ireland about delays in payments of monetary compensatory amounts to farmers in Northern Ireland; if these delays are still continuing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Payments generally are now being made more promptly by the Republic of Ireland authorities, but there are still some monetary compensatory amount claims under query for which payments have been outstanding for some time. It is hoped that measures taken as a result of the useful discussions my officials have had with officials from the Republic of Ireland will enable these payments also to be released before long.

Sea Defence and Coast Protection

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking towards harmonising the grant rates for sea defence and coast protection.

Mr. Jopling: I announced in February that the maximum rate of grant for sea defence schemes carried out by water authorities was being increased to 65 per cent. with effect from 1 April 1987. The Secretary of State for Wales and I have also decided that the maximum rate of grant for schemes under the Coast Protection Act 1949 should be reduced from 79 per cent. to 70 per cent. for all schemes where the full application for approval is received by the Department concerned on or after 1 October 1987.

From the same date we will also be introducing for such schemes a condition under which the rate of grant notified when the scheme is approved will be available for a fixed period which will normally allow two years for the construction work. Work not completed within this period will qualify for the rate of grant applicable at the time it is carried out.

ENERGY

Renewable Energy

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will provide a detailed breakdown of funds provided for research into renewable energy forms for each of the past five financial years, and the amounts currently allocated for the present financial year.

Mr. David Hunt: My Department's expenditure on individual technologies for each of the past five financial years and the budget provision for the current financial year is as follows:

£ million

	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	Estimated Outturn 1986-87	Budget Provision 1987-88

Coal Industry

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish, by areas, figures for fatalities in the coal industry for 1985-86.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 12 March at columns 280-81.

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish, by areas, figures of serious accidents in the coal industry in 1985-86.

Mr. David Hunt: Figures of serious accidents in the coal industry for 1985-86 are as follows:

Area	Numbers
Scottish	63
North Yorkshire	100
North Derbyshire	59
South Midlands	40
Western	65
North East	80
South Yorkshire	86
Nottinghamshire	115
Kent	5
South Wales	91

I regret that the footnote to my answer of 12 March, at columns 281-82, should have read:

"The Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1985, which came into effect on 1 April 1986, required the reporting of accidents which were not originally included. The figures for 1986-87 will therefore be calculated on a different basis to earlier years."
Source: British Coal Corporation.

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has received any representations from the British Coal Corporation under sections 6 and 7 of the Coal Industry Act 1987.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have received representations from the British Coal Corporation under section 7 of the Coal Industry Act 1987 stating that the UDM represents a substantial proportion of the members of the mineworkers pension scheme (MPS) but lacks the right to participate fully in that scheme.

I have also received represention from the British Coal Corporation under section 6 of the Coal Industry Act 1987 stating that there are four organisations representing a substantial proportion of the corporation's employees or of any class of them who do not enjoy as of right full participation in the social welfare body known as the Coal Industry Social Welfare Organisation (CISWO). These are the Union of Democratic Mineworkers (UDM) and the Association of Professional, Executive, Clerical and Computing Staff (APEX), the British Association of Colliery Management (BACM) and the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers (NACODS).

Having considered these representations, I propose to make orders under sections 6 and 7 to permit such participation, and my Department has sent formal letters of consultation on the appropriate changes to the memorandum and articles of association of CISWO and to the MPS to the corporation, those organisations and the National Union of Mineworkers (NUM), as required under the Act. They have been asked to make such representations as they may wish by 15 June.

The Government made clear during the passage of the Act their determination to see removed injustices in these areas caused by NUM intransigence.

Coal Industry (Accidents)

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his answer of 6 April, Official Report, column 6, if he will take steps to produce details of all fatal accidents which have occurred in the coal industry for the year 1986-87, broken down according to coalfield areas, as soon as possible.

Mr. David Hunt [pursuant to his reply, 10 April 1987, c. 447-48]: Details of fatal accidents in the coal industry for 1986-87 are as follows:

Area	Numbers
Scottish	1
North Yorkshire	4
North Derbyshire	1
Western	0
North East	0
South Yorkshire	4
Nottinghamshire	2

TRANSPORT

Summer Morn

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in view of the Summer Morn incident in the Irish sea on 18 February 1987, he will now ensure that all inspectors' reports into the disappearance of vessels in the Irish sea over the period of five years are published in full.

Mr. Moore: Three United Kingdom fishing vessels have disappeared in the Irish sea in unexplained circumstances between 1982 and 1986. Inspectors' reports are confidential to my Department and the reports on those three losses will not be published, but the Department's investigations found no evidence of submarine involvement as there was in the Summer Morn incident.

North Circular Road

Mr. Fry asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when the public inquiry concerning the upgrading of a section of the north circular road at Ealing in west London commenced; when it was completed; when the inspector's report was received; and when a decision concerning this road improvement will be announced;

(2) if he will state the reasons for the delay in reaching a decision concerning proposals to upgrade a section of the north circular road at Ealing in west London following submission of the inspector's report after the public inquiry.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The public inquiry into the proposed improvement of the north circular road between Popes lane and the A40 opened in December 1983 and closed in June 1984. The inspector submitted his report in April 1985. I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) on Tuesday 7 April 1987 at column 125.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Peter Rees asked the Secretary of State for Transport what account he took of the possibility of earth tremors in approving plans for the Channel tunnel.

Mr. Moore: The possibility of earth tremors affecting the tunnel was examined in detail for the 1973 Channel tunnel project by distinguished geologists from the Institute of Geological Science (now the British Geological Survey), the Bureau de Recherches Geologiques et Minieres, and the British and French consulting engineers employed on the project. After examining all the historical evidence of earthquakes in the area, including the one in 1580 referred to in a recent article in the New Scientist, and undertaking sophisticated measurements of the present geology of the area, the conclusion was that the risk to a bored tunnel was very low indeed.

This evidence was reviewed again by consultants to the present promoters, who included a special section on seismicity in their proposal. The Government assessors who examined the engineering aspects of all the proposals put forward agreed with the view that the risk was very slight, and stated that "displacements during a very large earthquake would be in the order of millimetres and damage would be nominal only."

Dangerous Chemicals (Transport)

Mr. Onslow asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action his Department takes to monitor the carriage of dangerous chemicals by road within the United Kingdom; and how many breaches of the relevant regulations have been drawn to his attention in each of the past four years for which statistics are available.

Mr. Moore: Responsibility for enforcing the regulations on the carriage of dangerous substances by road rests with the Health and Safety Executive. It is supported in this by the police and by my Department's traffic examiners, who carry out checks on vehicles carrying out dangerous substances from time to time.

There is no central record of offences.

Disabled People, Merseyside

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on transport provision made for disabled people on Merseyside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Passenger transport authorities and their executives have a statutory duty to have regard to the transport needs of the disabled in arranging for public transport provision in their area. It is for them to judge how best this duty can be met.

I understand that in Merseyside the passenger transport executive recently let a fresh contract for the provision of special transport for the disabled. It has set aside £500,000 for this purpose in 1977-88—an increase of £200,000 on last year's expenditure.

Pedestrian Crossings

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his policy towards the provision of zebra crossings and on circulars issued to local authorities on the safety of such crossings.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Zebra crossings can improve road safety in certain circumstances where there is high conflict between pedestrian and vehicular traffic. We commend their use. The Department issued advice on these crossings covering inter alia, road safety aspects in advice note TA/10/80 "Design Considerations for Pelican and Zebra Crossings", a copy of which is in the Library. This advice has recently been revised. I will write to the hon. Member enclosing the latest information.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many zebra crossings and how many pelican crossings with lights have been authorised on roads for which he is responsible in each year since 1979.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The approximate numbers of such crossings are as follows:

	Pelican Crossings	Zebra Crossings
1979	29	3
1980	23	2
1981	19	5
1982	16	0
1983	18	1
1985	41	1
1986	26	1

Sail Training Vessel Marques (Loss)

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has received the report of the investigation into the loss of the Marques; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I have now received the report of the formal investigation into the loss of the sail training vessel Marques in the Atlantic in June 1984 with a loss of 19 lives, and I have placed a copy in the Library.

The report concludes that the cause of the loss of the Marques was an unexpected and violent squall which resulted in the severe heeling, flooding and sinking of the ship. The report finds that it was not the fault of any person or persons that the Marques had insufficient stability to resist the squall, but comments that, if judged by the knowledge and experience now available, the stability of the Marques would be found to have been inadequate and the vessel unseaworthy for operation as a sail training ship in non-coastal waters.

The report finds that the Marques was in a proper state of repair, and that so far as the structure of the vessel was concerned she was in a safe and seaworthy condition. It also finds that, with certain reservations, she was properly manned and sailed.

The report's main recommendation is that criteria should be developed for assessing safe standards of stability for sail training ships. As the report notes, the Department of Transport has already commissioned technical studies with this in view. This work will be taken forward as rapidly as possible, in conjunction with the organisations responsible for sail training, with a view to the publication of a merchant shipping notice on standards of stability for sailing ships. These criteria will in future be applied in considering applications for load line certificates or load line exemption certificates in respect of sail training ships. The report also contains a number of other recommendations concerned with the operation of ships of this kind and with the conduct of races involving sail training ships. These recommendations will all be followed up in consultation with the organisations involved.

The report contains a number of criticisms, including criticism of the Department of Transport's decision to issue a load line exemption certificate for the vessel when stability data were not available, and concludes that without such stability information the ship was unseaworthy: however, it finds that the failure to provide this information did not cause the loss of the vessel. The Department notes this finding, which relates to a difficult judgment which was required to be taken about a vessel with a long record of safe operation worldwide in all weather conditions. Load line exemption certificates will not in future be issued in the absence of stability data.

Lorries (Offences)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list in the Official Report the number of convictions obtained in each magistrates court area since May 1985 against owners and drivers of motor lorries which were being used when the permitted second axle weight was exceeded and against owners and drivers of motor lorries which were used when the permitted gross weight was exceeded, both offences contrary to section 40(5) of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1972, and the level of fine imposed on each occasion on the driver and the owner.

Mr. Mellor: I have been asked to reply.

No reliable information is available separately for goods vehicles. The readily available information relates to all findings of guilt for offences of exceeding the gross weight or axle weight and is published annually in "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles England and Wales . . . Supplementary Tables" (table 5 of the issue for 1985). Table 6 of the same publication gives information on fines imposed and table 17 on findings of guilt in each police area for all types of load offence. More detailed information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Prisons (Integration)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the practice of integration in Northern Ireland prisons, stating what practices apply in which prisons.

Mr. Scott: The Government remain of the view that the allocation of prisoners to accommodation without regard to paramilitary affiliation or religious denomination makes for more effective security and control and gives prisoners a better opportunity to serve their sentences free from paramilitary influence. Segregation can provide the opportunity for paramilitary organisations to increase their hold on prisoners and to organise cohesive action of a disruptive nature.

The remaining special category prisoners continue to be housed in compounds at Her Majesty's prison Maze according to paramilitary faction and there is de facto segregation in some cellular wings in the prison; prisoners in all other prisons are housed in mixed accommodation.

ACE Programme

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many jobs are currently available through the ACE programme; how many applicants have sought the chance to establish an ACE project in Northern Ireland since its inception; how many jobs have been created; how many proposals have been turned down; and how many are awaiting a decision.

Mr. Viggers: There are currently 6,886 ACE jobs in existence; 1,591 applicants have applied to establish an ACE project since the scheme was introduced. The average number of ACE jobs created each year since 1981 is as follows:

Period	Average number of jobs created
1981-82	430
1982-83	1,270
1983-84	2,529
1984-85	3,080
1985-86	3,890
1986-87	6,150

Note: 26 proposals have been rejected; and 110 new proposals at present await a decision.

Integrated Education

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether any of the funds being made available to Northern Ireland from American sources will be used for integrated education.

Mr. Scott: The disbursement of funds from the International Fund for Ireland is a matter for the independent board appointed by the Governments of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland.

Prisoners

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the levels of education, pastoral care and psychological help available to prisoners in Northern Ireland prisons.

Mr. Scott: The level of care and attention given to prisoners in these and other respects is of a high standard and I am satisfied with the services provided by teachers, medical staff and prison chaplains. In common with all aspects of the regime, the provision of education, religious ministration and health care are kept under review.

Devolution

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a further statement on his policy towards devolved government in Northern Ireland in the light of the proposals contained in the Ulster Defence Association's document, entitled "Commonsense," a copy of which has been sent to him.

Mr. Tom King: It remains the Government's objective to establish in Northern Ireland a system of devolved government that would command widespread acceptance throughout the community. Any recognition of the need for the involvement of the minority in such a system is welcome, since it would be essential to the achievement of widespread acceptance. Progress towards devolution now depends on the constitutional political parties. I hope, therefore, that talks involving those parties may soon take place.

St. Angelo Airport

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the future of St. Angelo airport.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for Fermanagh district council, the owner of the airport, but I understand that the council is currently negotiating an agreement with a private aviation interest under which the company concerned would accept full responsibility for maintaining and running the airport.

Terrorists

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons convicted of terrorist offences are currently in prison in the Province; how many are men and how many women; and what is the average length of sentence served in prison for such crimes.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

EMPLOYMENT

YTS

Mr. Conway asked the Paymaster General what has been the percentage job placement from the YTS in the Shrewsbury travel-to-work area in the last period for which figures are available.

Mr. Trippier: The information is not available in the form requested.

The MSC conducts a regular follow-up survey of YTS leavers. The latest results for the local authority district of Shrewsbury, covering leavers during the period 1 April 1986 to 31 September 1986, show that some three months after leaving 63 per cent. were in full-time employment; 5 per cent. were in part-time employment; 3 per cent. were on a full-time course; 9 per cent. were on another YTS scheme; 4 per cent. were doing something else; and 16 per cent. were unemployed.

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Paymaster General if he will announce the numbers currently leaving YTS and going into employment.

Mr. Trippier: The Manpower Services Commission conducts a regular follow-up survey of all YTS leavers. The latest results, covering leavers during the period 1 April 1986 to 31 September 1986, show that some three months after leaving 65 per cent. were in full-time employment; 4 per cent. were in part-time employment; 4 per cent. were on a full-time course at a college or training centre; 5 per cent. were on another YTS scheme; 3 per cent. were doing something else; and 20 per cent. were unemployed.

The figures do not total 100 per cent. due to rounding.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Amess asked the Paymaster General if he will give the number of unemployed people in Basildon for the last month for which he has figures and for each equivalent period in each of the past five years.

Mr. Trippier: The following information is in the Library.

The table shows the numbers of unemployed claimants in the Basildon local authority area from March of each year from 1984. Statistics of unemployment for local areas are derived from the ward-based system and are available only from June 1983. The comparison is affected by the change in the timing of the compilation of the count in March 1986.

	Number
March 1984	8,775
March 1985	9,331
March 1986	8,823
March 1987	8,018

Mr. Hannam asked the Paymaster General if he will list the unemployment figures for Exeter for March in each of the years 1975 to 1987.

Mr. Trippier: The following information is in the Library.

The table shows the number of unemployed claimants in the Exeter local authority district for March of each year from 1984. This comparison is affected by the change in the timing of the compilation of the count in March 1986. Statistics of unemployment for local authority districts are derived from the ward-based system and are available only from June 1983.

	Number
March 1984	4,430
March 1985	4,998
March 1986	4,982
March 1987	4,636

Redundancies

Mr. John asked the Paymaster General what was the cost to public funds of redundancies in the following firms: (a) Webglow Limited, (b) Summit Operation Services Limited, (c) Recording Audio Myers Limited, (d) Bulldog Reclamations Limited and (e) Taylor Stenmec Limited; and whether the firms named met part of the cost of redundancies.

Mr. Trippier: There has been no cost to public funds in respect of any redundancies which may have occurred at these firms.

Mr. John asked the Paymaster General what was the cost to public fund of redundancies in the following firms: (a) Hymid Graemross Limited, (b) Homebean Limited, (c) Benchase Limited, (d) Cliffmore Limited and (e) Powerspeed Limited; and whether the firms named met part of the cost of redundancies.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is shown in the table:

Firm	Cost to public funds[1] £	Firm's contribution to cost[2] £
Hymid Graemross Ltd.	Nil	n/a
Homebean Ltd.	Nil	n/a
Benchase Ltd.	Nil	n/a
Cliffmore Ltd.	Nil	n/a
Powerspeed Ltd.	27,360·01	20,004·46

[1] The sum represents redundancy payments made direct to employees out of the redundancy fund.

[2] When a direct redundancy payment is made to an employee, the employer automatically incurs a debt to the redundancy fund. The sum therefore represents the amount repaid to the fund, less any rebate that would otherwise be due.

n/a Not applicable

Mr. John asked the Paymaster General what was the cost to public funds of redundancies in the following firms: (a) Birkett-Ycol Limited, (b) Boulton Fabrications Limited, (c) Whitfield Wylie Limited, (d) The Long Wire Company Limited, (e) The Manor Engineering Company Limited and (f) Brownsior Caludon Engineering Limited; and whether the firms named met part of the cost of redundancies.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is shown in the table:

Firm	[1] Cost to Public Funds £	[2] Firm's Contribution to cost £
Birkett Wycol Ltd.	nil	[3]n/a
Boulton Fabrications Ltd.	2,839·56	139·56
Whitfield Wylie Ltd.	nil	[3]n/a
The Longford Wire Co. Ltd.	112,342·01	1,962·81
The Manor Engineering Co. Ltd.	96,328·92	15,982·14
Brownsoov Caludon Engineering Co. Ltd.	52,126·93	10,276·63

[1] The sums represent both redundancy payments made direct to employees out of the redundancy fund and rebates paid to the firm out of the fund in the last three years.

[2] When a direct redundancy payment is made to an employee, the employer automatically incurs a debt to the redundancy fund. The sums therefore represents the amount repaid to the fund, less any rebate that would otherwise be due.

[3] n/a Not applicable

Mr. John asked the Paymaster General what was the cost to public funds of redundancies in the following firms: (a) Hayes Shelicast Limited, (b) South Wales Forgemasters Limited, (c) Belgrave Engineering Limited, (d) Belgrave Parsons Limited, (e) Belgrave Transmission Limited and (f) Belgrave Finery Limited.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is shown in the table:

Firm	[1] Cost to Public Funds £	[2] Firm's Contribution to cost £
Hayes Shelfcast Ltd.	59,731·48	1,731·48
South Wales Forgemasters Ltd.	274,236·76	—
Belgrave Engineering Ltd.	77,325·42	43,867·32
Belgrave Parsons Ltd.	77,201·49	11,135·73
Belgrave Transmission Ltd.	nil	[3]n/a
Belgrave Finery Ltd.	nil	[3]n/a

[1] The sums represent both redundancy payments made direct to employees out of the redundancy fund and rebates paid to the firm out of the fund in the last three years.

[2] When a direct redundancy payment is made to an employee, the employer automatically incurs a debt to the redundancy fund. The sums therefore represents the amount repaid to the fund, less any rebate that would otherwise be due.

[3]n/a Not applicable.

Health and Safety

Mr. Michie asked the Paymaster General whether Her Majesty's Government have complied with European Community amending directive 82/501/EEC on the major accident hazards of certain industries.

Mr. Trippier: Directive 82/501/EEC is implemented on Great Britain by the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards (CIMAH) Regulations 1984. Directive 87/216/EEC, which amends directive 82/501/EEC, was adopted in 19 March 1987 and notified to Her Majesty's Government on 24 March 1987. Member states must comply with the amendment within 18 months of notification, and work has already commenced to amend the CIMAH regulations.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Care Proceedings

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many applications for care proceedings were made in juvenile courts in 1984, 1985 and 1986;

(2) if he will estimate the number of applicants for care proceedings in the juvenile courts for the first quarter of 1987.

Mr. Mellor: The information which is readily available to me and is known to be incomplete, relates to applications for orders in civil care proceedings under the Children and Young Persons Act 1969. This indicates that there were about 5,200 such applications in 1984, and 5,600 in 1985. Information for 1986, and for the first quarter of 1987, is not yet available.

Correspondence

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he hopes to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne, dated 21 February, concerning matters raised by Mrs. Vivienne Stephens, of 1 North Roskear village, Camborne, Cornwall.

Mr. Hurd: I have today written to my hon. Friend.

Trevi Ministers (Meeting)

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the outcome of the recent meeting of Trevi Ministers in Brussels.

Mr. Hurd: Trevi Ministers met in Brussels on 28 April under the Belgian presidency. This meeting was part of the regular pattern of Trevi business and follows on from the previous meeting in London on 9 December last, under my chairmanship, and later work by officials.

Ministers agreed to establish new arrangements for the exchange of information on significant thefts of arms or explosives, or discovery of arms or explosives, which might be of terrorist significance. We also approved practical arrangements whereby a Community country which refused to admit or deport a non-Community national for reasons connected with terrorism would inform other Community countries of its decision, together with identifying particulars. We further agreed to inform the European Commission of our view that any new measures to facilitate the free movement of goods within the Community should not inhibit national authorities making such checks as they thought appropriate on the movement of firearms across Community frontiers.

Ministers welcomed progress towards full operation of a secure communications link between police forces, and approved plans for the regular updating of the assessment of the terrorist threat to Community countries which had been adopted at our meeting in London last December.

The United Kingdom will organise and host two Trevi conferences later this year: one of directors of forensic and scientific laboratories to discuss the detection of firearms and explosives at airports; the other of national correspondents of member states dealing with the problem of football hooliganism.

We agreed principles for the sharing of information and practical co-operation so that a drugs liaison officer representing one Community country in a country outside the Community could, by agreement, conduct inquiries on behalf of, and provide information to, other Community countries. More detailed arrangements will be developed further by officials.

For obvious reasons, much of what Trevi discusses, especially on terrorism, cannot be made public. But this was a productive meeting which carried still further the co-operation within the Community on matters of crimes of terrorism.

The growing importance of Trevi was shown by the fact that the US Attorney-General, the Canadian Solicitor-General and the Austrian Minister of the Interior came to discuss in the margins of our meeting how their countries should be associated with our work.

Immigration

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the outcome of the recent meeting of the Ministers of the European Community responsible for immigration.

Mr. Hurd: At a meeting in London in October, during the United Kingdom presidency, the Ministers of the states of the European Community responsible for immigration set up an ad hoc working group of senior officials. At our meeting in Brussels on 28 April, which was also attended by my noble Friend Lord Cockfield, a vice-president of the European Community, my ministerial colleagues and I, considered the first report from this group and agreed on a number of important steps to co-ordinate our methods of immigration control and our response to the growing abuse of the right to claim asylum, and the increased use of forged or fraudulent documents.

The meeting recognised that the strengthening of immigration controls at the external frontiers of the Community was a necessary complement to the movement towards gradual abolition of border checks at its internal frontiers. Ministers instructed officials to pursue vigorously their work on the greater harmonisation of the visa policies of the different countries in the Community since this had an important part to play in the strengthening of controls.

As regards claims to asyluth Ministers agreed to recommend all member states to take a number of measures, in line with action that some countries, including the United Kingdom had taken, or were considering. These included making provision which would > make carriers responsible for removing someone brought by them into a Community country without the required documents and meeting the cost involved; make possible the impositon of penalties on carriers who bring passengers without the required documents; establish simplified procedures for reaching decisions where asylum was claimed but the application was unjustified because it clearly failed to meet the requirements of the 1951 contention.

Finally, my colleagues and I endorsed recommendations from officials to combat the use of forged and fraudulent documents. These included the preparation and circulation to the immigration authorities of all our countries of an information bulletin giving particulars of cases of fraud that had been detected.

The working group of officials will continue its study of the response that the countries of the Community can make to what are common problems, and will report again to Ministers later in the year.

Immigration (Detention)

Sir Julian Ridsdale asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase the accommodation available for the detention of persons under the Immigration Act 1971.

Mr. Hurd: In the light of continuing pressure on existing accommodation for the detention of persons under the Immigration Act 1971, I have decided that the most effective and economic way to provide more detention accommodation for immigration purposes quickly will be to lease a ship. My Department has therefore agreed to charter from Sealink the motor vessel Earl William. The charter is for three months in the first instance.

The ship will be moored at Harwich and will remain alongside the quay throughout its use as an immigration detention centre. In common with existing immigration detention centres, care of the detainees will be the responsibility of Securior. Catering services will be provided by a private contractor.

The Earl William is a modern car ferry; sleeping accommodation is in four-berth cabins, each with integral sanitation. In practice we would expect the number accommodated to be no more than 120, which is about half the total passenger capacity of the vessel. The public rooms on the ship will provide adequate space for relaxation and visits by relatives, friends and lawyers in comfortable but not luxurious conditions. The ship will be available to the Home Office from about 11 May and the first detention cases will go on board about the middle of May.

Drug Misuse and Crime

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out in the Official Report details of the research known to his Department on the relationship between drug misuse and crime.

Mr. Mellor: There has been a great deal of research on this subject. Three recent major studies are referred to in "Criminal Justice: A Working Paper", a copy of which is in the Library. An account of present and proposed studies funded by the Home Office will be included in the Home Office research programme 1987-88, which is to be published shortly.

Prisons (Medical Services)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will set out in the Official Report details of research commissioned by his Department into the psychiatric needs of the prison population;

(2) what research has been commissioned by his Department into the case for specialist psychiatric units within the prison system for prisoners not regarded as detainable under the Mental Health Act; and when he expects a decision to be taken on the case for such units.

Mr. Mellor: The study referred to in the reply given to a question to the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) on 16 February, at column 436, will provide definitive data on which the prison medical service may consider the particular needs for this part of the prison population. The study is expected to take three years. In the meantime, censuses of mentally disturbed prisoners undertaken by medical officers provide a starting point for the development of improved arrangements for their care and management. It is not envisaged that such arrangements will amount to separate psychiatric units.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the study of the practicability, costs and benefits of clustering prison establishments in groups to enable one establishment to act as a main centre providing medical services for the others to be completed.

Mr. Mellor: This is a long-term study, for which a completion date has yet to be set.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the visit to Scotland by the head of prison nursing services to examine arrangements for nurse officer training in the Scottish prison service is expected to take place.

Mr. Mellor: A date has yet to be set.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions in the last five years prisoners have petitioned him seeking a second medical opinion; and what response was made to each such petition.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not statistically recorded.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many consultant psychiatrists employed by the prison service do not have control of National Health Service beds.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not readily ascertainable from central records and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Prisons (Hygiene)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out the professional qualifications held by each of his Department's safety officers responsible for carrying out hygiene inspections of prison service establishments; and how many such officers are currently in post.

Mr. Mellor: There are six health and safety officers in post and two vacancies are being advertised. All hold the Royal Institute of Public Health and Hygiene certificate in food hygiene and the handling of food; five hold the Royal Institute of Public Health and Hygiene diploma in food hygiene.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the recent instructions issued by his Department on hygiene inspection of prison establishments and on procedures to be followed in cleaning prison kitchens.

Mr. Mellor: No. The recent instructions on hygiene inspections set out detailed arrangements for the cleaning of prison kitchens to ensure that the Department meets the requirements of the Food Hygiene (General) Regulations 1970. But it is not normal practice to publish management instructions to staff.

Occupational Health Review

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will set out the main steps being taken to implement the recommendations of the occupational health review, referred to in the Government reply to recommendation 21 of the Third Report from the Social Services Committee in Session 1985-86.

Mr. Mellor: The main steps being taken to implement the recommendations of the occupational health review carried out by the Department are as follows:

1. The reintroduction of medical exainations for new recruits.
2. The further development of a pilot scheme designed to enhance staff fitness.
3. The development of a training package specifically designed for prison staff on AIDS.
4. Consideration of the possibility of producing a training package to help staff cope with the stress of working in the prison environment.
5. A preventive health campaign on smoking.

Public Disorder (Police Reserves)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, pursuant to his answer of 26 March, Official Report, column 224, he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the number of officers held in reserve on 21 March and the anticipated scene of possible public disorder.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Commissioner informs me that 460 officers were held in reserve for use if there had been an outbreak of public disorder in Tottenham. Fortunately, there was not.

THE ARTS

Disabled People

Mr. Chapman asked the Minister for the Arts what opportunities there are for arts organisations working with disabled people to benefit from arts sponsorship.

Mr. Luce: The business sponsorship incentive scheme encourages businesses to sponsor the arts, including arts organisations working with the disabled. I am particularly pleased that the latest list of awards under the scheme, announced on 7 April, included six projects designed to bring arts to the disabled and disadvantaged. I hope this success will encourage other businesses to follow suit.

"Stratford Mill" (Valuation)

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts what criteria were used in selecting the two sources of outside advice on the valuation proposed by the offerers of Constable's Stratford Mill in satisfaction of inheritance tax; what steps were taken to avoid a potential conflict of interest on the part of those sources of advice; what attempts were made to obtain a counter-check on their valuations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: The Government are advised on valuations for works of art by their expert advisers in particular fields. The expert advisers, who are selected according to their professional expertise, act independently on behalf of the Government. In this case, in view of the importance of the painting, two separate valuations were obtained from advisers in the National gallery and the Tate gallery.

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts what indications he received as to the precise time limit governing a decision on whether or not to accept Constable's Stratford Mill, in satisfaction of inheritance tax; what steps he took to check the necessity for such a time limit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: It was important to reach a decision as quickly as possible in this offer of a painting of great quality.

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts what discussions he had with the chairman of the Museums and Galleries Commission regarding the implications of the deadline for a decision on acceptance of Constable's Stratford Mill in lieu of tax for the practicability and desirability of consulting the Commission as a whole; how many members of the Commission were actually consulted and by what criteria they were selected; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I have discussed with the chairman of the Museums and Galleries Commission the arrangements for acceptances in cases where a short deadline for decision may be imposed, and I have asked him to consult the commissioners on how best to ensure that I receive good and speedy advice in such cases.

Young Artists

Mr. Lord asked the Minister for the Arts if he is in a position to give further details of his scheme for assisting young artists by displaying their work in Government offices.

Mr. Luce: I am introducing an experimental scheme whereby works of art which have not previously been exhibited widely will be reproduced and displayed in selected Government offices for the benefit of those who visit those offices and of the staff who work in them. Initially, the scheme will be limited to the Management and Personnel Office and the Office of Arts and Libraries, for which I am directly responsible. I am selecting a consultant to advise me on the details and the purchase of the works of arts. If the experiment is a success, other Government Departments will be invited to join in and the scheme will be operated on a large scale.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Pensions

Mr. Woodcock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of men have a sufficient national insurance contribution record by the age of 60 years to entitle them to a 100 per cent. basic pension.

Mr. Major: I regret that the information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Benefits

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish figures for the latest date available, showing the average annual number of people in receipt of each of the following benefits, distinguishing in each case between claimants, adult dependants and child dependants: national insurance unemployement benefit, sickness benefit, invalidity, widows and retirement pensions, non-contributory invalidity pension and supplementary benefit without any national insurance benefit; and if he will estimate the corresponding figures for 1987-88.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Secure Units

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he now expects the regional secure unit programme to be completed; and which health authorities have not yet opened a purpose-built secure unit.

Mrs. Currie: Eleven of the 14 regional health authorities now have permanent regional secure units (RSUs) in operation. Permanent RSUs can either be purpose-built or adaptations of existing hospital facilities.

Of the remaining three regions, a permanent RSU at Rubery hill hospital, Birmingham (west midlands) is scheduled to open this year. A permanent unit in the Oxford region is also expected to open at Borocourt hospital in 1987. A further two permanent RSUs are being planned in the Oxford region. South-West Thames region is planning a permanent RSU at Netherne hospital, which will function in association with several "close supervision" units already operating in existing hospitals.

In addition, the North-East Thames region has plans to provide two further pemanent RSUs to complement the one already in operation at Runwell hospital, Southend. A second permanent RSU in South-Western region is due to be completed at Glenside hospital, Bristol, in 1988.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the role proposed for non-regional secure unit facilities in the psychiatric assessment of offenders, referred to in the Government response to recommendation 25 of the third report from the Social Services Committee, Session 1985-86, indicating which other facilities it is intended to utilise.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Liverpool Women's Hospital (Cervical Cancer Tests)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why 45,000 records of women tested at Liverpool women's hospital for cervical cancer have been re-examined; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe on 10 April, Official Report, column 503, if he has yet written to the voluntary organisations' steering group on the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 with proposals for their involvement in planning the implementation of the Act; and if he will make a further statement.

Mr. Major: I am still considering the points made by the members of the steering committee at the meeting on 1 April. As indicated in my earlier reply, I shall write to them as soon as possible suggesting a framework for involving voluntary organisations, where appropriate, in future work on the implementation of the Act.

1991 Census

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any decision has been taken on the inclusion of a religious question in the 1991 census; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to improve the accuracy of the information available to him about National Health Service waiting lists.

Mr. Newton: All health authorities are asked to ensure that their waiting lists accurately reflect the demand for services and I am not aware of any specific problems with the data they supply. Since 1 April an improved system for collecting waiting list data has been in operation. This will provide the Department with more frequent and more comprehensive information about waiting times.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras can expect a substantive reply to his question about hospital waiting lists to which a holding answer was given on 23 March, Official Report, columns 75-76.

Mr. Newton: I replied to the hon. Member today.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out, region by region, district health authority in-patient waiting lists, the total population living in each district, the percentage which the former represents of the latter and their national ranking by that percentage.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 23 March 1987, c.76]: Information on in-patient waiting lists, and total resident populations is given in the following table. A significant, though varying, proportion of patients on the waiting list are referred by general practitioners in other districts. The relevant population for comparison is therefore the "catchment" population which can, and in many cases does, vary substantially from the resident population. The percentage figures may therefore have little significance, and any national ranking based on them may be seriously misleading.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will set out, region by region, the hospital urgent in-patient waiting list in each district, together with the number of urgent cases waiting more than a month, the percentage the latter presents of the former and their national ranking by that percentage;

(2) if he will set out, region by region, the hospital non-urgent in-patient waiting list in each health district together with the number of non-urgent cases waiting more than a year, the percentage the latter represents of the former and their national ranking by that percentage.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 23 March 1987, c. 76.]: Information on the numbers of urgent cases and non-urgent cases in each district and the percentages waiting over a month and a year respectively are given in the following tables. National ranking according to these percentages would be misleading since in many districts the actual numbers waiting are very low. Nor is there any common definition of what constitutes an "urgent" case. That means that comparison between districts, even in terms of actual numbers, has little significance.

Number of urgent cases and number of urgent cases waiting for more than one month on in-patient waiting list at 30 September 1986 with over one month cases as a percentage of all cases

SCOTLAND

Housing Stock

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the estimate of the value of the housing stock in Scotland in April 1986 and of the percentage increase in value since then; what are the comparable rateable values; and what is his estimate of the amount collected in rates on dwellings in the year 1986-87.

Mr. Ancram: Information on the market value of housing stock in Scotland is not held centrally. The total rateable value of domestic subjects in Scotland as at 1 April 1986 was £1,327 million. Information regarding any increase since then is not yet available. The estimated amount collected in rates on domestic subjects in 1986-87 was £527 million.

Drug Abuse (Edinburgh and Lothian)

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will finance urgent studies into the co-factors affecting drug abuse and AIDS identifiable in the drug abusing population in Edinburgh and Lothian region since 1983.

Mr. John MacKay: The Scottish Home and Health Department is at present providing funding for seven relevant projects in this general area of research, of which four have direct relevance to the drug abuse population in Edinburgh and Lothian region. In addition, additional relevant studies have recently been funded by the Medical Research Council and further proposals are under assessment.

AIDS

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will arrange for urgent studies into the possibilities for, and effects of, treatment on HIV infected babies identified in and near Edinburgh since 1983.

Mr. John MacKay: All the known HIV infected babies in or near Edinburgh are to be included in a research study which is under assessment by the Medical Research Council. My officials will be involved with that assessment.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will finance urgent studies into the transmission of HIV from mothers to children in Edinburgh and Lothian since 1983.

Mr. John MacKay: Discussions between my officials, the Medical Research Council and the Lothian and Tayside health boards are likely to lead to proposals for research in due course.

Road Works (Objectors)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to release the names of objectors to trunk road alterations and bypasses to hon. Members as well as public inquiries.

Mr. Ancram: No; the degree of confidentiality which those opposing trunk road schemes can expect at present is a valuable safeguard of their rights. It ensures that people are not deterred from lodging objections by fear of pressure being brought to bear on them by other interested parties. Where a public inquiry is held, however, there is no option but to make public the names of those who have maintained their objections, since the proceedings are held in public.

Children's Panels

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland for what purpose he introduced rule 13 for the conduct of children's panels relating to the custody of persons by police or prison officers; and on what date did it become effective.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1987, c. 214]: The rule was introduced so that an escorting officer who considers that he must accompany his prisoner throughout a children's hearing shall have the right to be present in the hearing room. It remains open to the chairman of a hearing to suggest to an escorting officer that he should remain outside to allow the hearing to proceed with maximum privacy. Chief constables and prison authorities have been asked to ensure that such requests are treated sympathetically, where possible. The new rule became operative on 2 February 1987.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland for what reason did he not reappoint from the children's panels in Ayrshire Mr. Alexander Baird and Mr. Ian Bigham; on what date this action became effective; and what representations he has received on this matter.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1987, c. 214]: Mr. Baird's term of appointment ended on 18 May 1986 and I accepted a recommendation from the Children's Panel Advisory Committee that he should not be offered a further term. Mr. Bigham was removed from office on 9 September 1986. I shall write to the hon. Member about the background to these decisions.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the powers of the children's panels in relation to access to all relevant files on the children appearing before them, or their families; on whose discretion panel members are given access to such files; and what is the authority for this arrangement.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1987, c. 214]: The reporter to the children's panel is required to make such initial investigations as he thinks necessary of any case of a child which is referred to him. If he refers a case to a children's hearing, he is required under the Children's Hearings (Scotland) Rules 1986 to provide the hearing members, in advance, with copies of any information or document which is material to the consideration of the case before the hearing. Members of children's panels have no other statutory rights of access to the reporter's records.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Personal Taxation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect on revenue in a full year at 1987-88 rates of taxing men and women separately, with personal allowances and the married women's earnings allowance replaced by a non-transferable personal allowance of £2,425; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing by range of income and for one and two-earner families the gains and losses for (i) earned income and (ii) unearned income.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The direct revenue yield from giving a non-transferable personal allowance of £2,425 to each partner in a married couple would be £4·3 billion in a full year at 1987-88 income levels. The table shows the gains and losses by range of total income. It is not possible to provide reliable estimates for earned and investment income separately.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the saving to the Exchequer in a full year at 1987-88 rates of restricting all allowances and reliefs to the standard rate of tax; and if he will provide a breakdown of the figure in the Official Report by category of allowance and relief.

Mr. Clay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update for 1987-88 the information on the extra revenue resulting from allowing all tax allowances and reliefs at the standard rate only, provided in his reply of 1 May 1986 to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) Official Report, columns 479-80.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 6 April 1987, c. 76]: The direct revenue cost at 1987-88 levels of income of allowing personal tax allowances at rates in excess of the basic rate of income tax is estimated to be about £850 million. Information on the similar cost of other income tax reliefs is available only in respect of mortgage interest, retirement annuity premiums, employees' superannuation contributions, the business expansion scheme, and donations to charities; in total it is about £750 million. Within this total is a cost of about £340 million for mortgage interest relief and about £130 million for retirement annuity premiums. It is not possible to provide reliable estimates for the other individual reliefs. Nor is it possible to estimate precisely the combined yield from restricting these reliefs and personal allowances to the basic rate, but it is thought to be about £1,800 million. These estimates make no allowance for any possible behavioural effects if allowances and reliefs were to be restricted to the basic rate.

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will construct an index, with 1978-79 equalling 100, of the changes in the level of income tax and national insurance contributions for each subsequent year for a taxpayer on (a) half, (b) two thirds, (c) average, (d) five times and (e) 10 times average earnings for households where the taxpayer is (i) single, (ii) married, no children, (iii) married with two children and (iv) married with four children, in all cases assuming the wife does not work, using a similar form to his answer of 27 March 1986, Official Report, columns 606-8.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 22 April 1987, c. 579]: The following table shows (a) income tax plus national insurance contributions less child benefit, where appropriate, as a percentage of gross earnings; and (b) real net income after tax, NIC and child benefit in index number form with 1978-79 equalling 100. The calculations assume that the taxpayer has no reliefs other than the appropriate personal allowance and that national insurance contributions are at the contracted-in rate. Average earnings are those for full-time males paid at adult rates whose pay was not affected by absence. Figures for 1986-87 and 1987-88 are provisional.

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the size of the cut in the standard rate of income tax required in 1987-88 to reduce the total tax payments, including income tax, national insurance contributions, indirect taxes, less child benefit where appropriate, for those on (a) three quarters and (b) 100 per cent. of average earnings in the categories (i) single people, (ii) married couples and (iii) married couples with two and four children in each case to (x) the same sum of money and (y) the same proportion of gross earnings as in 1978-79.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 22 April 1987, c. 579]: Figures for couples with four children are not available. The remaining figures are in the table.

Stamp Duty

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present rate of stamp duty on shares issued as a result of mergers and acquisitions; and if he will provide an estimate of the yield in 1986-87 of stamp duty at the rate of 1 per cent. on shares issued as a result of such mergers and acquisitions.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The present rate of capital duty is 1 per cent., but it does not apply if the consideration consists entirely, or almost entirely, of shares in the acquiring company. I regret that the information requested on yield is not available centrally and could be obtained only at undue cost.

Channel Tunnel (Duty-free Facilities)

Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to ensure that duty-free facilities are made available to rail passengers utilising the Channel tunnel, commensurate with those available to cross-Channel passengers using alternative modes of transport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Income Tax

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will update, to take account of the 1987 Budget, the information on income tax reductions provided in his reply of 14 April 1986 to the hon. Member for Thurrock, Official Report, columns 314-15;

(2) if he will update, to take account of the 1987 Budget, the information on tax changes contained in his reply of 21 October 1986 to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), Official Report, columns 807-8.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his replies, 25 March 1987, c. 215-16]: The information is in the tables. For each financial year the yield from the tax regime in that year is compared with the 1978-79 tax regime. All estimates are calculated on the 1987-88 tax base and all tax regimes have been indexed to 1987-88 by reference to the statutory formula. The comparisons therefore allow for budgetary changes in income tax rates and allowances, but not for any change since 1978-79 in the definition of the tax base.

The first table shows the total reduction (+) or increase (−) in tax yield from each income range; and the second table shows the average change for individual tax units.

As child tax allowances were being phased out in 1978-79, they have been excluded from the comparison.

Taxation

Mr. Straw asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update the answer to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) and the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth) of 28 April 1986, Official Report, column 329, to cover 1987-88 as well as 1985-86 and 1986-87, in comparison to 1978-79.

Dr. McDonald asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update, to take account of the 1987 Budget, the information on tax and national insurance provided in his reply of 9 April 1986, at columns 124-25, to the hon. Member for Thurrock.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his replies, 23 March 1987, c.41, and 25 March 1987, c. 216]: Available information for 1987-88 is in the tables. Further information could be provided only at disproportionate expense.

Range of earnings[1] where income tax[2] and nic[3] form a smaller proportion of gross earnings in 1987-88 than in 1978-79 under the assumptions in the Footnotes below

[1] In each of the ranges of percentages of average earnings shown, tax plus NIC is a smaller proportion of earnings in 1987-88 than in 1978-79. The income levels in £ per week are at 1987-88 levels, rounded to the nearest £1. It is assumed that the taxpayer has no investment income and no relief or allowance other than the appropriate personal allowance.
[2] Less child benefit, where appropriate.
[3] At contracted-in rates.
[4] On the assumption that husband and wife each have the same multiple of the appropriate all occupations figure for average earnings (full-time males and females respectively).
[5] Average earnings of full-time males (all occupations) are £92·80 in 1978-79 and £227.30 in 1987-88, for females £59.60 and £149.70 respectively.
[6] Percentage of joint income.

[1] The income levels are those for single people and childless married couples at which, if income were all earned, tax and NIC would be the same proportion of earnings in 1978-79 and 1987-88 (see previous table). Reliable estimates which take account of the numbers of children in each family are not possible.

Reliefs and Allowances

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will show tax and national insurance in 1987-88 as a proportion of earnings, together with a breakdown of the reliefs and allowances applicable in the cases of a married man with earnings of £100,000 per annum, making an annual investment of £40,000 from his earnings under the business expansion scheme and claiming tax relief on (a) a mortgage loan of £30,000, assuming a monthly interest payment of £281·25, (b) the maximum contribution to a personal pension scheme from 4 January 1988, having no contracted-out employer's scheme prior to that date, (c) a life insurance policy taken out before 13 March 1984 and with an annual premium of £1,000 and (d) the maximum monthly tax-free investment into a personal equity plan;

(2) if he will show tax and national insurance in 1987-88 as a proportion of earnings, together with a breakdown of the reliefs and allowances applicable in the case of a married man with earnings of £30,000 per annum, and making an annual investment from his earnings of £5,000 under the business expansion scheme as well as claiming tax relief on (a) a mortgage loan of £30,000 assuming a monthly interest payment of £281·25, (b) the maximum contribution to a personal pension scheme from 4 January 1988, having no contracted-out employer's scheme prior to that date, (c) a life insurance policy taken out before 13 March 1984 and with an annual premium of £200 and (d) the maximum monthly tax-free investment into a personal equity plan;

(3) if he will show tax and national insurance in 1987-88 as a proportion of earnings, together with a breakdown of the reliefs and allowances applicable in the cases of (a) a married man with earnings of £100,000 per annum, (b) a married man on the level of average male earnings assumed for 1987 and (c) a single person earning £100 per week.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his replies, 10 April 1987, c. 449-50]: The information is in the table. It has been assumed that there are no wife's earnings and that the taxpayer has no relief or allowance available other than those specified.

National insurance contributions are assumed to be paid at contracted-in rates. Where an employee has made the maximum contribution to a personal pension scheme, he and his employer pay NI contributions at the standard contracted-in rate and the Department of Health and Social Security pays minimum contributions to his personal pension scheme equivalent to the difference between the contracted-out and contracted-in rates of NI contributions for both employer and employee. The maximum contribution to a personal pension plan is 17½ per cent. of earnings (assuming the taxpayer is aged under 50).

The maximum investment in a personal equity plan of £2,400 per annum is not relieved against income tax and therefore does not affect the calculation of income tax liability. Tax relief is given on dividends reinvested in a PEP scheme, and on capital gains made on mature plans.

[2] i.e. 17·5 per cent of earnings for the three months remaining of the tax year after 4th January 1988.
[3] reduction in tax due at 15 per cent. of the annual premium.
[4] i.e. £227·30 per week which is estimated average earnings for a man paid at adult rates in 1987-88.
[5] i.e. £100 per week.

Taxation (Yield)

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the yield in real terms in (a) 1978-79 and (b) what he is now proposing for 1987-88 in (i) direct taxes, including national insurance and (ii) indirect taxes.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 22 April 1987, c. 577]: The figures are as follows:

	1978-79	1987-88	Change
(a) Direct taxes	57·8	73·8	+16·0

(c) Total taxes, royalties and national insurance and other contributions[2]	118·9	156·3	+37·4

[1] revalued using the GDP deflator.
[2] components do not add to total because of rounding.

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated yield from all sources of taxation including excise and other duties for 1987-88; what was the comparable yield for 1978-79 revalued at 1987-88 prices; and if he will publish a breakdown by categories of the real increase in taxes between 1978-79 and 1987-88 similar to that in his answer of 25 March 1986, Official Report, columns 426-27.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 22 April 1987, c. 577]: The estimated total yield from all sources of taxation including local authority rates and national insurance contributions is £156 billion in 1987-88; the yield in 1978-79 revalued at 1987-88 prices using the GDP deflator is £119 billion. The other information requested is in the table.

[1] All information is in terms of tax units i.e. married couples are counted as one and their incomes combined.
[2] By reference to the number paying tax in 1987-88.
[3] That is, the 1986-87 tax regime indexed (by 3·7 per cent.) to 1987-88 levels by reference to the statutory formula.

Taxable Benefits

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his reply dated 6 April, Official Report, column 78, concerning taxable benefits subject to special and general rules, whether he will provide an estimate for each of the three classes of the proportion of the actual value which is assessed to tax in each of the three cases together with a list of the more important items.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 27 April 1987, c. 54]: The taxable value of cars and free fuel for private use provided by an employer is calculated by reference to a set of scale charges. Information on which to calculate aggregate values on a different basis is not available within the Inland Revenue, but it is clear that, in general, while the fuel scale charges broadly reflect the value of the fuel benefit, the scale charges for company cars still fall well short of the true value of the benefit.

The taxable value of private medical insurance premiums and most other expense payments and benefits — the main exceptions being beneficial loans and accommodation provided by an employer — is the cost to the employer of providing the benefit. The taxable value of beneficial loans is calculated by reference to the difference between the official rate of interest (which broadly reflects commercial rates) and the actual rate of interest paid; accommodation provided by an employer is taxed by reference to the annual value of the accommodation, less any rent paid. The Inland Revenue does not collect information on any other basis of valuation.

The most important types of benefits are cars and fuel for private use and private medical insurance.

Personal Allowances and Expenses

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to which taxpayers the explanatory note Cyllid Y Wlad Treth Incwm, ref 510 (1987), has been issued; how many have been issued; and at what cost.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 29 April, 1987, c. 162]: Inland Revenue form 510 gives in Welsh a brief summary of the main personal allowances and of expenses that may be claimed and explains that a tax return in Welsh is available on request. The form is sent with personal tax returns to taxpayers whose affairs are dealt with by tax offices in Wales and is also issued by those offices as required throughout the year.

An estimated 250,000 forms have been issued with tax returns this April. The cost for the year is £2,639.

DEFENCE

Conventional Forces

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received about the level of conventional forces; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I am not aware of any recent representations specifically about the level of conventional forces. A full description of the United Kingdom's conventional forces is set out in the annual Statement on the Defence Estimates.

Harpoon (Offset Work)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the offset work gained by United Kingdom firms in exchange for the purchase of Harpoon for the Royal Navy.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The offset work gained by United Kingdom firms in exchange for the purchase of Harpoon for the Royal Navy covers a wide variety of products and services including mechanical and electrical components, aircraft instruments, computer design and installations and research and development programmes.

Marconi and Plessey

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence what defence contracts have been placed with Marconi and Plessey, respectively, in the past three years.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not the practice of the Ministry to reveal details of contracts placed with individual contractors for reasons of commercial confidentiality. However, the overall values of contracts placed with the Marconi and Plessey groups of companies during the last three years are approximately £1·7 billion and £0·9 billion respectively.

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many former employees of his Department have been given permission since 1979 to join the board of directors of (a) Marconi and (b) Plessey.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The number of Ministry of Defence personnel, and former staff, including serving and former members of the Armed Forces, granted approval to join the boards of companies in the Plessey and Marconi groups since 1979 are as follows:

	Plessey Group	Marconi Group
1979	—	1(1)
1980	—	—
1981	—	—
1982	—	—

1984	1	1(1)
1985	1(1)	2(2)
1986	—	1(1)
1987 to date	—	—

Figures in brackets indicate the number of cases in which a waiting period of between three months and two years was imposed.

Low-level Flights

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in the Official Report the number of low-flying missions flown in the United Kingdom for each year since 1979; how many flights traversed the Ministry of Defence area which contains the Borders region each year during that period; and how many formal complaints have been received from residents within the Borders region during the period.

Mr. Freeman: As far as low-flying missions flown in the United Kingdom since 1979 are concerned I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 22 April at column 585 to the hon. Member for Merionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas). The low-flying administrative area containing the Borders consists of Scotland south of a line between the firths of Forth and Clyde, and the figures in columns 2 and 3 relate to movements into and complaints from this area. The number of movements in a mission is variable but around 2·5 on average.

Defence Service Organisation

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the budget for the Defence Export Services Organisation in (a) 1986-87 and (b) 1987-88.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is contained in table 4 "Exports of defence equipment: Votes 1 and 2" of the MOD Supply Estimates for 1986-87 and 1987-88.

US Installations

Mr. Ron Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many military installations the United States of America has in the United Kingdom, and how many personnel.

Mr. Stanley: There are 66 military bases and facilities in the United Kingdom made available for use by United States forces under United States national command. In addition, there are two North Atlantic Treaty Organisation armament depots under United Kingdom command but providing a service for the United States forces. Approximately 31,500 United States Service personnel are currently stationed in the United Kingdom.

West Germany

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current balance of payments cost of keeping British forces in West Germany.

Mr. Stanley: The estimated direct cost to the balance of payments in 1987-88 of keeping British forces in West Germany is £1,350 million.

Hydrographical Surveys

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy towards the employment of British vessels and crews in relation to hydrographical surveys which his Department undertakes in the North sea; and why Dutch and Danish survey ships have been chartered recently for such work.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A programme of hydrographic surveys to meet civil requirements is drawn up each year by my Department and the Department of Transport. The 1987 programme includes a hydrographic survey of part of the North sea. The task of carrying out the survey was put out to contract by my Department following competitive tender. It is the responsibility of the contractor to provide the vessels required, if necessary by chartering them. We cannot oblige the contractor to use British-flag vessels, although we naturally prefer that he should do so, and this is stated in the contract. In this case we understand that the contractor was unable to agree terms for the charter of British-flag vessels.

Magilligan Prison (Firing Range)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will take steps to ensure that the firing range situated close to Magilligan prison, Northern Ireland, is moved to a location out of earshot of the prisoners; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: No. It would not be feasible to move the facilities, which are sited at Magilligan training centre, to another location.

Accident (Dartmoor)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the injury to a 12-year-old boy by an explosive object found in the military training area in the Dartmoor national park on 22 April; and whether this date was a firing date.

Mr. Freeman: On 22 April a group of six juveniles aged between 6 and 18 supervised by a local resident were on Okehampton range when there was an explosion injuring one of the party. There was no firing on the range on that day. The range boundary is clearly marked and public access to the area is at all times in accordance with the MOD range byelaws. Signs are clearly displayed warning the public of the dangers of picking up or searching for items of ordnance.

I understand that the Devon and Cornwall constabulary investigations into the circumstances of the incident have concluded that on this occasion the public safety warnings were ignored and some members of the group were deliberately seeking out military souvenirs at the time of the explosion. This unfortunate accident, therefore, serves to underline the importance of observing the range byelaws, warning flags and notices which are intended to protect the public.

We do everything in our power to make the Dartmoor ranges safe, but it should be noted that they have been used for military training for some 90 years. Members of the public have access to the ranges when they are not in use, but for their own safety they are clearly warned not to pick up or even touch any metal objects.

The military investigations have not yet been completed and I cannot comment further at this stage.

United Kingdom-United States of America (Treaties)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all treaties, agreements, memoranda of understanding and other formal arrangements currently in force between the United States of America and the United Kingdom covering the collaborative research, development and production of defence equipment and British participation in United States defence programmes.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I shall answer shortly.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list all treaties, agreements, memoranda of understanding and other formal arrangements currently in force between the United States of America and the United Kingdom covering the support provided by the United Kingdom Government either directly or indirectly for United States' military bases and installations and facilities in the United Kingdom and its territorial waters and for their expansion in a time of tension or war;

(2) if he will list all treaties, agreements, memoranda of understanding and other formal arrangements currently in force between the United States of America and the United Kingdom covering the use by the United States of military bases, both operational and support, and facilities within the territorial waters of the United Kingdom, the arrangements for the operational control of such bases and facilities, and their expansion in a time of tension and war;

(3) if he will list all treaties, agreements memoranda of understanding and other formal arrangements currently in force between the United States of America and the United Kingdom covering the use by the United States of America of bases and facilities in British territory outside the United Kingdom and support provided by the United Kingdom Government either directly or indirectly;

(4) if he will list all treaties, agreements, memoranda of understanding and other formal arrangements currently in force between the United States of America and the United Kingdom covering the exchange of information, materials and designs concerning the research, development and production of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the dates when the High Level Group, the Nuclear Planning Group, and the Defence Planning Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty

Organisation each agreed to support the deployment of the W-79 nuclear shell by the United States in Germany; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what information he has received from the United States authorities regarding their deployment of the W70-4 variant of the nuclear warhead for Lance in Germany;

(3) what information he has received from the United States authorities as to which variant of the W-79 nuclear shell has been deployed by the United States in Europe;

(4) what information he has received from the United States authorities regarding the deployment of W-79 nuclear shells with those United States custodial units which support the British Army of the Rhine; and if he will make a statement;

(5) when he was informed by the United States authorities of the deployment of the W-79 nuclear shell in Germany; and when he was first informed of the United States intention to carry out the deployment.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what information he has received from the United States authorities as to which variant of the W-79 nuclear shell has been deployed by them in Europe; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what information he has received from the United States authorities regarding the deployment of the W-70-4 variant of the nuclear warhead for Lance in Germany;

(3) when he was informed by the United States authorities of the deployment of the W-79 nuclear shell in Germany; and when he was first informed of the United States intention to carry out the deployment;

(4) what information he has as to when deployment of the W-79 by the United States in Europe commenced;

(5) if he will list the dates when the High Level Group, the Nuclear Planning Group and the Defence Planning Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation each agreed to support the deployment of the W-79 nuclear shell by the United States in Germany;

(6) if he will list the grades and ranks of the civil servants and military officers who attend each of the following North Atlantic Treaty Organisation bodies: the High Level Group, the Special Consultative Group, the Nuclear Planning Group, the Study Group of the Nuclear Planning Group and the Defence Planning Committee;

(7) whether Her Majesty's Government's approval is required prior to the allocation of W-79 nuclear warheads by the United States to its custodial units supporting the British Army of the Rhine; and if he will make a statement;

(8) what information he has received from the United States authorities about the deployment of W-79 nuclear shells with those United States custodial units which support the British Army of the Rhine; and if he will make a statement;

(9) what information he has received from the United States authorities about the deployment by the United States army of W-79 nuclear warheads in the Northern Army Group area of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation;

(10) what information he has received from the United States authorities concerning a potential enhanced radiation capability in relation to the W-79 nuclear shell deployed by the United States in Europe.

Mr. Stanley: I shall answer shortly.

Written Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Electricity

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will estimate the United Kingdom's demand for electricity in 2005, 2025 and 2050, respectively, and the proportion of that demand that would be provided by the proposed Severn barrage.

Mr. Goodlad: The production of forward estimates of electricity demand is the responsibility of the electricity supply industry. If a Severn tidal barrage of the kind currently under consideration were to be built near Cardiff and Weston, it might provide about 5 per cent. of the current electricity demand level on average over the year. To the extent that electricity demand grew in the future, this percentage would become smaller.

North-east

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will give figures showing the productivity of the north-east coalfield (a) over the last 12 months and (b) in 1982-83; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: Average deep-mined revenue output per man shift in the North-East area during 1986-87 was 2·98 tonnes. This represents an impressive increase of 43 per cent. compared with the average of 2·09 tonnes during 1982-83.

Nuclear Safety

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make it his policy to invite an operating safety review team from the International Atomic Energy Agency to assist the nuclear installations inspectorate in its safety monitoring of (a) nuclear power plants, (b) nuclear fuel and enrichment plants and (c) nuclear reprocessing facilities in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Goodlad: I fully support the International Atomic Energy Agency's work on nuclear safety. The agency's provisional schedule of operational safety review team visits for 1987 does not include any to nuclear installations in the United Kingdom.

Regulatory control of our nuclear installations is of course the statutory responsibility of the nuclear installations inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list his responsibilities with regard to (a) safety of nuclear installations, (b) relations with the International Atomic Energy Agency, (c) relations with the Organisation of Economic Co-operation and Development nuclear energy agency, (d) relations with Euratom and (e) promoting visits by members of the public to civil nuclear installations as part of the nuclear industries' expanded open information policy.

Mr. Peter Walker: I am the Secretary of State with overall policy responsibility for the safety of nuclear installations. The Government insist on the highest standard of safety at United Kingdom nuclear installations, and encourage openness by the nuclear industry. We attach great importance to improving international co-operation on nuclear safety through the, IAEA, NEA and EURATOM. The promotion of visits to nuclear installations is a matter for the organisations involved.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy on 22 April, Official Report, column 547, if he will set out (a) the number and dates of all meetings to which he refers held so far, (b) the occasions when he has been present personally, (c) the number of departmental officials involved and (d) the organisations involved in the discussions; and if he will make a statement on progress to date.

Mr. Goodlad: It is not Government practice to reveal details of meetings held in confidence with other bodies. Discussions are continuing, and I shall make an announcement in due course.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his reply of 22 April, Official Report, column 547, on the Layfield report recommendations, if he will set out the nature of the considerations of security and commercial sensitivity on which discussions are taking place; and whether the safeguards divisions of the International Atomic Energy Agency and Euratom have been involved in the discussions.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 29 January at column 327. Safeguards issues will be taken into account as appropriate.

Coal Industry (Accidents)

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will now give an update to the latest date for which figures are currently available of the details of all serious accidents which have occurred in the coal industry for the year 1986-87 broken down according to coalfield areas.

Mr. David Hunt: Final year figures for serious accidents in 1986-87 are not yet available. I therefore have nothing further to add to the answer I gave the hon. Gentleman on 12 March, Official Report, columns 281-282.

Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will now give an update to the latest date for which figures are currently available of the details of all fatal accidents which have occurred in the coal industry for the year 1986-87, broken down according to coalfield areas.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 1 May 1987, at column 249.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Mozambique

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current situation in Mozambique; and what further action Her Majesty's Government intend to take to relieve the situation.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am deeply concerned at the scale of the present suffering in Mozambique. The Government are playing a full part in the international effort to alleviate it. In addition to our longer-term development assistance programme for Mozambique, we have offered over £11 million as emergency aid over the past few months. We stand ready to assist further. I will be discussing the situation with the President of Mozambique during his visit this week.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Research Councils

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he proposes that the £15 million supplement to the research councils should be available in the years 1987-88 and subsequent years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: The additional £15 million is for 1987-88. We are assessing the needs of science for future years in the current public expenditure survey. The Government are committed to maintaining and enhancing the strength and quality of the science base. We attach particular importance to sustaining the work of the most able scientists and their teams. I would remind the hon. Member that the Government has increased the science budget by 14 per cent. at constant prices since 1979.

Information Technology (Research)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether Her Majesty's Government intend, in the event of the proposals of the Bide (IT 86) Committee being accepted, to provide new money to keep basic research in information technology running at the present levels.

Mr. Walden: The Government are considering the recommendations of the committee, chaired by Sir Austin Bide, and the resource implications for basic research in information technology both within and outside the areas covered by the committee's report. The Government will make their decision known in due course.

Tertiary Colleges

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will list, in tabular form, proposals put to him involving tertiary colleges since 1979, indicating in each case whether the proposals were approved, modified or rejected, the reasons for each rejection, the number of students at each tertiary college proposed and whether there was an existing sixth form college.

Mr. Dunn: Information is not available in precisely the form requested. The table lists the statutory proposals published since August 1979 which involve the establishment of tertiary colleges, and shows whether these proposals were approved or rejected by my right hon. Friend or his predecessors. Information on the reasons for each rejection, on the number of students at each proposed tertiary college, and on whether there was an existing sixth form college, is not recorded centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

North-East

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many full-time students attend first degree courses at institutions of higher education in the north-east; and how many were doing so in 1978-79.

Mr. Walden: In 1985 there were 20,800 full-time and sandwich first degree students studying at universities, polytechnics and colleges situated in the counties of Northumberland, Durham, Tyne and Wear and Cleveland. The corresponding figure in 1978 was 17,200.

Education Reforms

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the education reforms instituted since May 1979 together with any changes in the level of resources available to the education system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I will reply as soon as possible.

Pupils (Expenditure)

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what the increase in spending per pupil has been since 1979.

Mr. Dunn: Between 1979-80 and 1985-86, the net institutional recurrent expenditure per primary and secondary pupil has increased, in real terms, by 19 per cent.

Teachers (Drug-related Offences)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will issue a circular to local education authorities to the effect that they should refrain from employing as a teacher any person convicted of a drug-related offence; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend does not consider the issue of a circular on employment of teachers convicted of drug offences to be necessary. Local education authorities are aware of the need to protect children and young people from teachers who would be a risk to them, and my right hon. Friend whenever necessary uses his powers under the Education (Teachers) Regulations 1982 to bar such persons from teaching.

Newcastle-upon-Tyne (Standards)

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will ask Her Majesty's inspectors to make a general report on education standards in Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Mr. Dunn: It is for Her Majesty's inspectors to determine their programme of inspections of education in individual local education authorities. I understand that they have no plans to inspect overall educational provision in Newcastle-upon-Tyne. They do, however, carry out each year a large number of formal and informal inspections of schools and colleges in the authority. In addition they have a range of meetings with officers of the authority to discuss matters of education in the area.

Human Embryos (Experiments)

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy that no Government funds or facilities will be used for the performing of experiments upon living human embryos before the introduction of the promised legislation on this matter.

Mr. Walden: No. The Government intend to await Parliament's decision on this issue. I would also refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 23 January at column 741 to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash).

O-Level and CSE Examinations

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his estimate of the numbers of 1987 April school leavers who are to sit O-level and CSE examinations.

Mr. Dunn: Information for the academic year 1986-87 is not available. There were 15,300 pupils reported as leaving English schools in the spring term of 1985 who attempted GCE O-level or CSE examinations in the summer of that year.

Student Grants

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science further to his answer of 28 April, Official Report, columns 98-9, if he will make it his policy that no reductions in grant will be made to reflect the abolition of domestic rates payable by universities on residential accommodation for students.

Mr. Walden: The Government's plans for funding the universities are set out in the public expenditure White Paper (Cm 56). The UGC has no plans to change the system for reimbursing universities' rates payments in full.

Independent Schools

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he intends to seek powers to extend his plans for a national curriculum to the independent schools sector; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so.

Science and Technology (Departmental Achievements)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give details of the achievements of his Department with respect to science and technology since 1979; and if he will make a statement on his plans for the future.

Mr. Walden: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will give the average cost per pupil currently assisted under the assisted places scheme, for the most recent year for which figures are available;

(2) what information he has about the average cost per pupil in the independent schools sector, for the most recent year for which figures are available;

(3) if he will give the average cost per pupil by local authority in Greater Manchester and for England, for the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Dunn: (i) The average cost to my Department per assisted place pupil is £1,759 for the 1986-87 school year.

(ii) No information is available on the average cost per pupil in the independent school sector.

(iii) The net institutional expenditure per pupil in 15 maintained primary and secondary schools for Greater Manchester and for England was as follows in 1985-86, the latest year for which information is available. Net institutional expenditure does not include the cost of school meals, central administration and inspection costs, capital expenditure or the financing costs of capital.

Local authority	Primary schools £ (cash)	Secondary schools £ (cash)
Bolton	720	1,115
Bury	715	1,175
Manchester	905	1,425
Oldham	815	1,095
Rochdale	795	1,275
Salford	790	1,200
Stockport	740	1,115
Tameside	815	1,160
Trafford	735	1,140
Wigan	785	1,230
England	805	1,175

Natural Environment Research Council

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the organisations that have received research funds from the Natural Environment Research Council, the projects that have been funded, and the amounts they have received since 1979.

Mr. Walden: The information on individual projects supported by the Natural Environment Research Council since 1979 can only be provided at disproportionate cost. The list of organisations and the research funds received by them are given in the council's annual reports, copies of which are in the Library.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the research projects undertaken by the Freshwater Biological Association and funded by the Natural Environment Research Council that are to be discontinued.

Mr. Walden: No decision has yet been taken to discontinue any research project undertaken by the Freshwater Biological Association and funded by the Natural Environment Research Council.

Rural Schools

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his policy on the closure of schools in rural areas.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Following wide consultation, I shall be issuing later this week a circular giving comprehensive advice on school provision and organisation. The circular will make it clear that I shall expect local authorities and voluntary bodies, in formulating their proposals, to take account of the general principles set out in the White Paper "Better Schools" about the size at which schools of different types can economically deliver a satisfactory curriculum; but that these principles are not to be interpreted as narrowly prescriptive or as providing a set of benchmarks for the closure of schools.

I recognise the wide degree of support that many rural schools command within their local communities. The circular will confirm that assessing the viability of an individual school is not solely a matter of the number of pupils on roll. I would expect proposals also to take account of wider considerations such as denominational choice; local geography; the distances to be travelled to alternative schools in the event of closure; and the age of the children making these journeys.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Burglary

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the increase in burglary in the Merseyside police authority area between (a) 1974 and 1979 and (b) 1979 and 1986.

Mr. Mellor: Numbers of offences recorded in each police force area are published each year in the Command Paper "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" and most recently in a Home Office statistical bulletin (table 6 of issue 4/87). The number of offences of burglary recorded by the Merseyside police decreased by an average of 2 per cent. per year between 1975 and 1979 and increased by an average of 9 per cent. per year between 1979 and 1986. Because the Merseyside police force was constituted on 1 April 1974, comparable figures based on the year 1974 are not available.

Electoral Registration

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why, pursuant to the answer of 26 February, Official Report, column 347, he is unwilling to change the electoral registration form to inform voters that their names and addresses may be sold without reference to them, or to give voters the option of not having their name and address sold to other organisations.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is of overriding importance to ensure that the electoral register is as complete as possible. A warning notice might discourage people from registering. The electoral register is a public document, but it is open to those who do not wish their addresses to be used for mailing purposes to inform the mailing preference service of the fact.

Remand Hearings

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish details of the research on remand hearings to which the Minister of State, the hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), referred on 31 March, Official Report, column 916, including information as to the nature and size of the sample and the number of occasions at each successive court appearance at which (a) successful and unsuccessful bail applications were made and (b) other progress with the case was made.

Mr. Mellor: The research mentioned was that undertaken by the court escort scrutiny which analysed a sample of 400 prisoners in custody during March 1985. The remaining information requested is not available.

Custodial Remands

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he will give the grounds which led his Department to suggest in paragraph 8 of the consultation document, "Remands in Custody", that the courts escort scrutiny report's sample of 400 prisoners over-represented long-term prisoners, and that the report's estimate of the average length of remands in custody exceeded the Home Office's estimates; and whether he will recalculate the savings to be expected from the proposal advanced in the consultation document on the basis of an appropriate sample;

(2) whether, in relation to the courts escorts scrutiny report, he will provide details as to how the sample of 400 prisoners was selected, giving informations about the sampling method and the population from which the sample was drawn.

Mr. Mellor: I understand that the sample of 400 prisoners in the court escort scrutiny report was chosen from the prison population in March 1985 rather than from receptions of prisoners on remand over a specific period. If no special allowance were made, the court escort scrutiny sample would therefore include a higher proportion of defendants remanded in custody for long periods. The more recent analysis referred to in paragraph 8 of the consultation document comes from the results of a sample of about 2,750 people whose cases were completed in magistrates' courts in three weeks between June 1985 and February 1986. The most recent analysis of data from this sample was published in Home Office statistical bulletin 5/1987, a copy of which is in the Library. No estimates have been made of savings which could occur on the basis of a different sample, since it was judged that any variations in the available estimates are small and do not affect the main conclusions of the survey that many remand appearances were unproductive of any useful results as regards the expedition of the case.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state, in respect of the most convenient recent year or other appropriate period, the number of persons who, on their appearance in a magistrates' court, having been remanded in custody on the previous occasions, were disposed of respectively by (a) trial, (b) committal, (c) further remand in custody for one week or less, or (d) who exercised an option under section 59 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982, providing the figures for each of the above four categories separately in respect of appearances in court on the second, third, fourth and subsequent occasion as applicable up to the twelfth.

Mr. Mellor: The information collected centrally relates to the final court appearance only and whether or not the person was remanded in custody by magistrates at any time before this appearance. Table 8·7 of the annual Command Paper "Criminal Statistics England and Wales" gives information on the disposal, of those remanded in custody by magistrates courts. More detailed information is not available.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will provide the most recent information available about the extent to which defendants take up the option under section 59 of the Criminal Justice Act 1982 not to appear at certain remand hearings; and whether he will provide figures showing the take up by length of remand period and by area.

Mr. Mellor: The results reported in Home Office research and planning unit paper 34 "Remands In The Absence Of The Accused", published in 1985, showed that between one third and one half of opportunities to be remanded in absence were taken up. Similar results are contained in the report of the court escort scrutiny. Information on take up by length of remand period and by area is not available.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will publish the findings of the courts escorts scrutiny committee separately for summary and committal cases, showing the number of prisoners in their sample of 400 who were bailed at their second, third, fourth and subsequent appearances.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not available and could not be provided without disproportionate cost.

Cruelty to Animals

Miss Fookes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received following the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals campaign to amend the Protection of Animals Act 1911 and the introduction of the Private Member's Bill by the hon. Member for Bury, South (Mr. Sumberg).

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Since 1 March, we have received 459 letters from right hon. and hon. Members about the campaign by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. From members of the public we have received 347 letters about the campaign and 17,650 postcards pre-printed by the RSPCA as part of its campaign material.

Bugging Devices

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to bring forward legislation to prevent the open unrestricted sale of bugging devices for commercial and domestic telephones, and the issuing of guidance and information about their installation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I do not believe that such legislation directed to the sale of such devices would be the best or most effective way to deal with the issues of privacy that arise.

Prisons

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have access to integral sanitation; how many are obliged to slop out; what plans he has to improve toilet facilities in prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: I will reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many places in prisons have been provided since June 1983 in (a) newly built prisons, (b) existing premises acquired for use as prisons and (c) additional places in existing prisons.

Mr. Mellor: The following additional new prison places have been provided since June 1983:

	Places
a) at newly built prisons	1,084
b) at existing premises acquired for use as prisons	750
c) additional places in existing establishments	1,826

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many additional places in prisons will be provided between now and 1995 in (a) newly built prisons, (b) existing premises acquired for use as prisons and (c) additional places in existing prisons.

Mr. Mellor: The following additional new prison places will be provided between now and 1995:

	Places
a) at newly built prisons	9,384
b) at existing premises acquired for use as prisons	250
c) additional places in existing establishments	4,061

Telephone Tapping

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been brought against private individuals and organisations for the illegal tapping of telephone calls since 1983; and how many of these prosecutions resulted in convictions.

Mr. Hurd: The information which is held centrally, which may be incomplete, indicates that there were no prosecutions or convictions since 1983 for the illegal tapping of telephones under either the Telecommunications Act 1984 or the Interception of Communications Act 1985. Information for 1986 or 1987 is not yet available.

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints his Department has received from private individuals and organisations since 1983 concerning the suspected tapping of telephone calls.

Mr. Hurd: No record has been kept of the number of such complaints.

North-East

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers are serving in the north-east constabularies; and how many were serving in 1978.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is as follows:

Force	Authorised police establishment on 31 December 1978	Strength on 31 December 1978	Authorised police establishment on 31 March 1987	Strength on 31 March 1987
Durham	1,349	1,289	1,357	1,307
Northumbria	3,325	3,208	3,413	3,402
Cleveland	1,411	1,311	1,474	1,462
Totals	6,085	5,808	6,244	6,171

Police Station Closures

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police stations have been closed in Wales since 1979 both overall and by individual police authority area.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the chief constables concerned that the information requested is as follows:

Police force—police authority	Number of police stations closed since 1979
Dyfed Powys	17
Gwent	—
North Wales	2
South Wales	7
Total	26

Mohammad Jamil Khan

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when Mohammad Jamil Khan applied to the British embassy in Islamabad for a visa to visit the United Kingdom; for how long he wishes to visit; on what date the application was referred to the Home Office; and when he expects a decision on the application to be made by his Department.

Mr. Waddington: Mohammad Jamil Khan applied to the British embassy in Islamabad on 5 January for a visa for a six-month visit to relatives in the United Kingdom. Since the application did not appear to be straightforward, it was referred to the Home Office on 11 January for inquiries to be made in this country. This has taken longer than I would have wished, but the inquiries should be completed by the end of the month. Their result will be sent to the embassy, who will make a decision on Master Khan's application and inform his father of it direct. This delay is by no means typical of applications made in Islamabad, where over 90 per cent. of visit visa cases are dealt with on the same day.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to arrange for staff of his Department to be screened for antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 334]: No.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any current or former staff of his Department have been found to have developed AIDS or antibodies to HIV.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 343]: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on 22 April at column 627-8.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to ensure that staff of his Department are warned about those homosexual and other activities which are deemed to involve a high risk of AIDS infection.

Mr. Hurd [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 344]: In April 1986, the Management and Personnel Office, after consulting the Government's chief medical officer, circulated to all Departments guidance to managers and model notes for staff. This Department has issued guidance and information to staff whose duties may put them in contact with AIDS sufferers, or with samples containing the virus. Information has also been provided to personnel management and welfare staff. In addition, members of staff will have received copies of the DHSS leaflet distributed in January 1987 to all households in the United Kingdom. The need for further advice to staff is under review.

PRIME MINISTER

Police Investigations

Q38. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to seek to alter the arrangements under which the Attorney-General can direct the police to pursue investigations into specific matters at named locations; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No. I am advised that the Attorney-General has no power to direct the police to pursue any investigations.

"Better Made in Britain" Exhibition

Q57. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her visit to the "Better Made in Britain" exhibition on Wednesday 8 April.

The Prime Minister: I was delighted to be able to open the two "Better Made in Britain" exhibitions on 8 April.

"Better Made in Britain" plays an important role in bringing together purchasers and potential suppliers, challenging United Kingdom manufacturers to match foreign goods in design, quality, price and delivery. I hope that the very large number of United Kingdom suppliers who visited the two exhibitions will vigorously follow up the contracts which they made there, to win back more United Kingdom business, with all this means for profits, jobs and living standards in the United Kingdom.

Scott Lithgow (Orders)

Q109. Dr. Godman asked the Prime Minister when she now expects Her Majesty's Government to place the order promised to Scott Lithgow at the time an order was awarded to Vickers, Barrow in Furness for the construction of conventional submarines; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: It is the Government's wish to place these orders with Scott Lithgow, provided the company meets the terms outlined by my hon. Friend on 28 January 1986 at column 449. Negotiations are still continuing with the company.

Farming

Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister if she will publish a table showing the level of financial support for the farming industry alongside that for other major industries.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) on 2 March at columns 518-520, which pointed out that in 1985, the latest year available, general Government expenditure in support of agriculture, forestry and fishing was £2,821 million compared with £2,432 million on manufacturing as a whole. A more detailed analysis could only be provided at disproportionate expense.

Northern Region

Mr. Fallon asked the Prime Minister whether she will list Government achievements in the northern region since 1983; and whether she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I will reply to my hon. Friend shortly.

Mr. Fallon asked the Prime Minister whether she will list, by Government Department, the principal aid given to the northern region in each year since 1983.

The Prime Minister: I will reply to my hon. Friend shortly.

State Security

Mr. Winnick asked the Prime Minister what is her practice in relation to answering parliamentary questions about security matters which occurred under previous Administrations; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 10 February at column 161, and to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) on 28 April at column 160.

Mr. Alan Williams asked the Prime Minister by what authority her press secretary briefed the media about the scope and nature of the 1977 inquiries into the alleged activities of the security services in relation to the Government headed by Lord Wilson of Riveaulx; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave to my right hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Rees) on 17 March at column 812, and to the reply I gave to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Devonport (Dr. Owen) on 19 March at column 1038.

Engagements

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 May.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 May.

Mr. Canavan asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 5 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Trade

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the principal achievements of his Department in promoting British trade since 1983.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on Tuesday 16 December 1986 at column 438.

End-User Certificates

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he takes to monitor compliance with end-user certificates; how many contraventions have been notified to him over the latest period for which figures are available; what steps he takes to investigate alleged contraventions of the terms of such certificates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Naval Construction

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many contracts have been placed in British shipyards by foreign Governments for the construction of naval vessels so far in the current year; and if he will give details in the Official Report.

Mr. Giles Shaw: It is not the Government's practice to reveal details of sales of defence equipment to foreign countries, for reasons of confidentiality. However, this year so far there have been no contracts for the construction of warships in British yards by foreign Governments.

Regional Aid

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many jobs have been created or safeguarded in the Northern region through regional development grants and regional selective assistance in each year since 1983.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The number of jobs expected to be created or safeguarded in the northern region[1] through offers of new-style regional development grant and regional selective assistance in each financial year since 1983 are as follows:

Financial Year	Jobs
New-Style Regional Development Grants
1983-84	[2]Nil
1984-85	846
1985-86	11,340
1986-87	18,389
Regional Selective Assistance
1983-84	14,133
1984-85	13,579
1985-86	5,984
1986-87	9,600

[1] The Northern Region is the North East Region plus Cumbria.
[2] The new-style RDG came into force with effect from 29 November 1984.

Notes:

(1) Since old-style RDG's were not linked to the creation or preservation of jobs no estimate is available of the effect on employment of payments under that scheme.

(2) Some RSA and RDG offers will relate to the same jobs but it is not practicable accurately to identify these.

(3) The figures for both schemes are based on offers made.

New Companies

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many new companies have been registered in the northern region in each year since 1979.

Mr. Howard: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Wine Sales

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what meetings he has held with the local authorities co-ordinating body on trading standards during the last 12 months to discuss sales of wine by the glass; what conclusion he has reached on the basis of their representations about the effectiveness of the code of conduct relating to the sale of wine in prescribed measures and at agreed prices; if he will now introduce legislation to place the code on a statutory basis; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list the options he has considered with the local authorities co-ordinating body on trading standards and with the trade sponsors of the code of conduct on the sales of wine by measured glass; and what steps he has in mind to establish stronger compliance with the code.

Mr. Howard: I have not discussed sales of wine by the glass with the local authorities co-ordinating body on trading standards in the last 12 months. The Department has, however, met the trade sponsors of the voluntary code of practice and impressed on them the need to secure more widespread compliance. The alternative would be legislation to require wine to be sold in a range of prescribed standard sizes or by reference to volume without the restriction of a prescribed range. The results of the most recent survey forwarded to the Department by a local authority indicate that adherence to the code is gaining momentum. Legislation would not therefore be appropriate at the present time.

South Africa

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) how many of the 7,300 black Africans reported in his Department's recent summary of company responses under the EEC code of conduct for companies with interests in South Africa as being paid below the SLL5 in the period ended 30 June 1985 were at the time employed by companies which by 30 June 1986 had stopped reporting to his Department or parts of companies which had or been sold by the company reporting;

(2) how many of the 7,300 black Africans reported in his Department's recent summary of company responses under the EEC code of conduct for companies with interests in South Africa as being paid below the SLL5 in the period ended 30 June 1985 were employed by companies which had reduced their black African workforces by June 1986 to fewer than the number of employees they reported below SLL5 the previous year; and what numerical effect such work force reductions have had on the total number of black Africans his Department considers to be being paid below SLL5.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is contained in the individual company reports submitted to my Department in accordance with the EC code of conduct for companies with interests in South Africa. The reports have, as usual, been deposited in the Library.

WALES

Road Works

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are his Department's scheduled starting dates, respectively, for improvements on the A487, for (a) the Felinheli bypass, (b) the Pont Selont improvements, (c) the Penygroes Uanllyfni bypass, (d) the Porthmadog bypass and (e) the Felinheli-Caernarfon south improvement; and what priority Gwynedd county council has indicated to his Department for all five of these schemes.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The A487 Port Dinorwic bypass (ie, Felinheli bypass), the A487 Seiont bridge and approaches scheme and the A487 Caernarfon-south of Port Dinorwic improvement are all expected to start in the period January 1988 to December 1990 in accordance with "Roads in Wales 1985". The start dates will depend on the completion of statutory procedures and scheme design and the availability of finance. Bypass schemes for Penygroes, Llanllyfni and Porthmadog are not included in the forward programme but the case for such improvements is being considered in drawing up the programme for the 1990s. In response to the consultation paper "Roads for Wales — The 1990s and Beyond", Gwynedd county council urged that projects programmed to start before 1990 should start as planned and indicated that bypasses for Porthmadgc, Penygroes and Llanllyfni were of equal priority for a start in the early 1990s.

Cardiac Services

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether his Department has sought to obtain cardiac services for National Health Service patients in Gwynedd or Clwyd by purchasing such services from private practitioners in England; and if he will make a statement on his policy on this matter.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My Department is presently exploring with the appropriate district health authorities a range of options to secure early improvement in cardiac services to patients in north Wales, including the provision of the service by private sector hospitals. No decision has yet been made.

Footpaths

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his reply of 27 April, Official Report, column 50, whether objections have been received relating to footpaths ascending Pen yr Oleu Wen (655619), Carnedd Dafydd (663631), Carnedd Llewelyn (685645), Foel Grach (689659), Yr Elen (673652), Penyrhelgi-du (698631), Pen lithrig y wrach, Y Garn (632596), Tryfan (664594), Glyder Fawr (643579), Glyder Fach (657584), Elidir Fawr (613614), Mynydd Perfedd (624618), Foelgoch (628613), Moel Siabod (705546), Crib Goch (625553), Llwyedd (624533), Cnicht (645466), Moel Hebog (565469), Mynydd Mawr, (540547) or Moel Eilis (556576); and when he now expects the footpaths in question to appear on definitive maps of rights of way.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. The timetable for the production of a definitive map for Gwynedd is a matter for Gwyedd county council.

Town and Country Planning

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Wales what new legislative provisions he anticipates will be required to supplement the existing town and country planning legislation in order fully to implement the European directive on environmental assessment.

Mr. Mark Robinson: A consultation paper on the implementation in the United Kingdom of the European directive on environmental assessment was issued jointly by the Secretaries of State for the Environment, Wales and Scotland in April 1986. This paper outlined the legislative proposals (including those in relation to projects in England and Wales which fall to be approved under the Town and Country Planning Acts) which it is proposed to bring into effect by statutory instrument under the European Communities Act 1972 beore 2 July 1988, the date by which the directive requires member states to take measures to comply with the directive. The responses to that consultation paper are still being considered.

A5 (Improvements)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much money has been spent on major road improvements on the A5 trunk road in Wales during each of the last seven years; and what is the planned expenditure, at November 1986 prices, on this road for the next four years, including the present financial year.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is as follows:

Outturn expenditure[1]

	£ million
1980-81	2·496
1981-82	1·323
1982-83	4·339
1983-84	2·729
1984-85	0·888
1985-86	0·327
1986-87	0·121

[1] These figures exclude expenditure on the A5/A55 Bangor By-pass as this was included in the information on A55 expenditure given to the hon. Gentleman on 27 April 1987, at column 49.

Planned expenditure at November 1986 prices[1]

	£ million
1987-88	1·742
1988-89	[2]0·526
1989-90	[2]3·262
1990-91	[2]5·436
Later years	[2]16·28

[1] This includes expenditure on the A5/A483 Chirk By-pass.
[2] These figures exclude expenditure on land which is expected to amount to some £0·881 million in the years beyond 1987-88.

Expenditure in 1987-88 and later years on schemes not yet in progress will depend on the completion of design and statutory procedures and the availability of finance.

Studies are being carried out or are planned for A5 on Anglesey and for locations on the mainland. These may give rise to additional improvement schemes.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has any plans to arrange for staff of his Department to be screened for antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 349]: No.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether any current or former staff of his Department have been found to have developed AIDS or antibodies to human immunodeficiency virus.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on Wednesday 22 April at column 628.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he has taken to ensure that staff of his Department are warned about those homosexual and other activities which are deemed to involve a high risk of AIDS infection.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards [pursuant to his reply, 30 March 1987, c. 349]: Staff in the Department have received copies of the leaflet on AIDS which was sent to every household in the country earlier in the year. In addition information which is more specific to employment issues—and based on guidance from the Management and Personnel Office and on the booklet "Aids and Employment" — has recently been issued to all staff.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

East Timor

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations Her Majesty's Government have received or made concerning military offensives by Indonesia in East Timor.

Mr. Renton: We have no evidence to support suggestions that Indonesia has launched military offensives in East Timor in recent months. Our impression is that the situation in East Timor is generally quiet, though minor incidents may still occur in those areas where low-level conflict persists.

Soviet Jews

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the estimated figures of Soviet Jews who have been allowed to emigrate from the Soviet Union during the month of April 1987.

Mr. Renton: 717. This is an increase over the figure for March (470). We welcome this continuing trend.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made as to the implications for the United Kingdom chemical industry under the requirements of article X of the United States draft treaty on chemical weapons.

Mr. Renton: Developments in the negotiations in Geneva are regularly discussed with the United Kingdom chemical industry.

In general, verification of non-production of chemical weapons in civil industry will be through agreed arrangements providing for information exchange and on-site inspection at a number of declared chemical facilities.

Article X of the United States draft treaty proposes arrangements for challenge inspection, the verification of last resort. By definition, a challenge inspection would be an exceptional event.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will review the United Kingdom's continued support for the modernisation of the United States' proportional share of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation chemical deterrent in the light of the position adopted by the United States at the conference on disarmament in the negotiations towards a chemical weapon treaty.

Mr. Renton: No. President Reagan reaffirmed with the Prime Minister at Camp David in November 1986 that a verifiable chemical weapons ban was one of their arms control priorities. We are working closely with the United States and other allies in Geneva to negotiate arrangements which will ensure that an agreement is fully effective.

Belize

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the talks on Belize between the United Kingdom, Belize and Guatemala, in Miami.

Mr. Eggar: Talks between Belize and Guatemala in Miami on 29 April were held in a frank and cordial atmosphere. British officials attended as observers. The delegations of Belize and Guatemala put forward proposals and agreed to report to their respective Governments.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy that the garrison in Belize shall be maintained as long as considered necessary by the Government of Belize.

Mr. Eggar: As I told the hon. Member on 19 May 1986, it was agreed with the Belize Government at independence in 1981 that the British garrison will remain in Belize for an appropriate period.

Disarmament

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to meet his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts to discuss current discussions on disarmament.

Mr. Renton: The next ministerial-level meeting of the North Atlantic Council will be in June. Until then, the process of close Alliance consultations on arms control will continue through both multilateral and bilateral contacts.

South Africa (Terrorism)

Mr. Cabom asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government made in the case of the trial of eight Namibians for their alleged contraventions of South Africa's Terrorism Act.

Mrs. Chalker: On 24 March, Her Majesty's ambassador in Cape Town made clear in a demarche to the South African Government our concern at evidence of human rights abuses by the security forces in Namibia.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Personal Incomes

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what gains he estimates will accrue or have accrued to (a) the unemployed, (b) pensioners and (c) employed persons with incomes per year of (i) under £5,000, (ii) £10,000, (iii) £10,000 to £15,000, (iv) £15,000 to £20,000, (v) £20,000 to £30,000, (vi) £30,000 to £50,000, (vii) £50,000 to £70,000, (viii) £70,000 to £100,000 and (ix) over £100,000 (1) as a result of his Budget of 17 March and (2) cumulatively as a result of all Budgets since 1979; how many persons are in each group; and what has been the average gain for members of each group.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I regret the delay in replying to this question. The table gives estimates of reductions in income tax liabilities at 1987-88 income levels of the proposed allowances, thresholds and rates for 1987-88. Estimates are given for taxpayers aged over 65 and for employed persons (taken as those with earnings from employment as a main or subsidiary source of income): on this basis, some taxpayers may be in both categories and some of those shown as employed may have a spell of unemployment during the year. All information is in terms of single people and married couples. The proposed 1987-88 tax regime is compared with (1) the 1986-87 tax regime and (2) the 1978-79 tax regime, both indexed to 1987-88 levels by reference to the statutory provisions. Some of the income ranges have been combined in order to provide reliable estimates.

No comparable figures are available for the unemployed. Income tax changes can have no direct effect on the net incomes of those who are not taxpayers, but income tax cuts in successive Budgets have helped improve incentives and stimulate enterprise and efficiency, thereby helping to create jobs.

Tax Reliefs and Allowances

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the aggregate value of the increase in tax reliefs and allowances of all kinds since May 1979 accruing to the richest 1 per cent., 5 per cent., 10 per cent., and 20 per cent., of earners; what is the breakdown by kind of relief or allowance; how many persons are in each of these categories; and what has been the average gain per earner in each of these categories.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information is available only for income tax personal allowances, thresholds and tax rates (including the investment income surcharge). Information in the table is given for the top 1 per cent., 5 per cent., 10 per cent. and 20 per cent. of taxpaying single people and married couples analysed by total income liable to tax. The table shows the reduction in income tax liabilities in a full year at 1987-88 income levels of the proposed 1987-88 income tax regime compared with the 1978-79 regime indexed to 1987-88 levels by reference to the statutory formula.

Northern Region

Mr. Fallon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will estimate the number of individual share owners in the northern region at present and in 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The joint Treasury and stock exchange survey estimated that 16 per cent. of the adult population in the northern region owned shares at the beginning of 1987. I regret that comparable figures are not available for 1979, though the number of adults owning shares has trebled over the United Kingdom as a whole since 1979.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will bring up to date the information on mortgages and the price of dwellings referred to in the reply of 26 July 1985, Official Report, column 873; and if he will add a forecast for 1987.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, what progress has been made in the discussions between the European Investment Bank and Eurotunnel on the provision of the £1,000 million loan for the Channel tunnel project; if a decision has yet been made on the guaranteeing of the loan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: A possible loan will be discussed at the next meeting of the board of directors. The question of guarantees will be one of the matters for consideration but it is accepted that there can be no question of a guarantee by the United Kingdom Government.

Building Societies

Mr. Bermingham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will introduce legislation to prevent the building societies from relying on a disclaimer in mortgage applications to avoid liability to purchasers of property for negligence on the part of the societies' own surveyor.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply]: No. Section 2(2) of the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 already provides that a person cannot by reference to any contract term or notice exclude or restrict his liability for negligence except in so far as the term or notice satisfies the requirement of reasonableness.

Income Tax

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total cost in 1986-87 prices of all reductions in rates of income tax since May 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 28 April, 1987, c. 64]: The total cost, in a full year, of all changes since 1978-79 in income tax rates, including those proposed in the 1987 Budget, is £7,840 million at 1987-88 levels of income (equivalent to £7,540 million at 1986-87 prices). This amount includes the cost of changes in basic and higher rates and higher rate thresholds, and abolition of the investment income surcharge and the reduced rate band. It excludes the cost of changes in the levels of personal allowances which totals £4,030 million at 1987-88 levels of income (£3,875 million at 1986-87 prices). The calculation is made by comparing the total income tax liabilities in 1987-88 under the proposed 1987-88 income tax regime with those under the 1978-79 tax regime indexed to 1987-88 levels by reference to the statutory formula. Thus, the comparisons allow for budgetary changes in income tax rates and thresholds but not for any change in the definition of the tax base between 1978-79 and 1987-88. The forecast movement in the RPI has been used to calculate equivalent amounts at 1986-87 prices.

Aviation Fuel (Iran)

Mr. Allan Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will investigate the circumstances in which the oil tankers Paula Maersk and Ambio Fingo left Milford Haven laden with aviation fuel and ended up at Iran's Hormuz terminal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lawson [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1987, c. 232]: Since aviation fuel destined for Iran is not subject to export licensing requirements, there would appear to be no reason for investigating the circumstances in this case.

Channel Tunnel (Duty-free facilities)

Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to ensure that duty-free facilities are made available to rail passengers utilising the Channel tunnel, commensurate with those available to cross-Channel passengers using alternative modes of transport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 1 May 1987, c. 290]: It is the Government's intention, so far as international obligations allow, to provide that travellers through the Channel tunnel will enjoy such duty-free facilities as are available to persons travelling by sea or air.

It is not currently the practice within the Community to permit the sale of duty-free goods on board trains. Most member states have acceded to an agreed international standard which does not provide for such a facility. Duty-free sales could be allowed only with the agreement of the other member states concerned. This particular matter is being kept under review during discussions about the customs arrangements for the tunnel.

It is expected that there will be duty-free shop facilities at the French and British terminals for the shuttle trains, ie at Frethun and Cheriton.

THE ARTS

Acceptances in Lieu

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Minister for the Arts what use has been made by the Office of Arts and Libraries of the contingency resources for acceptance in lieu of tax in the current financial year.

Mr. Luce: As I announced on 19 March 1987 in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), at col. 561, the Government are acquiring Constable's "Stratford Mill" for the nation. The necessary resources will be made available from the 1987-88 public expenditure reserve. There will be no overall increase in public expenditure.

Opera North

Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister for the Arts what information he has about the future funding of Opera North, Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: Opera North will receive Arts Council funding of £2·593 million for 1987-88 which includes £0·454 million for touring. In addition, the company has received about £0·032 million from the local authorities for its operations during the first three months of this financial year, and discussions are continuing about funding for the remainder of the year.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Criminal Justice Bill

Mr. Alton asked the Lord Privy Seal how many hours have been spent in Standing Committee and on the Floor of the House of Commons discussing the Criminal Justice Bill; and what was the cost to public funds.

Mr. Biffen: The information is as follows:

Hours spent discussing the Criminal Justice Bill

	Hours
In Standing Committee	82·5
On the floor of the House of Commons	21·0

No sensible estimate of the cost to the taxpayers is readily available.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Paymaster General if he will list in the Official Report, the maximum number of approved places and permited average occupancy rates for all community programme projects which have been approved by managing agencies in the Borders region for each year since 1983, including those proposed in 1987-88.

Mr. Lee: The Borders regional council community programme agency is the only managing agent in the Borders region. Statistics on this agency are available from 1985, although not in the precise form requested. Prior to 1985, this information could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Northern Region

Mr. Fallon asked the Paymaster General how many people have been placed in work by job centres in the northern region in each year since 1983.

Mr. Trippier: Following is the available information. The figures exclude placings on Government schemes.

	Number
1983	83,311
1984	92,094
1985	99,408
1986	101,957

Mr. Fallon asked the Paymaster General (1) how many new jobs have been created in the northern region in each year since 1983;

(2) how many people are self-employed in the northern region; and how many were so in 1979 and 1983.

Mr. Lee: There are no figures for job losses and job gains.

The available information is as follows:

Northern Region

Numbers of self-employed people (based on labour force surveys)

	Number
1978	79,000
1983	92,000
1986	107,000

Mr. Fallon asked the Paymaster General (1) how much will be spent on training and retraining in the northern region in the current year; and how much was spent in 1983;

(2) how many places are being provided in each of his Department's training schemes in the current year in the northern region; and how many were so provided in 1983.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Inner-city Task Forces

Mr. Leighton asked the Paymaster General how many new jobs were created during the first year's operation of the eight inner-city task forces.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A principal aim of the task forces is to make it easier for residents in their areas to get jobs. However, it is not possible to measure total net additional jobs in the task force areas with accuracy. Any estimate would have to combine new jobs specifically associated with task force projects, jobs associated with business start-ups; jobs in firms helped by task force development funds, jobs created in agencies funded by the inner cities initiative and jobs gained by residents as a result of training courses facilitated by the initiative. We have not therefore yet attempted such an overall estimate.

I have been very impressed with the progress made by our eight Government task forces. They have made considerable headway in countering problems of employability, motivation, skills and enterprise among residents of some of our most difficult areas. The considerable success of the task forces has, as I announced to the House on Monday 27 April, led us to extend the experiment to a further eight areas. We are confident that the new task forces will enjoy the same degree of success, and bring positive benefits to the residents of their areas.

Hazardous Substances

Mr. Michie asked the Paymaster General in relation to the Control of Industrial Major Accidents and Hazards Regulations 1984, for how many large inventory top tier sites the area defined by the notification of institutions handling hazardous substances consultation distance, determined by the Health and Safety Executive for the site, exceed the area to which in the opinion of the enforcing authority the provisions of Control of Industrial Major Accidents and Hazards Regulation 12 should apply.

Mr. Lee: This information is not held centrally and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Michie asked the Paymaster General in relation to the Control of Industrial Major Accidents and Hazards Regulations 1984, (a) for how many large inventory top tier sites, and for what proportion of the total number of large inventory top tier sites, Control of Industrial Major Accidents and Hazards Regulations 11 and 12 have been complied with and (b) for how many small inventory top tier sites, and for what proportion of the total number of small inventory top tier sites, Control of Industrial Major Accidents and Hazards Regulations 11 and 12 have been complied with.

Mr. Lee: The information is not available in the form requested. Of the installations at which the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984 apply, 173 are known to have prepared plans required by regulation 11. The number of installations at which actions is known to have been taken in respect of regulation 12 is 190.

Mr. Michie asked the Paymaster General on what date amendments to the Control of Industrial Major Accidents and Hazards Regulations 1984 arising from European Community Directive 82/502/EEC will come into force.

Mr. Lee: Directive 87/216/EEC, which amends Directive 82/501/EEC, was adopted on 19 March 1987 and notified to Her Majesty's Government on 24 March 1987. Member states must comply with the amendment not later than 18 months after notification and it is intended that the required amendments to the Control of Industrial Major Accidents Hazards Regulations 1984 will be made within this time period.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if, on the basis of the labour force survey, he will list how many (a) men, (b) women, (c) men and women (i) said they would like a job and were available to start work in the next two weeks, (ii) said they would like a job but were not available to start work in the next two weeks but had sought work in the last four weeks and (iii) said they would like a job; and if he will provide estimates for Scotland, Wales and each region.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General (1) if he will list the numbers employed in each parliamentary constituency in 1984, on the basis of his results from the labour force survey, showing for each constituency the gains and losses in employees since 1981;

(2) if he will publish the April unemployment rates for the United Kingdom and each region, including Scotland and Wales, using the new employment estimate contained in the 1984 census of employment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will list the numbers employed in (a) manufacturing industry and (b) manufacturing and construction industry in each parliamentary constituency in 1984, on the basis of his results from the labour force survey, showing for each constituency, the gains and losses in (a) manufacturing and (b) manufacturing and construction employees since 1981.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is not available. The labour force survey only provides estimates at national and regional level and is not designed to provide information for smaller areas such as parliamentary constituencies. The available constituency figures are the same as given in my reply to the hon. Member on 10 April 1987, at columns 435-443.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will list the number of people who have been continuously unemployed since June 1983 for each region of the country and for Scotland and Wales.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend on 10 April 1987 at column 434.

Wages Councils

Mr. Wainwright asked the Paymaster General if he will publish in the Official Report the statistics on wages councils employment and compliance with wages councils rates in 1986 in the same format used in the reply given on 17 April 1986, Official Report, columns 493-98; if he will also indicate the effect on employment in each wages council sector of the removal of young people from wages council coverage; and if he will show for each wages council the extent of underpayment of young people aged under 21 years before their removal from wages council coverage.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is given in the tables, except that statistics relating to underpayments of young people under the age of 21 are not available.

Attempts to estimate the employment effects of the reforms implemented by the Wages Act 1986 are not likely to be fruitful, but the removal of statutory minima, which prevent employers from offering jobs at rates which young people would accept, must result in increased employment.

The Divisional figures for the number of workers whose pay was checked by methods not involving inspection visits include workers employed by multiple firms whose head office is located in the Division, who are employed in branches in other areas. This needs to be taken into account when comparing the Divisional figures shown in columns 2 and 5 of Table 5.

Brentwood and Ongar (Training Schemes)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Paymaster General if he will state the number of young people on various training schemes in the Brentwood and Ongar constituency, based on the most recent statistics available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The information is as follows. On 30 April 1987, in the Brentwood and Ongar local authority district, which includes the constituency of Brentwood and Ongar, there were 110 people in training on YTS schemes. In addition, a further 184 young people who live in Brentwood were in training in other YTS schemes in Essex.

I am greatly encouraged by the success of YTS. It reflects well on all those involved in the programme, particularly industry and commerce, that YTS is now a high-quality training programme which offers our young people the best possible start in working life.

DHSS Benefits

Mr. Dewar asked the Paymaster General if he will publish a table giving the number of people in each Department of Health and Social Security office area in Scotland who have been refused entitlement to benefit (a) for failing the eligibility for work criteria and (b) following a Restart interview in the most recent period of 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

"Can Workfare Work?"

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will detail all the costs involved in the study by Mr. John Burton on "Can Workfare Work?"

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The research project into workfare carried out by the employment research centre of the university of Buckingham cost £19,926.

Professor Addison (Study)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will detail all the costs incurred in the study by Professor Addison of the University of North Carolina; and when the report will be made available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The study by Professor Addison was part of the research project into workfare carried out by the university of Buckingham. The total cost of the project was £19,926. It is not possible to provide specific cost figures for particular aspects of the project.

I understand that the employment research centre at the university intends to publish Professor Addison's report soon.

"Action for Jobs"

Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General what is his policy towards the distribution of the Manpower Services Commission pack, "Action for Jobs" by persons outside his Department.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The "Action for Jobs" booklet is a guide to over one million opportunities available through over 30 employment, enterprise and training programmes. The opportunities are freely available to a wide range of people and we have therefore encouraged as large a distribution of the booklet as possible. This includes distribution through banks, post offices and other organisations so as to reach as many people as can benefit from it. Over 5 million copies have been taken up so far.

ENVIRONMENT

PRC (Homes) Ltd.

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many individual guarantees have been issued by PRC (Homes) Ltd. to date in respect of completed repair works.

Mr. Tracey: I understand from PRC Homes Ltd. that, as at 1 April 1987, 1,423 houses had been registered in England and Wales under the PRC Homes Ltd. warranty scheme; and that, of these, 396 had had their repairs completed.

Equipment Sales

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the way in which the Property Services Agency and contractors conducted the sale of equipment used for building the airport at Mount Pleasant in the Falklands.

Mr. Chope: Most of the equipment used in the building of the Mount Pleasant airport was bought, and consequently owned, by the contractor, Laing-Mowlem-ARC Joint Venture. Disposal of that equipment is entirely a matter for the joint venture.

In respect of surplus stores and equipment sold by PSA, I refer to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 24 November at column 43. That sale realised net receipts to the Exchequer of just over £500,000.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report annual statistics since 1979 of local government spending in Grimsby, and the percentage of this spending which was financed by the central Government rate support grant.

Mr. Chope: The information for 1981-82 and later years is as follows:

	Total expenditure £ million	Rate support grant as per cent. of total expenditure
1981-82	4·323	91·4
1982-83	4·934	79·9
1983-84	5·210	79·6
1984-85	5·773	72·9
1985-86	5·981	79·4
1986-87	6·328	81·6
1987-88	7·336	70·1

Total expenditure is the measure of local authority expenditure used in the determination of block grant (the main component of rate support grant). It comprises net current expenditure on the rate fund revenue account plus items such as debt charges and revenue contributions to capital and less specific and supple-mentary grants and items such as interest receipts. Estimates of total expenditure prior to 1981-82 are not available.

British Gas (Land Holdings)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps have been taken to remove the land holdings of British Gas from the public bodies land Register under section 10 of the Local Government Act 1980, following privatisation of the Corporation.

Mr. John Patten: The Gas Act 1986, which privatised the British Gas Corporation, also amended the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 so that the provisions concerning the registers of publicly owned land, contained in part X and schedule 16 of the Act, no longer applied to British Gas. The relevant provisions of the Gas Act were brought into operation on 23 August 1986.

Council House Sales

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council-owned houses in the borough of Shrewsbury and Atcham have been sold since the implementation of the Housing Act 1980.

Mr. Tracey: Reported sales of dwellings by Shrewsbury and Atcham council appear in the following issues of "Local Housing Statistics" which are available in the Library:

Financial years	Issue No.
1980-81	62
1981-82	63
1982-83	67
1983-84	75
1984-85 and 1985-86	79

In the first nine months of 1986-87, Shrewsbury and Atcham council has reported selling 108 dwellings, of which 107 were under the right to buy scheme implemented in the 1980 Housing Act.

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses have been sold in the northern region in each year since 1980.

Mr. Tracey: Estimated sales of council houses in each region appear in the following issues of "Local Housing Statistics" which are available in the Library:

Financial year	Issue No.
1980-81	62
1981-82	63
1982-83	67
1983-84	75
1984-85 and 1985-86	79

For the first three quarters of 1986-87 there were an estimated 4,320 council house sales in the northern region.

Derelict Land Grant (Corby)

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the total derelict land grant paid to the Corby district council in 1985-86 and 1986-87, respectively;

(2) what is the total derelict land grant (a) paid and (b) approved, so far to the Corby district council in 1987-88.

Mr. John Patten: Derelict land grant paid to Corby district council since 1985-86 is:

	£ million
1985-86	2·13
1986-87	4·03
[1]1987-88	Nil

[1] To date.

Corby district council has received a capital resource allocation for 1987-88 of £3·4 million to cover expenditure on DLG reclamation schemes already approved. Grant will be paid to reimburse them for 100 per cent. of the actual costs incurred.

County Hall, Wakefield

Mr. Harrison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to ensure that a a public inquiry is held into the future of the county hall, Wood street, Wakefield; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Any question of a public inquiry would need to be considered in the context of the normal planning procedures.

House Prices

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the average house price, at the mortgage completion stage, in (a) south-west England, (b) south-east England excluding Greater London, (c) East Anglia, (d) the midlands, (e) north England, (f) Scotland, and (g) Wales.

Mr. Tracey: The average price of houses mortgaged to the building societies in the east and west midlands in the final quarter of 1986 was £29,691 and in the three regions of the north of England was £26,751. The figures for the other areas are in table 1.13*(b)* of "Housing and Construction Statistics" No. 28, which is available in the Library.

Nuclear Accidents

Mr. Redmond asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 18 December 1986, Official Report, columns 612-13, when the final stage of the Government's review of the emergency plans and procedures in the event of a nuclear accident in the United Kingdom or abroad, following the accident at Chernobyl, will be complete; and if it is the Government's intention to place a copy of this review in the Library when it is available.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the final paragraph of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's answer of 18 December 1986, in which she stated that a further statement would be issued when planning is complete.

Housing and Planning Act 1986

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to inform tenants about the terms of the Housing and Planning Act 1986.

Mr. Tracey: The Department's booklet "Your right to buy your home" has been revised to take account of changes introduced by the 1986 Act and copies were sent during February to tenants of council flats and maisonettes. The distribution was followed by a series of advertisements in the national press drawing attention to the new booklet, which tenants can obtain by sending in a freepost coupon. Further steps will be taken to draw the attention of the tenants to the other housing provisions of the Act where appropriate.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the additional cost arising in (a) compensation payments, (b) redundancy and (c) other payments as a result of the Government's delay in finalising the terms for staff compensation as a result of the abolition of the metropolitan county councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: None. The report of the London and metropolitan government staff commission has noted that the attitude of the trade unions was in large measure responsible for the delay in settling the compensation terms.

Derelict Land

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many acres of derelict land have been cleared in the northern region in each year since 1979; and at what cost.

Mr. John Patten: Since 1979, the following areas of land in the northern region (the counties of Cleveland, Durham, Northumberland and Tyne and Wear) have been reclaimed with the assistance of derelict land grant:

Year	Area reclaimed (acres)	Approved expenditure (£ million)
1979-80	755	6·157
1980-81	743	6·847
1981-82	753	5·260
1982-83	694	9·805
1983-84	403	8·748
1984-85	1,210	10·411
1985-86	484	11·615

Canoeing

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will hold discussions with the Countryside Commission about the impact of the activities of canoeists on the congestion of rivers, the problems of countryside access and the level of damage to river banks; and what consideration he has given to introducing legislation to control the use of canoes;

(2) if he will request the Nature Conservancy Council to prepare a report on the activities of canoeists, with particular reference to how rapidly the sport of canoeing is being established and the implications for countryside conservation and wild life; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am aware of the potential conflict between the interests of canoeists and other water-based activities, particularly angling. Canoe users can cause in some instances damage to river banks. However, I am not satisfied that there is any serious risk to conservation from their activities nationally. I do not therefore see any need to discuss the matter with the Countryside Commission or to ask the Nature Conservancy Council to prepare a specific report since they already work with these canoeist groups as necessary. No legislation to control the use of canoes is contemplated. Disputes between river users are best settled by local negotiation.

Nature Conservancy Council

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what level of grant aid the Government made available in 1986-87 and 1987-88 to the Nature Conservancy Council; how many staff are employed full and part-time; and what percentage of its total expenditure is represented by the Government grant.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government allocated grant-in-aid to the nature Conservancy council of £32·1 million in 1986-87, and £36·5 million in 1987-88. At 1 April 1987 715 permanent full-time and 84 part-time staff were in post. Government grant will cover 97 per cent. of NCCs planned expenditure in 1987-88.

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on the activities of the Nature Conservancy Council and, in particular, on its policy towards declaring sites of special scientific interest.

Mr. Waldegrave: Under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, the NCC has a statutory duty to notify sites which it considers to be of special scientific interest. I have received a number of representations about the operation of these provisions ranging from suggestions that the NCC should be given stronger powers of compulsion to proposals for imposing further restrictions on the NCC's existing limited powers. I am satisfied that the present balance is about the right one.

Salcombe Estuary

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the operation of the Wildlife and Countryside Act in the light of the Nature Conservancy Council's decision to designate the entire Salcombe estuary as a site of special scientific interest, without first consulting or discussing the matter with the South Hams district council or the hon. Member for South Hams.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. I am satisfied that the Nature Conservancy Council acted in accordance with its statutory obligations in this case.

Environmental Assessment

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he has completed consideration of responses received to the consultation paper on the implementation in the United Kingdom of the European directive on environmental assessment which he issued in April 1986; what steps he proposes to take to implement this directive; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what new legislative provisions he anticipates will be required to supplement the existing town and country planning legislation in order fully to implement the European directive on environmental assessment.

Mr. Waldegrave: The consultation paper of April 1986, includes legislative proposals in relation to projects in England and Wales which fail to be approved under the Town and Country Planning Acts. It is proposed to bring these provisions into effect by statutory instrument under the European Communities Act 1972 before 2 July 1988, the date by which the directive requires member states to take the measures necessary to comply with the directive. The responses to the consultation paper are still being considered.

Urban Programme and Partnership Authorities

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the total accumulated loss of rate support grant to the urban programme and partnership authorities since 1979 expressed in 1987 prices.

Mr. Chope: A full answer could only be provided at disproportionate cost and because of the change in grant systems and to the structure of local government, any figure that might be produced would be of doubtful significance. Figures for rate support grant payments to individual authorities are available in the Library.

Newham

Mr Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the block grant, and the housing investment programme allocation for the London borough of Newham for each year since 1979 expressed in constant prices.

Mr John Patten: The information is as follows:

£ million (constant 86/87 prices)

	Block grant	Housing investment programme allocation
1979-80	[1]80·7	43·1
1980-81	[1]80.4	36.2
1981-82	71·3	19·8
1982-83	81·4	26·4
1983-84	81·7	23·2
1984-85	73·8	25·5
1985-86	77·3	22·2
1986-87	[2]66·4	21·7
1987-88	[2]75·8	16·8

Cash values have been converted to constant 1986/87 prices using the GDP deflator.

[1] Not comparable with grant paid in later years; arrangements for paying grant changed in 1981/82 when the 'Needs and Resources' elements of grant were replaced by Block Grant.

[2] Not comparable with grant paid in earlier years because of the abolition of the GLC.

[3] Figures for 1987/88 are estimates of likely grant entitlement when the Supplementary Report 1987/88 has been approved by Parliament.

Insulation

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the number of households which are not insulated to acceptable standards and which will not benefit from the new 90 per cent. grant for insulation.

Mr. Tracey: Precise information is not available, but the Government believe it is sensible to target assistance towards the costs of loft insulation on the households least able to afford it for themselves. Installing or improving loft insulation is generally very cost-effective, and householders with adequate means will find it in their own interest to make the necessary investment.

Longford River, Hampton Hill

Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects completion of the current works to protect the river banks at the Longford river, Hampton hill; if he will set out in the Official Report, what specific action he will take to reinstate wildlife, trees, flowers, grass and turf; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: These works are proceeding well and it is anticipated that the engineering elements will be completed early in June. This will include modifications to the sheet piling in response to representations by residents. A berm will be constructed to encourage plant growth at the water's edge and to provide a suitable habitat for wild life.

The landscaping reinstatement of the areas where contractors' plant has disturbed the banks will begin shortly. This will include seeding with a mix of wild flowers and grasses and planting of acquatic species in the berm.

Council Homes

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce legislation to confer on local authorities the power to require council tenants to pay an annual charge, to be refunded at the end of each year, where the tenant, in the opinion of the authority, has kept his or her home in good order; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The respective obligations of local authorities as landlords and of their tenants regarding the proper use and maintenance of council dwellings are laid down in the terms of their tenancy agreements, subject to the requirements of the Landlord and Tenants Act 1985 and part IV of the Housing Act 1985 ("the tenants' charter), and we see no need to alter these.

National Parks

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the national park authorities that have requested the designation of areas of land under section 42 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, and the name of each location and its size; and if he will make a statement on each request.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales have each received a request as follows:

National Park	Location	Area
North York Moors	Lockton High Moor	364ha (910 acres)
Pembrokeshire coast	Fronlas Mynachlogddu	3·5ha (8·5 acres)

In each case the farmer had voluntarily notified the authority of his intentions and an order under section 42 would not have been appropriate.

Public Inquiries

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is in a position to announce the results of his review of the call-in criteria in the light of the undertaking in paragraph 50 of his reply to the fifth report column 43 from the Government Committee, Session 1985-86, on "Planning: Appeal, Call-in and Major Public Inquiries".

Mr. Ridley: As noted in the Government's response to the fifth report from the Environment Committee, Session 1985-86, (Cm 43) the Government's general approach is not to interfere with the jurisdiction of the local planning authority unless it is necessary to do so. Each case must be considered on its individual merits. But after careful consideration, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have concluded that there is no need to depart from the general approach to calling in applications as stated in circular 2/81. We will therefore continue to be very selective about calling in cases for our decision, and applications will in general be called in only if planning issues of more than local importance are involved. Such cases may include, for example, those which in our opinion could have wide effects beyond their immediate locality, which give rise to substantial regional or national controversy which may conflict with national policy on important matters, and those where the interests of national security or of foreign Governments may be involved.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Civil Defence

Mr. Redmond asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when county emergency planning teams will be told their allocation of emergency feeding equipment, including field cookers, Soyer boilers and food containers, and from where it can be obtained.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Local authorities were informed a month ago that MAFF regional offices would be providing them with updated information on this matter. Letters will shortly be sent to them.

Mr. Redmond asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when local authorities will be notified of the identity of emergency food stocks controlled by his Department to aid them in making their emergency feeding plans.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The composition of the food stockpile maintained by my Department is identified in section 11 of the "Emergency Planning Guidance to Local Authorities" which makes it clear that this is a national asset to be used in areas of greatest need. Consideration is being given to whether the release of further information would be helpful to local authorities in their planning.

Mr. Redmond asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when local authorities will be notified of the location and inventory of EEC intervention stocks to aid them in making their emergency feeding plans.

Mr. Donald Thompson: It is not the custom to reveal details of EC intervention stocks held in individual stores but this information is maintained and would be released to local authorities if appropriate.

Mr. Redmond asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether his Department have consulted local authorities on the issuing of ration cards for use in a period of international tension; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: This is one of the matters with which my Department is concerned as part of its routine civil defence planning. Useful consultations are taking place with representatives of local authorities about the arrangements necessary to implement food control in crisis and war, including the issue of ration cards.

Farm Incomes

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy towards direct income aids for farmers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Canoeing

Mr. Mason asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will consult the water authorities regarding the implications of the expansion of canoeing activity for the operation of the Freshwater Fisheries Acts, with particular reference to disturbance of rivers and the impact on freshwater fish; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the right hon. Member as soon as possible.

Frozen Foods

Mr. Foulkes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his Department's response to the European Commission's recent questionnaire on the draft directive on quick frozen foods; and if he will make a statement on his Department's assessment as to the likely financial effect of these proposals on both retailers and consumers.

Mr. Donald Thompson: My Department has received no questionnaire from the European Commission on the draft directive on quick frozen foods, although I understand that such a questionnaire has been sent to certain non-Governmental Community bodies with an interest in the proposed directive. As the retail provisions of this directive have not yet been agreed I am unable to make an assessment of financial effects on retailers and consumers. My officials continue to make clear in negotiations in Brussels the United Kingdom's opposition to the unduly stringent provisions of the directive in its proposed form.

Salmonella

Mr. John Townend asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, in view of the continuing high incidence of salmonella food poisoning, he will consider making mandatory the effective treatment of animal protein feeds against salmonella.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Processed animal protein for use as animal feedingstuff is subject by statute to sample testing to ensure that it is salmonella free. If contamination is detected the manufacturer is required to take corrective action. Similar controls apply to imported animal protein.

Butter

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will make a statement setting out the price, in terms of pence per pound, at which the EEC Management Committee of the common agricultural policy agreed to the sale of 181,000 tons of butter to the Soviet Union under Regulation 765/86 at its March meeting; and what will be the cost which the EEC will require to fund after 1989 when member states are repaid the sums involved in subsidising these exports;

(2) if the representative of Her Majesty's Government serving on the Management Committee of the Common Market's agricultural policy supported the decision to extend the scope of regulation 2409/86 to enable the subsidising of butter sales for experimental industrial uses; and if he will make a statement setting out the possible experimental industrial uses which the committee had in mind and the price, in terms of pence per pound, at which butter will be made available for these experimental industrial purposes.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Fishing

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangement he provides for British vessels to fish off the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his policy towards seeking to reduce expenditure on the common agricultural policy in the light of the calculations of its cost to the average family contained in the recent evidence by the consumers in the European Community Group (UK) to the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities, a copy of which has been sent to him; and what is his Department's latest estimate of the cost of the Common Agricultural Policy per average family.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Cliff Erosion (Fairlight)

Mr. Warren asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will discuss with the Rother district council, the Southern water authority and the East Sussex county council what action can be taken, as a matter of urgency, to protect houses at Fairlight, in the constituency of Hastings and Rye, faced with imminent destruction by the collapse of cliffs into the sea.

Mr. Donald Thompson: It is for the coast protection authority — Rother District Council in this case — to promote such schemes as it wishes to carry out to protect the Fairlight area. I understand that the council has engaged consultants to study the problem and that a report is expected in June.

TRANSPORT

A40 Headington Junction

Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in the light of the representations from the hon. Member for Oxford East concerning congestion at the A40 Headington junction, he will make a statement on his proposals for alleviating this problem.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A scheme for grade separation at the A40 Headington junction is one of the 82 additions to the national trunk road construction programme which we announced on 28 April. The next step will be the appointment of design agents to investigate possible options for this major improvement. Meanwhile, we are considering with Oxfordshire county council a small modification to the layout of the roundabout to reduce traffic delays in the interim.

I acknowledge my hon. Friend's campaign and concern for the scheme.

Severn Crossing

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the date when tenders are to be invited for the second Severn crossing, the proposed date when work is to commence and the proposed completion date.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I informed the House on 6 November 1986 and 3 February this year that we wish to be in a position to provide the second Severn crossing by the mid-1990s, if the build-up of traffic needs it by then and Parliament so decides. This is a large and complex scheme, and many detailed investigations and consultations will have to be carried out before tenders can be invited. The next step is to appoint consultants for these tasks, and competitive bids will be invited shortly from suitable firms.

Airports Policy

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider an investigation into a long-term strategy for Britain's airports making provision for increases in passenger movements balanced with protection of the environment, into the next century.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. My right hon. Friend is satisfied that the 1985 White Paper "Airports Policy" (Cmnd. 9542) adequately sets out a strategy for the provision of airport capacity and associated environmental protection.

A1 (Roadworks)

Mr. Blair asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many separate roadworks there are on the A1(M) from 15 miles south of Wetherby to Darlington and from the junction of the A19 with the A1 near Thirsk to five miles north of Middlesbrough; in each case, what is the area of road with less than full two-lanes either way unrestricted traffic; when each set of works began; what is the likely cost of each; when each was due under contract to be completed; and when each is likely to be completed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: With roadworks, the position changes daily. The position on 30 April 1987 was as follows:

Schemes	Length of lane closure	Start date	Cost	Contract completion date
	A1 from 15 miles south of Wetherby to Darlington
Baldersby Junction Improvement	½ mile north bound + south bound nearside lanes closed	April 1986	£2·29 million	October 1987
Allerton Park carriageway repairs	1 mile contraflow. South bound carriageway closed	March 1987	£0·27 million	May 1987
Wetherby Bypass construction	½ mile of partial contraflow	August 1986	£9·9 million	August 1988
	½ mile single lane north + southbound

Schemes	Length of lane closure	Start date	Cost	Contract completion date
Bramham Crossroads carriageway repairs	50 yards of lane closure in each direction	30 April 1987 for 1 day	£1,000	—
Brotherton carriageway reconstruction	1¼ miles contraflow north bound carriageway closed	November 1986	£1·1 million	June 1987
A19 from A168/A1 junction to 5 miles north of Middlesbrough
Swale Bridge repairs to bridge	½ mile contraflow	February 1987	£0·134 million	May 1987
Thirsk Bypass to Richmond Farm	1½ miles nearside lane	30 April 1978 for 1 day
Routine inspection	closure in both carriageways

It is not possible to forecast precise completion dates. Some of these schemes are likely to be completed in advance of the contract date.

Motorways (Central Barriers)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his answer of 27 April, Official Report, column 7, he will take steps to identify the local contractors responsible for erecting programme central reservation barriers on motorways constructed without them, stating the number of contracts made and the number which will be checked by the progress described in his written answer of 8 April, Official Report, column 249.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It will take some time to collect this information and it is possible that all the information will not be available. I will write to the hon. Member when we have assebled information that is available.

Written-off Vehicles

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take steps to ensure that vehicles written off by insurance companies but subsequently restored for use are subjected to a standard test of roadworthiness; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are considering with the police, the insurers and others the problems arising from the continued use of written-off vehicles and vehicle documentation. My hon. Friend's proposal is one of several options available. Any solution would need to be justifiable in terms of accident and crime prevention and consumer protection and to be effective in dealing with all or most written-off vehicles.

Marques (Inquiry Report)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he received the report from the wreck commissioner on the Marques inquiry; and when he intends to publish it.

Mr. Moore: The wreck commissioner made his report to me on 24 April 1987 and it was published on 1 May.

Humber Bridge

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the amount of Government loans now owing by the Humber Bridge Board; and what proposals he has for writing them down.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The latest published accounts show that at 31 March 1986 the debt on the bridge was made up as follows:

Department of Transport	199,733,310
Public Works Loans Board	45,894,761
Bond	100,000
Temporary Loans	10,390,000
	256,118,071

In their response last July to the report on tolled estuarial crossings by the Select Committee on Transport, the Government acknowledged that the Humber bridge was a special case, and that proposals for dealing with its financial problems were still awaited from the Humber bridge board. Officials from the Department and the board have produced jointly an analysis of various measures, including the write-off of some debt, which might be adopted to tackle the financial problems of the bridge. This should help the board to decide what proposals to put to me, and then provide an agreed basis for discussion. We will consider reasonable and realistic ways of putting the bridge finances on a sound footing. It is for the board to produce proposals as it has sole responsibility for managing the bridge.

European Year of the Environment

Mr. Higgins asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps the Department of Transport is taking to mark European Year of the Environment.

Mr. Moore: As a contribution to the European Year of the Environment, my Department is today publishing a booklet "Transport and the Environment", which sets out its policies towards the environment—for road, rail sea and air. I am placing copies in the Library of the House.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport how the rescinding of the letter of October 1986 to British Rail which instructed British Rail not to make advance payments to Eurotunnel was communicated; if he will publish all documents involved in the rescinding; and if he gave any guidance to British Rail on the sources of revenue which it might make available for advance payments to Eurotunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail was advised by letter on 17 March that as a result of the provisions in clause 40 of the Channel Tunnel Bill which forbids Government grants to British Rail in respect of international rail services, it would not be contrary to the treaty for it to include in its proposed contract with Eurotunnel a provision to make advance toll payments, if it judged this to be commercially attractive.

However, British Rail is not currently contemplating the making of advance toll payments of this kind. What is currently under negotiation between BR, SNCF and Eurotunnel is some form of reservation fee for the use of the tunnel, to be paid on a monthly basis when the tunnel is open and to be offset against toll payments. There is no question of contravening the treaty by allowing Government funds to be used for this purpose.

British Rail

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the nature of his Department's financial responsibility for losses made, or undertakings given, by British Rail; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend has no financial responsibility for losses made or undertakings given by British Rail, other than in respect of those activities for which he has a duty under section 3 of the Railways Act 1974. Clause 40 of the Channel tunnel Bill now before Parliament excludes international rail services associated with the Channel tunnel project from those provisions.

DEFENCE

Cruise Missiles

14. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about the number of cruise missiles currently based in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley: Most recently, a number of hon. Members tabled questions on this subject which I answered on 24 March.

37. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will seek a meeting with the Belgian Minister of Defence to discuss the decision of the Belgian Government to cease deployment of cruise missiles so long as negotiations on intermediate nuclear forces in Geneva are in progress.

Mr. Younger: There will be an opportunity to meet Defence Ministers from other NATO countries at the spring meeting of the NATO Nuclear Planning Group.

Tornado

15. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the availability of radar equipment for the Tornado.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: A number of Foxhunter radars on order for the Tornado ADV have now been delivered. Although these radars do not fully meet RAF requirements they are contributing to our air defence capability and the first aircraft have now been declared to NATO. We are discussing a programme of improvements with GEC Avionics and, subject to agreement on appropriate contractual conditions, look forward to receiving equipment to the required standard in due course.

32. Mr. Dykes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what measures are being taken by his Department to bring the Foxhunter radar for the Tornado up to Royal Air Force requirements.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) on 2 April.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many RAF Tornado aircraft have crashed to date.

Mr. Freeman: Twelve.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to how many Italian and German Tornado aircraft have crashed to date.

Mr. Freeman: The Royal Air Force maintains close links with the Italian and German Air Forces to exchange information about accidents in order to prevent recurrences elsewhere. However the public release of national aircraft accident statistics is a matter for the respective Governments.

Single-Role Mine Hunters

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to announce the results of the tender for the single-role mine hunters.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Tenders have only recently been received and it will be some time before I can announce the results of the competition.

Land

17. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number of acres of land in the United Kingdom currently in the ownership of his Department; and how this figure compares with those for five and 10 years before.

Mr. Freeman: At 1 October 1986 landholdings were 592,168 acres. This compares with 615,374 acres in 1981 and 627,801 acres in 1976.

Trident

18. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the financial savings at 1987-88 prices which would arise from the immediate cancellation of Trident in terms of planned future expenditure forgone, net of costs already incurred or committed, together with default penalties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The savings arising from the cancellation of Trident would depend upon the costs of cancellation and these in turn would be based upon contractors properly incurred liabilities at termination. These costs should be less than the total amount committed, which currently stands at about £3 billion out of a current total estimate at 1986-87 prices of a little under £9·3 billion. There are no punitive cancellation charges involved.

The project will be recosted at 1987-88 prices towards the end of this year when the estimate is revised.

35. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much of the Trident programme is being spent in the northern region.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Estimates of the cost of the Trident programme are not available on a regional basis.

Co-operation (Projects)

19. Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to meet the French Defence Minister to discuss co-operation on defence projects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: I next expect to meet M. Giraud at the meeting of the independent European programme group in June.

United Kingdom-Irish Republic (Border Operations)

20. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the effectiveness of military operations on the border between the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic.

Mr. Stanley: Military operations on the border between the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic are mounted in support of the RUC. In recent months the Security Forces have mounted a number of successful operations against terrorist activity in the border areas. These successes can be attributed to the dedication and professionalism of the RUC, the Regular Army and the UDR. The Garda have also been successful in thwarting a number of terrorist attacks. Nevertheless the IRA remains capable of exploiting the border in order to carry out murderous attacks. The development of enhanced security co-operation is a high priority for the two police forces and for the British and Irish Governments.

Cyprus

22. Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on morale of British forces based in Cyprus and on the training given within the sovereign base areas.

Mr. Freeman: The morale of all British Forces serving in Cyprus remains high. They receive regular military training to the maximum extent possible, given their commitment to operational and security duties. They also take full advantage of excellent adventure training and sporting facilities.

Pakistan

21. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he last met the Prime Minister of Pakistan; and what subjects were discussed.

23. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his meeting with the Pakistan Foreign Affairs Minister.

Mr. Younger: I met the Pakistan Prime Minister on April 7. We discussed a range of defence subjects of mutual interest including the possible purchase by Pakistan of type 23 frigates.

BAOR

24. Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he next plans to visit the British Army of the Rhine; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: I hope to visit the British Army of the Rhine later this year.

Nuclear Weapons

25. Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received urging him to increase the number of short range nuclear weapons in Europe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Terlezki) on 24 March at column 156. Since then, as my hon. Friend will be aware, the Soviet Union has made new INF proposals which are being carefully examined in conjunction with our allies.

29. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received about the adequacy of the United Kingdom early warning system in relation to an attack with nuclear weapons and the time afforded to the public to take shelter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: I am not aware of any such representations recently.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 19 January at column 455.

34. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received concerning Her Majesty's Government's role in the implementation of the Montebello decision of the NATO planning group, regarding short-range nuclear weapons.

Mr. Stanley: Since the beginning of the year my Department has received about 20 representations.

Hunter-Killer Submarines

26. Mr. Neale asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to change the role of Britain's hunter-killer subenarines.

Mr. Stanley: There are no plans to change the role of our SSNs which is primarily anti-submarine warfare.

Strategic Defence Initiative

27. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the value to date of contracts placed by the United States Government on the strategic defence initiative programme.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the answer given to the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mrs Shields) on Tuesday 9 December 1986 at column 139.

RAF (Air Defence)

28. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Defence, if he has any plans to improve the current air defence capability of the Royal Air Force.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are being taken to update Britain's air defences.

Mr. Stanley: I refer my hon. Friend and the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 22 April at column 589.

European Defence Ministers

30. Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to meet the Defence Ministers of Poland, Hungary, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Roumania, and Bulgaria to discuss the level of conventional forces in Europe; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: I have no such plans. We are, however, taking an active and positive part in the continuing negotiations on mutual and balanced force reductions dealing with conventional forces, and in discussions on the mandate for new negotiations on conventional stability.

Army Recruits

31. Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received about the mistreatment of Army recruits.

Mr. Freeman: Recent publicity concerning alleged mistreatment of young soldiers has resulted in a number of representations from hon. Members and others being received in the Department. In addition the hon. Member came to see me, with other hon. Members, on 8 April to discuss the matter. I have since written to the hon. Member.

Far East

33. Mr. Ottaway asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his recent visit to the far east.

Mr. Younger: The main aims of my visit to south-east Asia, which took place from 23 March to 1 April, were to reaffirm the United Kingdom's interest in the stability and security of the area, as exemplified by our support for ASEAN and our membership of the five power defence arrangements; to discuss defence matters of mutual interest; and to support sales of British defence equipment.

In Thailand, which I visited from 23-25 March, I had useful discussions with the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, the Minister of Defence, the Supreme Commander of the Royal Thai Armed Forces, and with the Commanders-in-Chief. I also paid visits to the war cemetery at Kanchanaburi, where I laid a wreath in memory of those who died in the construction of the Burma-Siam Railway in 1942-43, and to the Kwai River bridge.

In Brunei (25-27 March), I had an audience with His Majesty The Sultan and useful discussions with the Deputy Minister of Defence and the Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs. I also visited units of the Royal Brunei Armed Forces and the British battalion currently stationed in Brunei, the 7th Gurkha Rifles.

In Malaysia (27-30 March) I had valuable talks with the Deputy Prime Minister, the Minister of Defence and the Deputy Minister of Defence. Finally, in Singapore (30 March-1 April), I had constructive discussions with the Prime Minister, the Minister of Defence, and the Minister for Trade and Industry; I visited units of the Republic of Singapore Armed Forces and a number of defence companies, including the British-owned Avimo (Singapore) Pte Ltd, whose new factory I opened; and I laid a wreath at Kranji War Cemetery in honour of those who are buried and commemorated there.

In all four countries, discussions were cordial and friendly, and I was able to build on the already close and constructive defence relationship that exists between the United Kingdom and a part of the world whose stability and security remain of importance both to this country and to the West in general.

Small Businesses

36. Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assistance his Department is offering to small businesses to identify and exploit export opportunities for defence equipment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Through the Defence Export Services Organisation, the Ministry offers advice to all United Kingdom companies on defence market prospects on a worldwide, regional or country basis and, in conjunction with our defence representative posts overseas provides a wide range of follow-up support and assistance to companies seeking to export their products and services.

Boarding School Allowance

38. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to alter the Government's support for the boarding school allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Boarding school allowance continues to be justified by the need to help Service parents to provide a stable education for their children. As with other allowances, the rate is subject to review from time to time.

Sidewinder Missile (Incident)

39. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, in view of the accidental release of a Sidewinder missile over Lapford, North Devon on 8 April, he will review overflying of populated areas and control of airborne equipment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Great care is taken in all aspects of military flying to maintain the highest possible standards of flight safety including the secure carriage of practice weapons and equipment. Pilots are fully instructed on the stringent regulations which govern their training activities within the United Kingdom and which specify that military aircraft should not fly at low level directly over major centres of population. It is however impractical for these aircraft to avoid all populated areas during the course of their essential training flights.

All safety aspects of flying activity are under continual review and whenever incidents occur, as happened at Lapford on 8 April, an inquiry is invariably held to establish its cause. If appropriate, modifications are made to equipment and operating procedures to prevent recurrences. While I see no need for a general review in the light of the incident on 8 April I will however write to my hon. Friend on the outcome of the unit inquiry as soon as it is available.

Scott Lithgow (Orders)

40. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received regarding the delay in placing an order with Scott Lithgow for a range mooring vessel and two powered lighters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Apart from representations that have been made by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow on behalf of Scott Lithgow, others have been made on behalf of other shipbuilders anxious to gain an opportunity to tender for these vessels. It is still my wish, however, to place these contracts with Scott Lithgow provided that the company can meet the terms and conditions outlined by my hon. Friend on 28 January 1986 at column 449.

European Fighter Aircraft

41. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the European fighter aircraft project.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave on 22 April 1987 to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw).

44. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the European fighter aircraft will make its first flight.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The EFA programme is at present in a period of definition refinement and risk reduction and the development programme has not yet been agreed. It is therefore too early to say when the first flight would be.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence when development work on the European fighter aircraft will commence.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The current international target date to begin full development of EFA is 1 August this year, but it is unlikely that all the relevant decisions in the four collaborating nations will have been taken by that date. The Government will reach a decision on the project when all the relevant information is available.

Rosyth and Devonport Dockyards

42. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the prospects for employment at Rosyth and Devonport dockyards now that the approved contractors are in the yards.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Government remain committed to a core programme of work for Rosyth and Devonport dockyards to maintain vital strategic assets. The dockyards will also be in a position to tender in competition for further work from the unallocated MOD ship repair programme and to bid for other work.

Subject to maintenance of the required strategic capacity, levels of employment at the dockyards are matters for the commercial management.

Norwegian and Barents Seas (Deployment)

43. Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning naval deployments in the Norwegian and Barents Seas.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) on 10 February 1987 at column 185.

Royal Navy (SAM Missiles)

45. Mr. Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Defence what orders have been placed for surface-to-air missiles for the Royal Navy.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Annual "Statements on the Defence Estimates" include information of such orders. For current main surface to air missiles we have placed five orders for Sea Dart, three for conventional launch Sea Wolf and one for vertical launch Sea Wolf.

Auxiliary Oiler Replenishment Vessel

46. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans to order the next auxiliary oiler replenishment vessel.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: If the terms stated by my right hon. Friend on 24 April 1986 at column 434 are met, I expect an order to be placed in the autumn with fabrication starting next year.

Submarine Exports

47. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with foreign Defence Ministers concerning submarine exports.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are a number of prospects for the export of submarines which my right hon. Friend has been able to discuss during some of his overseas visits. However it is not the usual practice to disclose confidential details of defence sales business.

Helicopter Procurement

48. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on collaborative helicopter procurement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It remains our policy to procure helicopters to meet the requirements of our forces through collaboration with our allies, whenever it is practicable and cost-effective to do so. Thus we are, as my right hon. Friend made clear in his statement to the House on 9 April, maintaining our full support for the Anglo-Italian EH101. We are also engaged, together with our Italian, Dutch and Spanish partners, in studies of a light attack helicopter based upon the Agusta A129.

Defence Export Services Organisation

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence which countries were visited by representatives of the Defence Export Services Organisation in 1986.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Representatives of the DESO travelled widely in 1986 to some 50 countries interested in British defence equipment. But because of the confidentiality of many of the transactions involved it is not the practice to list individual countries where discussions have been taking place.

Upholder Class Submarines

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the first four Upholder class submarines will enter Royal Naval service.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not our practice to reveal acceptance dates for Royal Navy ships. However, I can say that HMS Upholder, the first of class, is expected to enter service in 1988.

Minesweepers

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many minesweepers are in Royal Naval service; and how many are on order.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are currently 41 mine counter measures vessels in service with the Royal Navy. Two Hunt class dual role minehunter/sweepers and one Sandown class single role minehunter are on order.

Ulster Defence Regiment

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the Ulster Defence Regiment have been discharged for involvement with paramilitary organisations.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the answers my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North on 18 February 1987, at column 688, and 8 April 1986, at column 106. I have nothing further to add.

Fighter Squadrons

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Lightning, Phantom and Tornado squadrons are currently tasked with United Kingdom air defence.

Mr. Stanley: As at 1 April 1987, there were two Lightning and five Phantom squadrons available for United Kingdom air defence tasks. One of the Phantom squadrons has begun to re-equip with Tornado F3 and is planned to become operational as a Tornado squadron later this year.

RAF Aircraft

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence which Royal Air Force aircraft types are currently employed in the tanker role.

Mr Stanley: The RAF currently employs Victor K2, VC1010 K2 and K3, Tristar K1 and Hercules C1K aircraft in the tanker role.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence which Royal Air Force aircraft types are currently provided with hardened shelters.

Mr. Stanley: Hardened shelters are currently provided for Tornado (ADV and GR1), Phantom, and Buccaneer aircraft and for Jaguar and Harrier GR3 aircraft based in RAF Germany. United Kingdom-based Jaguars and Harriers have a number of forward and dispersed operating options.

Royal Ordnance PLC

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what recent orders have been placed with Royal Ordnance plc.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It is not the practice of the Ministry to reveal details of contracts placed with individual contractors as the information is commercial in confidence. However, the overall value of direct HQ contracts placed with RO plc in the year ended 31 March 1987 was £163 million.

Submarine Orders

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the latest position regarding submarine orders.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are currently eight submarines on order, of which five—a Trident SSBN, a Trafalgar class SSN and three Upholder class SSKs—were ordered last year. On future orders, I refer the hon. Member to the answers given to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) on 16 January 1986 at column 642 of the Official Report and that given to my hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Franks) on 24 March 1987 at column 139 of the Official Report.

Zircon Project

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence why, pursuant to his answer of 10 April, he will not identify separately expenditure on the project Zircon in his forthcoming White Paper; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to give details of intelligence matters.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether he or his Department has been consulted by the United States of America on that country's contingency plan for the deployment of chemical weapons in Europe; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether the United States contingency plans for the deployment of chemical weapons in Europe in time of crisis include options for the deployment of chemical weapons in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley: I have nothing to add to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces to the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 24 July 1986 at columns 489-490.

NATO Groups

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the grades and ranks of the civil servants and military officers who attend each of the following North Atlantic Treaty Organisation bodies: the high level group, the special consultative group, the nuclear planning group, the study group of the nuclear planning group and the defence planning committee.

Mr. Stanley: I will answer shortly.

W-79 Nuclear Warhead

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what information he has received from the United States authorities concerning a potential enhanced radiation capability in relation to the W-79 nuclear shell deployed by the United States of America in Europe;

(2) whether Her Majesty's Government's approval is required prior to the allocation of W-79 nuclear warheads by the United States to its custodial units supporting the British Army of the Rhine; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what information he has received from the United States authorities about the deployment by the United States Army of W-79 nuclear warheads in the NORTHAG area of NATO;

(4) what information he has as to when deployment of the W-79 nuclear shell by the United States of America in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation commenced.

Mr. Stanley: I will answer shortly.

Horses (Polo)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will estimate the proportion of private horses moved by military transport as participants in representative polo teams that belong to, or are ridden by, other than commissioned officers.

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is not readily available. It could only be provided at a disproportionate cost.

Bloodhound

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence when Bloodhound entered RAF service.

Mr. Stanley: The current Bloodhound MK2 system entered RAF service in March 1964. Since then, there has been a number of modifications to the system to enhance its capability.

Oerlikon/Skyguard System

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many United Kingdom Royal Air Force bases are protected by Oerlikon/Skyguard.

Mr. Stanley: The Skyguard anti-aircraft system is in service at RAF Waddington.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence from which source the Royal Air Force acquired the Oerlikon/Skyguard system.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Oerlikon/Skyguard anti aircraft system now in service with the RAF Regiment was captured from Argentina during the Falklands conflict.

Nuclear Capability

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to which countries possess a military nuclear capability, showing in each case the implications of such capability for the defence of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Younger: Apart from our NATO allies, France and the United States, two other countries — the Soviet Union and China — are nuclear weapons states; both also possess the associated delivery systems which could threaten the United Kingdom. In 1974 India exploded a nuclear device. Several other countries have carried out research into nuclear weapons and a few of these countries may be close to developing the capability to make them.

Aviation Support Ships

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to make a presentation to industry about the proposed aviation support ships.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: No decision has been taken on a presentation to industry on the concept of the aviation support ship.

Missiles

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress is being made over the development of the airborne short-range anti-aircraft missile and the collaborative project for a medium range stand-off missile.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom is collaborating with Germany and Norway on the current project definition (PD) phase for the Advanced Short Range Air to Air Missile (ASRAAM) which is expected to be completed in the autumn. A second phase of PD is then planned so that areas of technical risk may be further reduced and costs defined.

Negotiations are proceeding between the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Germany, Italy, Spain and Canada on the Memorandum of Understanding governing the principles for the collaborative modular stand off weapons programme.

Nuclear Weapons (Deployment)

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the appproximate number of nuclear (a) intermediate range, (b) short and (c) battlefield weapons deployed by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the Warsaw pact, respectively.

Mr. Stanley: I will answer shortly.

Tucano

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many flying hours have so far been logged for each of the Tucano aircraft at Boscombe Down.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: There are no Tucano aircraft at Boscombe Down.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence by how many months the Shorts Tucano programme is delayed in relation to the original contract programme.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Shorts advise that the programme is currently delayed by about eight months. They expect to recover this delay later in the delivery programme.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence when RAF basic flying training will commence with the Shorts Tucano.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Basic flying training is expected to start next year.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made with the full ground fatigue test for the Shorts Tucano.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The current Tucano fatigue test is progressing satisfactorily and has so far achieved about one quarter of the required test programme.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) when the Shorts Tucano will receive its release for service from Boscombe Down;

(2) if he will make a statement concerning progress with the Tucano aircraft at Boscombe Down;

(3) how many Short Tucano aircraft are currently at ETPS Boscombe Down.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Shorts advise that the first two Tucano aircraft produced under their contract are planned to be delivered to Boscombe Down this month. A release to service is expected later in the year. There are at present no plans for the Empire Test Pilots' School to be equipped with Tucano aircraft.

Skyflash

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether there have been any delays in deliveries of Skyflash to the RAF; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many Skyflash missiles are currently on order for the RAF.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: For reasons of confidentiality, it is not my Department's practice to reveal the number of missiles on order, but I can confirm that current deliveries of Skyflash to the RAF have been on schedule.

Medium Range Anti-Aircraft Missile

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Defence when the advanced medium range anti-aircraft missile will enter Royal Air Force service.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The AMRAAM is planned to enter RAF service in the 1990s.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Homelessness

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest available figures for the number of children in local authority care because their family is homeless; and if he will give this information for England as a whole, greater London, the metropolitan authorities excluding London, non-metropolitan authorities, and for each English local authority area.

Mrs. Currie: A child may be taken into care for a number of reasons of which homelessness may be a contributory factor, although not identified as a specific cause in the statistics. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 6 November 1986 at column 594-96 which gave the 1984 figures by local authorities where the specific cause for a child being in care was that his or her family had been made homeless. The additional information requested is given in the table:

	Number
Metropolitan district	384
Shire counties	244
Greater London	85
England	713

A breakdown of these figures by local authority for 1985 is not yet available. The provisional total for England is 598 children, a decrease of 16 per cent. over 1984. This compares with an 8 per cent. decline in the total figures for children in care.

District Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give the capital and revenue expenditure for the Worcester district health authority for each year from 1978-79 onwards;

(2) if he will give the capital and revenue expenditure for the Bromsgrove and Redditch district health authority for each year from 1978-79 onwards.

Mr. Newton: The information available centrally is shown in the table. Before 1 April 1982 both districts formed part of the Hereford and Worcester area health authority and information on a district basis was not collected centrally. If my hon. Friend wishes to seek information for the earlier years I suggest that he contacts the chairmen of the district health authorities.

	Worcester and District Health Authority		Bromsgrove and Redditch Health Authority
	Revenue £ million	Capital £ million	Revenue £ million	Capital £ million
1982-83	35·5	2·0	18·1	1·2
1983-84	38·0	1·4	19·7	6·7
1984-85	40·0	1·9	21·4	10·3
1985-86	42·8	3·0	23·2	7·2

Notes:
(1) The figures for revenue expenditure are those shown in the annual financial accounts of the health authorities. Those for capital expenditure also include expenditure specifically on behalf of those districts which is shown in the annual accounts of the West Midlands regional health authority.
(2) Expenditure on family practitioner services is excluded although for Worcester, the figures for the years 1982-83 to 1984-85 include a small element representing family practitioner committee administration expenses.

Thalassaemia

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy that thalassaemia be listed as a chronic sickness and its sufferers entitled to free prescriptions for their condition.

Mr. Newton: We have no plans to include thalassaemia in the list of medical conditions which confer entitlement to exemption from prescription charges.

NHS (Staff)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many National Health Service staff there were in the United Kingdom in (a) June 1979 and (b) February 1986, respectively.

Mr. Newton: Figures for September 1979 and September 1985 are shown in the table. Figures were not collected centrally for June 1979 and February 1986.

NHS directly employed staff in post[1] at 30 September United Kingdom

[1] Includes agency nursing and midwifery staff. Includes all permanent (whole-time, part-time, honorary) and locum medical and dental staff in the hospital and community health services. (Locum figures for Northern Ireland are not included.)

[2] Figures are independently rounded to the nearest one hundred (100) whole-time equivalents.

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many staff are employed in each category in the National Health Service in the northern region; and how many were so employed in 1978.

Mr. Newton: The figures are shown in the table.

NHS staff in post in Northern Regional Health Authority[1] at 30 September

Whole-time equivalent

	1978	1986 (Provisional)
Medical and Dental[2]	2,450	2,820
Nursing and Midwifery[3,4]	22,970	27,350

[1] Figures are independently rounded to the nearest ten (10) whole-time equivalents.

[2] Includes Hospital Practitioners, Part-time Medical and Dental officers (clinical assistants) and locums.

[3] Includes agency staff.

[4] Figures not adjusted to take account of the change in nurses' working hours in 1980 (reduced from 40 to 37·5 hours weekly).

[5] On 1 April 1984 Operating Department Assistants (ODAs) transferred from Ancillary to Professional and Technical staff group. Figures for 1986 are not therefore strictly comparable with those for 1978. (At 31 March 1984 there were some 120 (wte) ODAs employed by the Northern Regional Health Authority).

NHS (Statistics)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to assemble centrally statistics relating to (a) outpatients waiting periods and (b) accommodation occupied by health service personnel in possession of district health authorities in regions since 1982 in the four metropolitan regional health authorities.

Mrs. Currie: Yes, we are looking at the possibility for the future of collecting the statistics indicated.

Benefits

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown, by type of beneficiary and type of benefit, of the savings that accrue from the existence of the overlapping benefit regulations, and of the total of these savings each year since 1979.

Mr. Lyell: There are a number of contingencies such as sickness, unemployment, disability, pregnancy, retirement and widowhood which since the start of the national insurance scheme in 1948 have brought into play the overlapping benefits provisions. Because more than one of the contingencies may apply simultaneously to the same person, it is not possible to provide a breakdown of benefit savings from the overlapping benefit provisions. However, if, contrary to well-established practice, entitlement to income maintenance benefits did not overlap, it is estimated that aggregated benefit expenditure would be increased in 1986 prices by some £5 billion.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from (a) local authorities, (b) local authority associations and (c) other organisations or bodies regarding the proposed new housing benefit arrangements to be introduced in April 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: The changes to the housing benefit scheme proposed for 1988 have been the subject of wide and continuous consultation since the Green paper "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9517) was published in June 1985.

Most recently, the local authority associations were consulted under statutory arrangements on the draft regulations giving effect to the changes. Their comments ranged widely, covering major issues such as the level of maximum benefit as well as a great many suggestions on points of detail.

The draft regulations were also distributed for information to individual local authorities and to other organisations on request. A number of representations were made as a result, again ranging from comments on major issues to purely technical points. A revised version of the draft regulations will be issued shortly following our careful consideration of the comments we received.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each region, including Scotland and Wales, his most recent estimate of the total numbers (a) claiming and (b) dependent on supplementary benefits; and if he will also list the numbers: (1) claiming supplementary allowance, (2) claiming supplementary pension, (3) dependent on supplementary pensions and (4) dependent on supplementary allowance.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will publish details of the changes in total statutory sick pay and sickness benefit expenditure on short term sickness in each year from 1983-84 to 1986-87 that resulted from the introduction of statutory sick pay and the April 1986 changes showing, as far as possible (1) expenditure changes that resulted from the replacement of sickness benefit rates with a different structure of statutory sick pay rates, (2) expenditure changes that resulted from administrative changes, (3) estimated revenue from statutory sick pay tax and national insurance liability and (4) the expenditure effects of other changes;

(2) if he will publish details of total expenditure on short term sickness in each year from 1979-80 to 1986-87 showing, as far as possible (1) a breakdown of expenditure between sickness benefit and statutory sick pay, (2) a breakdown between administrative costs and actual payments of the two types of support, (3) the average weekly payment made under the two types of provision and (4) supplementary benefit and related housing benefit expenditure on the short term sick;

(3) if he will publish details of claims for statutory sick pay and expenditure on statutory sick pay for each year of its operation showing, as far as possible (1) the total number of claims and payments made, (2) the extent of overpayment and underpayment by employers, (3) total expenditure on the scheme, (4) a breakdown of this expenditure between statutory sick pay payments and administrative costs and (5) an estimate of the costs of statutory sick pay payments net of tax and national insurance revenue.

Mr. Lyell: I shall let the hon. Member have the information that is available as soon as possible.

Operation Waiting Periods

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has on the average waiting period in the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale health authority area for (a) a joint replacement operation, (b) a prostate operation and (c) a cataract operation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Information on average waiting periods for operations is available centrally from a 10 per cent. sample of hospital activity records. The numbers in this sample are too small for reliable estimates to be made for individual health districts. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale district health authority for the information he requires.

Factor VIII

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of haemophiliacs who have been injected with blood clotting agent Factor VIII; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Precise figures are not held centrally but it is broadly estimated that up to 3,000 haemophilia A patients may use Factor VIII products either on an intermittent or a regular basis.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the insurance industry concerning compensation for haemophiliacs who have contracted AIDS following the administering of Factor VIII, and whose next of kin have claimed against the companies; what response he has given; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We are not aware of any representations from insurance companies on this matter.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the Ministers in his Department first became aware that Factor VIII products might contain HIV; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Evidence emerged in the United States of America in 1982 that haemophiliacs were contracting AIDS and although the mechanism of infection was not known, it was presumed that it had been transmitted through the use of blood products such as Factor VIII.

I also refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 7 April, at column 207.

NHS (London)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what real terms growth is to be expected in the National Health Service in Greater London health authorities, excluding those in inner London, as a result of allocations from his special fund for 1987-88 and 1988-89.

Mr. Newton: This information is not available in the form requested. The Greater London health authorities, excluding those in inner London, which have received allocations from the special fund for regions receiving less than national average growth are as follows:

Regional Health Authority	District Health Authority	Special fund allocation 1987-88 (£'000)
North West Thames	Brent	486
	Hillingdon	450
North East Thames	Haringey	700
South East Thames	Greenwich	400
	Bexley	100
	Bromley	150
South West Thames	Merton & Sutton	450

Allocations to district health authorities are a matter for the appropriate regional health authority and the hon. Member might wish to contact the chairmen of the regional health authorities involved for further detail.

Allocations from the special fund for 1988-89 will be decided when 1988-89 main allocations are known.

District Health Authorities (Budgets)

Mr. Robert Banks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out the district health authorities whose budgets have increased in real terms in each of the last three years.

Mr. Newton: I regret that the information requested is not held centrally. Responsibility for determining allocations to district health authorities rests with regional health authorities.

Child Abuse

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any estimate of the number of names of children on the child abuse registers of local authorities for the last five years; and what estimate he has made of the change in the level of child abuse in recent years.

Mr. Newton: No. Information about the number of names of children on child abuse registers in England and Wales is not held centrally. However, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children does hold registers which cover about 10 per cent. of the population and its statistics for 1985 show a rise as compared with 1984 of 42 per cent. in reported cases of child abuse overall and of 126·5 per cent. for child sexual abuse. This increase in reported cases may be attributed to increased public and professional awareness of abuse.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the number of long leaseholders receiving supplementary benefit additional requirements for service charges and ground rent; and what proportion are pensioner households.

Mr. Lyell: I regret that the information is not available on which to base an estimate.

Pensioners

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his most recent estimate of the total amount of social security benefits which are not taken up by retirement pensioners; and if he will give a breakdown of the total amount by category of benefit.

Mr. Lyell: Invitations to claim retirement pension are issued automatically to everyone who appears to be entitled about three to four months before minimum pension age. In consequence, take-up is virtually 100 per cent.

For supplementary pension estimates, I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) and the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) and Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) on 30 October 1986 at columns 231-34. First estimates of the take-up of housing benefit are expected to be published shortly.

NHS Staff (Pay)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received any recent representations from nurses or other National Health Service staff regarding pay; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have received no representations since my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced the Government's decision to implement in full the recommendations of the review body for nursing staff, midwives, health visitors and the professions allied to medicine, and the review body on doctors' and dentists' remuneration.

Guardians ad Litem

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any extra funding has been made available to local authorities for the provisions of guardians ad litem following the decision of Regina v. Plymouth Juvenile Court ex parte F.

Mrs. Currie: The setting up of the panels of guardians ad litem was one of the new areas of expenditure for which allowance was made in the rate support grant settlement for 1984-85. The matter has been raised in subsequent discussions on the increased pressures that local authorities foresee. These discussions with respect to 1988-89 have just begun. It is, of course, for local authorities to decide the priorities for expenditure between this and other functions.

Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has taken any action to reduce the period between the appointment of the guardian ad litem and the nomination of a guardian ad litem.

Mrs. Currie: The Department conducted an informal exercise last summer which shows that in over half the areas the time taken to nominate guardians ad litem is under a week. Where delays occur, they are for the local authority responsible for administering the panel of guardians ad litem to resolve, in conjunction with the Courts. The Department has assisted local action by amending regulations to allow a wider range of suitable persons to act as guardians ad litem, and by holding a national conference of all panel administrators. The Department intends to issue further guidance to panel administrators in due course.

Member's Letters

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he anticipates that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) will be writing to the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne regarding the contents of a letter, passed to her on 5 March 1987, from Mr. Robert Beaton of 227 Longfield, Falmouth, Cornwall.

Mrs. Currie: My noble Friend wrote to my hon. Friend on 30 April.

Cystic Fibrosis

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will add cystic fibrosis to the list of conditions for which free prescriptions are available.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 15 January at column 303.

Benefit (Multiple Applications)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many multiple applications for social security benefit have been uncovered in the past 12 months; how many people have been prosecuted; and what sentences have resulted.

Mr. Lyell: The information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Food (S Manual)

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why the guidelines on average expenditure on food in clause 4736 of the S manual were not based on data relating to the entire sample of the 1979 "Family Expenditure Survey".

Mr. Major: I understand from the chief adjudication officer that the figure of £9 was derived from data in respect of single pensioners, married couple pensioners and single adults under 65 in the lowest 20 per cent. household income bracket as it was considered that these data more accurately reflected expenditure by supplementary benefit claimants than would data from the entire sample. Data from the entire sample would have provided a higher figure of average expenditure on food, resulting in less help by way of dietary additions.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the basis for determining the percentage or proportion of the relevant scale rate for adults used for calculating the dietary figures for children in clause 4736 of the S manual.

Mr. Major: The figure of £9, derived from the 1979 family expenditure survey, was approximately 30 per cent. of the adult householder long-term scale rate at November 1981. I understand from the chief adjudication officer that the figures in respect of children were therefore based on 30 per cent. of the children's scale rates. As data from the family expenditure surveys relate to households rather than to individuals, they do not provide information specifically in respect of children.

Hospitals (Bath)

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has yet considered the implications of the proposals made by the Bath district health authority on both the Bradford on Avon and Melksham hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The Bath district health authority has not yet decided whether to propose any changes in services at the Bradford on Avon and Melksham hospitals. Ministers would become involved only if any formal proposals to reduce or significantly to change the use of beds at these hospitals were produced which could not be agreed with the community health council.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representation there has been by his Department at the series of conferences on the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 organised by MIND and RADAR; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: The Department was not invited to attend these conferences, which I understand were intended principally to brief representatives from the voluntary organisations and local authority social services departments about the provisions of the Act and give them the opportunity of discussing its implications.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown by regional health authority of the numbers of medical personnel and non-medical personnel employed in the National Health Service who have developed AIDS or antibodies to the AIDS virus.

Mr. Newton: The Department does not hold information on the numbers of National Health Service employees who have developed AIDS or who have been identified as antibody positive.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has concerning the number of medical personnel in the United States of America who have developed AIDS or antibodies to the AIDS virus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: According to a report in the journal of the American Medical Association (256 3231 (1986)), 16,748 adults with AIDS reported to the Centres for Disease Control, Atlanta by 1 May 1986; 922 (5·5 per cent.) were identified as health care workers. Each of these individuals had a history of (other than occupational) exposure known to increase the probability of HIV infection. We are not aware of any published information about health care workers in the United States with antibodies to the AIDS virus.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his Department's policy towards supplying the media with details of the numbers and location of medical personnel who have developed AIDS or antibodies to the AIDS virus;

(2) what is his policy towards the degree of publicity to be given to the numbers and whereabouts of doctors in the National Health Service who have contracted AIDs or who have developed AIDS antibodies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The health of medical personnel is subject to the normal rules of medical confidentiality and the Department does not intend that these should be breached in the case of those infected people who have made their condition known to their employing authority. Information of this sort would therefore not be made available to the media.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary State for Social Services how the National Health Service is going to make the drug AZT available for treatment of AIDS; and what is the estimated cost of such treatment in 1987.

Mr. Newton: The manufacturers of Retrovir (AZT) have made arrangements with regional National Health Service staff for a distribution mechanism within their regions that will ensure a continuity of supply to those patients prescribed the drug. The cost of treatment in 1987 will depend on the rate of prescription by National Health Service doctors.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the drug AZT is to be made available for the treatment of AIDS patients in National Health Service hospitals.

Mr. Newton: Retrovir (AZT) has been available for the treatment of AIDS patients in NHS hospitals since 1 April 1987. There was also limited use of AZT in clinical trials for some months before this.

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the drug AZT is available on the National Health Service.

Mr. Newton: Yes.

Abortions

Mrs. Ann Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services to what extent abortion statistics may be broken down by the postal areas of the women upon whom the abortions were performed.

Mr. Newton: The post codes of the addresses of the women upon whom abortions are performed are shown on the notification forms. These post codes are used to generate local authority and district health authority area codes which are held on the computer file from which abortion statistics are produced. For reasons of maintaining confidentiality, computer files containing post coded data on abortions are not retained.

Statistics are released only for DHA of usual residence, or for other areas which cover, directly or indirectly, populations exceeding 80,000 persons.

NHS (Capital Schemes)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) which of the capital schemes listed in appendix D to his National Health Service annual report 1985 are not in full use;

(2) if he will list any National Health Service hospital schemes of more than £2 million completed since those given in appendix D to his National Health Service annual report 1985 which are not in full use.

Mrs. Currie: Detailed information about when all facilities come into full use in new capital developments is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to inquire of the appropriate regional health authorities.

National Insurance Credits

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, what is his estimate of how many men aged 60 to 64 years are receiving national insurance credits without being required to register as unemployed.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Cross-infection

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list, by region, the numbers of cases of cross-infection for each year since 1983.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) on 12 January at column 123.

Health Statistics

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the decision was taken to stop publishing the annual census of Health Service staff statistics, excluding medical and dental staff; and why.

Mr. Newton: Summary figures from the Department's census of National Health Service non-medical manpower are placed in the Library each quarter. More detailed figures are provided annually in publications such as "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics" and "The Health Service in England Annual Report". The booklet entitled "Health Service Staff Statistics" has not been published since 1983, as it was given lower priority following the introduction of the quarterly counts.

Health Authorities (Staff)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the numbers of non-medical staff employed by district health authorities for 1982-83 and for the latest year available in the manner of the reply to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) of 10 December, Official Report, column 218.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Yorkshire RHA (Expenditure)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the expenditure of the Yorkshire regional health authority for the years 1974 to 1979 on (a) revenue and (b) capital account.

Mr. Newton: Following are the total expenditure figures recorded in the annual financial accounts of the Yorkshire regional health authority and those of the former area health authorities within that region:

Hospital and community health services

	Revenue £ million	Capital £ million
1974-75	166·1	16·7
1975-76	216·9	25·7
1976-77	249·8	22·7
1977-78	279·3	21·4
1978-79	313·5	27·6
1979-80	380·7	30·9

Expenditure on family practitioner services is excluded although the figures include a small element representing family practitioner committees' administration expenses.

Patients (Statistics)

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many in-patients, out-patients and day-patients were treated in the northern region in 1986; and how many were so treated in 1983.

Mrs. Currie: I am sorry that I cannot give my hon. Friend all the information he seeks. Information on individual patients treated is not available centrally and figures for 1986 are not yet available. The available information is given in the table.

NHS hospitals in Northern RHA

All specialties	1983	1985
In-patient cases	409,115	433,131
Day cases	66,093	75,473
Out-patient attendances:
New attendances	557,125	595,232
Total attendances	2,451,627	2,543,549

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has on the relative costs of caring for a patient in (a) the Thames valley hospice and (b) a comparable National Health Service bed; and if he has any plans to assist private hospices.

Mrs. Currie: Information on the costs of caring for a patient in individual hospices is not held centrally. The average daily cost of one in-patient in a National Health Service acute hospital is £132·23 a day, but this is not directly comparable with the costs of hospice care. Assistance for private hospices is a matter for individual health authorities. All health authorities have been asked to examine their current provision of services for terminally ill patients and to plan to fill gaps, where possible in collaboration with the voluntary sector.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish information showing the proportion of claims for family income supplement in which it is necessary to contact employers to verify information on earnings; how many of these contacts can be attributable to inadequate wage slips; how many cases arise because the employee does not receive wage slips; what other reasons necessitate checks with employers; and to what extent the incidence of checks with employers has changed since the introduction of family income supplement.

Mr. Major: It is estimated that inquiries to employers on earnings are made in around three quarters of claims for family income supplement. Inquiries are made either because the claimant has not provided the necessary payslips or because further information is needed to establish normal earnings; a breakdown of the overall estimate according to the precise reason for the inquiry is not available. Estimates of the level of inquiries to employers are not regularly made and recorded, but there is no evidence to suggest that there has been any significant change in recent years.

Health Expenditure (London)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to write to the hon. Member for Newham, South in answer to his question of Thursday 9 April, Offical Report, column 412, relating to the increase or decrease in the expenditure on the National Health Service in the London region.

Mr. Newton: I replied to the hon Member today.

Hyperlipidaemia

Mr Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, what support is given by his Department to the Family Heart Association; and if he will take steps to encourage within the National Health Service the same type of testing for hyperlipidaemia and related matters as that which is currently taking place in the House of Commons.

Mrs. Currie: The Department recognises the good work being carried out by the Family Heart Association. On 27 April, I opened an exhibition in the House to promote its current activities.

Hyperlipidaemia is an inherited condition causing an increase of heart attack, and sometimes stroke, at an early age. It is for the clinicians responsible for the case of such patients to initiate whatever tests they consider appropriate but there is no professional or scientific consensus on the need for general population screening at this time.

Cervical Screening

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what were the reasons in each case why those health authorities listed in his reply of 6 November 1986, Official Report, columns 580-83, as planning to bring call and recall screening systems into operation by 31 March 1986 failed to do so;

(2) in which health authorities the implementation of call and recall cervical cancer screening has been delayed by concern about the capacity of pathology laboratories to cope with the additional smears or of surgical capacity to deal with cases which need treatment;

(3) on what dates those health authorities listed in his reply of 6 March 1986, Official Report, columns 580-83, as bringing call and recall screening systems into operation by 31 March did so, or plan to do so, respectively;

(4) on what dates he expects each of those health authorities listed on 6 March 1986, Official Report, columns 580-83, as planning to bring call and recall screening systems into operation by 31 March 1988, will actually do so.

Mrs. Currie: Health authorities have been asked to arrange with family practitioner committees to implement computerised call and recall systems for cervical cancer screening no later than 31 March 1988. Within this timetable the dates on which individual systems become operational is a matter for local planning.

My right hon. Friend has asked Sir Roy Griffiths, deputy chairman of the National Health Service management board, to lead a small team to oversee the implementation of the Government's policy on cervical and breast cancer screening.

Sir Roy and his team are working with health authorities and family practitioner committees to make sure they have viable plans and that the remaining districts implement those by 31 March 1988. Sir Roy will make regular reports to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what additional pathology laboratory capacity has been provided to cope with the extra smears resulting from the introduction of call and recall cervical cancer screening.

Mrs. Currie: Health authorities have been required to give priority to ensuring that laboratories can meet demand from cervical cancer screening programmes and avoid backlogs. Many districts have been recruiting and training additional laboratory staff. Detailed information on laboratory capacity is not held centrally.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the largest current delay in each health region known to his Department in providing cervical smears through pathology laboratories;

(2) in which health authorities, which have introduced computerised cervical cancer call and recall screening, the increase in the number of women covered is being limited by the need for more computer capacity than was originally provided.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Social Workers

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the number of health visitors per 1,000 elderly people in each district health authority in each year since 1979.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 21 January 1987, c. 623]: The table shows the information requested for England, and for each of the regional health authorities, for the years 1979 to 1985 inclusive. (The September 1985 manpower figures are the latest available to this level of detail). To obtain this information for each district health authority would be disproportionately expensive, and even then, the figures for 1979-81 would not be directly comparable with those for 1982 and later years, due to boundary changes occurring as a result of the 1982 NHS reorganisation.

West Midlands Regional Health Authority

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give by health authority district within the West Midlands regional health authority the number of beds in 1978 and 1987;

(2) if he will list the number of patients given treatment, annually since 1978 in each health authority district within the West Midlands regional health authority.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 6 April 1987, c. 102]: I am sorry that I cannot give my hon. Friend all the information he seeks in precisely the form requested. The latest information centrally available is given in the tables. For more recent information my hon. Friend may wish to write to the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority.

Financial Management Initiative

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement on the effect on his Department of the financial management initiative.

Mr. Fowler [pursuant to his reply, 9 April 1987, c. 408]: The financial management initiative embraces a whole range of improvements to management in central Government to reflect our commitment to value for money in public expenditure. Since the launch of the initiative in 1982 my Department has made considerable progress in this field. Management accounts and a new staff appraisal system have been introduced, both of which emphasise the importance of accountability and arrangements to set and monitor objectives and targets. A system of delegated budgetary control has been introduced, giving line managers throughout the Department responsibility for their own running costs and promoting greater cost consciousness at all levels.

We have completed a series of wide-ranging reviews of the social security system and, in the Health Service, the financial management initiative has been reflected in the appointment of general managers at regional, district and unit level.

Chapter 3.14 and 3.15 of the public expenditure White Paper (Cm. 56) gives examples of output and performance measures over the Department's businesses. These improvements have provided a valuable impetus and build on work which was already under way in the Department to develop financial management. The principles of the initiative form an integral part of our developing management systems and improvements in value for money generally. Its effects are thus increasingly difficult to identify separately.

Health Expenditure (London)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), 2 April, Official Report, column 1221, he will tabulate in the Official Report, for each of the London region health authorities and health districts, respectively, the expenditure of each in real terms in 1979 and in 1986, showing the percentage increase or decrease stating or using the same statistical criteria.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 9 April 1987, c. 412]: The table shows gross revenue expenditure of the Thames regional health authorities, London area and district health authorities and boards of governors and special health authorities for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals in 1978-79 and 1985-86 at 1985-86 price levels as measured by the gross domestic product deflator, and, where appropriate, the percentage growth in real terms over the period. Comparisons between individual authorities across the period are invalidated by the effects of the boundary changes following the reorganisation of the National Health Service in 1982.

The percentage real terms increase on all health services, that is hospital and community health services' revenue expenditure and expenditure on the family practitioner services, in Greater London between 1978-79 and 1985-86 was 10·6 per cent.

[1] Figures distorted by 1982 boundary changes

Notes:

(1) The figures are derived from health authorities summarised income and expenditure accounts.

(2) The 1982 reorganisation of the National Health Service resulted in substantial and complex boundary changes and changes in management responsibility, and it is therefore not possible to make direct comparisons between the pre- and post-1982 authorities. In addition to these changes there was a major restructuring of the boards of governors for the London postgraduate teaching hospitals as follows:

(a) Bloomsbury health authority now manages the Royal national throat nose and ear hospitals, the Royal national orthopaedic hospitals and St. Peter's hospitals.

(b) West Lambeth health authority now manages St. John's hospital for diseases of the skin.

(c) Hammersmith hospital was given special health authority status.

Sick Pay

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what will be the statutory sick pay of a person currently earning £75 per week who is in receipt of statutory sick pay for the first time this week; what would have been his statutory sick pay had such a person been taken sick in March 1987 or been eligible for statutory sick pay that month; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1987 c. 225]: In March, someone normally earning £75 a week would be entitled to statutory sick pay at a weekly rate of £46·75. Because of the simplification of the SSP scheme, reducing three rates to two, the same weekly earnings since 6 April attract weekly SSP of £32·85.

But it does not follow from this that the employee will find his income during sickness has reduced. The SSP scheme provides for a statutory minimum amount to be paid by employers to their employees when sick. There is nothing to prevent employers from paying more than the amounts laid down—and indeed many already do so under their own occupational sick pay schemes. Over 80per cent. of full-time employees are covered by such schemes.

Secure Units

Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the role proposed for non-regional secure unit facilities in the psychiatric assessment of offenders, referred to in the Government response to recommendation 25 of the third report from the Social Services Committee, Session 1985-86, indicating which other facilities it is intended to utilise.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 1 May 1987, c. 264]: The psychiatric assessment of offenders can be carried out, according to the needs of the individual, within a range of facilities which will include the regional secure units, and other National Health Service hospitals and units offering security appropriate to the individual. These will include facilities which are being developed in some regions as a supplement to permanent RSUs, described as "close supervision" or "intensive care" units which can offer psychiatric care under secure conditions.

The Department has stressed the need for the NHS to provide a comprehensive range of facilities for patients needing varying degrees of security. I am arranging to place in the Library a copy of a letter sent to regional chairmen last autumn which emphasised this requirement; it includes a table showing that the NHS had nearly 1,800 beds offering degrees of security.

Liverpool Women's Hospital (Cervical Cancer Tests)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why 45,000 records of women tested at Liverpool women's hospital for cervical cancer have been re-examined; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 1 May 1987, c. 264]: A review of 45,000 records of cervical smear tests, carried out during the period March 1983 to December 1985 at the women's hospital, Liverpool, was undertaken after the Liverpool health authority was advised that tests reported as negative at the time might have been sufficiently doubtful to have justified a repeat examination or follow-up.

As a result of the review 487 women were identified as requiring further investigation or treatment and 429 have already been contacted. Efforts are continuing to trace the remaining 58. Arrangements set up by Liverpool health authority for special clinics, including evening and weekend sessions, have enabled the 429 to be seen as quickly as possible. Some of these women have received or will require some form of treatment, mostly on an out-patient basis. The health authority is satisfied that the situation is confined to the period and hospital mentioned.

A thorough review is being conducted by a team chaired by Mr. J. B. Fitzpatrick CBE, chairman of the authority, and which includes a consultant pathologist from outside the Mersey region nominated by the Royal College of Pathologists.

We are keeping a close watch on the situation and await the results of the health authority's review before considering whether any departmental action is required.

1991 CENSUS

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any decision has been taken on the inclusion of a religious question in the 1991 census; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 1 May 1987, c. 264]: No decisions have been taken about the content of a 1991 census. The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, the General Register Office for Scotland and the census office in Northern Ireland, which carries out its own census under separate legislation, have been consulting users of census statistics about possible questions for inclusion. The consultations are planned to continue throughout 1987 and all requests will be carefully considered.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Integrated Education

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on integrated education in Northern Ireland; and if he will outline the criteria used for allocating funds to integrated schools.

Dr. Mawhinney: It is Government policy that integrated education should be encouraged in Northern Ireland wherever there is sufficient local demand for it. Independent integrated schools seeking recognition as grant-aided maintained schools must prove over a period that they are able to attract enough pupils to make them potentially viable. When they are recognised as maintained schools they are funded in the same way as other maintained schools, ie

a. the Department of Education pays the salaries of the teachers;
b. the appropriate education and library board meets the running costs;
c. the Department of Education pays 85 per cent. grant on approved capital expenditure.

Marches and Funerals (Policing)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the policing of marches and funerals in the Province.

Mr. Scott: The control of public processions and similar events is the responsibility of the police who have a duty to ensure that the law is not broken or, if it is, that those responsible are dealt with in an appropriate manner. Sensitive operational judgments have frequently to be made and these depend on the circumstances of each case.

Forestry

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if, under the new EEC regulation aimed at establishing uniform forest health surveys, he has assessed the number of sampling points that would need to be looked at under the agreed grid system; and if Northern Ireland will be included in the Government's 1987 tree health survey.

Mr. Viggers: The Department of Agriculture has assessed that the number of sampling points needed for the European Community survey will be approximately 52. Northern Ireland will take part in the EC survey but has not been included in the Forestry Commission 1987 tree health survey.

Police Complaints Board

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current composition of the Police Complaints Board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The current membership of the Police Complaints Board for Northern Ireland comprises a chairman; deputy chairman; and six other members.

The Draft Police (Northern Ireland) Order 1986 was laid before Parliament on 16 December 1986 and is due to be debated in the House on 6 May. This provides, subject to parliamentary approval, for the abolition of the board and its replacement by the Independent Commission for Police Complaints for Northern Ireland.

The proposed membership of the new commission is a chairman; two deputy chairmen; and not less than four other members.

Northern Ireland Airports Ltd.

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the members of Northern Ireland Airports Ltd., and the remaining periods for which each member has been appointed; whether members are required to declare any interests in firms appointed by the authority; and whether his approval was sought for the major changes in management at Aldergrove airport announced last week.

Mr. Needham: The information requested regarding the membership of the board of Northern Ireland Airports Ltd. is provided below. There is a requirement for members of the board to disclose their relevant commercial interests. Matters related to the management staff of the company are the responsibility of the board.

Name of director	Date of expiry of appointment
The Hon. H. O'Neill (Chairman)	30 June 1989
Mr. R. L. Schierbeck	30 June 1987
Mr. T. G. McLaughlin	30 April 1988
Mrs. E. I. Johnston	30 June 1988
Mr. C. H. Martin	30 June 1988
Mr. J. R. Gorman	31 July 1988
Mr. J. Blair	31 October 1988

Terrorism

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his reply of 22 April, Official Report, column 580, how many of the recent murders considered to have been carried out by competing factions of the Irish National Liberation Army led to the deaths of individuals who had formerly been charged with scheduled offences but subsequently released.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate the total cost of resisting the terrorist campaign since 1969.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to my hon. Friends as soon as possible.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons convicted of terrorist offences are currently in prison in the Province; how many are men and how many women; and what is the average length of sentence served in prison for such crimes.

Mr. Scott [pursuant to his reply, 1 May 1987, c. 254]: On 12 April 1987 there were 1,157 sentenced prisoners in Northern Ireland who had been convicted of a scheduled offence, including 448 prisoners who were serving life imprisonment or detention during the Secretary of State's pleasure; 1,143 were men and 14 were women. Because of the very high proportion of those serving indeterminate sentences a meaningful figure on the average length of sentence served in prison is not available.

SCOTLAND

Stirling

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the total amount spent or committed by his Department on capital projects and grants in the Stirling constituency since 1983; and if he will list the principal projects involved.

Mr. Ancram: Records relating to public expenditure are not generally maintained on a constituency basis.

Milk Quota

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the transfer of milk quota from Scotland to other parts of the United Kingdom; and what effect this will have on the dairy production and processing industries in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Environmental Assessment

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what new legislative provisions he anticipates will be required to supplement the existing town and country planning legislation in order fully to implement the European Directive on environmental assessment.

Mr. Ancram: Details of proposed statutory provisions for implementing the directive were set out in an appendix to the consultative paper on implementation of the directive which was issued by the Scottish Development Department in April 1986. Copies of that paper are available in the Library. Responses are being considered.

Killearn Hospital

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement regarding the Killearn hospital site.

Mr. John MacKay: Missives for the sale of the site were concluded in July 1985. An application by the purchasers for a change of use to an equestrian centre with associated facilities was approved by Stirling district council in October 1985 subject to various conditions and the requirement that an agreement under section 50 of the Town and Country Planning (Scotland) Act 1972 be successfully negotiated between the local authority and the developer prior to planning consent being issued. These negotiations are not yet complete and accordingly the sale has not yet been concluded.

Bridge of Allan (Flooding)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Central regional council regarding flooding in Bridge of Allan.

Mr. Ancram: No representations as such have been received from Central regional council, but the council did inquire in April 1986 about the availability of grant for a flood prevention scheme at Bridge of Allan in varying circumstances of cost allocation among interested parties.

Forth Valley Health Board

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to the answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 73, relating to consultation procedures carried out by the Forth Valley health board, how many neighbours were consulted by Forth Valley health board; why the chairman refused to meet residents when requested to do so by the hon. Member for Stirling; why the board refused to attend public meetings and a community council meeting; if he is satisfied with the procedures followed by Forth Valley health board in this matter; and if he will now issue guidelines on consultation.

Mr. John Mackay: My right hon. and learned Friend understands that Forth Valley health board took certain steps regarding consultation with local residents on its proposal for 11 Randolph road, Stirling. On the question of guidelines, I have nothing to add to the reply which I gave to my hon. Friend on 11 March 1987 at column 243. The matters on which my hon. Friend seeks detailed information are entirely for the health board and are best pursued direct.

AIDS

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to the answer of 22 April, Official Report, column 567, whether the restrictions on blood donations are to apply to all who have visited certain parts of Africa or only to those who have had sexual intercourse with persons living in those countries, as stated in his Department's press release entitled "People who must not give blood", issued on 29 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: The long-standing practice (designed to reduce the risk of transmitting certain tropical diseases) is to ask all potential donors who have lived in or visited certain parts of Africa not to donate blood until 12 months after their return to the United Kingdom.

The restrictions introduced in August 1984 (which, as announced on 28 April, are now to be slightly amended to discourage donations from prostitutes and people with AIDS or the AIDS antibody) apply to potential donors who, in addition, have had sexual relations with men or women living in those parts.

Diabetics

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he now expects free disposable syringes and needles for diabetics to be available on prescription.

Mr. John MacKay: Free disposable syringes and needles will be available for diabetics on GP prescription as soon as negotiations with manufacturers on specification, supply and price have been completed.

Marine Farming (Pollution)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what research he is sponsoring into the incidence of pollution from marine farming.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Fisheries Protection

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is the registration index of the Fokker F27 that he is acquiring for fishery surveillance; what will be the cost of changing the registration index; and what the new index will be;

(2) if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for East Lothian on 27 March, Official Report, column 300, regarding the Fokker F27-200 to be used for fishery surveillance patrols, he will list the owners of the aircraft since 1959 and the type and location of services for which it was used during that period; what is the estimated remaining life of the aircraft in terms of flying hours in Scottish fishery patrol conditions; what is the anticipated average number of hours per cycle in this service; and to what extent the manufacturer of the aircraft is directly involved in its current overhaul.

Mr. John MacKay: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will indicate the percentage unemployment in the Stirling constituency for each month since January 1983.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is not available for parliamentary constituencies. However, unemployment percentage rates for the Stirling travel-to-work area from January 1983 to March 1987 (the latest date for which information is available) were as shown in the table below.

Unemployment Rates—Stirling Travel-to-Work Area

	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987

November	13·4	14·0	14·0	13·7	—
December	13·4	13·8	14·0	13·6	—

Due to various changes in the compilation of the statistics during the period these figures are not directly comparable.

This information is available in the Library.

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many jobs have been created and how many lost in the Cumbernauld and Kilsyth constituency in each year since June 1979 in the food processing industry;

(2) how many jobs have been created and how many lost in the Cumbernauld and Kilsyth constituency in each year since June 1979 in the clothing and textile industry;

(3) how many jobs have been created and how many lost in the Cumbernauld and Kilsyth constituency in each year since June 1979 in the computer construction industry;

(4) how many jobs have been created and how many lost in the Cumbernauld and Kilsyth constituency in each year since June 1979 in the construction industry;

(5) how many jobs have been created and how many lost in the Cumbernauld and Kilsyth constituency in each year since June 1979 in the distribution industry;

(6) how many jobs have been created and how many lost in the Cumbernauld and Kilsyth constituency in each year since June 1979 in the engineering industry;

(7) how many jobs have been created and how many lost in the Cumbernauld and Kilsyth constituency in each year since June 1979.

Mr. Lang: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Norman Hogg asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many qualified teachers are presently unemployed in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay: Information about numbers of unemployed teachers is not available.

Rates

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has as to how the current produce of domestic rates in Scotland and in each of the regions of Scotland might be raised through community charge or local income tax with and without resource equalisation in the cases of (a) a single person on (i) 100 per cent., (ii) 90 per cent., (iii) 75 per cent. and (iv) 60 per cent. of the average male manual worker's wage for Scotland, (b) a married man with earnings as in (a) above, whose wife earns 50 per cent. of the average for women in full-time employment, (c) a married man with earnings as in (a) above, whose wife earns 50 per cent. of the average for women in part-time employment and (d) a married man as in (c) above, living with three sons or daughters aged 18 to 24 years all of whom earn the average for full-time workers in the 18 to 24 age group.

Mr. Ancram: The estimated average local tax bills under the community charge system and under a local income tax system with and without resource equalisation needed to replace domestic rates in 1985-86, are given below for the specific cases requested.

Notes:

(1) The average community charges for 1985-86 used in the tables were published in the Official Report on 20 February 1986.

(2) The underlying local income tax rates (with resource equalisation) have been estimated on the assumption that some form of resource equalisation would make the yield of 1p in the £ the same per adult in all areas.

(3) Published information on taxable resources in local authority areas is only available up to 1982-83. The sample size is small and the regional pattern shows considerable variation from year to year. Estimates of local income tax rates without resource equalisation are therefore subject to some uncertainty. Those in the table have been produced by applying the pattern of unequalised tax rates calculated for 1982-83 to 1985-86 average earnings.

(4) Estimates of average gross earnings have been taken from the 1985 new earnings survey. The average figures for Scotland have been used in each case with the exception of average earnings for the 18-24 year age group, where only GB figures were readily available.

(5) In applying local income tax rates to cases (a) to (d) it is assumed that earnings are the only sources of income and that only personal tax allowances apply.

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has as to how the current produce of domestic rates in Scotland and in each of the regions in Scotland might be raised through community charge or local income tax with and without resource equalisation in the cases of (a) a single person on (i) 100 per cent., (ii) 90 per cent., (iii) 75 per cent., and (iv) 60 per cent. of an annual male manual worker's wage in Scotland, (b) a married man with earnings as in (a) above, whose wife's earnings are the average for women in full-time employment, (c) a married man with earnings as in (a) above, whose wife's earnings are the average for women in part-time employment, (d) a married man with earnings as in (a) above, whose wife has no income, (e) a married couple with earnings as in (b) above, living with a son or daughter aged 18 or over whose earnings are the average for full-time workers in the 18 to 24 years age group, (f) a married couple with earnings as in (b) above, living with a son or daughter aged 18 to 24 years who is unemployed, (g) a single person on 100 per cent. of an average male non-manual worker's wage and (h) a married man with earnings as in (g) above, whose wife's earnings are the average for women in full-time employment.

Mr. Ancram: The estimated average local tax bills under the community charge system and under a local income tax system with and without resource equalisation needed to replace domestic rates in 1985-86, are given below for the specific cases requested.

Notes:

(1) The average community charges for 1985-86 used in the tables were published in the Official Report on 20 February 1986.

(2) The underlying local income tax rates (with resource equalisation) have been estimated on the assumption that some form of resource equalisation would make the yield of 1p in the £ the same per adult in all areas.

(3) Published information on taxable resources in local authority areas is only available up to 1982-83. The sample size is small and the regional pattern shows considerable variation from year to year. Estimates of local income tax rates without resource equalisation are therefore subject to some uncertainty. Those in the table have been produced by applying the pattern of unequalised tax rates calculated for 1982-83 to 1985-86 average earnings.

(4) Estimates of average gross earnings have been taken from the 1985 new earnings survey. The average figures for Scotland have been used in each case with the exception of average earnings for the 18-24 year age group, where only GB figures were readily available.

(5) In applying local income tax rates to cases (a) to (h) it is assumed that earnings are the only sources of income and that only personal tax allowances apply.

(6) In case (f) it has been assumed that the unemployed son or daughter will be in receipt of unemployment benefit.

Health Service (Contracts)

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, further to his answer of 29 April 1986, Official Report, column 148, how many of the 28 contracts awarded went to private sector organisations; and in each case if he will list the bid submitted by the in-house organisation and that by the most competitive private company.

Mr. John MacKay: Four out of the 28 contracts which had been put out to tender by the end of 1986 were awarded to the private sector. Information is not collected centrally in individual tendering exercises undertaken by health boards.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Michael Delaney

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Attorney-General if the Director of Public Prosecutions is considering a prosecution over the death of Michael Delaney killed by a lorry outside News International plant in Wapping.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions has considered this case and has decided that there is not sufficient evidence to justify a prosecution.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Mr. Graeme Adam

Mr. Foulkes asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what progress has been reported to him following the referral to the procurator fiscal in Kilmarnock of information regarding the solicitor, Mr. Graeme Adam.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I refer to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley on 8 April 1987, at columns 298-9. These matters are being investigated actively and the procurator fiscal will report the results as soon as possible. I do not expect to receive interim progress reports.

TRANSPORT

Public Carriage Office

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has about the current delays experienced by drivers and owners of London taxis in having them licensed by the Public Carriage Office; and what assessment he has made of the costs involved in such delays.

Mr. David Mitchell: I visited the Public Carriage Office on Tuesday 5 May and I understand that some of the recent delays are attributable to the increased proportion of vehicles presented in an unsatisfactory condition and requiring re-examination. Ways of reducing the delays are being explored. No assessment has been made of the costs involved.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the effect on the level of service at the Public Carriage Office of the introduction of a payment system; and what representations he has received from the cab trade on this matter.

Mr. David Mitchell: A cost recovery system was introduced in 1981 without effect on the level of service. I have received no recent representation on this matter.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many staff are currently available to inspect taxis at the Public Carriage Office; how this figure compares with each of the last five years; what assessment he has made of the implications of current staff levels for delays being experienced by cab owners and drivers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: There are 27 vehicle examiners at the Public Carriage Office. This is one more than the number available over the last five years. Steps are being taken to recruit further staff.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the ratio of cabs being presented for passing, against the number of carriage offices in each of the last five years.

Mr. David Mitchell: The number of carriage officers remained constant at 26 during the last five years. The number of cabs presented was:

	Number
1982	24,768
1983	25,733
1984	27,440
1985	29,167
1986	30,321

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in the light of the constraints on space at the Public Carriage Office, he will extend the hours during which it is open; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is an operational matter for the Assistant Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police. I understand that from 5 May 1987 the Public Carriage Office is open to receive vehicles from 7 am, one hour earlier than previously.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport what measures are being taken to recruit more staff to the Public Carriage Office; what problems have been experienced in recruiting; if a training scheme exists; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Steps are being taken by the Public Carriage Office to recruit vehicle examining staff, but problems are being experienced in recruiting suitably qualified people. Specialist training is provided.

Heathrow (Access)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will consider initiating further detailed studies of wider access to Heathrow, now that the M25 is complete;

(2) when the study of improvements in surface access between central London and Heathrow, initiated in March 1986, will be completed and published.

Mr. David Mitchell: The study of ways of improving surface access between Heathrow and central London is almost complete, and we hope to publish it shortly. Discussions on possible further studies of access to Heathrow from other directions are now taking place with local authorities.

Chapter 2 Aircraft

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he is giving to phasing out the noisier types of chapter 2 aircraft.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Government are considering how all, not just the noisier types of chapter 2 aeroplanes might be phased out. It must be recognised, however, that this will be a long process that is dependent ultimately on international agreement.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to reintroduce noise insulation grants for defined areas around certain airports on a generous basis, and extended to schools and hospitals.

Mr. David Mitchell: We are assessing BAA's most recent noise insulation grants schemes at Heathrow and Gatwick. We have no plans to require BAA to introduce new schemes at these airports. It is proposed that a noise insulation grants scheme should be introduced at Stansted in due course, on the lines of the recent Heathrow and Gatwick schemes.

We are also considering whether criteria can be developed for making noise insulation grants for those parts of schools and hospitals where the work is particularly sensitive to aircraft noise.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if, in view of the fact that aircraft noise limits were set some 25 years ago, he will initiate an update of such limits;

(2) if he will introduce penalties for airlines persistently deviating from noise preferential routes without sound reason;

(3) what steps he is taking to require airport operators to monitor the track-keeping of aircraft both to and from the airport in accordance with section 68 of the Airports Act 1986.

Mr. David Mitchell: BAA plc is considering, together with the Civil Aviation Authority and officials of my Department, the introduction of an integrated noise and track-keeping monitoring system for Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted. When we know the capability of the equipment we shall consider the criteria against which it should be operated, including track-keeping tolerances and revised noise limits.

In general, pilots carefully follow the flight instructions which implement noise preferential routes. Moreover, a sanction for failure to comply with the noise preferential route requirements at a designated aerodrome is provided for in section 78(2) of the Civil Aviation Act 1982, which empowers the Secretary of State to direct an aerodrome manager to secure that the aerodrome's facilities are withheld to the extent specified from the offending aircraft operator. We shall consider whether this, or some alternative sanction, would be appropriate when the new route monitoring system is in operation.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many public complaints have been received about night flying at Heathrow and Gatwick for each year since and including 1984.

Mr. David Mitchell: The numbers were as follows:

	Heathrow	Gatwick
1984	115	17
1985	294	81
1986	363	109

The increase in complaints may reflect the publicity given to night noise by the Department when it initiated a review of night restrictions policy at the airports. The review is still in progress.

Docklands Light Railway

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much Government finance is to be provided for (i) the docklands light railway extension to the Bank and (ii) other improvements and upgrading of the docklands light railway.

Mr. David Mitchell: The proportion of the costs of the extension of the docklands light railway to Bank and the associated upgrading of the capacity of the initial railway to be met by London Regional Transport is dependent on the outcome of its negotiations with the consortium proposing to develop the Canary wharf site. The other major proposed improvement to the docklands light railway, the extension to Beckton, would be funded by the LDDC out of the higher land values accruing to it which the extension will itself generate.

Mr. Mikardo asked the Secretary of State for Transport how much the Canary wharf consortium is to put up for (i) the docklands light railway extension to the Bank, and (ii) other improvements and upgrading of the railway.

Mr. David Mitchell: The amount which the Canary wharf consortium will contribute to the extension of the docklands light railway to Bank and to the associated upgrading of the capacity of the initial railway is dependent on the outcome of the negotiations currently taking place between the consortium and London Regional Transport. The consortium is not involved in the financing of the other major project on the docklands light railway, the extension to Beckton.

Severn Ports (Shipping)

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the maximum size of ships in deadweight tonnage so far handled by each of the ports of the Severn estuary.

Mr. David Mitchell: According to "Lloyd's Ports of the World 1987" the deadweight tonnage of the largest ship handled in each of the main ports is:

	Number
Barry	27,343
Cardiff	23,788
Newport	39,239
Sharpness	6,000

Bristol is said to be able to accommodate ships up to 70,000 deadweight tons.

The constraining factors on ship size in these ports are the length, beam and draught that can be accommodated in their entry locks.

Bournemouth

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those measures taken by his Department since 1979 which have specifically benefited transport and roads serving the borough of Bournemouth.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: On trunk roads, for which this Department is directly responsible Bournemouth has benefited from improvements to the A31-A35-M27 south coast trunk route, the A36 route to Bristol and the North, and the extension of the M3 from London.

Schemes opened to traffic include bypasses on the A31 in Dorset of Wimborne, Bere Regis and Ferndown and the completion of the M3 as far as Winchester. On the A36, construction of the Warminster bypass is under way to link with the recently completed Heytesbury bypass. On the A35, work is due to start on the Dorchester bypass later this year.

Preparation is under way on a number of further projects to improve these trunk routes, including schemes to join the M3 directly with the M27 on the south coast route just north of Southampton. In addition, on the A36 preparatory work is in hand on bypasses of Salisbury, Steeple Langford, Codford and Beckington, and in last month's roads White Paper schemes were added for the improvement of the A36 between Heytesbury and Codford as well as for a bypass of West Wellow.

Responsibility for other routes serving the borough lies with the county councils. Since 1979 Dorset county council has received from the Department a total transport supplementary grant of £42 million, a substantial part of which has contributed towards the improvement of Bournemouth's local roads.

Road Schemes, Derbyshire

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will itemise details of how much has been spent upon road schemes by Derbyshire county council in each of the past three years; and if any schemes have been deferred.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In the past three years, it is estimated that Derbyshire county council has spent the following amounts on road schemes costing over £1 million:

	£ million
1984-85	2·2
1985-86	0·8
1986-87	1·9

In its transport policies and programmes for 1984-85, Derbyshire county council proposed that in the above three years it would start construction on four road schemes costing over £1 million. Only two actually started within that period.

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will itemise how much grant money has been received by Derbyshire county council for road schemes in each of the past three years where the money has not been spent.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: 1985-86 was the first year for which transport supplementary grant was restricted to capital expenditure on roads and the regulation of traffic. Taking the years 1985-86 and 1986-87 together, £6·35 million of Derbyshire county council's proposed expenditure on road schemes costing over £1 million was accepted for grant at a rate of 50 per cent. It is estimated that about £2·8 million of that expenditure was incurred in the two years. The council therefore received grant of about £1·775 million on some £3·55 million of expenditure for road schemes which was not incurred.

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will itemise details of (a) the schemes proposed and (b) the schemes accepted for transport supplementary grant by Derbyshire county council in each of the last three years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Major schemes (those costing £1 million or more) proposed for transport supplementary grant by Derbyshire county council in its 1985-86, 1986-87 and 1987-88 transport policies and programmes are listed in the table. Minor works (those under £1 million) are not named individually in TSG settlements.

Transport Grants

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those highway authorities who have incurred liability to clawback of transport grants in each if the past three years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Adjustments to local highway authorities' accepted expenditure are made to ensure that over a period, expenditure on major schemes taken together, in authorities' accepted programmes is broadly in line with expenditure on major schemes accepted for grant. The present system of adjustments was introduced for shire counties in the 1986-87 settlement, and for metropolitan districts and London boroughs in 1987-88. The authorities which have been subject to adjustment of TSG accepted expenditure are:

Western Environmental Route

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he proposes to take with regard to the proposed western environmental route to ensure that traffic does not increase in adjacent areas.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have made it clear that it is not our aim to increase traffic in west London, either north or south of the river. The intention is to transfer the traffic which has to to be in the area, including most of the heavy lorries, to a purpose-built road. We want to discuss with the boroughs measures to control the traffic remaining on the existing network and to remove it from unsuitable residential roads. Having provided means by which the local environment can be improved, we wish to see measures that maintain the improvement.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he proposes to consult the public about the proposals for the western environmental improvement route.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Yes. We shall be publishing the consultants' report on the feasibility of the route as soon as possible, probably in June. The report will include plans showing how the road might fit into the corridor. We then plan to start public consultation on the various options for standards and access early next year. There will be ample opportunity for all views to be considered before we reach any firm decisions.

Arundel Bypass (Crossbush Section)

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now respond to representations from the hon. Member for Arundel, the Lyminster parish council and residents of Crossbush and announce details for an advanced start of the Crossbush section of the Arundel bypass A27 trunk road.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am still considering the representations that the Crossbush section of the Arundel bypass should be provided in advance of the full scheme. I will make an announcement as soon as I can. We expect to consult the public on possible routes for the remainder of the scheme shortly.

Toad Tunnels and Badger Crossings

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government in respect of the construction of toad tunnels and badger crossings in new road schemes.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department of Transport makes every effort to minimise any disruptive effect to wildlife arising from national road schemes. In a number of cases, tunnels or underpasses have been provided to protect animals using their accustomed routes. Each case is considered on its merits following consultation with the Nature Conservancy Council and other interested bodies.

A copy of "Transport and the Environment", published by the Department on 5 May, has been placed in the Library.

Heathrow (Security)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport who will be responsible for security at Heathrow airport in the event of privatisation of the British Airports Authority.

Mr. David Mitchell: So far as responsibilities for security are concerned, it makes no difference whether an airport is publicly or privately owned.

Open Level Crossings (Report)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he now expects to receive Professor Stott's report of his review of the safety of automatic open level crossings.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that Professor Stott needs more time than originally estimated to carry out the thorough job which he and I believe to be needed, and that he now expects to submit his report in June.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Acid Deposition

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list those lakes and rivers in Northern Ireland that are suffering from acidification.

Mr. Needham: Northern Ireland has been included in the European monitoring and evaluation programme on acid deposition since 1984. It is too soon to establish long term trends although monitoring so far and routine river quality monitoring does not indicate acidification problems.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of the 6,000 claims from married women for invalid care allowance have been dealt with to date; and at what rate he expects to dispose of this balance.

Mr. Needham: At 24 April 1987, 5,871 claims for invalid care allowance had been received from married women, of which 2,234 were decided by that date. In view of the very high take-up of this backdated benefit in Northern Ireland, arrangements are being made to improve substantially the present clearance rate and I would expect the present backlog to be cleared by the autumn.

Agriculture (Green Pound)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received on the implications for agriculture in Northern Ireland of the current rate of the green pound; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: Representations have been received from Northern Ireland Members of Parliament and from representatives of the agriculture industry that a significant devaluation of the green pound is required to improve market support and reduce monetary compensatory amounts on trade between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland. It has been made clear to the European Commission that the United Kingdom will want to improve on the reduction of four percentage points proposed by the Commission.

EMPLOYMENT

Pay

Mr. Corbyn asked the Paymaster General what information he has as to the numbers and proportions of workers in Britain who are paid less than the Council of Europe decency threshold; and what was the number and proportion in 1979.

Mr. Lee: The new earnings survey indicates that in April 1986 just over 4¼ million, or about 28 per cent. of full-time adult employees in Great Britain had gross weekly earnings for a full week of less than £125·6, the latter figure corresponding to 68 per cent. of the Great Britain average for all full-time adult employees. Comparable figures for 1979 are not available. Although an advisory committee of the Council of Europe has suggested the figure of 68 per cent. of national full-time adult average earnings as significant in considering low pay, the figure has not been accepted or recognised by the United Kingdom or any other member state of the Council of Europe.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Chapman asked the Paymaster General if he has any plans to introduce more accurate assessments of the numbers in employment and the registered unemployed.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I currently have no plans for changing the methods of estimating the numbers employed and unemployed.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if, on the basis of the labour force survey, he will list how many (a) men, (b) women, (c) men and women (i) said they would like a job and were available to start work in the next two weeks, (ii) said they would like a job but were not available to start work in the next two weeks but had sought work in the last four weeks and (iii) said they would like a job; and if he will provide estimates for Scotland, Wales and each region.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987, c. 332]: I am able to give the figures requested but I trust that the hon. Member is not going to take any of this very partial selection of figures as any estimate of the number of unemployed people.

Estimates from the preliminary labour force survey results for the spring of 1986 of the number of people who said they would like a job for whatever reason are as shown in column 1 of the table. Columns 2 and 3 of the table extract the figures requested for those people who said they would like work and were available to start work within two weeks or, if not available, had looked for work in the last four weeks.

Of those people who said they were available for work, 1,357,000 had made no attempt to find a job in the last four weeks. This should be taken into account under any analysis, as is the case under internationally accepted definitions. On the basis of the accepted ILO definition and on the basis of the labour force survey, fewer than 3 million people were unemployed both in 1985 and 1986.

* Less than ten thousand

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will publish the April unemployment rates for the United Kingdom and for each region including Scotland and Wales using the new employment estimates contained in the 1984 Census of Employment.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987, c. 331]: We plan to publish unemployment rates incorporating new employment estimates which take account of the 1984 census of employment results on Thursday 14 May 1987. At that time, revised regional and national rates will be available in the Library.

Small Firms

Mr. Haynes asked the Paymaster General what is the success rate of small firms in the creation of jobs after one, three and five years, respectively.

Mr. Trippier: I regret that the information is not available in the form requested. However, it is estimated that between 1982 and 1984 very small firms employing less than 20 people created around 1 million extra jobs in the United Kingdom, offsetting net job losses of ¼ million in larger firms.

Chemical Industry

Mr. Dalyell asked the Paymaster General if he will make a statement about safety hazards in the chemical industry in the light of recent explosions at Grangemouth.

Mr. Trippier: The incidents at Grangemouth are still being investigated by inspectors from the Health and Safety Executive. Reports will be sent to the procurator fiscal. When the investigation has been completed, I shall write to the hon. Member.

Bournemouth

Mr. Butterfill asked the Paymaster General if he will list those measures taken by his Department since 1979 which have benefited specifically employment, small businesses and tourism in the borough of Bournemouth.

Mr. Trippier: The measures which have been available since 1979 to assist people in the Bournemouth area with employment are restart, community programme, YTS, adult training strategy, enterprise allowance scheme, job training scheme, job share, job splitting scheme, job clubs, job start, job release, voluntary projects programme, training opportunities scheme, wider opportunities training programme, open tech programme, new workers scheme, small firms employment subsidy, youth opportunities programme, young workers scheme, community industry, community enterprise programme, special temporary employment programme, travel to interview scheme and temporary short-time working compensation scheme. Many additional forms of encouragement have also been available in Bournemouth to the small business community since 1979; I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given on 9 February at columns 56-60 to my hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) which lists these in detail.

Since 1983, the only period for which statistics are readily available, the English tourist board, for which my Department has sponsorship responsibility, has offered assistance totalling £785,000 under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969 to 56 tourism projects in Bournemouth. Bournemouth has also benefited indirectly from marketing campaigns organised by the English tourist board, the Southern tourist board and the British Tourist Authority.

Parcels Services

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Paymaster General if he will instruct his enterprise and deregulation unit to conduct an urgent inquiry into the treatment by Government agencies of the express parcels services offered by the Post Office and by private courier concerns in competition; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

New Workers Scheme

Mr. Chapman asked the Paymaster General whether he is proposing to make any changes to the new workers scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The new workers scheme will continue, with some changes, to encourage employers to create more full-time jobs for young people under 21 at realistic rates of pay. From 1 June this year the eligibility criterial for support for jobs starting on or after that date will change as follows:

The scheme will be open only to 18, 19 and 20 year olds in their first year of employment.

Eligibility for new workers for young people aged 18 will no longer be dependent upon their having exhausted their eligibility for YTS.

The average gross weekly wage ceiling for 18 and 19 year olds will be increased from £55 to £60.

In all other respects, the scheme remains unchanged.

Booklets explaining the new workers scheme conditions in full, together with a revised application form, will be available from the employment measures units of the Department of Employment, jobcentres and careers offices shortly.

Northern Region

Mr. Fallon asked the Paymaster General (1) how much will be spent on training and retraining in the northern region (a) in the current year and (b) in 1983;

(2) how many places are being provided in each of his Departments training schemes in the current year in the northern region, and how many were so provided in 1983.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987, c. 331.]: The amounts spent by employers, who have the primary responsibility for ensuring adequate provision for training, is not known. The information available about the training provided in the northern region through the Manpower Services Commission is as follows:

	1983-84		1987-88
	Cost £ million	Numbers	Cost £ million	Numbers
YTS	[1]—	[2]28,758	67·025	23,348
Training Opportunities Scheme	15·2	5,416	—	—
Job Training Programme	—	—	[3]15·761	[4]32,297
Wider Opportunities Training Programme	—	—	1·056	4,643
TOTAL	N/A	34,174	83·842	60,188

Notes:

1. Regional spending figures were not produced for YTS for 1983-84.
2. During the first year of YTS more places were established than were eventually required by local young people. The planned figure for 1987-88 is therefore a closer reflection of local demand.
3. Since 1983-84 adult training provision has been substantially remodelled, and the new schemes include a number of developmental elements run directly from MSC Head Office. It is not possible to disaggregate expenditure on these by region and it is therefore not included in the table.
4. Figures for adult training schemes are in terms of planned starts. Training place figures are not kept, because of widely varying course lengths.

DHSS Benefits

Mr. Dewar asked the Paymaster General if he will publish a table showing the number of people in each Department of Health and Social Security office area in Scotland who have been refused entitlement to benefit (a) for failing the eligibility for work criteria and (b) following a restart interview in the most recent period of 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987, c. 339]: No one can lose their benefit entitlement solely as a result of a restart interview. As regards eligibility for work, it has always been a requirement, under long-standing legal rules adopted by successive Governments, that claimants to unemployment benefit must be available for work. Decisions about entitlements in individual cases are and always have been the responsibility of independent statutory adjudicating authorities.

The number of claims disallowed on availability grounds by centralised adjudication offices for the 12 month period up to 31 December 1986 is as follows:

Location	Number of disallowance decisions
Aberdeen	851
Anniesland	193
Ayr	281
Dundee	507
Edinburgh (East)	995
Edinburgh (West)	1,285
Falkirk	317
Glasgow (South Side)	737
Inverness	378
Kilmarnock	362
Motherwell	222
Paisley	685
Peterhead	414
Total	7,227

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

West Germany

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Government of the Federal German Republic concerning the imbalance of trade between the United Kingdom and West Germany; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table comparing the United Kingdom deficit in trade in manufactures with West Germany and with Japan as a total and per head of the population of the relevant exporting country.

Mr. Alan Clark: Trade matters are frequently discussed with our partners in the Community, including the Federal German Republic, which is the second biggest market for our exports.

The statistical information requested is in the table:

United Kingdom Trade in Manufactures[1] 1986

	Trade balance £ million	Per head[2] £
Trade with:
Federal Republic of Germany	−6,714	110
Japan	−3,913	30

Airbus

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to ensure that funding of the European airbus on other than commercial terms will not prejudice United Kingdom exports to the United States of America; and whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing what proportion of the increase since 1979 in United Kingdom exports of finished manufactures is accounted for by the increase in exports of such manufactures to the United States of America and how much to the European Economic Community.

Mr. Pattie: The airbus partner Governments have reaffirmed that any support for Airbus Industrie and its partner companies will be in accordance with their GATT obligations. Before agreeing to provide British Aerospace with launch aid in respect of the airbus A330/A340, the Government will wish to be satisfied that the projects have sound prospects of economic and commercial viability and that they could expect to receive a real rate of return on their investment. The increase between 1979 and 1986 in exports of finished manufactures to the United States of America was equivalent to 26 per cent. and to the EC countries 43 per cent. of the overall increase.

Bournemouth

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those measures taken by his Department since 1979 which have benefited specifically trade and industry in the area of the borough of Bournemouth.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My Department has, through the encouragement of enterprise and restoration of incentives, sought to benefit industry and commerce throughout the country. The promotion of competition, in part through privatisation, the reductions in the burdens on business and the improved links between industry and education have all contributed towards improving the climate in which industry operates. More specifically, we have in the financial years 1979-80 to 1986-87 offered assistance of £2·728 million under the support for innovation scheme and £0·996 million under the provisions of section 8 of the Industrial Development Act to companies in the Bournemouth travel-to-work area.

Advertising (Space Satellites)

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from observatories and from astronomers about the impact on their work of the launching into space of satellites for the purpose of advertising; if he proposes to take any action; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Pattie: I will reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Privatisation (Shareholdings)

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to how many shares are held by (a) individuals and (b) institutions in British Telecom plc and British Gas plc.

Mr. Butcher: Information on shareholdings in British Telecom is given on page 49 of the company's 1986 annual report, available in the Library of the House. Information on British Gas is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

International Couriers

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress he has made in his discussions regarding the treatment of public and private sector international couriers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: Discussions are continuing both with my ministerial colleagues and with representatives of the Post Office and the private sector courier companies to identify possible ways of making progress towards parity of treatment.

Komatsu Components

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether Komatsu components imported into the United Kingdom for the local assembly of hydraulic excavators are subjected to the 26·6 per cent. anti-dumping duty; and what information he has on (a) the quantity and (b) the value of such imported components in each of the past three years or comparable period.

Mr. Alan Clark: Components imported for local assembly of hydraulic excavators are not subject to anti-dumping duty unless imported as excavators in completely knocked down, disassembled or unassembled form.

Statistics for the quantity and value of components imported by Komatsu over the past three years are not available.

End-user Certificates

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he takes to monitor compliance with end-user certificates; how many contraventions have been notified to him over the latest period for which figures are available; what steps he takes to investigate alleged contraventions of the terms of such certificates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987, c. 318]: Export licences are not issued unless the Government are satisfied as to the end use stated on the application. End-use certificates are just one element in the verification of export licence applications. It is not Government practice to disclose the nature of checks made.

New Companies

Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many new companies have been registered in the northern region in each year since 1979.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987, c. 319]: Jordan and Son Limited estimates that the number of companies incorporated each year and whose current registered office is located in the northern region (or, in the case of companies which have been dissolved, the last known registered office) is as follows:

	Number
1979	1,719
1980	1,794
1981	1,884
1982	2,347
1983	2,545
1984	2,537
1985	2,648
1986	3,155

A small number of companies registered in parts of Lancashire and North Yorkshire are included in the northern region figures and some around the Berwick area are excluded as the table was compiled from an analysis of postcodes of registered office addresses.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Radice asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if any further companies have been approached by his Department to fund city technology colleges; and how many companies have now expressed a willingness to provide funding.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The situation remains as set out in my reply to the hon. Member on 1 April, at column 529, though I am pleased to add that since then Dixons Group plc has announced sponsorship of £1 million for the establishment of a city technology college in south Yorkshire.

Dyslexia

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what research is being undertaken into dyslexia; what is his policy towards the teaching of dyslexic pupils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The Department has devoted considerable time and money in the past few years on research into specific learning difficulties. Four research projects were funded, and a seminar was organised; I am sending my hon. Friend a copy of the report of the proceedings. Currently, research funding is being channelled towards other areas of disability. Education research tends to identify the teacher rather than the method as the most significant input into successful teaching. The needs of dyslexic pupils are best considered in teachers' in-service courses within the broad framework of pupils with special educational needs.

Bournemouth

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list those measures taken by his Department since 1979 which have benefited specifically education in the area which includes the borough of Bournemouth.

Mrs. Rumbold: Most Government resourcing of education is in the form of rate support grant, which LEAs are free to spend as they wish. Prescribed capital expenditure, also at the discretion of LEAs, totals £34·4 million for Dorset since 1981 and has enabled the LEA to include in its building programmes three major building projects at further education colleges in the Bournemouth — Poole area, costing over £5 million. Direct capital allocations for voluntary schools in Dorset total £2·4 million since 1982 and current building work includes provision of a new Anglian primary school at Muscliffe.

Dorset has benefited from various Government schemes involving direct financial assistance for the in-service training of teachers and others and its annual grants for this purpose have increased from about £70 million in 1983 to nearly £300 million in 1987. Nearly £1·3 million will be made available in 1987-88 under the new LEA training grants scheme. Since the inception of education support grants in 1985, Dorset has been particularly successful in its bids, covering many categories of activities, including, in the schools field, projects to enhance the management and curricula of rural primary schools and to develop pupil records of achievement and, in adult education, the establishment of the Dorset training consortium and a current project to develop educational provision for the unemployed.

Teachers' Dispute

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make it his policy to provide figures which would show the total estimated cost of resources available in schools throughout the United Kingdom but unused as a result of the teachers' strike.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information requested is not available. Strike action continues to affect about 1 to 2 per cent. of schools in England and Wales each week.

School Meals

Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what payments have been made or approved by him in relation to schemes submitted by local authorities for the payment of school meals supervisory assistance.

Mr. Dunn: Under the ESG scheme, my right hon. Friend made available £37·2 million in 1986-87 to meet the cost of approved proposals relating to arrangements for midday supervision. Approved bids totalling £32,608,802 were received and to date grant totalling £12,650,431 has been paid. To enable authorities to continue their existing arrangements my right hon. Friend has allocated £39 million for this purpose for 1987-88.

GCSE

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the amount of money allocated per pupil for materials necessary for general certificate of secondary education courses.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government's plans for local authority current spending this year include an additional £100 million for GCSE non-teaching costs. Provision of £10 million is supported directly through education support grant and is specifically for books and equipment, including materials; the allocation of the £90 million which is supported through block grant is for individual authorities to determine but is intended to cover inter alia further spending on books and equipment. The £100 million in total is equivalent to £84 per fourth and fifth year pupil.

Bradford

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the pupil-teacher ratio in (a) first, (b) middle and (c) upper schools in Bradford in (i) 1983-84, (ii) 1984-85, (iii) 1985-86 and (iv) 1986-87.

Mr. Dunn: The pupil-teacher ratios in first, middle and upper schools in Bradford in 1984, 1985 and 1986 are given in the table. Information for 1987 is not yet available.

January each year	1984	1985	1986
First schools	20·3	20·6	20·7
Middle schools	19·2	18·1	17·6
Upper schools	15·9	15·7	15·5

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the amount of money spent per pupil in (a) first, (b) middle and (c) upper schools in Bradford in (i) 1983-84, (ii) 1984-85, (iii) 1985-86 and (iv) 1986-87.

Mr. Dunn: The information in the form requested is not available. The net institutional recurrent expenditure per primary and secondary pupil is given in the following table.

	Bradford
	Primary £ (Cash terms)	Secondary £ (Cash terms)
1983-84	745	890
1984-85	785	990
1985-86	850	1,085
1986-87	[1]	[1]

[1] Not available

Bradford's middle schools are deemed to be secondary and therefore the secondary cost above is the appropriate one for their middle school pupils.

Science and Engineering Research Council

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much has been awarded in grants by the Science and Engineering Research Council to (a) educational institutions and (b) others in Yorkshire and Humberside in each year since 1979; how much the council will disburse in the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn [pursuant to his reply, 1 May 1987, c. 237]: The information requested is as follows:

SERC research grant expenditure in Yorkshire and Humberside

Financial year	Gross expenditure £'000
1979-80	3,021
1980-81	3,891
1981-82	4,320
1982-83	4,480
1983-84	5,633
1984-85	6,486
1985-86	6,494
1986-87	[1]7,818

[1] Provisional outturn.

Expenditure in 1987-88 is expected to be at least £7·8 million. It is not possible to give a more precise figure at this stage. All expenditure on grants, for which the SERC is responsible, relates to education institutions.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Skoal Bandits

Miss Fookes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services for how long his Department has been in consultation with the tobacco industry regarding the labelling of Skoal Bandits; and when he expects to announce the results of the discussions.

Mrs. Currie: Measures further to control Skoal Bandits, including a health warning on the label and advertising material, have been under review since last year. An announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Hospital and Community Health Services

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the annual percentage change in revenue input volume for hospital and community health services each year since 1979; and what was the annual percentage change forecast each previous year from 1978 onwards.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 8 December 1986 at columns 69-70 for actual changes in the purchasing power of hospital and community health services current spending.

Since the introduction of cash planning from 1982-83, no forecasts have been made for changes in purchasing power. Forecasts for earlier years are not readily available on a basis consistent with my earlier reply owing to changes in the classification of HCHS current spending.

National Health Service

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the National Health Service capital expenditure projects completed in the Staffordshire Moorlands district during the past 12 years and those projected in the next five years.

Mrs. Currie: The available information about National Health Service capital projects for the parts of north Staffordshire and south-east Staffordshire health authorities which cover my hon. Friend's consitituency is given in the table. Information about schemes undertaken by the health authorities out of their annual block allocations for capital works is not held centrally. My hon. Friend may therefore wish to write to the chairmen of the district health authorities for details of any additional building schemes.

Projects completed from 1 January 1975.

1. St. Edwards Hospital, Cheddleton — Reorganisation of central kitchen.
   Completed—12 December 1975.
2. St Edwards Hospital, Cheddleton — Fire Alarm upgrading and provision of emergency lighting.
   Cost—£96,000.
   Completed—29 April 1977.
3. St Edwards Hospital, Cheddleton — Replacement Boiler House, Phase 1.
   Cost—£912,000.
   Completed—19 May 1981.
4. Cheadle Hospital—Grounds stabilisation.
   Cost—£49,000.
   Completed—10 November 1983.

Projects Planned to be completed by 30 April 1992.

1. Cheadle Geriatric Hospital (replacement for existing Cheadle Hospital).
   Cost—£4·3 million.
   Completion—November 1987.
2. Leek Moorlands Hospital Redevelopment (conversion to neighbourhood hospital).
   Cost—£2·1 million.
   Completion—1989.
3. Biddulph Neighbourhood Hospital.
   Cost—£2·25 million.
   Completion—1992.

Rugby DHA

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients were treated in the hospital of St. Cross, Rugby in (a) 1986 and (b) 1978.

Mrs. Currie: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend the information he seeks in precisely the form requested. Information on individual patients treated is not available centrally. The available information is given in the table.

St. Cross hospital, Rugby

	1978	1985
In-Patient cases	5,667	8,585
Day cases	407	964
New out patient attendances	11,501	13,081
Total out patient attendances	47,892	55,633

East Dorset Health Authority

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list those measures taken by his Department since 1979 which have specifically benefited the East Dorset health authority.

Mr. Newton: The East Dorset health authority, together with other health authorities, has benefited in many ways from the large increase in expenditure on health services since 1979. The health authority has experienced a real growth of 36 per cent. in revenue funding in the period 1978-79 to 1986-87. Sales of land have released a further £851,176. Phase 1 of the Bournemouth district general hospital is presently under construction and approval has been given to the second phase of this major new capital development. At Poole general hospital, an extension to the maternity unit nears completion and a new geriatric unit is to start later this year, as is an acute mental illness unit at St. Anne's hospital, Canford Cliffs. East Dorset has also received £280,000 from central funds towards services for drugs misusers and £114,500 from the waiting list fund to deal with more than 2,000 additional cases. More patients have been treated than ever before, for example the numbers of in-patient cases increased by 29 per cent. between 1978-79 and 1985-86. A computerised cervical cytology call and recall system has been recently implemented in East Dorset.

Scleroderma

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in the United Kingdom it is estimated were suffering from scleroderma at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mrs. Currie: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend the information he seeks in precisely the form requested. On the basis of the hospital in-patient inquiry, it is estimated that in 1984 there were 560 in-patient cases treated for systemic sclerosis (ICD 9th revision No. 710.1) including scleroderma in National Health Service hospitals in England. Figures for the rest of the United Kingdom are a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, and my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

Cigarettes

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish statistics showing recent trends in the use of cigarettes and other tobacco products; and if he will make a statement on the implementation of the Protection of Children (Tobacco) Act 1986.

Mrs. Currie: Information up to 1986 will be available later in the year. The latest available statistics on recent trends are as follows:

(a) Prevalence of Cigarette Smoking (Great Britain)

	Adults		Children[1] (11-16 years)
	Men Per cent.	Women Per cent.	Boys Per cent.	Girls Per cent.

[1] Provisional.

More detailed statistics on the use of cigarettes and other products are in the annual report of the Commissioners of HM Customs and Excise, (CM5), the general household survey (OPCS) and "Smoking Among Secondary School Children" in 1984 (OPCS). Copies are available in the Library.

NB. The Protection of Children (Tobacco) Act came into force on 8 October 1986. A circular (LAC (86)14) was issued to local authorities and other bodies with an interest to draw their attention to the provisions and purposes of the Act. As yet there are no centrally available statistics on prosecutions under the Act.

Deaf Persons (Core Funding)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will have discussions with representatives of the Royal Association in Aid of Deaf People regarding core funding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lyell: Officials from the Department met representatives of the association in November to discuss its application for a grant. I regret that in the light of those discussions we decided that funding would not be appropriate, and the association has been informed accordingly.

Acid Rain

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what discussions his officials have had with the World Health Organisation regarding the direct and indirect human health implications of air pollutants associated with acid rain and the need for research in the United Kingdom in this area; and when these discussions took place;

(2) if he will make a statement on any discussions since 1980 which he or his officials have had with their counterparts in the health or environment agencies of other Governments regarding the direct and indirect human health implications of the air pollutants associated with acid rain.

Mrs. Currie: The main links with health and environmental officials from other countries have been through meetings arranged by the World Health Organisation. The United Kingdom was represented at a conference on the health effects of acid rain organised by the European office of WHO and held in Berlin in July 1984. The European office also arranged a series of meetings between 1984 and November 1986 on air quality guidelines, attended by officials from the Department and other United Kingdom experts, at which effects of air pollutants interrelated with acid rain were considered. Additionally, departmental officials have discussed this topic with their United States counterparts, following the report of a workshop on health effects of acid rain held at the United States National Institute of Environmental Health Science in December 1983.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what research has been done in the United Kingdom since 1968 to investigate the effects of ambient levels of the various pollutants associated with acid rain on sections of the population susceptible to, or suffering from asthma, bronchitis and lung cancer; and if he will summarise the results.

Mrs. Currie: The programme of research at the former Medical Research Council air pollution unit, at St. Bartholomew's hospital, started in the 1950s continued through to 1981, covering, among other things, the monitoring of effects on health of pollutants such as sulphur dioxide, sulphuric acid and other particulates, associated in other contexts with acid rain. The MRC is the main Government-funded agency for United Kingdom biomedical research receiving a grant-in-aid from the Department of Education and Science.

The work included studies of exacerbations of illness among large groups of patients with existing respiratory disability, largely attributable to bronchitis, but with other conditions such as asthma and lung cancer represented. From 1968 onwards these studies showed a sharp decline in adverse effects, corresponding with the implementation of the Clean Air Act, that gained momentum during the 1960s. Day-to-day changes in death rates from respiratory diseases have been monitored continuously since 1968, and this work still continues, in collaboration with the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. Throughout that period, with much reduced levels of pollution, there has been little evidence of any of the sharp peaks in deaths such as had been seen frequently in earlier years in relation to periods of high pollution.

There is no evidence to indicate that acid rain itself has any adverse effect on health, even among people already suffering from respiratory illnesses.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what research has been performed in Britain to investigate any possible links between acid deposition and the following ailments: dialysis dementia, dialysis osteomalacia, dialysis dystrophy, and Alzheimer's disease; and if he will summarise the results.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will outline the nature and goals of research which has been performed, or has been commissioned, since 1980 by his Department or the Medical Research Council into the direct and indirect health effects of ambient levels of air pollutants associated with acid rain and, in particular, projects concerning the human health implications of the following (a) inhalation of sulphuric acid and nitric acid aerosols, (b) inhalation of sulphates, (c) inhalation of particulates, (d) inhalation of sulphur of dioxide, (e) inhalation of nitrogen dioxide, (f) inhalation of ozone, (g) public consumption of potable water contaminated by aluminium, (g) cadmium, mercury or asbestos and (h) public consumption of fish contaminated by heavy metals.

Mrs. Currie: Research on the following direct effects of air pollutants associated with acid rain has been undertaken as follows:

(a) Experimental human inhalation studies with sulphuric acid mists were in progress at the clinical section of the Medical Research Council toxicology unit in 1980-81, to examine short-term effects on lung function. The MRC is the main Government-funded agency for United Kingdom biomedical research receiving a grant-in-aid from the Department of Education and Science. There were no studies specifically with nitric acid aerosols.

(b,c,d) The same investigations included some pilot studies with sulphate aerosols and other particulates, and an extensive series of studies on sulphur dioxide had been completed prior to 1980.

(e) Research work on effects of nitrogen dioxide have been concerned more with exposures indoors, from heating and cooking sources, than with those outdoors. Work on interrelationships with respiratory illnesses, commissioned by the Department, was in progress in 1980-81, concluding with a series of publications in 1982 in the International Journal of Epidemiology. As the findings were complex, I would refer the hon. Gentleman to the original reports.

(f) There has been no research on the effects of inhalation of ozone, but data from environmental monitoring carried out by Government Departments and other groups have been examined in order to consider possibilities of any direct effects on health. No detectable effects on health would be expected at the levels occurring from time to time in the United Kingdom.

(g) The Medical Research Council is undertaking studies on levels of aluminium in patients with Alzheimer's disease and on the occurrence of that disease and related neurological conditions in relation to concentrations of aluminium in potable water. Other indirect effects of acid rain that have been suggested, such as through the mobilization of heavy metals would be blocked by regulatory controls on levels of contaminants in water.

(h) Questions about public consumption of fish contaminated with heavy metals are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and I understand controls exist and monitoring is effected by his Department.

The possibilities of any direct or indirect effects of acid rain on human health are kept under close scrutiny, in line with the conclusions of the WHO meeting in 1984; it is not considered that any clear indications of adverse effects have been produced.

Ambulance Service (London)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice or instruction have been given to district health authorities in the Greater London area concerning the use of contractors other than the London ambulance service for provision of non-emergency ambulance services.

Mrs. Currie: None.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what scales of charge, or other financial arrangement for their services, are being made by the London ambulance service to district authorities for provision of non-emergency ambulance services.

Mrs. Currie: No charges are at present levied. Proposals to introduce charges are under consideration by the four Thames regional health authorities. The service to patients will of course continue to be free.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what tests of competence or other conditions relating to standards of remuneration and safety are applied by district or regional health authorities when using ambulance contractors for non-emergency ambulance services.

Mrs. Currie: Health authorities are responsible for the day-to-day management of National Health Service ambulance services. It is for them to arrange the most appropriate, efficient and cost-effective means of transport for each of the patients the ambulance service is asked to convey. This may involve the use of taxi, hire car or other private contractors as well as volunteers. Standards of safety and payments to private contractors are not set centrally: health authorities are responsible for negotiating contracts locally and for setting standards of service, patient care, and safety.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice, guidance or instruction has been given to the London ambulance service in respect of the employment of part-time employees for manning ambulances.

Mrs. Currie: Part-time employees are used by the London ambulance service to carry out non-emergency work. The national agreement on the salaried structure for ambulance staff allows management to use any combination of working arrangements to maximise effectiveness, including the use of part-timers where appropriate.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state the numbers of persons in each of the categories of personnel of the London ambulance service, including those persons now employed as part-time employees, at the latest convenient date, and the comparable numbers two years before that date.

Mrs. Currie: The information is as follows:

	May 1985 whole time equivalent	May 1987 whole time equivalent	May 1987 actual staff in post
Leading ambulance man	60	57	57
Grade 4/Qualified ambulance person	1,560	1,509	1,509
Grade 3	189	564	564
Grade 2	237
Grade 1	53
Ambulance person part-time	Nil	97·5	195
Total	2,099	2,227·5	2,325

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the minimum qualifications required by the London ambulance service for personnel employed in a full or part-time capacity in non-emergency ambulance services.

Mrs. Currie: Applicants must be at least 21 years old, 5 ft 3 in tall, hold a full United Kingdom driving licence and live in the Greater London area. Successful applicants are trained by the London ambulance service for duties they undertake.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what study has been made of the impact of the reduction in non-emergency ambulance services of the London ambulance service on the administration and efficiency of out-patient departments in hospitals which they serve.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Cervical Screening

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in which health authorities, which have introduced computerised cervical cancer call and recall screening, the increase in the number of women covered is being limited by the need for more computer capacity than was originally provided.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 5 May 1987]: Health authorities were asked in 1966 to introduce cervical screening for women over 35 and in September 1971 it was announced that a central recall system would be introduced. In December 198[illegible], a change from national to local recall was announced because the national recall system was found to be ineffective. In April 1985 we asked health authorities to review the organisation of their screening programmes and to introduce a computerised call/recall system. In February 1987 we asked health authorities to extend their screening programmes to cover all women aged 20 to 65. These changes have created some problems for computer capacity.

The 40 district health authorities listed may be limited in the current operation of cervical cancer screening by the capacity of the computer equipment at the associated 22 family practitioner committees. The situation in these areas is being considered by the task force that we have set up under the direction of Sir Roy Griffiths.

THE ARTS

Bournemouth

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Minister for the Arts if he will list those measures taken by his Department since 1979 which have specifically benefited the arts in the borough of Bournemouth.

Mr. Luce: The Government's arts policies have benefited individuals and arts organisations in all parts of the country.

The public library service provided in Bournemouth by Dorset county council has benefited, as have the public library services elsewhere, from research and studies in library and information matters initiated by my Office. The results have been published in HMSO's library and information series.

The area museum council has made grants in Bournemouth totalling £19,400. The Arts Council has continued its support of the Bournemouth symphony orchestra, now located in Poole. In 1986-87, the proportion of the orchestra's grant which related to concerts given in Bournemouth was £180,000.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Parliament Street Restaurant

Mr. Sheerman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many full-time and part-time employees were working at the Treasury's Parliament street restaurant (a) before and (b) after November 1985.

Mr. Brooke: Immediately prior to November 1985, the following Civil Service Catering Organisation staff were employed in the Parliament street restaurant:

		Number
Manager	Full-time	1
Industrials	Full-time	nil
Industrials	Part-time	7

At 31 March 1987 the committee employed
2 full-time staff and
16 part-time staff.
In addition to the above there is also one catering manager employed by the Civil Service Catering Organisation.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will give the hourly rates of pay for the head cook, cook, assistant cook, cashier, catering assistant and kitchen porter, working at the Treasury's Parliament street restaurant;

(2) if he will give the annual holiday entitlement, sickness pay entitlement, pension and redundancy pay entitlements of catering workers at the Treasury's Parliament street restaurant (a) before and (b) after November 1985;

(3) if he will give the amount of the immediate savings after the Civil Service Catering Organisation was replaced at the Treasury's Parliament street restaurant.

Mr. Brooke: The committee will shortly be putting the contract for the Treasury staff restaurant to tender. It would be wrong of me in these circumstances to divulge commercial in-confidence information about the committee's operations and business.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many full-time equivalent new jobs were created since control of the Treasury's Parliament street restaurant was removed from the Civil Service Catering Organisation.

Mr. Brooke: Since the committee has assumed responsibility for the Treasury staff restaurant, two full jobs have been created. In addition, 10 of the 16 part-time staff are employed for 30 hours a week or more.

Bournemouth

Mr. Butterfill asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those measures taken by his Department since 1979 which have benefited specifically individuals, commerce, and industry in the borough of Bournemouth.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government's financial and economic policies have benefited individuals, commerce and industry in all parts of the United Kingdom. I refer the hon. Member to the written answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 19 February 1987 at columns 801-7.

Blind People (Taxation)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the reply of 30 March, Official Report, column 398, to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (a) how many blind people claim the blind persons' tax allowance, (b) how many of these pay income-tax and (c) how many of these do not pay income tax.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Customs and Excise (Strip Searching)

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which Mrs. Jean Warrington was strip searched by customs officers at Gatwick airport during the first week of April; what is the policy of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise towards the use of strip searches; what guidelines are given to customs officers on the procedures for stripsearches, with particular reference to the treatment of pregnant women, and as to the sex of the officers who carried out the search; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Consignments (Customs Clearance)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will instruct Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to review its treatment of express parcels;

(2) if he will make it his policy to support the principle of rapid customs clearance for urgent consignments in meetings of the Customs Co-operation Council;

(3) if he will amend the Customs requirements for express parcels services to reflect the transit times demanded by the international business community;

(4) what representations he has received regarding the Customs treatment of express parcel services; and if he will make a statement;

(5) whether he has received a copy of the recent survey conducted by Peat Marwick into the Customs collection of duty and value added tax on items shipped by express mail; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Capital gains

Mr. Hoyle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect he estimates the raising of capital gains will have on (a) life insurance polices and (b) mortgages linked to house policies; and what amount he estimates will be lost in basic payments.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Correspondence

Mr. Mudd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects that the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), will be in a position to reply to a letter sent to him on 27 January by the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne on behalf of Mrs. M. Sampson, of 5, Tregullow road, Falmouth, Cornwall.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend replied on 5 May.

Police Manpower

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of current applications for increased police manpower relate specifically to road traffic policing duties; and if he will make it his policy to take into account the Department of Transport's assessment of a national 5 per cent. increase in traffic during 1986 in considering such applications.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: About 2 per cent. of the additional police posts in current applications from provincial police authorities, which cover four financial years 1987-88 to 1990-91, relate specifically to road traffic policing duties. The 937 additional police posts which we have so far approved for provincial forces in England and Wales since April 1986 have been to meet a range of specific needs, including more foot patrols, drugs work, CID officers, motorway policing and airport policing. In considering applications for further increases in police establishments we take into account any requirements which the force may have for particular purposes, including additional traffic policing.

Bournemouth

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those measures taken by his Department since 1979 which have specifically benefited the borough of Bournemouth.

Mr. Hurd: Since 1979, the Home Office has taken a number of measures which will have been of specific benefit to the borough of Bournemouth and its inhabitants, or of more general benefit to the citizens of Dorset as a whole.

Approval was given by the Home Office for Dorset probation service to incur capital expenditure up to £46,000 in the 1982-83 financial year to provide day centre facilities at Hyde road, Bournemouth. The centre, called the Don Low Centre, has been open since 4 July 1983 and is aimed primarily at adult long-term unemployed clients of the probation service with four or five previous convictions and, probably a previous custodial sentence. In addition, approval was given last November to the building of probation offices in 1989-90, in Madeira road, at a cost of about £300,000. Both projects attract specific Home Office grant at the rate of 80 per cent. Meta House, a drug rehabilitation project for young women, which is based in Bournemouth also receives financial support through the Home Office after-care grant scheme towards the cost of places reserved for offenders. In 1985-86, the grant amounted to £11,214.

The Home Office has also authorised the payment of specific grant at the rate of 75 per cent. on £75,000 incurred by Bournemouth district council in providing a civil defence emergency centre.

As for Dorset more generally, total police manpower has increased by 212 (62 police officers and 150 civilians) since May 1979. In the same period, the authorised establishment of police officer posts has now risen to 1,235.

Petty Officer John Black

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the latest position regarding the police investigation into the death in Spain in 1983 of Petty Officer John Black, Royal Navy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that, following a request by the Ministry of Defence, and Foreign and Commonwealth Office for the Metropolitan police to investigate Petty Officer Black's death, an interim report has been submitted to the Commissioner and copies sent to both Departments. The report is under consideration and it is unlikely that investigations will be complete for some weeks.

Heathrow Airport (Police)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost of policing Heathrow airport in each of the past five years.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the amounts paid to the Metropolitan police by the British Airports Authority in respect of Heathrow under the Policing of Airports Act, 1974 in each of the past five years are as follows:

1982-83	9,327,815
1983-84	9,909,698
1984-85	10,811,069
1985-86	11,252,963
[1]1986-87	11,117,795

[1] To 28 February 1987.

Police Raids (Press Presence)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to why local newspaper reporters and photographers have been taken by the Metropolitan police on raids; on how many raids during the past 12 months local reporters and photographers have been present; and which newspapers were involved;

(2) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to arrangements made by the Metropolitan police to ensure the safety of local newspaper reporters and photographers taken on raids; and what documents such journalists are required to sign.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I will reply as soon as possible.

City of Westminster (Private Bill)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice he has offered to Lady Porter in respect of the terms of the City of Westminster Bill.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend has suggested to the city council that it should consider amending clauses 4, 5 and 9 so as (a) to reduce any burdens the Bill might place on the police, and (b) to secure that in the usual way the revenue from fixed penalties is paid into the Consolidated Fund.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what amounts are still outstanding for grants from his Department to the London Residuary Body.

Mr. Hurd: Pending receipt of audited grant claims, we estimate that £1·1 million now remains due to the London Residuary Body.

Amusement Arcades

Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has decided to initiate research into the use young people make of amusement arcades and the possible addictive effect of the machines found there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: As part of our review of the law on amusement arcades, I have decided to initiate a research project which will examine the extent of the use which young people make of amusement machines in arcades and other places, whether there are signs that they become addicted to playing the machines found there and whether there is evidence of machines leading to anti-social behaviour or criminal behaviour. It is hoped that the research will be completed by early next year.

In addition, I have asked the chairman of the Gaming Board if he will arrange for a report to be prepared on amusement arcades in the light of the concern which has been expressed. To this end, Gaming Board inspectors will be making a number of visits to arcades over the next six months.

These steps are being taken in order to assess whether there is hard evidence of social problem which might justify new controls on amusement arcades. I look forward to considering the results and have no plans at present for fresh legislation on this subject.

Immigration

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were detained overnight during 1986 in (a) Harmondsworth detention centre, (b) Queen's building, Heathrow and (c) Beehive, Gatwick.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 10 April 1987, c. 421]: The information requested is as follows:

(a) 3,842
(b) 1,891
(c) 2,217

Some passengers were detained in more than one centre.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of passengers detained overnight under Immigration Act powers during 1986, by nationality.

Mr. Waddington [pursuant to his reply, 10 April 1987, c. 421]: The available information relates to passengers held in Immigration detention units and police cells. No central record is maintained of the nationality of passengers detained in Prison Department accommodation and this information could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. As some passengers were detained in more than one location, there is an element of double counting.

WALES

Disabled Persons Act 1986

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) why no additional funds have been made available to local authorities in Wales to enable them to carry out the provisions of the Disabled Persons Act 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has received from the Wales Council for the Disabled concerning implementation of the Disabled Persons Act 1986; and what responses he has sent.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The implementation of the Act was fully discussed with representatives of the Wales

Council for the Disabled when I called at its offices in Caerphilly on 26 March, and I have subsequently replied to a letter sent to me by the council. The resource implications for local authorities will be considered in the context of the Welsh Consultative Council on Local Government Finance.

Mental Handicap

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will indicate what categories of staff trainees in assisting mentally handicapped people have been found to be in shortage in Wales leading to delays in the implementation of the all-Wales strategy for mentally handicapped people; and what steps he is taking to try and overcome such shortages.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I am not aware that the strategy has been delayed by shortages of trainees, but we are planning to hold formal review meetings with all 10 joint planning teams in Wales during the year and shall consider carefully whatever representations are then made.

Public Health Laboratory Service

Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Secretary of State for Wales if, in view of recent developments, in particular the increasing threat from the spread of AIDS, he will take steps to ensure the existence and continued effectiveness of the peripheral laboratories in Wales to the Public Health Laboratory Service.

Mr. Mark Robinson: My right hon. Friend is well aware of the vital contribution which the public health laboratory service makes to meeting threats to public health, such as AIDS. The PHLS has made clear its intention to ensure that an efficient and accessible service is available and the Welsh Office will continue to work with the PHLS to ensure this for Wales.

Children (Cardiac Surgery)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of children from Wales under 12 months old, one to three years old, and over three years old, who received cardiac surgery in hospitals in Wales and England in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what is the percentage in each category who were treated in Welsh hospitals.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Comprehensive information about patients receiving cardiac surgery outside Wales is not readily available. The following table contains an analysis of the numbers of children who were discharged from hospital in Wales in 1986 having been in the care of a cardiac surgeon.

	Age (years)
	Under 1	1 to 3	4 to 15
Number of discharges/deaths	2	5	9

Community Charge

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish in the Official Report updated tables showing the import of the community charge and non-domestic rate proposals for each local authority in Wales on a basis comparable with the information supplied by the Secretary of State for the Environment referred to in answers to the hon. Members for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) and for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) in relation to local authorities in England, 1 April, Official Report, column 547.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is given in the following table.

Renal Dialysis

Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he proposes to improve facilities for renal dialysis in south Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I am pleased to announce that, following the establishment of subsidiary renal dialysis units at Carmarthen and Bangor to improve access to renal dialysis for patients in those areas, two further units are to be established. Following consultation with Gwent, Mid Glamorgan and South Glamorgan health authorities and an appraisal of the options presented by them, I have decided that subsidiary renal dialysis units should be provided at the University hospital of Wales, Cardiff and at Prince Charles hospital, Merthyr Tydfil. When operational they will improve the service to patients in south-east Wales, provided at present by the main renal unit at Cardiff royal infirmary. The costs of the units will be funded by the Welsh Office and each will have five dialysis stations.

I intend that the units will be established as soon as possible. Invitations to tender for the construction and running of them will be extended to South and Mid Glamorgan district health authorities, experienced voluntary organisations and private sector companies.

This development, together with the "Lifeline Wales" project which was launched last year with the support of the Welsh Office to increase the awareness of the value of organ donations and to encourage kidney transplantation where appropriate, will significantly enhance the treatment facilities for patients suffering end-stage renal failure.

SCOTLAND

Community Charge

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the enactment of the Abolition of Domestic Rates, Etc. (Scotland) Bill will permit the names and addresses of those who pay the community charge to be sold in machine-readable form or made available to other government departments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: Clause 20 of the Abolition of Domestic Rates, Etc. (Scotland) Bill provides that copies of those parts of the community charges register which are to be available for public inspection may be sold by the regional or islands council in either documentary or machine-readable form.

Countryside Commission for Scotland

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the members of the Countryside Commission for Scotland, including their chairman, with their biographical details and their dates for reappointment.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is given in the following table.

Membership of the Countryside Commission for Scotland

Name	Occupation	Present appointment terminates
J. R. Carr (Chairman)	Managing Director, Moray Estates Development Company	1 January 1990
J. Arnott (Vice Chairman)	BBC Radio Producer	28 February 1990
Mrs. F. Ballantyne	Textile Industry	29 February 1988
D. J. Bennet	Strathclyde University, Lecturer and author	28 February 1990
Quinton Brown	Retired Managing Director, Scottish Agriculture Industries	28 February 1990
Prof. Ian M. M. Cunningham	Principal, West of Scotland Agriculture College	28 February 1990
Prof. C. H. Gimingham	Department of Botany, Aberdeen University	29 February 1988
Provost D. S. Grainger	Chairman, Clydebank District Council	28 February 1990
D. Ross	Principal, Benmore Outdoor Centre	29 February 1988

Cigarettes

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish statistics showing recent trends in the use of cigarettes and other tobacco products; and if he will make a statement on the implementation of the Protection of Children (Tobacco) Act 1986 in Scotland.

Mr. John Mackay: The currently available statistics are as follows:

(1) Prevalence of smoking among adults aged 16 and over in Scotland (a)

Year	Men Per cent.	Women Per cent.
1978	48	42
1982	45	39
1984	43	35

(2) Prevalence of smoking among secondary schoolchildren in Scotland (Smoking more than one cigarette a week) (b)

Year	Boys Per cent.	Girls Per cent.	All Per cent.
1982	15	14	15
1984	16	17	16

Details of the Protection of Children (Tobacco) Act 1986 were circulated to general managers of health boards by circular NHS 1986(GEN)21 of 2 October 1986. The circular was also sent to chief constables, directors of education, directors of social work, health education officers, procurators fiscal, regional reporters to children's panels and regional chairmen of children's panels. Statistics on the number of offences under section 18 of the Children and Young Persons (Scotland) Act 1937 are not separately identifiable in the Scottish Home and Health Department statistics.

South of Scotland Electricity Board

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to retain the South of Scotland Electricity Board in public ownership.

Mr. Lang: There are no present plans to take the South Electricity Board out of public ownership.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will list the number of patients on hospital waiting lists in each of the health board regions in Scotland indicating whether they were in-patients or out-patients, in each of the years 1983 to 1986.

Mr. John MacKay: Statistics on out-patient waiting lists are not held centrally. The numbers on hospital in-patient waiting lists at 30 September in the years in question were as follows:

	1983	1984	1985	1986[1]
Scotland	88,338	83,077	77,677	80,862

Scottish Museums Council

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to bring the funding of the Scottish Museums Council to a level of parity with the English area museum councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and learned Friend will consider the funding of the Scottish Museums Council as part of his response to the report on museums in Scotland by the working party of the Museums and Galleries Commission chaired by Professor Hamish Miles (the Miles report).

Cadmium and Mercury

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what research has been undertaken in Scotland into levels of cadmium and mercury in the flesh of grouse or other game and in the flesh of trout and pike; and what were the results of that analysis.

Mr. John MacKay: There is currently no programme being undertaken on heavy metals by my Department either for fish or for grouse or other game. A survey of heavy metals in fish flesh, including cadmium and mercury, was however conducted by my Department's freshwater fisheries laboratory in 1977. The values for cadmium in trout and pike were less than 0·04 micrograms per kilogram. The value of mercury in trout ranged from 0·15 to 0·06 micrograms per kilogram and in pike from 0·9 to 0·2 micrograms per kilogram. There is no reason to believe that these levels have increased significantly.

Peterhead Prison (Prisoners' Grievances)

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has received the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons for Scotland into prisoner grievances at Her Majesty's prison, Peterhead; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I have received the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons for Scotland on the inquiry I requested into grievances of prisoners about conditions and treatment at Peterhead prison. I am placing copies of the report in the Library together with my initial response to its 11 recommendations. Copies of the report and my initial response have been sent to my hon. Friend the member for Banff and Buchan, to the Chairman of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs and the Chairman of the Scottish all-party penal affairs group and to other interested bodies. Copies of the report can be purchased from my Department.

I will give further close consideration to the findings of this report and the "points of note" which Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons has drawn to my attention. A further response to those issues or suggestions will be made in due course.

Scottish Development Agency (Consultants)

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list in the Official Report the total value of work of all kinds put out to consultants by the Scottish Development Agency for each of the last five years, the name of each company and the value of each contract awarded; whether the contract was awarded on the basis of tenders in each case; and if he will give the reasons in those cases where tenders were not invited.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 10 April 1987, c. 467]: The amounts spent by the Scottish Development Agency on consultants' fees for the last five years are given in the following table. A detailed breakdown comprising the names of companies which have successfully tendered for contracts and the value of those contracts cannot be provided without incurring disproportionate expense and breaching commercial confidentiality. It is Scottish Development Agency practice to require all contracts to the value greater than £2,000 to go to competitive tender with not less than three quotations required. This requirement is breached only in exceptional circumstances, eg where the source of expertise can only be obtained from one party; in such cases a single tender procedure is followed.

	Capital	Revenue	Total
1981-82	7,493,870	3,115,748	10,609,618
1982-83	9,308,430	4,265,593	13,574,473
1983-84	8,329,566	5,086,337	13,415,903
1984-85	10,167,582	4,953,324	15,120,906
1985-86	10,816,582	8,568,179	19,384,767
1986-87	12,568,022	6,851,863	19,419,885

Note A: The capital column includes fees to civil engineers, architects, surveyors, heating and electrical consultants.

Note B: The revenue column includes fees on research and development, advisory services, appraisal and administration, ie tax and accountancy advice, pension and legal consultancies.

Fisheries Protection

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for East Lothian on 27 March, Official Report, column 300, regarding the Fokker F27-200 to be used for fishery surveillance patrols, he will list the owners of the aircraft since 1959 and the type of and location of services for which it was used during that period; what is the estimated remaining life of the aircraft in terms of flying hours in Scottish fishery patrol conditions; what is the anticipated average number of hours per cycle in this service; and to what extent the manufacturer of the aircraft is directly involved in its current overhaul.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, Tuesday 5 May 1987]: The F27 was in service as follows:

21 October 1959-31 October 1973—Trans Australian Airlines.

1 November 1973-14 July 1984—Air Niugini (Air New Guinea) during this period the aircraft was operated and maintained by Trans Australian Airlines.

15 July 1984-to date—Air UK.

Throughout the above periods the aircraft was operated in a public transport passenger carrying role.

The aircraft has about 21,500 cycles remaining in accord with the Fokker maritime structural integrity programme and it is anticipated that the average duration of each cycle on fishery surveillance will be eight hours with up to 400 cycles annually undertaken on fishery patrols, depending on seasonal and other factors.

The manufacturers of the F27 are directly involved in the modifications relating to the enhanced endurance of the aircraft and in providing flight manual amendments. The manufacturers' director of flight testing will be involved in the certification and test flying on completion of the overhaul and modification.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the registration index of the Fokker F27 that he is acquiring for fishery surveillance; what will be the cost of changing the registration index; and what the next index will be.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987]: The registration index of the Fokker F27 when the tender acquisition was accepted was G-BLML and will be G-SOFS when acquired by the Secretary of State for Scotland. The cost of the change in registration is £190 and is already contained within the total acquisition price.

Milk Quota

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the transfer of milk quota from Scotland to other parts of the United Kingdom; and what effect this will have on the dairy production and processing industries in Scotland.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987]: At 1 April this year 4·425 million litres of wholesale quota, being the required Scottish share (proportionate to production) of the total for Great Britain, was transferred to Northern Ireland. The transfer of quota was effected at the insistence of the European commission to align the treatment of Northern Ireland producers with special needs more closely with that of their counterparts elsewhere in the United Kingdom. The effect is a provisional reduction in wholesale quotas in Scotland of 0·35 per cent., an amount which may be subsequently adjusted depending on the success of an outgoers' scheme which will be opened shortly to try to obtain the quota voluntarily. Compensation at the rate of 27·5p per litre over seven years will be paid. A reduction of about one third of 1 per cent. of wholesale quota will not have any significant effects on the dairy sector in Scotland.

ENVIRONMENT

Planning Appeals

14. Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to ensure that when a planning appeal has been lost by developers and won by local authorities, no further applications, either original or amended, can be submitted on all or any part of that land within 10 years of the date of the appeal inspector's report containing the dismissal of the appeal.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. Such a limitation would unjustifiably restrict development which might reasonably be permitted.

Community Charge

15. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the likely level of the community charge, without safety nets, in Manchester.

Dr. Boyson: Illustrated figures were placed in the Library on 1 April showing the community charge figure in each area if the system had been fully in operation in 1986-87, and on the basis of expenditure and grant figures applicable to that year. On these assumptions, the community charge in Manchester would have been £250.

21. Mr. Blair asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received as to the minimum level of community charge to be paid by those on low incomes.

Dr. Boyson: I refer to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) earlier. My right hon. Friend has received, and continues to receive, a substantial number of representations on this issue.

24. Mr. Randall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the likely level of the community charge, without safety nets, in the city of Kingston upon Hull.

Dr. Boyson: Illustrative figures were placed in the Library on 1 April showing the community charge in each area if the system had been fully in operation in 1986-87, and on the basis of expenditure and grant figures applicable to that year. On these assumptions, the community charge in Kingston upon Hull would have been £205.

40. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further representations he has received as to the minimum level of community charge to be paid by persons on low income.

49. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received as to the minimum level of community charge to be paid by those on low incomes.

Dr. Boyson: I refer to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) earlier today. My right hon. Friend has received, and continues to receive, a substantial number of representations on this issue.

41. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what further representations he has received as to the introduction of a community charge in England.

Dr. Boyson: There are no proposals for the introduction of a poll tax, but my right hon. Friend continues to receive representations from members of the public, local authorities and other organisations about the introduction of the community charge.

47. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the likely level of the community charge, without safety nets, in Cleveland.

Dr. Boyson: Illustrative figures were placed in the Library on 1 April showing the community charge figure in each area if the system had been fully in operation in 1986-87, and on the basis of expenditure and grant figures applicable to that year. On these assumptions, community charges in Cleveland would have been in the range £220 to £242 without safety nets.

52. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the likely level of the community charge in major cities in Yorkshire.

Dr. Boyson: Since we published illustrative community charge figures on 1 April we have received a number of representations about the likely level of the community charge in Yorkshire.

North-east New Towns

16. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the future of the three north-east new towns.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend hopes to do so shortly.

Rural Areas (Development and Conservation)

17. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received from the National Trust concerning local development and conservation in rural areas.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have recently received comments from the National Trust on the draft circular "Development Involving Agricultural Land" and on our proposals for the future of development plans. These are, of course, being given very careful consideration.

Architectural Heritage

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what initiatives he has taken, and proposes to take, to ensure the conservation of Britain's architectural heritage.

Mr. Waldegrave: Since 1979, the Department's support for the built heritage has increased by over 30 per cent. in real terms. The stock of listed buildings has grown exponentially. We shall soon be adding to the lists outstanding buildings of the post-1939 period.

Rate Support Grant (Basildon)

19. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on rate support grant limitation for Basildon.

Dr. Boyson: Basildon district council is a very high spender and has been subject to selective rate limitation in each of the last three years. The expenditure level set for the council under the 1984 Rates Act has been the same in cash terms in each of those years and this has provided real benefits to Basildon ratepayers. The local rate has risen by only 5 per cent. over the last two years combined, well below the rate of inflation and less than half of the rise for other shire districts over the same period.

Planning Circulars

20. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the content of planning circulars.

Mr. Waldegrave: We receive many and various comments about the content of planning circulars, for which I am grateful. In particular we have received much helpful comment on the draft circular on development involving agricultural land.

Water Quality

22. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many water catchment areas in Britain are presently exempt from the terms of the European Commission water quality directive.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have granted derogations under article 9 of the drinking water directive in respect of 195 public water supply zones in England. We have also applied to the European Community Commission for an extended period for compliance under article 20 in respect of 87 water supply zones.

39. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will next be meeting his European counterparts to discuss the problems of water pollution and nitrate contamination.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall attend the next Environment Council on 21 May, at which we expect at least one proposal relating to the discharge of dangerous substances to water—concerning the discharge of aldrin, dieldrin and endrin—to be on the agenda.

46. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next intends meeting representatives of the Nature Conservancy Council to discuss water pollution problems; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has no plans at present to meet representatives of the Nature Conservancy Council to discuss water pollution problems. If the hon. Member has a particular problem in mind and will let me have the details, I will look into it.

51. Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his current policy towards water quality problems posed by agricultural pollution.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Department's general policy on the control of river pollution, including agricultural pollution, is to restore and maintain the wholesomeness of our rivers. Part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974 provides water authorities with a comprehensive system of controls, including the power to prosecute in appropriate cases. While the existing framework of controls is generally considered to be adequate, the Department is considering whether there is a need to introduce regulations which extend and strengthen the existing powers of water authorities in order to reinforce the voluntary efforts currently being made to combat agricultural pollution.

Housing Authority Capital Receipts

23. Mr. Torney asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the likely capital receipts of housing authorities over the next two years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: Our estimate of local authorities' housing receipts in 1987-88, as set out in the public expenditure White Paper, is £1·58 billion. Receipts are expected to continue at broadly this level in 1988-89.

Islington (Finance)

25. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the cost of central Government finance given to the London borough of Islington from all sources in 1979-80, 1983-84 and proposed for 1987-88 at constant 1979-80 prices, and as a proportion of the council's total spending.

Dr. Boyson: The information readily available covers rate support grant, housing subsidies, housing benefit, specific revenue grants and capital grants. Because of changes to the grant system, however, the figures are not on a comparable basis each year.

The figures are, at 1979-80 prices

	£ million
1979-80	81
1983-84	72
1986-87	81

(no information is available for 1987-88).

The proportions these amounts represent of Islington's total gross spending are 47 per cent. in 1979-80 and 44 per cent. in 1983-84. (No figures of gross spending are yet available for 1986-87).

Homelessness

26. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish his estimate of the total cost to local authorities of providing temporary shelter to homeless families in 1987-88, in so far as it constitutes a component in the total grant-related expenditure assessments for local authorities for that year.

30. Miss Maynard asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the number of people accepted as being homeless and those placed in bed and breakfast accommodation is rising or falling.

Mr. John Patten: Regrettably, both homeless acceptances and the use of bed and breakfast are increasing. Expenditure on temporary accommodation is not separately identifiable within GRE assessments since they relate to authorities' needs to spend, not to estimates of expected expenditure.

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the number of those for whom local authorities in England, Wales and Scotland respectively, accepted responsibility for securing accommodation who were outside Great Britain a year earlier; what was their place or country of origin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The information available to the Department is that, in 1986, some 4,000 households accepted as homeless by local authorities in England were outside Great Britain a year earlier. For the position in Wales and Scotland, I refer my hon. Friend to the respective Secretaries of State.

Ground-Water Protection Zones

27. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in favour of ground-water protection zones.

Mr. Waldegrave: Designation of protection zones to safeguard vulnerable water resources was contained in the Government's consultation paper, "The Water Environment: The Next Steps", published last year. A total of 185 responses were received to the consultation paper. Certain further representations have meanwhile been received on the use of protection zones in limiting nitrate levels in drinking water, following publication in December of the report of the nitrate co-ordination group.

Power Generation and Resource Recovery Unit, Liverpool

28. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to hold a public inquiry into the proposal to construct a power generation and resource recovery unit on a site in Stonebridge lane in Liverpool; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I see no reason to justify holding a public inquiry into these proposals. The plant will be subject to strict operational control by the local authority as a waste disposal site and, as regards atmospheric emissions, by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution as an electricity works.

Ozone Layer

29. Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he is having with his colleagues in the European Council of Ministers concerning the protection of the ozone layer.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Environment Council on 19 March, at which I represented the United Kingdom, discussed the Community's stance for current negotiations of international measures to control chlorofluorocarbons in the context of the Vienna convention for the protection of the ozone layer. I anticipate further discussion at the Council on 21 May.

Green Belt (Epping Forest)

31. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from people in the Epping Forest district of Essex about proposed encroachments upon the green belt; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has received representations asking him to call in for his own decision a proposed indoor tennis and leisure centre at the former RAF barrage balloon site, Buckhurst Hill. Representations have also been received opposing a proposed development of 3,500 houses known as Brenthall park, to the south east of Harlow, and in respect of proposed residential development at Roydon.

While I am unable to comment upon individual cases which are before my right hon. Friend or which may come before him, I would take this opportunity to reaffirm the Government's strong commitment to the maintenance of approved green belts.

Sports Council

32. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the Sports Council to discuss sport in schools.

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend, the Minister with responsibity for sport, meets the chairman and members of the council frequently and discussed aspects of school sport with them on 18 March during a visit to Lilleshall and on 26 March at the council's recreation management seminar at Harrogate.

House Building

33. Mr. Stott asked the Secretary of State for the Environment in which of the last 30 years the numbers of homes completed by local authorities in Great Britain was lower than the number completed in 1986.

Mr. John Patten: None. But private sector completions were the highest since 1973, and the total housing stock has grown by 1·4 million since this Government came to office in 1979. Over the same period the number of households is estimated to have increased by only about 1·25 million; so the overall balance of supply and demand has improved significantly.

Housing Investment Programme

34. Mr. John Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of housing authorities have been given housing investment programme approvals for 1987-88 which are lower than that for which the authority sought approval.

Mr. John Patten: In their housing investment programme submissions local authorities are asked to state the total size of their proposed capital programme. The figures they give cannot therefore be compared with the amounts they received in housing investment programme allocations, because we expect more than half of local authority capital expenditure on housing in 1987-88 to be funded from capital receipts rather than from allocations.

Slum Clearance

35. Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the latest figures he has on progress with slum clearance.

Mr. John Patten: The latest available information is from English local authorities' returns for the financial year 1985-86. Summary figures were published in table 2·25 of "Housing and Construction Statistics" No. 28, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Rented Housing Market

36. Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied with the level of mobility in the rented housing market; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: The level of mobility in the private rented sector has been adversely affected by the decline in the supply of privately rented accommodation. The Government believe that the sector has an important role to play in meeting housing need. We hope to introduce measures in the next Parliament to stimulate the supply of private rented homes and thus to increase mobility particularly for job-related reasons.

London Grants Committee

37. Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met representatives of the London grants committee to discuss its budget for 1987-88.

Mr. Ridley: I met representatives of the committee on 24 March. As a result of representations at the meeting, and others received in response to consultation, I have decided not to proceed to make an order under section 48 of the Local Government Act 1985 to set a ceiling of £28·5 million on the budget of the committee for 1987-88.

The Grants Committee has now fixed a budget of the same amount. I wished to demonstrate support for the voluntary sector in London by proposing to exercise my powers. Having considered all representations received, I have decided it is no longer necessary to proceed further. I am pleased that my action has received its desired effect of establishing an agreed budget and removing uncertainty over the funding of the voluntary groups.

New Houses

38. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the latest figure available for the number of new houses which stand unsold and unoccupied.

Mr. John Patten: This information is not available.

Landlord and Tenant (No. 2) Bill

42. Mr. Nicholls asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about the Landlord and Tenant (No. 2) Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I have received representations from Members of Parliament, interested organisations and individuals. Their views are being fully taken into account during the passage of the Bill.

Water Authority Financing

43. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received regarding water authority financing.

Mr. Ridley: Within the last month a number of letters about representations made by the Lancashire water services council have been received. The hon. Member has been sent a copy of the reply sent to the council.

Derelict Land Reclamation

44. Mr. Dorrell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice his Department gives to members of the public and local residents who wish to bring derelict plots of land back into use.

Mr. John Patten: My right hon. Friend maintains registers of publicly owned unused and underused land, some of which may be derelict. Members of the public may inspect a copy of the register for their area, free of charge, during normal office hours, at the principal office of their district council or London borough council. The registers for the districts in each region are also available for inspection at the appropriate regional office of the Department and a complete set of all the registers is open for inspection at the Department's offices at 2 Marsham street, London SW1.

In addition, my right hon. Friend has invited people to bring to his attention areas of publicly owned land, of whatever size, which they believe should be entered on the register, and, where land is already registered, to request him to use his powers to direct the owners to dispose of it.

Where land is in need of reclamation before it can be brought back into use, application can be made to the Department for derelict land grant. Guidance notes setting out the principles and availability of derelict land grant are provided on request. Potential applicants are advised to consult the appropriate regional office of the Department at an early stage in drawing up their proposals for reclamation.

Council House Building

45. Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new council houses are expected to be completed in 1987.

50. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new council homes are expected to be completed in 1987.

Mr. Ridley: It is not the practice for the Department to make forecasts of house building completions.

Private Rented Dwellings

48. Mr. Stevens asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of dwellings in England is privately rented; and how this compares with other countries in the European Economic Community.

Mr. John Patten: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Royal Dockyards

53. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement concerning progress of the schemes he announced on 31 March concerning developments in the royal dockyards.

Mr. John Patten: The announcement of 31 March concerned the Secretary of State's approval to the London Docklands Development Corporation's overall strategy for the royal docks. The individual schemes to regenerate the area are matters for more detailed consideration by the corporation. Several such schemes are currently being discussed with the developers concerned.

Urban Programme (Wirral)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list how much urban programme money has been granted to Wirral in the last three financial years, and the extent to which Wirral has spent this allocation.

Mr. John Patten: The information is as follows:

Financial year	Allocation £ million	Outturn spend £ million
1984-85	7·81	7·06
1985-86	6·16	5·21
1986-87	6·65	[1]6·65

[1] Estimated.

These figures include Wirral's inner area programme allocation (£3·67 million each year) and additional grants made available from the urban programme for specific special housing initiatives.

Council House Sales

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council-owned houses in the borough of Brighton have been sold since the implementation of the Housing Act 1980.

Mr. Tracey: Reported sales of dwellings by Brighton borough council appear in the following issues of "Local Housing Statistics" which are available in the Library.

Financial years	Issue number
1980-81	62
1981-82	63
1982-83	67
1983-84	75
1984-85	79

Brighton borough council has reported selling 194 dwellings during 1985-86, all of which were under the right-to-buy scheme implemented in the 1980 Housing Act, and 192 in the first nine months of 1986-87, of which 170 were right-to-buy sales.

Bournemouth

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those measures taken by his Department since 1979 which have specifically benefited the borough of Bournemouth.

Mr. Ridley: A full answer could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the following capital allocations and grant or subsidy payments have been made in respect of Bournemouth borough since 1979:

	£ '000
Capital allocations to the borough council (since 1981-82 when the present system came into effect)	45,900
Capital allocations to housing associations	2,700
Rate support grant (including domestic rate relief)	63,156
Housing subsidy payments to the borough council	19,000
Housing association grant payments	5,200
Listed building grants	75
Urban programme grants	5

Planning Applications

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he has any plans to introduce legislation to provide a right of appeal for objectors to planning applications; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he has any plans to introduce legislation to provide objectors with the right to seek a review of planning applications after they have been approved by local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: My right hon. Friend has no such plans. Development control procedures already provide adequate opportunity for considering objections to development proposals.

Noxious Emissions

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the target for reducing emissions from power stations of sulphur dioxide by 1993 and 1998, respectively; on what year's level those targets are based; what is the Government's policy on reduction of nitrogen oxide emissions from power stations; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will outline the technological measures applied between 1970 and 1980 and between 1981 and 1987 at fossil fuel power stations operated by the Central Electricty Generating Board aimed specifically at reducing emissions of nitrogen oxides;

(3) if he will outline the technological measures applied between 1970 and 1980 and between 1981 and 1987 at fossil fuel power stations operated by the Central Electricty Generating Board aimed specifically at reducing emissions of sulphur dioxide.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Inner Area Programme

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what decisions he has made regarding submissions made under the 1987-88 inner area programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: A total of 54 urban programme authorites have submitted inner area programmes to date, of which 20 have been approved.

Conservative Party Conference, 1985 (Policing)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent repesentations he has received on the rate support grant settlement for 1985-86 in relation to the policing costs for the 1985 Conservative party conference at Blackpool; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received representatives from Lancashire county council and from a number of hon. Members that he should disregard expenditure on policing the 1985 Conservative party conference in Blackpool. He considered these before he made the third rate support grant supplementary report for 1985-86 on 19 March 1987: he decided not to do so. He will reconsider the representations before making the next supplementary report for 1985-86.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what directions he has given to the London residuary body since its establishment.

Mr. Chope: A formal direction under the provisions of section 78(1) of the Local Government Act 1985 regarding the presentation of the statement of its accounts for 1985-86 was issued to the London residuary body on 26 July 1986.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will call for a report from the London residuary body about the delay in determining the detriment payments to the 388 eligible staff from the Greater London council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member on 23 March 1987 at column 62.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will issue a direction to the London residuary body requiring it to give Three Rivers district council first refusal on Oxley playing fields.

Mr. Chope: No. I understand that negotiations between the London residuary body and the Three Rivers district council are in progress.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the practice in respect of offering to the authority within which it is located land currently held by the London residuary body outside the Greater London area before offers are sought; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: This is a matter for the London residuary body.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings have taken place in the past 12 months between officials of his Department and representatives of the London residuary body.

Mr. Chope: No central record is kept of meetings between officials of this Department and officers of the London residuary body, but it is estimated that some five to 10 meetings take place each month.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings have taken place in the past 12 months between Ministers and members of the London residuary body.

Mr. Chope: Ministers of this Department have had 18 meetings of a formal nature with members of the London residuary body since 1 May 1986.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has of sums still outstanding to the London residuary body in respect of all Government grants to the Greater London council.

Mr. Chope: There are outstanding entitlements to various Government grants in respect of the GLC's activities prior to abolition.

In the process of closing the GLC's 1985-86 accounts LRB has estimated the amounts of Government grants receivable. These entitlements and arrangements for payment are the subject of discussions between LRB and the respective Government Departments.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a breakdown of the capital receipts cash entitlements made by the London residuary body to rating authorities by 31 March 1987.

Mr. Chope: I refer the hon. Gentleman to table C of the answer I gave my hon. Friend, the Member for Ealing, North, (Mr. Greenway) on 23 February 1987 at columns 92-94.

London Scientific Services

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made in determining the level of staffing in respect of the London Scientific Services.

Mr. Chope: The level of staffing of the London Scientific Services is related to the level of demand. The present complement is 117.

GLC Chairman (Official Car)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has of the present location of the Daimler motor vehicle registration GLC1 previously used by the chairman of the Greater London council.

Mr. Chope: The vehicle is at the British Motor Industry Heritage Trust collection in Coventry.

Middlesex and GLC (Badge of Office)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has of the location of the badge of office previously used by the chairman of the Middlesex county council and the chairman of the Greater London council.

Mr. Chope: They are in secure storage within the care of the London residuary body.

Thames Barrier

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what payments are still outstanding in respect of contracts relating to the Thames barrier; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: This information is not readily available. If the hon. Member has in mind any specific contractual issue he should contact either the London residuary body or the Thames water authority.

Government Vehicles (Parking Fines)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state (a) the total amount paid by his Department in 1986 in respect of parking fines incurred by ministerial vehicles and (b) provide a breakdown by Government Department in terms of offence, fine, date and location.

Mr. Chope: I shall answer this question shortly.

Residuary Bodies

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will give details of consents sought by residuary bodies for disposal of land or buildings for less than the best price offered;

(2) if he will give details of all applications for the acquisition of land made to his Department by residuary bodies since their establishment.

Mr. Chope: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of all applications to borrow money made to his Department by residuary bodies, and for what purposes.

Mr. Chope: The Department has received various inquiries from residuary bodies about the circumstances in which borrowing approval would be available. The following formal applications were made in 1986-87.

Body	Purpose	Amount approved
London	—
Greater Manchester	Inherited capital liabilites for Central Station	£3,000,000
	Other inherited capital liabilities	£1,500,000
Merseyside	Staff compensation	No limit specified (approval has not been exercised)
	Recreating County Council cash book balances	No limit specified (up to £7,000,000 believed to have been borrowed)
	Refinancing County Council car loans	£300,000
	Other capital liabilities	Not approved
South Yorkshire	Staff compensation	£2,475,812
Tyne and Wear	Various inhertied capital liabilities	£2,550,000
West Midlands	—
West Yorkshire	Staff compensation	No limit specified (approval has not been exercised)
	Various capital liabilities	Not approved

No formal applications have been made in 1987-88.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will identify the county halls currently awaiting disposal by residuary bodies following the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Chope: Residuary bodies are marketing their respective interests in the county halls for the former Greater London council, West Yorkshire county council, Greater Manchester county council, Merseyside county council, Tyne and Wear county council and West Midlands county council.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of additions and removals of residuary body members since their establishment after abolition of the Greater London council and metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Chope: Mr. Philip Carter was appointed to the Merseyside residuary body on 21 December 1986. There have been no other changes in the membership of the residuary bodies since the abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of all directions issued to residuary bodies in respect of the recovery of sums from local authorities received in contravention of section 91 of and schedule 15 to the Local Government Act 1985.

Mr. Chope: No such directions have been issued.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of all directions issued by his Department to residuary bodies in respect of land and buildings.

Mr. Chope: None has been issued.

Local Authority Functions

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of possible changes in local authority functions currently being considered by his Department.

Mr. Chope: The Department keeps under review all local authority functions for which it is responsible. But, unless and until an announcement is made to the contrary, the House may assume that my right hon. Friend has no new proposals for change.

Thamesmead

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) when he will publish the explanatory paper on the financial terms for the transfer of Thamesmead; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he now expects to make an announcement about the transfer of Thamesmead to Thamesmead Trust; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Shortly.

Hampstead Heath

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he now expects to make an announcement on the future of Hampstead Heath; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I expect a final decision to be made in sufficient time to effect a smooth transfer of responsibility for the heath in the spring of 1988.

GLC (Mortgages)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the number of ex-Greater London Council mortgagors who refinanced their mortgages following the letter written by the London residuary body on 7 November 1986.

Mr. Chope: None.

London Research Centre

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the future of the London research centre together with the Acompline and Urbaline databases.

Mr. Chope: I understand that the work of the London research centre is continuing under joint committees under section 88 of the Local Government Act 1985 and under section 101 of the Local Government Act 1972.

London Marathon

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give details of all the assistance being provided by his Department to the organisers of the 1987 London marathon; and what charges will be made for such services.

Mr. Tracey: The Government have given broad support and encouragement to the London marathon. This includes the use of a substantial part of Greenwich park and routes in St. James' park. No facility fee is charged for this use of the royal parks, although the Department requires the London marathon to reimburse the net costs of additional works and facilities provided specifically for the event.

London Skyline (Photogrametric Records)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment where the photogrametric records of London's skylines are now kept.

Mr. Chope: The records are with the London research centre.

GLC (Seaside and Country Homes)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he now expects to make an announcement about the future of the seaside and country homes previously owned by the Greater London council.

Mr. Chope: I hope that it will soon be possible to make an announcement.

Local Government Act 1985

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will give details of the use of his powers exercised under sections 49, 62, 64 and 77 of the Local Government Act 1985;

(2) if he will give details of the money made available to the Trust for London in the financial year 1986-87.

Mr. Chope: The following orders have been made wholly or in part under the powers in sections 49, 62 and 77 of the Local Government Act 1985:

section 49: The Local Government Reorganisation (Capital Money) (Greater London) Order 1987; SI No. 118 1987

section 62: The Local Government Reorganisation (Croxteth Hall and Park) Order 1986; SI No. 573 1986

section 77: The Local Government Reorganisation (Capital Money) (Metropolitan Counties) Order 1986; SI No. 2063 1986

The Local Government Reorganisation (Capital Money) (West Midlands) Order 1986; SI No. 2093 1986

The Local Government Reorganisation (Capital Money) (Greater London) Order 1987; SI No. 118 1987

The powers in section 64 of the Act have not been exercised.

Article 5 of part III to SI No. 118 1987 provides that the London residuary body shall pay a grant of £10 million to the Trust for London in 1986-87. I understand that the money was paid to the City Parochial Foundation which administers the trust, in early March.

Newcroft Park, Stretford

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what instructions he has given to Trafford borough council about land in Newcroft park, Stretford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: On 15 December 1986 my right hon. Friend gave Trafford borough council notice, under section 99 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, of his intention to direct it to sell a 0·85 hectare piece of land it owns off Newcroft drive, Urmston. The council has made representations and these are being carefully considered. A decision will be announced in the near future.

LCC and GLC (Portraits)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has in respect of the whereabouts of the portraits of the first chairman of the London county council and the last chairman of the Greater London council.

Mr. Chope: They are in secure storage within the care of the London residuary body.

Radiochemical Inspectorate

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total number of staff employed by the radiochemical inspectorate annually since 1979 to 1987; and if he will give the projection for the next two years.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Town and Country Planning (Review)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress has been made with the Government's review of the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order.

Mr. Ridley: We are grateful to all those who commented on the proposals in our consultation paper last June on the revision of the order. I have today published a new order, which will come into force on 1 June. The order which extends to England and Wales, takes full account of all the views expressed to us.

Modernising the order will reduce the need for planning applications, but retain effective control over changes of use where that is needed because of their environmental consequences or relationship with other uses.

The major change in the modernised order will allow more flexible use of business premises. A new business class will be created by merging the present light industrial use class with office uses other than those which provide professional and financial services to customers who visit the premises; this will help commercial and industrial activities which at present straddle the boundary between two classes. In addition we have already clarified planning law to ensure that the subdivision of non-domestic premises does not constitute a change of use and does not require planning permission. These changes will give greater freedom to industry to undertake development and create jobs without endangering amenity.

The order retains the existing shops class and adds to it certain similar uses which are at present excluded. The order also contains two new classes: one comprises uses as shops selling hot food, restaurants, snack bars, cafes, public houses and similar establishments; the other comprises financial and professional services offered direct to the public visiting the premises. The creation of separate classes distinguishing between offices serving the public and other offices should enable local planning authorities to grant permission more frequently for service uses in the knowledge that the order will not permit subsequent changes to uses that do not need to be in shopping areas. The hot food class should allow more flexible use of premises by the modern catering industry; it should not adversely influence consideration by local planning authorities of proposed changes of use from shops to fast foods restaurants, which can bring both vitality to the street scene and convenience to shoppers.

One change from the proposals published last June is the exclusion of theatres from the assembly and leisure class so as to ensure that all proposals for material change of use of live theatres would require planning permission.

The largest new class covers use as a dwellinghouse for various types of residential use. This class extends beyond use as a family dwellinghouse to small residential care homes and student accommodation where not more than six people live together as a single household. This will help to clarify the circumstances in which the planning system bears on our care in the community initiative. The order does not change the planning requirements when it is proposed to use part of a dwellinghouse for business purposes; planning permission is not usually needed if the overall character of its use as a residence would not be changed.

My Department and the Welsh Office have today published a circular giving advice about planning control and the change of use of property and explaining the operation of the new order.

Chernobyl Accident (Costs)

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the overall cost to Her Majesty's Government to date of the Chernobyl accident in the following categories in England (a) farmers' compensation schemes, (b) additional equipment purchased for monitoring purposes, (c) additional staff time spent on radiation monitoring and administration of the compensation schemes for farmers and (d) additional staff time spent on informing the public on the accident and its effects.

Mr. Waldegrave: The overall cost to date to Her Majesty's Government in the wake of the Chernobyl accident of farmers' compensation schemes in England is £242,000. The cost of additional monitoring equipment is £175,000.

It is not possible to provide an answer to parts (c) and (d) because time and costs are not recorded in a suitable form.

Nature Conservancy Council

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the members of the Nature Conservancy Council and its committees for England, Scotland and Wales including their chairmen, with their biographical details and their dates for reappointment.

Wildlife and Countryside Act

Mr. Cormack asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those areas where sections 53 and 54 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 have not been brought into force; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: These provisions are not in force in the counties of Cornwall, Cumbria, Staffordshire and the former east riding area of North Yorkshire, nor in the London boroughs of Bexley and Richmond upon Thames.

In these areas, the public are not yet able to apply to the surveying authority for an order, under section 53(5) of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, to modify the definitive map and statement but my Department is examining the feasibility of bringing section 53(5) into operation notwithstanding the continuing existence of a review under the previous provisions of the Countryside Act 1986.

Drinking Water

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by water supply district those parts of the United Kingdom in which drinking water supplied through the mains system or available through private supplies is below the pH range 6.5-8.5.

Mr. Waldgrave: I am not aware of any public water supplies in England where pH is below 6.5.

City of Westminster (Private Bill)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations have taken place between officials of his Department and Westminster city council in respect of the terms of the private Bill from that authority now before the House.

Mr. Chope: None directly, since the Bill concerns enforcement of the law, which is primarily a matter for the Home Office. The Department's officials have kept in close touch with Home Office officials and have joined in discussions with Home Office, Westminster city council and Metropolitan police officials about the provisions of the Bill.

Toad Tunnels

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to support the construction of further toad tunnels; and if he will make a statement about progress made so far.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am in favour of the construction of further toad tunnels where these can be justified; the first toad tunnel at Hambledon appears so far to have proved a success.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Select Committee Reports

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will give the number and length of reports issued by each Select Committee for each year since 1981.

[1] Up to and including 17th Report.

Notes:

1. In addition, the Joint Committee on Consolidation, &c., Bills published 17 reports in 1981, four reports in 1982, six reports in 1983, 11 reports in 1984, five reports in 1985 and five reports in 1986. It has published one report in 1987. All these reports were under one page in length.
2. The reply includes both reports and special reports.
3. "Number of pages" refers to the number of pages of text of the report plus any annexes.
4. Since November 1986 reports have been printed in A4 size pages. Earlier reports were printed in royal octavo.

ENERGY

Bournemouth

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list those measures taken by his Department since 1979 which have benefited specifically the borough of Bournemouth.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Government's approach to energy questions is necessarily a national one. However, consumers in Bournemouth have benefited from our determination to keep supplies flowing. The improved efficiency of the gas and electricity industries has meant that domestic prices have fallen in real terms since the last election, electricity by 12 per cent. on average and gas by 8 per cent.

Our energy efficiency campaign has been taken directly to Bournemouth, including a briefing when my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Energy discussed with senior managers of locally based industry ways in which energy efficiency measures could benefit them.

Nuclear Accidents

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Energy when the hon. Member for Leyton can expect to receive a reply to his question tabled for answer on 7 April concerning compensation claims from (a) leukaemia victims in the vicinity of nuclear installations where accidents involving radiation leaks have occurred and (b) nuclear power workers and their families and (c) others received by the Central Electricity Generating Board over the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 30 April at column 203.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Thames Barrier

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury on 27 April, Official Report, column 24, about the raising of the Thames barrier, he will indicate what the flooding risk to London was on Sunday 29 March; and what assessment he made of the risk involved in not raising the barrier.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Day-to-day assessment of the risk of flooding in London and consequent operational decisions are matters for the Thames water authority. I have previously listed for the hon. Member on 27 April at column 24 the climatic and tidal factors that led to the prediction that the noon high tide on 29 March would reach a level against which it would be prudent to have the protection of the barrier in place.

Farming (Retirement)

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on measures encouraging retirement from farming within the EEC.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Acid Deposition

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research has been undertaken or commissioned by his Department into the bioaccumulation of metals in shellfish in estuaries as a result of acid deposition; and what were the findings.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Hedgehog Ladders

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what resources are made available by his Department for the construction of hedgehog ladders.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Fisheries Council

Mr. Harris asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Council of Fisheries Ministers meeting held in Brussels on 5 May; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: With my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, I represented the United Kingdom at the meeting of the Council of Fisheries Ministers in Brussels on 5 May. This was the first meeting of the Fisheries Council since the end of the British presidency.

The main business of this council meeting concerned the allocation of quotas between the Member States for the cod stocks at Spitzbergen and in north-west Atlantic waters subject to regulation by the North Atlantic Fisheries Organisation. I am pleased to report that the Council approved by qualified majority a compromise proposal by the Commission which was very favourable to United Kingdom fishing interests. We were allocated for 1987 a quota of 2,700 tonnes of cod at Spitzbergen, which is well in excess of the United Kingdom catch in any year since 1978 and amounts to nearly 13 per cent. of the Community availability; the allocation for future years will be on a sliding scale which gives the United Kingdom over 22 per cent. of any increase in the Community availability over 1987 levels and this increases the total United Kingdom share as the stock improves. For cod in NAFO areas 2J, 3KL (the other main stocks of practical interest to the United Kingdom fishing industry), the compromise approved gave us 850 tonnes as compared with the Commission's original proposal of 700 tonnes.

In view of the urgent need for a decision on these quota allocations, both from the point of view of United Kingdom fishermen and in terms of the Community's international standing on fisheries matters, I judged it right to support the compromise decision in advance of completion of parliamentary scrutiny procedures in this country.

The Council approved a decision, in fulfilment of a commitment in the treaty of accession, to grant Portugal financial assistance in 1988 and 1989 up to a maximum of 12 mecu for the modernisation and improvement of her fisheries control and surveillance facilities, together with a further decision providing for similar assistance to other member states up to a maximum of 10 mecu in 1988 and 1989. Member states, including the United Kingdom, have until 30 September 1987 to submit their investment plans. I very much welcome this decision which should lead to an improvement in control arrangements throughout the Community.

Finally, under "other business", I raised with the Commission the need for urgent action to follow up, in consultation with Norway, any possibility for increasing the current total allowable catches for North sea cod and haddock in the light of revised scientific advice likely to emerge from the current meeting of the advisory committee on fisheries management of the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea. I was supported by a number of other member states and in turn supported a similar request by France in relation to cod in area VII. I am glad to report that the Commission undertook to follow up any such advice, if and when it emerges, with all urgency.

Sugar

Mr. Spearing asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all forms of subsidy, assistance or other financial support available to the beet sugar industry and not available to cane sugar refineries.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

Countryside Commission

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to make more resources available to the Countryside Commission to enable it to discharge more effectively its functions in relation to the enjoyment of the countryside by the public.

Mr. Waldegrave: Since 1979-80, we have increased the resources available to the Countryside Commission by 61 per cent. in real terms to enable them to fulfil effectively their statutory responsibilities, which include the promotion of recreation in the countryside. I expect to receive their corporate strategy, which will outline their plans for 1988-89 onwards, shortly and will consider their future resource requirements in that context.

Endangered Species

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps are being taken to ensure that the European Community convention on international trade in endangered species regulations are being properly implemented in the United Kingdom and other European Community states.

Mr. Waldegrave: With the agreement of the EC member states, the wildlife trade monitoring unit of the IUCN conservation monitoring centre at Cambridge is currently carrying out an independent study for the European Commission of the implementation of the EC CITES regulations in each country of the Community. The United Kingdom will co-operate fully in this study and will shortly publish a report on the implementation of CITES in the United Kingdom to assist the conservation monitoring centre in their task. Copies of the report will be placed in the House Libraries when they are available.

National Parks Authorities

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the ministerial appointees on all the national park authorities and give their biographical details and their dates for reappointment.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information in respect of the seven English national park authorities is as follows:

Vacancy
All appointments expire on 31 March.

Appointments to the three Welsh national park authorities are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Conservation

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many reports have been submitted to him by the Countryside Commission during each of the past five years concerning the establishment of long-distance routes, under the provisions of section 51 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949.

Mr. Waldegrave: None. The last such report, which concerned the Peddars way and North Norfolk coast path, was submitted on 27 August 1981 and approved on 8 October 1982. This route was officially opened on 8 July 1986. I understand, however, that the commission has two further reports in preparation.

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average time taken to deal with appeals under paragraph 4(1) of schedule 14 to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and applications for directions under paragraph 3(2) of that schedule; and if he will take steps to reduce delays.

Mr. Waldegrave: The average time between receipt of appeal, or application for a direction and determination has been 100 and 34 weeks respectively. Steps have already been taken to reduce this by provision of extra staff in the division concerned.

Empty Properties

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many empty Government-owned properties have been licensed to local authorities or other agencies for use either temporarily or permanently for homeless families.

Mr. Tracey: No information is held centrally about such lettings.

Hedgehog Ladders

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance is given by his Department on the construction of hedgehog ladders.

Mr. Waldegrave: I will answer this question shortly.

Nuclear Waste Disposal

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has made in the last year to NIREX about the relative effectiveness and economies of deep disposal of low-level waste as against shallow tunnel disposal.

Mr. Waldegrave: None.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the cost of the legal actions initiated by NIREX to obtain and sustain access to the four sites considered for the dumping of low-level nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: NIREX estimates these costs as £50,000.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from NIREX concerning his decision to stop exploratory work of shallow-trench disposal of nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has had no representations from NIREX since the letter of 30 April from the chairman.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total cost of the NIREX drilling and exploratory work on each of the four sites explored for the dumping of low-level nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: NIREX estimate that £10 million has been spent on drilling and exploratory work at the four sites, and that a further £4 million may be incurred at the sites on winding up, cancellation and reinstatement work.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the total expenditure by (a) NIREX and (b) his Department in planning, considering, promoting and exploring shallow-trench disposal of low-level nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: NIREX estimates that its total expenditure has been £17 million, with the possibility of a further £4 million yet to be incurred. Comparable details of the Department's costs are not readily available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the cost of NIREX publicity, consultation and public relations on (a) each of the four sites considered for low-level nuclear waste and (b) in general in relation to shallow-trench disposal.

Mr. Waldegrave: NIREX estimate that £40,000 was spent at Bradwell, £310,000 at Elstow, and £200,000 at each of Fulbeck and South Killingholme. NIREX's total expenditure on publicity, consultation and public relations for shallow trench disposal has been £1·5 million.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the cost of the planning work done in his Department to assess the best practicable options for the disposal of nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: The direct costs of the assessment of best practicable environmental options for the management of low and intermediate level solid radioactive wastes published in March 1986 was £200,000. But this built on earlier research on nuclear waste strategies funded by the Department since 1982, on which expenditure averaged £300,000 per year between 1982 and 1985.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the estimated costs of (a) shallow-trench disposal of low level nuclear waste on each of the four sites surveyed by NIREX and (b) deep disposal undersea methods; and if he will indicate any changes in these calculations between 1986 and 1987.

Mr. Waldegrave: Information about the estimated costs of shallow burial low-level waste is given in the letter of 30 April from the chairman of NIREX to my right hon. Friend. Work is continuing on undersea disposal methods, and details of costings will be published in due course.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the costs of the preliminary desk and geological work done by (a) NIREX and (b) his Department before the choice of the four sites for exploration as possible sites for the storage of low-level nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: NIREX estimate the cost of their preliminary work was £1 million. Comparable figures for the Department's costs are not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will specify why the large cost differential between shallow-trench disposal and deep disposal of nuclear waste has disappeared.

Mr. Waldegrave: This was set out by the chairman of NIREX in his letter of 30 April, a copy of which is in the Library.

Defective Housing

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for one of the Ministers in his Department to receive a deputation on Wednesday 20 May from the residents of the Wimpey no fines dwellings in the Walsall borough to discuss the present state of their dwellings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I refer the hon. Member to my letter to him of 9 April on the question of a deputation by residents from Blakenhall in Walsall. It is for Walsall borough council to determine its own priorities for the repair and improvement of its housing stock within the total resources available.

NIREX (Chairman)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the chairman of NIREX over the last month; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is customary for my right hon. Friend to have meetings with the chairman of NIREX from time to time, one of which took place after the meeting of the NIREX board on 29 April.

WALES

National Museum of Wales

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Wales what funds voted for the purchase of specimens by the National Museum of Wales during 1986-87 were vired for other purposes; and if he will specify the sums and the purposes for which authority to vire was granted.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: £545,245, of which £456,166 was for salaries and general administrative expenditure including the costs of mounting the dinosaurs exhibition and £89,079 for capital works.

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has given authority to the National Museum of Wales to vire funds voted for the purchase of specimens during 1987-88; and if he will specify the sums and the purposes for which the authority to vire was granted.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: No. There has been no request for virement.

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will specify the departmental operating budgets of the curatorial departmemts of the National Museum of Wales in 1986-87; and those approved for 1987-88.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Decisions on departmental operating budgets are a matter for the National Museum within the total grant in aid allocation.

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many new posts have been created in the National Museum of Wales since 1 February 1986 with the approval of his Department; and if he will specify them.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: None requiring the approval of the Welsh Office.

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether the report of the full independent inquiry into the conduct and management of the Department of Art of the National Museum of Wales has now been delivered; and if he will place a copy in the Library.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The National Museum of Wales commissioned the inquiry into the conduct and management of the art department. Decisions about the dissemination of the report which has been received are therefore a matter for the museum authorities.

National Gallery of Wales

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Wales what steps are being taken to give administrative autonomy to the National Gallery of Wales and a governing body; and if he will establish a separate grant in aid for its art purchases.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Careful consideration will be given to the future arrangements for the organisation and funding of the art department of the National Museum of Wales. No decisions have yet been reached.

Mid-Wales Development Board

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many jobs have been lost, and how many created since June 1979 in the Mid-Wales Development Board catchment area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is not available in the form requested.

Drugs Education

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the latest developments regarding the drugs education programme in Welsh schools.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Responsibility for developing drugs education programmes in schools rests with the local education authorities. The Department has given assistance through the education support grants scheme to enable LEAs to appoint advisers to promote and co-ordinate activity aimed at preventing drug misuse. This funding amounts to £169,000 in 1987-88. All LEAs in Wales have benefited from this scheme. The education advisers work closely with county health education officers for drugs, who are also funded by the Department. In addition all LEAs in Wales have received copies of the joint Welsh Office/Department of Education and Science publication "Drug Misuse and the Young" and the Department has made available to all secondary schools a video package entitled "Double Take". The Department has also made grant of £127,000 available in 1987-88 for the in-service training of teachers in drug education.

Defective Housing

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state, in respect of the PRC dwellings and home owners, for each local authority in Wales (a) the number who have been assisted to date by local authority, by means of repurchase, (b) the average price paid for such repurchases, and (c) the minimum, maximum and average valuation, gross and net of discount, in respect of the original sale of these properties.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The number and average price of repurchases since 1984, for the 19 local authorities in which repurchase of PRC dwellings has occurred, are shown in the following table. Information on the original sale of repurchased dwellings is not collected centrally.

	Number of repurchases	Average cost per dwelling £
Alyn and Deeside	2	21,500
Arfon	2	18,500
Blaenau Gwent	4	17,500
Brecknock	17	23,300

Consultants (Cover)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the policy in the Gwynedd health authority area on covering consultants' sessions where the consultant is away ill or on holiday; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mark Robinson: This is an operational matter for the Gwynedd health authority.

Junior Hospital Doctors

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has had any representations about the length of hours worked by junior hospital doctors in Gwynedd.

Mr. Mark Robinson: No such representations have been received.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the average hours worked by junior hospital doctors in (a) Clwyd and (b) Gwynedd; and how the average has varied over the last five years for which information is available.

Mr. Mark Robinson: This information is not available centrally.

Ambulance Service

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average response time for ambulances answering emergency calls; and what is the percentage of response times taking 20 minutes or more for the counties of (a) Clwyd and (b) Gwynedd for the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Recommended response times for ambulances answering emergency calls are based on eight minutes for the 50 percentile and 20 minutes for the 95 percentile. The 50 percentile may be taken as the median of the total number of calls. Figures for the last five years in Clwyd and Gwynedd are as follows:

	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986
			(in minutes)
Clwyd
50 percentile	7	8	8	8	6
95 percentile	16	18	17	16	17
Gwynedd
50 percentile	8	8	7	7	7
95 percentile	20	20	20	19	20

The percentage of calls in which the response time was more than 20 minutes are as follows:

	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986
Clwyd	3	3	2	3	3
Gwynedd	5	5	5	4	5

ENERGY

Oil and Gas Development

Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he will publish his next report on oil and gas development in the United Kingdom, the Brown Book.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have today published the latest edition of the Brown Book, and have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library of the House and the Vote Office stores. The report gives a detailed account of oil and gas development in 1986.

North Sea Oil

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give the most recent figures available to him of the numbers of personnel working offshore on the United Kingdom continental shelf; how many are (a) United Kingdom nationals, (b) European Economic Community nationals other than United Kingdom, (c) United States nationals and (d) others; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith [pursuant to his reply, 2 April 1987, c. 568]: I regret that, due to an error of transcription, the number of "Others" offshore on fixed installations was overstated. The correct figure is 64, and the total for the column should accordingly be amended to 6,360.

EMPLOYMENT

Avon and Wansdyke

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Paymaster General (1) what was the percentage change in unemployment in (a) Avon and (b) Wansdyke constituency between January 1986 and January 1987 for those people without a job for more than three years;

(2) what was the percentage change in unemployment in (a) Avon and (b) Wansdyke constituency between January 1986 and January 1987.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The comparison of unemployment between 9 January 1986 and 8 January 1987 is affected by the change in the compilation of the unemployment statistics in March 1987. The table shows the published number of claimants in the county of Avon and the Wansdyke constituency on the two dates, and the numbers who had been unemployed for over three years.

	Unemployed claimants
	Total		Over 3 years
	January 1986	January 1987	January 1986	January 1987
Avon	48,318	45,109	6,455	6,821
Wansdyke constituency	3,162	3,057	336	346

Radio Frequency Equipment

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Paymaster General what warnings have been given to the public about the danger to health of radio frequency equipment; what screening safeguards are required; and what are the maximum levels of radiation for such equipment permissible in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: Radio transmission equipment has not been shown to create a danger to the health of the public such as to require public warnings. Operators are advised by the Health and Safety Executive and the Department of Trade and Industry to follow Medical Research Council recommendations on safe levels of exposure. These include a power density limit for continuous exposure of 10mW/cm² for the frequency range 30 to 30,000MH_3. This may require the prevention of public access to some radio frequency transmitting areas, with fencing and notices to keep out.

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Paymaster General what steps he is taking to ensure that radio frequency and microwave safety levels are enforceable by law.

Mr. Trippier: There is no legislation requiring specific safety levels for radio frequency or microwave radiation. The general provisions of the Health and Safety at Work etc Act 1974 require any health and safety risks from such radiation, should they arise, to be contolled so far as is reasonably practicable. Operators are advised by the Health and Safety Executive to follow Medical Research Council recommendations on limiting exposure. Domestic electrical appliances such as microwave ovens are covered by regulations made under the Consumer Protection Act 1961. Under these regulations, the sale of appliances leaking harmful levels of radiation is not permitted. The safety limit used for this purpose is set out in British Standard BS5175:1976.

Sir Bernard Braine asked the Paymaster General if he will set out in the Official Report such information as he has as to the minimum requirements for safeguarding health from the dangers of radio frequency and microwave equipment in the United Kingdom, the United States of America and the Soviet Union.

Mr. Trippier: In the United Kingdom, the Medical Research Council have recommended a power density limit for continuous exposure of 10 mW/cm² for the frequency range 30 to 30,000MH_3. The most recent information available on requirements in the United States of America and the Soviet Union are contained in a paper published in July 1986 in the Applied Industrial Hygiene journal, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Labour Statistics

Ms. Clare Short asked the Paymaster General if he will publish figures on the proportion of part-time females paid below £3·20 and £3·40 an hour in April 1986, for all agreements, industries, occupations and age groups, as listed in tables 171, 172, 173 and 174, respectively, of the new earnings survey, 1986, part F.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I am sending the hon. Member the information requested, which is also available in the Library.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Paymaster General if he will publish figures from the 1985 labour force survey showing the percentages of employees aged 16 years and over, by sex, usual hours worked per week and, in the case of women, marital status.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The 1985 labour force survey estimates are shown in the table:

Employees by basic[1] usual hours work per week
Great Britain Spring 1985

[1] ie excluding meal breaks and paid and unpaid overtime.
[2] widowed, divorced, legally separated or single.
[3] includes those who did not state number of hours worked.

Mr. Mates asked the Paymaster General what is the present level of recorded unemployment and the number of reported job vacancies in the constituency of East Hampshire.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. On 12 March 1987, the number of unemployed claimants in the East Hampshire parliamentary constituency was 2,356. Vacancy figures are not collected separately for the Fleet jobcentre, which covers an area similar to the East Hampshire constituency. However, these figures are included in those for Aldershot jobcentre, where there were 662 unfilled vacancies, excluding vacancies on Government schemes, on 6 March 1987.

Ms. Clare Short asked the Paymaster General if he will publish figures from the 1985 labour force survey, showing separately for full-time and part-time workers, the percentages of employees aged 16 years and over by sex, age group, and in the case of women, marital status.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The 1985 labour force survey estimates are as shown in the table:

Employees by whether full[1] or part-time[2] and age
Great Britain Spring 1985

[4] Sample size too small to provide a reliable estimate.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will list the numbers employed in each parliamentary constituency in 1984, on the basis of his results from the labour force survey, showing for each constituency the gains and losses in employees since 1981.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [pursuant to the reply]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply of Tuesday 5 May 1987, at column 332.

YTS

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Paymaster General whether he has any information as to the number or percentage of young people who found work following the successful completion of youth training schemes in Leicester and in the east midlands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The latest available figures show that around 1,800 young people completed their entitlement to YTS in Leicester during the period April 1986 to September 1986 and were in work three months later; this represents around 83 per cent. of all those who completed YTS in the period. The comparable figures for the Manpower Services Commission's east midlands and eastern region are around 8,300 young people and 76 per cent. respectively.

These figures clearly demonstrate that very many young people are benefiting from the opportunities available under YTS.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Paymaster General how many people are currently on youth training schemes in Leicester and in the east midlands ; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: On 31 March 1987 there were around 7,100 young people in training on YTS schemes in the local authority district of Leicester; the comparable figure for the Manpower Services Commission's east midlands and eastern region was around 36,200.

These figures clearly show that the young people of Leicester and the east midlands recognise that YTS offers quality training and work experience in their transition from school to work.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Paymaster General how many people have completed youth training schemes in Leicester and the east midlands to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: By the end of March 1987, the latest date for which figures are available, around 7,600 young people in the local authority district of Leicester and 69,000 in the east midlands and eastern region had completed YTS schemes since the scheme was introduced in April 1983.

I am confident that the success of YTS in the east midlands as in other parts of the country will provide a secure base from which young people will be able to build a better future. For the first time in this country we have a high-quality training scheme for all 16 and 17-year-old school leavers. This will be of benefit not only to young people but to British industry, which will gain from a better trained, more flexible young work force.

Job Creation

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Paymaster General if he will estimate the numbers of unemployed people who have benefited from the Government's employment measures since May 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: It is not possible to give a precise number. Certain of the schemes benefit both the employed and the unemployed. However, since May 1979, over 6·5 million people have benefited from the employment, training and enterprise measures run by my Department and the Manpower Services Commission.

TRANSPORT

Aircraft Noise

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what he defines as a quiet aircraft; and if he will issue up-to-date noise footprints for these aircraft.

Mr. David Mitchell: Aircraft on the United Kingdom register which do not meet the basic noise standards of chapter 2 to annex 16 to the convention on international civil aviation have been banned from operating in this country since 1 January 1986. Such aircraft on foreign registers will be banned from 1 January 1988.

The Department does not define quiet aircraft as such. For the purposes of night restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted, the Department define a category of "quieter" aircraft: those with a 95 PNdB noise footprint not exceeding four square miles on take-off and 2¼ square miles on landing. To be allowed to operate planned movements at night at these airports, an aircraft must be classed as "quieter". All non-jet aircraft with one or two engines are exempt from the night restrictions; all those with more than two engines meet the criteria. We are considering including 95 PNdB footprint diagrams of representative aircraft types in a future consultation document on night restrictions.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will extend aircraft noise control limits to include non-jet aircraft and noise from aircraft landing.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. Most noise near airports is made by jet aircraft taking off. Noise limits will continue to be applied to such aircraft at Heathrow and Gatwick. In addition, we will continue to encourage pilots to use operational procedures to reduce noise on both landing and take-off.

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has on the effect to which the noise climate at Gatwick has changed as expressed by the noise contours for 1986 and 1985; what information he has as to the reasons for this; and if there has been any improvement between 1985 and 1986.

Mr. David Mitchell: The area within the 35 noise and number index contour, which is generally taken to indicate the onset of disturbance, was 225 sq km in 1984, 299 sq km in 1985 and 288 sq km in 1986. The factors affecting the area are: extra aircraft movements, increasing use of the BAC1-11, and the shape of the noise contours themselves. It is unlikely that any particular place will have experienced an increase of more than 2 or 3 NNI.

Bypasses and Road Schemes

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many bypasses and road schemes have been completed since 1979; and when he expects the Bedford bypass to be completed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: 199 national road schemes have been completed since 1979, of which 67 are bypasses or relief roads. Subject to the completion of the outstanding procedures and the availability of resources, the A428 Bedford bypass could be completed towards the end of 1993.

Pacer Units

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his answer of 27 April, Official Report, column 9 on pacer units, he will publish the information he received from British Rail at the time British Rail placed its orders for pacer units.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Government do not receive information from BR when it places its rolling stock orders. We receive information in support of BR's investment submissions, but for reasons of commercial confidentiality it is not the practice to make this information public. As I explained in my earlier answer to the hon. Gentleman, questions on the reliability of the pacer units are the responsibility for the British Railways board and the manufacturers.

Underground (Escalator Repairs)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will review the times taken by London Regional Transport to repair broken escalators in the underground.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have no plans to do so. Responsibility for the efficient day-to-day operation of the underground rests with London Underground, which has a substantial maintenance and repair programme for escalators.

Manchester Airport Rail Link

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on recent developments in regard to the Manchester airport rail link.

Mr. David Mitchell: Further to the reply which I gave the hon. Gentleman on 1 April, officials had a constructive meeting on 8 April to discuss the PTA's application for a section 56 grant. The PTA has agreed that further work needs to be done before the case for the investment can properly be assessed. I understand it is hoping to complete that work within the next few weeks.

Time Saving and Accident Prevention (Report)

Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has reached a decision on the proposals contained in the report, "Values for Journey Time Savings and Accident Prevention"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: When I published the report in March, I promised to consult experts in transport appraisal and others before deciding on the final values for time and accident costs that are to be used in the economic appraisals of transport policy, projects and operations. The consultation period ended on 21 April. We are most grateful to all those who responded to our request for comments.

The balance of responses gave strong support for the recommendations for substantial increases to the values for journey time savings and accident prevention in the report. Respondents confirmed our view that the recent research into travel time savings provided a sound basis for increasing the values of time.

The main criticisms of the report concerned the proposed increases in casualty costs. Several respondents argued that there was adequate evidence to justify much higher values than those we propose. In 1980, we commissioned a study into how much people are willing to pay to reduce their risks of death or injury in road accidents. The research was of high quality, but like the other available research evidence it threw up both theoretical and practical problems. Interest has now been expressed in publication of the report of this study and we are considering this.

A recent comprehensive and wide ranging interdepartmental review of road safety, which we expect to publish shortly, also had serious reservations about the available evidence on road casualty costs. After considering all the comments on this issue very carefully we decided that the best course was to retain the values proposed—which maintain the weight of safety vis-a-vis mobility—until we have had an opportunity to consider further the recommendations of the interdepartmental review.

Another criticism was that the provision of separate values of time for retired people and children was contrary to the principle of a single appraisal value and that this may lead to inequities of investment between regions, particularly where local concentrations of retired people or children exist. It is our view that there will be very few circumstances where it would be appropriate to depart from the use of the single standard appraisal value. The use of separate values for pensioners, children and working age adults should only be considered in very exceptional circumstances.

I have placed in the Library details of the new values of non-working time and casualty costs which—in the light of the proposals in the report and the comments received on it — we have decided to adopt. The Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Northern Ireland and for Wales have also decided to use the new values in transport investment decisions in their countries thus preserving a consistent approach throughout the United Kingdom.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Credit

Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the credit industry about measures to reduce the level of personal over-indebtedness through the use of existing credit reference bureaux; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: My Department is in regular contact with the main commercial lenders about a wide range of consumer credit issues including consumer overindebtedness. I am encouraged that lenders are making greater use of the services offered by credit reference agencies to aid them in their commercial assessment of the credit worthiness of credit applicants, which in turn should help to minimise consumer over-indebtedness.

Mr. Porter asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to require the credit industry to offer borrowers payment protection insurance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I have no plans to introduce such legislation. I accept that payment protection insurance schemes can be of value in helping to minimise the risk of over-indebtedness, provided that they offer adequate protection, but they involve extra cost and consumers should be able to choose whether or not to participate.

Mr. Porter asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has about the latest incidence of personal over-indebtedness; if he will finance an extension of the services of trading standards officers to provide consumers with professional financial advice; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The definition of over-indebtedness depends on a range of individual circumstances and it is impossible reliably to estimate its total extent. However, Government statistics on the total financial liabilities of individuals are available, and for the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available, these rose by 16 per cent. Over the same period, the financial assets of individuals rose by 17 per cent. The trading standards service is funded through the rate support grant to enforce a wide range of statutory consumer protection duties. It is for local authorities to make the necessary arrangements and to allocate resources as they see fit. Information and advice to the public on a wide range of matters including consumer and financial problems is available from citizens advice bureaux. My Department provides funds, through grant in aid, to the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux.

False Origin Marks

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation making it an offence to import into the United Kingdom goods known to the importer to bear a false indication of origin.

Mr. Howard: Section 16 of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, which is enforced by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, already prohibits the importation of any goods to which a false indication of their place of manufacture has been applied outside the United Kingdom. It is an offence under the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 for a person to import any goods contrary to such a prohibition under any enactment with intent to evade that prohibition.

House of Fraser (Investigation)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who are the inspectors appointed under the Companies Act to investigate the circumstances surrounding the acquisition of shares in House of Fraser during 1984 and 1985.

Mr. Howard: The inspectors are Mr. Philip Heslop QC and Mr. Hugh Aldous FCA. They were appointed under section 432 of the Companies Act 1985 to investigate and report on the affairs of House of Fraser Holdings plc and they have been asked to look in particular at the circumstances surrounding the acquisition of shares in House of Fraser plc in 1984 and 1985.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Mental Illness

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will amalgamate the tables analysing figures for places for mentally ill people in local authority day centres and National Health Service day hospitals so as to show what day care provision is available to such people by (a) district health authority and (b) local authority.

Mr. Currie: The amalgamated tables requested are not readily available because not all district health authority areas are conterminous with local authority areas: a list of conterminous areas was provided in my predecessor's reply to the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) on 9 June 1986 at columns 99-104.

Information on the number of places in local authority day centres solely for mentally ill people, analysed by local authority is published in "Day centres for the Mentally Ill, the Elderly and the Younger Physically Handicapped at 31 March 1985, England", copies of which have been placed in the Library. Information collected centrally does not separately identify places for mentally ill people in day centres which cater for mixed client groups but it is planned to collect such detail in future.

Figures for the number of places for mentally ill people in National Health Service day hospitals in England by district health authority as at 31 December 1985 are given in the table.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied, in the light of the number of patients with a diagnosis of schizophrenia readmitted to hospital in 1985, that appropriate support facilities were available for these patients after initial discharge and that clinicians had confirmed their availability before discharge.

Mrs. Currie: Many patients with schizophrenia have periods of good health interrupted by recurrent attacks. For this reason it is always likely to be the case that the number of admissions over a patient's lifetime — and therefore the ratio of readmissions to first admissions nationally—is higher with schizophrenia than with most other mental illnesses. We accept that good quality support to the patient when at home can reduce the number of recurrences. Research studies have shown that in many places the quality of support is patchy and we shall not be satisfied until we know that good support is on offer everywhere. In particular we have been emphasising the importance of the professional team agreeing an individual care plan with the patient and carers at the time of discharge.

Organ Transplants

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has on the level of organ transplants in the United Kingdom and other comparable countries.

Mrs. Currie: According to information supplied by the United Kingdom transplant service, the number of organ transplant operations performed in the United Kingdom during 1986 was as follows:

	Number
Kidney (cadaveric donors for NHS-entitled patients only)	[1]1,493
Heart	176
Heart/Lung	51
Liver	127

[1] As notified to date.

Provisional information on the number of heart, heart/lung and liver transplant operations performed in Austria, Belgium, Germany and the Netherlands during 1986 has been provided by Eurotransplant and is as follows:

	Heart	Heart/Lung	Liver
Austria	32	3	[1]30
Belgium	[2]37	—	51
Germany	161	1	105
Netherlands	24	—	14

[1] Includes 1 liver/kidney transplant.
[2] Includes 1 heart/kidney transplant.

Figures for the number of kidney transplant operations performed in other countries are not yet available for 1986. 1985 statistics have been made available by the European Dialysis and Transplant Association. These figures include living donor transplants and private operations and are therefore higher than those provided by UKTS for the United Kingdom. For selected European countries, 1985 information is as follows:

	Total kidney transplants	Patients treated per million population
Austria	229	18·9
Belgium	290	29·4
Federal Republic of Germany	1,274	20·8
France	1,157	21·0
Netherlands	323	22·4
United Kingdom	1,549	27·5

For information on a more complete list of countries, my hon. Friend may wish to write to the EDTA at St. Thomas's hospital, London SE1.

Rugby DHA

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the budget of the Rugby district health authority (a) in 1986 and (b) in the first year since its inception; and how many staff were employed in each of those years.

Mrs. Currie: Financial allocations to individual health authorities are matters for the regional health authority. My hon. Friend may therefore wish to write to the chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority for this information. Staff in post figures, as at 30 September for the years 1982 and 1985 are shown in the table. I regret that staffing information for 1986 is not yet available centrally to this level of detail. Because of the 1982 National Health Service reorganisation, information for years prior to 1982 would not be comparable with that for 1985.

"Preventive Care for Pre-school Children"

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning the booklet "Preventive Care for Pre-School Children"; and what action he has taken.

Mrs. Currie: Since this handbook was published in 1974 by the British Medical Association and the Royal College of General Practitioners, the Department has made available to and discussed with them views received from the relevant professional bodies. I understand that production of a second edition is underway, and I will arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library when published.

Health Promotion Teams

Mr. Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the district health authorities which have health promotion teams or units and those which include general practitioners on these teams.

Mrs. Currie: I understand that only four district health authorities out of 191 are currently without a health education unit. These are: Bassetlaw, Leeds Western and Waltham Forest, which at present rely on services provided by health education units in neighbouring authorities, and Somerset, which has part-time cover. No information is collected centrally on the membership of health promotion teams, but we estimate that, whereas about 250 health education officers were employed by district health authorities and regional health authorities in 1979, the current number is over 600.

Health Education Authority

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) to what extent information and publicity material formerly made available by the Health Education Council to community health councils and other local units will continue to be provided by the Health Education Authority; and what will be the effect of the change upon such work;

(2) what resources it is intended that the Health Education Authority will make available for the work of local health education units.

Mrs. Currie: The Health Education Authority will be responsible for production and distribution of its own material but may continue to distribute material produced by the Health Education Council. Local health education units will continue to receive free supplies of publications, posters and other material from the authority. As the new authority is an integral part of the National Health Service, liaison arrangements and links with bodies in the Health Service involved with health education are expected to improve. The funding of local health education units is a matter for the local health authorities.

Press Release (In-patients)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the number of copies of DHSS press release 87/153, figures on National Health Service acute in-patient activity, sent out and the number of copies of the statistical bulletin referred to in the press release which were sent to (a) members of the press at the same time as the press release and (b) in response to subsequent requests from the press.

Mrs. Currie: The Department issued 300 copies of press release 87/153 to the media. Of these, 110 copies, sent to national media offices and the Press Gallery of the House, were accompanied by the statistical bulletin. About 10 further copies of the bulletin were provided to journalists who subsequently requested them; there is no record of the exact number.

Statistical Bulletins

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report, for each of the statistical bulletins published by his Department, the title, date, number of copies printed and number of copies distributed free of charge to (a) Government and National Health Service users and (b) press and the numbers sold so far.

AIDS

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the percentage of households which have received the Government's AIDS leaflet to date.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Leaflets

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many copies of his Department's new series of social security leaflets have been distributed (a) in total and (b) to members of the press.

Mr. Lyell: The number of copies of the new series of social security leaflets printed by the end of April were:

Leaflet		Number printed (million)
FB2	Which benefit?	2·00
FB6	Retiring?	3·00
FB8	Babies and benefits	3·50
FB23	Young people's guide to Social Security	3·00
FB27	Bringing up children?	3·00
FB28	Sick or disabled?	3·00
FB29	Help when someone dies	3·00
NI17A	Maternity benefits	1·14
NI196	Social Security benefit rates	5·35
NI246	How to appeal	0·70
NP38	Your future pension	0·50
NP39	Your Additional Pension statement	0·30

	Leaflet	Number printed (million)
MA1	Integrated leaflet/claim form for Maternity Allowance	0·86
SF100	Integrated leaflet/claim form for maternity payments from the Social Fund	0·90
SF200	Integrated leaflet/claim form for funeral payments from the Social Fund	1·50
TOTAL		31·75

An initial distribution has been made, but at any one time a proportion of these leaflets is held in store waiting to resupply local offices and other outlets. Further quantities will be printed throughout the year in response to demand.

Approximately 130 press packs containing a set of the new leaflets and explanatory material were distributed to members of the press.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report the places in which the new social security leaflets are officially available.

Mr. Lyell: All social security leaflets and claim forms are available from local social security offices and supplies of leaflets can be obtained from the DHSS leaflets unit, PO Box 21, Stanmore, Middlesex HA7 1AY.

Of the new leaflets FB6, FB8, FB23, FB27, FB28 and FB29 are also available at main post offices; MA1, SF100 and FB8 at ante-natal clinics; SF200 at registrars of births, deaths and marriages; and FB23 at careers offices.

Additionally, copies of social security leaflets are delivered direct to over 7,500 individuals and organisations including libraries, independent advice centres, the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, and social services departments of local authorities.

General Medical Council (Registration)

Mr. Jim Lester asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the number of overseas applicants for registration with the General Medical Council between the years 1981 and 1987, and as to the ratio of passes to the total number who applied.

Mr. Newton: The numbers of overseas qualified doctors who were granted registration with the General Medical Council in the years 1981-86 were as follows:

	[1]1981	[1]1982	[1]1983	[1]1984	[1]1985	[2]1986
Full registration

We have no information about the numbers for 1987 nor about the number of overseas qualified doctors who applied unsuccessfully for registration in the years 1981 to 1986. My hon. Friend may care to approach the General Medical Council for these details.

Pregnant Women (AFP Test)

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many and what proportion of pregnant women in England and Wales were given the AFP test for each year since 1978.

Mrs. Currie: This information is not available centrally.

Spina Bifida

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many and what proportion of babies in England and Wales were born with spina bifida for each year since 1978, broken down in terms of live and still births.

Mrs. Currie: The information is given in the table.

Notifications of births with spina bifida, England and Wales 1978-86

Note: Figues are derived from a voluntary system of notifying congenital malformations observed at birth or up to seven days after birth and are therefore an incomplete measure of the total number of affected infants.

Children in Care

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what number of children were in care in England and Wales for each year since 1978; and what proportion they were of the total number of children in England and Wales for each year since 1978.

Mrs. Currie: The numbers of children in care in England and Wales and the proportion of the population aged under 18 years for each year 1978-84 are given in "Children in Care in England and Wales", published annually, copies of which are available in the Library. Figures for 31 March 1985 show that the numbers and proportion aged under 18 years have continued to fall to 72,800 and 6·1 per 1,000 respectively. Figures for 1986 are not yet available.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much money has been spent on cervical cancer screening in England and Wales for every year since 1978; and what is the projected expenditure for each year until 1990.

Mrs. Currie: Total expenditure on cervical cancer screening is not separately identified in health authority accounts or forward plans. It has been estimated that the annual cost is between £20 million and £30 million.

Benefits

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list each social security benefit showing separately those which are paid in advance and those which are paid in arrears indicating the period in advance or arrears in each case and the day of the week which is the pay day on which each is paid.

Mr. Lyell: The information requested is as follows:

Benefit	Frequency and period of payment	Pay day
Retirement Pension	weekly in advance	Monday or Thursday
Widow's benefit	weekly in advance	Tuesday
Industrial Injury/Disablement Benefit	weekly in advance	Wednesday
Attendance Allowance	weekly in advance	Monday
Invalid Care Allowance	weekly in advance	Monday
Guardian's Allowance	weekly in advance	Monday or Tuesday
Family Income Supplement	weekly in advance	Tuesday
Supplementary Benefit	weekly in advance or fortnightly in advance to claimants who are available for employment	Monday or the appropriate day for payment of linked contributory social security benefit.
Mobility Allowance	four weekly; 3 weeks in arrear, 1 week in advance.	Wednesday
Child benefit	weekly or four-weekly in arrears	Monday or Tuesday
Maternity Allowance	weekly in arrears	Friday
Sickness benefit; Invalidity benefit; Severe Disablement allowance	weekly in arrears	Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday depending on the claimant's NI number.
Unemployment benefit	fortnightly in arrears	Two days after the claimant's signing day.

Retirement pension, widow's benefit, mobility allowance, attendance allowance and child benefit may be paid direct to a beneficiary's bank account; payments under these arrangements are made four-weekly or quarterly in arrears.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each social security benefit the date or range of dates on which claimants will have received the new rate of benefit which came into force from Monday 6 April.

Mr. Lyell: The uprated benefits were paid as follows:

Benefit	Date(s) Paid
Retirement pension	6 April or 9 April
Widow's benefit	7 April
Il disablement benefit	8 April
Attendance allowance	6 April
Invalid care allowance	6 April
Guardian's allowance	6 April or 7 April
Family Income Supplement	7 April
Supplementary benefit	30 March—10 April
Mobility allowance	8 April
Child benefit	6 April or 7 April
Maternity allowance	10 April
Sickness benefit	9—15 April
Invalidity benefit	9—15 April
Severe disablement benefit	9—15 April
Unemployment benefit	8—24 April

Those benefits paid four-weekly or quarterly in arrears to a bank account will be paid later depending on the payment cycle.

There will have been delays in making payments on the above dates in a small number of the Department's local offices.

Adult Dental Health

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects the research committee of his Department to finish its consideration of the proposed 1988 national survey of adult dental health.

Mrs. Currie: We have decided to go ahead with this survey. Preparatory work will begin shortly.

PRIME MINISTER

EC (Budgetary Controls)

Q154. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will raise at the next meeting of the European Council the operation of the agreement of 4 December 1984 on strict budgetary controls of EEC spending; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The European Council in June will be having extensive discussions on the future financing of the Community. I shall insist on the need to improve budget discipline and management, taking account of the Council conclusions of 4 December 1984.

Engagements

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 May.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 May.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 May.

Mr. O'Brien asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 May.

Mr. Amess asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 May.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 May.

Mr. Canavan asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 7 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Broadcasting

4. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent progress has been made in the discussions within the European Economic Community on the broadcasting directive proposed by the Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The draft directive is still under discussion in the Council working group of officials. The Government continue to hold the view that a case has not been made out for Community legislation in this field, and that the proposed Council of Europe Convention provides a better way forward.

Crime (Clear-up Rate)

7. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the most recent clear-up rates for each police force area in England and Wales for all recorded crimes.

Mr. Mellor: As the answer is in the form of a table I will, with permission, circulate it in the Official Report. In 1986, the police cleared up 32 per cent. of all recorded notifiable offences in England and Wales.

27. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to improve the clear-up rate of crime in England and Wales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have taken steps to increase the resources in money, equipment and manpower available to the police; but it is for chief officers to take operational decisions about what proportion of their available resources should be devoted to the investigation of crime in general or of particular crimes.

West Midlands Police

8. Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the annual report of the chief constable of the west midlands police for 1986.

Mr. Hurd: I was pleased to receive the chief constable's report, in which he records that 1986 was a year of considerable change, major problems, and some notable successes in many areas of the force's work. I am glad to see that the chief constable concludes that the west midlands police are in good heart with a high morale despite the daunting range of tasks that confronts them.

Criminal Injuries

10. Mr. Bob Edwards asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases are currently awaiting decisions by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board; and how many of these have been waiting for more than 12 months.

Mr. Mellor: At the end of March 1987, the board had about 64,000 uncompleted cases. These included a number in which the board awaited the results of inquiries and about 8,000 cases in which it had made an initial decision. No record is kept of how many of the outstanding cases have been waiting for more than 12 months.

Crime (Epping Forest)

11. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what increases and decreases have occurred in the main categories of crime during the last year, or nearest convenient year, in those parts of the Metropolitan police district and of the Essex police area falling within the Epping Forest parliamentary constituency.

Mr. Mellor: The only information readily available to me is for the parts of Epping Forest district falling within the Metropolitan police district, where burglaries fell by 8 per cent. in 1986. The Metropolitan police recorded 1,848 offences of theft, about 150 more than in 1985; and 767 offences of criminal damage, about 100 more. The number of offences of violence, including robbery and sexual offences, remained low.

Burglars (Age Statistics)

14. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average age of offenders who commit burglary.

Mr. Mellor: The figures of those cautioned or convicted indicate that the peak age of offending for burglary is 15.

Neighbourhood Watch Schemes

15. Sir John Osborn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence he has of the effect of neighbourhood watch schemes on the level of crime; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: Neighbourhood watch schemes vary considerably in size, scope and in the commitment of their members. Their effects will inevitably also vary considerably. A good deal of material is now to hand suggesting that some neighbourhood watch schemes are effective in reducing crime while others reduce the fear of crime and increase social cohesion. We shall continue to encourage the remarkable growth of these schemes.

23. Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many neighbourhood watch schemes now exist; and what were the corresponding figures for each of the preceding three years.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are now over 29,500 neighbourhood watch schemes in existence in England and Wales. This compares with some 14,500 schemes in June 1986, some 3,000 schemes in June 1985 and about 1,000 schemes in June 1984.

Prison Officers

19. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had with representatives of the prison officers.

Mr. Mellor: My right hon. Friend last met representatives of the Prison Officers Association on 2 March, when they talked about certain aspects of the fresh start proposals.

28. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officers there are; and how this compares with the figure in 1979.

Mr. Mellor: On 1 April 1987 there were 19,176 staff employed in the prison officer class, compared with 15,708 on 1 April 1979.

Metropolitan Police (Crime Statistics)

20. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the most recent clear-up rates for crimes committed in the Metropolitan police area, categorised by the type of crime.

22. Mr. Raynsford asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to improve the clear-up rate for crime in the Metropolitan police area.

Mr. Hurd: Tables giving the numbers of offences recorded and cleared up in the Metropolitan police district, by main offence group, are regularly placed in the Library. Decisions about what proportion of his available resources should be devoted to the investigation of crime in general or of particular crimes are for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, but I strongly support his decision, recorded in his strategy report for 1987, to identify as a priority, the enhanced detection of a number of offences of particular concern including burglary, robbery and racial and sexual attacks.

Crimes of Violence

21. Mr. Lilley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes have occurred in the level of sentences for crimes of violence over the past two years.

Mr. Mellor: The proportionate use of custody for offences of violence rose between 1983 and 1985, as did the average sentence length for males over 21 sentenced in the Crown court.

25. Sir Peter Blaker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the most recent clear-up rate for crimes of violence; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In 1986 the clear-up rate for offences of violence against the person was 71 per cent. Although this rate represents a slight decrease on the previous year, the number of such offences cleared up was greater in 1986 than in 1985.

Offenders (Ages)

26. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average age of offenders in England and Wales committing each of (a) violence against the person, (b) burglary, (c) theft and handling of stolen goods, (d) fraud and forgery, (e) criminal damage and (f) all crimes.

Mr. Mellor: The figures for those cautioned or convicted indicate the peak age of offending as 18 for violence against the person; 15 for burglary; 15 for theft and handling stolen goods; 18-21 for fraud and forgery and 15 for criminal damage. The peak age for known offending in general is 15 for boys and 14 for girls.

Tamil Refugees

29. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to be in a position to make an announcement on the applications for asylum for the 64 Tamil refugees who arrived in the United Kingdom at the beginning of the year.

Mr. Waddington: The Sri Lankan Tamils who arrived here from Dhaka on 13 February are currently being re-interviewed. Fresh decisions on the individual applications will be reached as soon as possible.

Thames Valley Police

30. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he next expects to meet the chief constable of the Thames Valley police to consider the budget of the Thames Valley police.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend does not expect to meet the chief constable for this purpose. It is the responsibility of the police authority to set the force's budget.

Animals (Cruelty)

31. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to enable courts to impose a ban on the keeping of animals by persons found guilty of offences involving abuse of or cruelty towards domestic animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are keen to ensure that effective penalties are available for all instances of cruelty to domestic animals. At present the court may disqualify a person from keeping a dog on first conviction for cruelty and other animals on a second or subsequent conviction. We are ready to consider support for proposals to make disqualification available in all instances on first conviction and the necessary consultations are now taking place.

Criminal Damage

32. Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to deal with the rise in the number of acts of criminal damage over the past eight years.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Criminal damage can often be prevented by good design. The Government's crime prevention strategy includes work to support local action against vandalism and other forms of criminal damage; for example, we have issued good practice guidelines to local authority chief executives and to chief officers of police on the handling of local anti-vandalism campaigns.

Crime (Use of firearms)

33. Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the increase since 1978 in the total number of crimes in England and Wales in which a firearm was used.

Mr. Mellor: Statistics of notifiable offences recorded by the police in which firearms of all types, including air weapons, were reported to have been used are published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (tables 3.1 and 3.2 of the latest edition, for 1985 Cm. 10). In 1985, 9,742 such offences were recorded, compared to 5,672 in 1978.

Prison Officers (Protective Clothing)

34. Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why he has decided to issue protective clothing to all prison establishments for the use of prison officers when dealing with patients suffering from AIDS.

Mr. Mellor: The decision to issue protective clothing to all prison establishments was taken as part of a package of preventive measures designed to protect prison officers against possible infection from hepatitis B or by the AIDS virus. While protective clothing will rarely be medically indicated, it has been made available in establishments for use when judged necessary.

Policemen (Dorset)

35. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the future provision of policemen in Dorset.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is the responsibility of the Dorset police authority to determine the authorised establishment of the force, subject to my right hon. Friend's approval. Seventy-one additional police posts have been approved for the force since May 1979, bringing the authorised establishment up to 1,235. The last increase was nine police posts approved with effect from 1 April 1987, which met in full the police authority's application for this financial year (1987-88).

Metropolitan Police (Stop and Search Operations)

36. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many stop and search operations took place in 1986 in the Metropolitan police area; how many of these resulted in (a) arrests and (b) successful prosecutions; and what were the equivalent figures for 1985.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Information on the number of stops and searches in 1986 in each police force area, recorded in accordance with the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, will be published shortly in a Home Office statistical bulletin. I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the available information for stops and searches in 1985 relates to the last three quarters of 1985 only, during which a total of 24,600 searches of persons and vehicles were made, resulting in 4,000 arrests. Prior to 1 April 1985, the information collected related to all stops and was collected on an annual basis only; figures for the first quarter of 1985 could only be provided at disproportionate cost. From 1 April 1985 a force order was introduced and information was collected in line with the requirements of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 in anticipation of its implementation on 1 January 1986. The figures collected in 1985 will not be comparable with those for 1986 because the 1984 Act extended the powers of search available.

Buildings (Hostile Attacks)

37. Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the final report of the working party on the rescue of persons from the buildings damaged by hostile attack will be published; and if he will make it his policy to place a copy of the report in the Library as soon as it is available.

Mr. Douglas Hogg The report of the working group on rescue is expected by the summer. Decisions on the publication of its recommendations will be taken when the report has been received.

"Civil Protection"

38. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will arrange for a copy of each subsequent issue of the quarterly bulletin, "Civil Protection", to be sent out to all hon. Members; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A number of copies of each issue are placed in the Library. If any hon. Members wish to receive copies on an individual basis we should be happy to include them on the mailing list.

Civil Protection Planning

39. Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he proposes to issue a statement on the current state of civil protection planning following the conclusion of the initial phase of the planned programme for implementation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We shall prepare a further report on the implementation of the 1983 regulations in the light of the information which we have asked local authorities to supply by 1 October.

40. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied, on the basis of the plans so far submitted under the planned programme for implementation, with the performance of local authorities in recruiting and training civil defence volunteers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Much more undoubtedly needs to be done by most local authorities in accepting and training civil defence volunteers. The planned programme for implementation suggests that initial priority should be given to the completion of detailed operational plans. But as the programme develops we shall be giving increasing attention to the role of volunteers.

41. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if all the local authorities required to do so under the planned programme for implementation have submitted their plans compiled under the Civil Defence Regulations 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The PPI is a rolling three-year programme setting a series of monitoring targets for all the requirements of the 1983 regulations. The first target date in respect of plans is 1 October this year. All the initial PPI meetings with individual county authorities have been completed satisfactorily.

Prison Building Programme

42. Mr. Spencer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the most recent progress in the prison building programme.

Mr. Mellor: The prison building programme includes 20 new establishments. Three have been completed and occupied; six are being built; two of which will be ready for occupation this year and three by spring 1988; the remainder are at various stages of design or planning. Together these new establishments will provide some 10,600 new places by the mid 1990s. In addition, we are modernising and redeveloping the existing prison estate, with major capital works in progress or planned at about 100 establishments. This part of the building programme will provide a further 6,600 new places by about the same date making a total of 17,200 in all.

Church Buildings

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will seek to amend the terms of charity law to enable owners of church buildings to allow them to be sold to other religious denominations even if they do not offer the highest purchase price; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: I have been asked to reply.

This is not principally a matter concerning charity law. If a building is held subject to a trust, the trustees wishing to sell it have a general duty, regardless of the nature of the building, to obtain the best price that they reasonably can. I see no reason for disapplying this duty in the case of church buildings.

British Summer Time

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received in support of the extension of British summer time.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In the past 12 months we have received 33 representations favouring the extension of summer time by the introduction of British standard time or central European time and 13 proposals for other changes.

British Broadcasting Corporation

Mr. Roy Jenkins asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in considering the four appointments or reappointments to be made to the board of governors of the British Broadcasting Corporation pending, he will make it his policy to seek a broad political spread amongst those appointed.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to a question by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 28 April at column 65-66.

Settlement Applications

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how long it currently takes to consider the application for settlement of a spouse of a British citizen who has been allowed to remain in Britain following marriage and whose entry was on a valid visa.

Mr. Waddington: For such cases decided in 1986, the average time between application and the grant of settlement was about 4½ months.

Elections (Unopposed Candidates)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many seats in today's elections resulted in the return of unopposed candidates.

Mr. Hurd: This information is not yet available.

Nuclear Waste Disposal

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total cost of the police attendance at the four sites chosen for exploration of low-level nuclear waste dumping from July 1986.

Mr. Hurd: I am asking the relevant chief constables to let me have such information as is available and will write to the hon. Member.

Prisons (Costs)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the cost of maintaining a prisoner in (a) local prisons, (b) other prisons and (c) penal establishments for those below prison age, in the latest year for which statistics are available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The latest available information was published in the report on the work of the prison department 1985-86 (Cm. 11—appendix 3, table E) a copy of which is in the Library. As noted in paragraph 70 of the report, the figures reflected a 1 per cent. reduction in real operating costs, in a year in which the prison population grew by 7 per cent.

Animal Procedures Committee

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, pursuant to his reply of 1 April, Official Report, columns 515-16, he has made any further appointment to the Animal Procedures Committee under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

Mr. Hurd: Further to my reply of 1 April 1987, I am pleased to announce that, acting jointly with the Department of Health and Social Services for Northern Ireland I have appointed Professor T. R. E. Pilkington to the animal procedures committee established under section 19 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. Professor Pilkington is professor of medicine at St. George's hospital medical school, London. I am very grateful to Professor Pilkington for letting us have the benefit of his considerable expertise in the new committee.

Prison System (Research and Advisory Group)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the work of the research and advisory group on the long-term prison system.

Mr. Hurd: A report setting out the research and advisory group's advice on the special units for long-term prisoners recommended by the control review committee has been published today under the title "Special Units for Long-Term Prisoners: Regimes, Management and Research". Copies have been placed in the Library.

Metropolitan Police (Reorganisation)

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the progress of the force reorganisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the reorganisation of the force is now nearly complete.

The territorial structure of the force has been simplified by the abolition of the district level of command. Largely as a result of this, the number of commander and chief superintendent posts has been reduced by more than 50. The new two-tier structure consists of eight Areas and 75 territorial divisions. Chains of command have been shortened, and divisional chief superintendents have been given greater responsibilities.

The growth of the force headquarters has been reversed and its size reduced by devolving many many of its functions to areas and divisions. As a result, some 1,200 posts will be passed to areas and 218 posts will be abolished, resulting in the release of that number of officers for operational posts at areas and on divisions. Most of these changes have taken place already, and the remainder will follow by April 1988. In addition, 150 civil staff will have been released from headquarters by this date.

As a further consequence of the reorganisation, another 200 officers have been released for deployment to other operational duties on divisions by the setting up of territorial support groups to replace the special patrol group and district support units.

I greatly welcome these changes and the benefits which the force reorganisation promises for the future.

Guildford Pub Bombings

Mr. Heffer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why no mention was made in his Department's memorandum on the Guildford bombing case of the medical inquiry into the condition of Carole Richardson conducted at the request of the senior medical officer at HM remand centre, Risley, in April 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 9 April, c. 364]: We took account of the report in the consideration of the case which preceded my right hon. Friend's statement on 20 January this year at columns 735-38. But we did not think it right for the memorandum supplementing that statement to make any reference to a medical report which, so far as we were aware, had not been made public by Miss Richardson's solicitors.

We are giving further consideration to the report in the context of the representations about the case which have been made since 20 January.

Coroners (Wales)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to how many of Her Majesty's coroners currently holding office in Wales are Welsh-speaking; and how many are not Welsh-speaking.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [pursuant to his reply, 10 April, c. 424]: Of the 50 coroners, deputy coroners and assistant deputy coroners holding office in Wales, 15 are sufficiently fluent in Welsh to be able to conduct an inquest without an interpreter.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Voluntary Aided Schools

Sir George Young asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to fund capital projects in voluntary aided schools to enable them to meet minimum statutory requirements for premises.

Mr. Dunn: When making allocations in respect of capital expenditure by the governors of voluntary aided and special agreement schools, my right hon. Friend takes account of certain statutory requirements. In 1987-88 the allocations allowed for all the projects falling into the following categories: committed expenditure on projects already under way to which governors are legally and contractually committed; "basic need", that is new or expanded schools in areas of population growth; work related to statutory proposals approved by my right hon. Friend which the proposers are legally obliged to implement.

It was also possible to support 13 major projects which, while not statutorily necessary, were required to remedy severe dilapidation or to improve extremely inadequate accommodation. Further sums for minor works were made available to local authorities for them to apply in consultation with the governors of aided schools in their areas.

My right hon. Friend will continue to take account of statutory requirements, as well as the desirability of upgrading inadequate premises when making allocations in future years.

"Providing for Quality"

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish the circular "Providing for Quality: the Pattern of Organisation to Age 19", issued in draft form in August 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to publish the final copy of the draft circular, "Providing for Quality"; and why it was not published by Easter as originally proposed.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The circular is being published today. It aims to give comprehensive advice on school provision and organisation to all school promoters. It explains and develops the guidance in the 1985 White Paper "Better Schools", and offers advice on the curricular and other considerations which promoters should bear in mind in formulating proposals for future rationalisation. The text incorporates a number of revisions which have been made in the light of responses to the draft.

Meningitis

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will ensure that a decision whether or not to fund the Edinburgh meningitis project will be taken in such time as to enable the department of bacteriology at the university of Edinburgh to appoint appropriate staff for the project to start at the beginning of the forthcoming academic year.

Mrs. Rumbold: I understand that the application from the department of bacteriology at the university of Edinburgh will be considered by the Medical Research Council's physiological systems and disorders board at its next meeting in June. It is for the MRC to determine its scientific priorities from within the annual grant in aid which it receives from the Department's science budget.

Academic Institutions (MRC Funding)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy towards the minimum period for an academic institution to be informed, in advance of the beginning of any academic year, of what Medical Research Council funding will be available for that year.

Mrs. Rumbold: Academic institutions receive Medical Research Council funding through grants to individual applicants. Each grant covers a specific project or programme of research, has a fixed tenure and provides an agreed level of support. MRC funding for each institution is the sum of all the individual grants made to researchers in that institution. Thus funding for an academic year is determined by the grants in existence at the beginning of each year but may increase during the year as new grants are awarded.

Welsh Language

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the present allowance for Welsh medium teaching at the University College of Wales referred to by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) on 30 April, Official Report, column 469.

Mrs. Rumbold: As I said, the separate constituents of the block grant made to each university are not identified by the University Grants Committee, in accordance with established convention.

Comprehensive Schools and Examinations

Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will state the main points which were agreed at a meeting between his Department's director of statistics and the authors of the Centre for Policy Studies' report, "Comprehensives: Counting the Cost", to consider his Department's statistical bulletin 13/84 and its relevance to proposals for the reorganisation of secondary schools;

(2) if he will state the findings of his Department's statistical analyses of examination attainments at 16-plus; and what differential performance they show as between local education authorities with 15 per cent. of pupils in grammar schools and fully comprehensive local education authorities assuming that social class factors are held constant.

Mr. Dunn: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Expenditure

Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much has been spent on primary and secondary schools (a) in England as a whole and (b) in Staffordshire each year since 1978-79, at constant prices.

Mr. Dunn: The information requested is given in the following table:

Net institutional recurrent expenditure

£ million—1985-86 real terms

	On Primary Schools		On Secondary Schools
	England	Staffordshire	England	Staffordshire
1978-79	3,087	73·4	3,871	86·6
1979-80	2,990	70·6	3,796	85·2
1980-81	3,081	72·4	4,012	91·3

The cash figures for the earlier years have been repriced to 1985-86 prices using the Gross Domestic Product (Market Prices) Deflator.

Schools (Reorganisation)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to publish the report by Mr. Angus Mitchell of the efficiency scrutiny of procedures for the reorganisation of schools in England; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The report is being published today, together with a summary of the conclusions I have reached on its recommendations.

I am grateful to Mr. Mitchell for his report, a copy of which I have placed in the Library. I have accepted a number of his recommendations, including his proposals that the Department should update the published guidance on its criteria for the consideration of proposals to reorganise schools, and that the Department should take steps to accelerate its own procedures. My aim will be to decide all proposals, wherever practicable, within six months of their publication.

I am also proposing to consult the local authority associations and other interested parties about his recommendation for a code of practice on the ocnsultation procedures to be followed before proposals for school reorganisations are made. I could not, however, accept other recommendations, particularly those which would have changed the framework within which the character of schools is determined and thus run counter to the steps the Government are taking to secure their greater autonomy.

PBI-NSDO (Sale)

Sir Anthony Grant asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will report progress on the sale of part of the Plant Breeding Institute and the National Seed Development Organisation.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: An information memorandum offering for sale certain Plant Breeding Institute plant breeding assets and all the shares of the National Seed Development Organisation is being made available today.

The memorandum, which is being issued by Lazard Brothers on the Government's behalf and which contains commercially confidential material, will be issued to serious prospective purchasers on completion of an undertaking to keep its contents confidential. Interested purchasers should contact Lazard Brothers.

The principal PBI plant breeding assets to be sold are the breeding programmes for wheat, barley, potatoes and field beans, certain chemistry, pathology, physiology, statistics and computing activities and the site and buildings at Trumpington.

The PBI's plant science programmes, including molecular genetics and cytogenetics, and the oilseed rape breeding programme are not included in the sale. The plant science programmes will become part of the Agricultural and Food Research Council's new Institute of Plant Science Research, to be based at Norwich. Relevant programmes will continue on the Trumpington site until the end of March 1990. Following the sale of PBI plant breeding and NSDO, the Agricultural Genetics Company will take over the oilseed rape breeding programme on a basis agreed with the Agricultural and Food Research Council. The council will receive a financial return as new oilseed rape varieties are produced.

Prospective purchasers will have until 12 June to submit offers and are also being asked to supply relevant details about their present activities and future strategy. A short list of possible purchasers will thereafter be drawn up.

In finalising the sale, the Government will wish to be satisfied that the successful purchaser is committed to the continuation of plant breeding relevant to United Kingdom agriculture and horticulture as well as to research, investment and employment in the United Kingdom.

Education Support Grants

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish his proposals for the programme of education support grants in 1988-89.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have written today to the local authority associations proposing expenditure of £115·5 million on this programme next year — that is £75·5 million for the continuing support of projects begun in earlier years and £40 million for new projects. The purposes for which I propose to pay grant are listed in the table. The new starts fall into five broad terms.

To improve the school curriculum I propose to extend support for the employment of advisory teachers in science and technology for the primary schools, and to pursue the recommendations of the Cockroft report on mathematics teaching. I also propose pilot projects to develop records of achievement for school leavers, to encourage schools to try alternatives to French as the first foreign language offered to pupils, and to prepare all pupils for life in a mult-ethnic society.

In the field of special needs I propose to offer more LEAs support for the establishment of teams to help parents with the education of handicapped pupils under five, and to continue the work of preventing drug misuse among young people.

In further education I propose new starts in four activities. These are designed to open educational opportunities to adults, to stimulate new forms of provision for young people in the cities, and to equip technical colleges to teach computer-aided engineering.

I propose to devote almost half of the expenditure on new starts, £19 million, to the expansion of information technology in the schools. Information technology has already shown its potential to improve the education of school pupils of all ages and in most subjects. I seek now to spread its benefits more widely through the provision to schools of more microcomputers, and more advisory teachers.

Finally, I propose support for the instalment of management information systems in further education establishments.

Grant would be paid at the rate of 70 per cent. on expenditure approved for 1989 in all these activities except the third (records of achievement), where I propose a rate of 50 per cent. I have invited views from the local authority associations on the question of the wider use of the 50 per cent. rate in future years; and on my proposals to encourage authorities to supplement the public expenditure on information technology in schools and computer-aided engineering with private contributions.

When I have completed consultations with the local authority associations, I shall lay before the House the necessary amendments to the education support grant regulations, and issue a circular inviting local education authorities to bid for the programme.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, further to his statement in the debate on the Education (School Teachers' Pay and Conditions of Employment) Order 1987 on 5 May, Official Report, column 677, if he will place in the Library a copy of his letter to head teachers about future pay determination arrangements for teachers.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Yes; I have written today to head teachers of maintained schools in England. Copies of my letter have been placed in the Library.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Value Added Tax

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue yield from value added tax at 17 per cent. on the sale of new houses in the current financial year on the basis of estimated sales in 1986 and 1987; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing which European Economic Community countries propose value added tax on (a) new housing and (b) other housing.

Mr. Brooke: It is estimated that the net additional full-year revenue of imposing value added tax at 17 per cent. on private new housing would be about £775 million (at 1987-88 prices), based on estimated sales in 1986.

In Portugal and the Federal Republic of Germany, sales of new houses are understood to be exempt from value added tax, but subject to specific property taxes. The other European Economic Community countries appear to tax private new housing at either the standard or reduced rates of value added tax.

Other housing transactions are generally exempt from value added tax in all the Community countries, although Italy is believed to tax sales made by registered traders. I regret that information about the tax treatment of housing in Greece is not available.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue yield from value added tax at 15 per cent. on the estimated sales of new houses in 1986-87.

Mr. Brooke: It is estimated that the net additional full-year revenue of imposing value added tax at 15 per cent. on private new housing would be about £675 million (at 1986-87 prices), based on estimated sales in 1986.

Textiles (Customs Seizures)

Mr. Waller asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the number of cases where textile goods imported into the United Kingdom have been seized under the provisions of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 on the grounds that they contravened section 16 of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, for each of the past five years.

Mr. Brooke: In each of the last five years the number of cases where textile goods have been seized under the provisions of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 on the grounds that they contravened section 16 of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, were as follows:

	Number
1982	nil
1983	nil
1984	82
1985	97
1986	149

Prior to 1984, Customs practice was not to seize goods imported contrary to the Trade Descriptions Act 1968, but to detain them and then release them when the offending marks had been removed or altered.

Civil Servants (Pay)

Mr. Onslow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what grades in the Civil Service are currently entitled to automatic annual pay increments; and how many staff this involves.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Strip Searches

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which Mrs.

Jean Warrington was strip-searched by customs officers at Gatwick airport during the first week of April; what is the policy of Her Majesty's Customs and Excise towards the use of strip searches; what guidelines are given to customs officers on the procedures for strip searches; with particular reference to the treatment of pregnant women; and as to the sex of the officers who carried out the search; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1987]: No. Individual clearances of passengers and their baggage are dealt with on a confidential basis. Passengers may be searched by customs officers under the provisions of the Customs and Excise Management Act 1979 where there are reasonable grounds to suspect that dutiable, prohibited or restricted goods are being carried, or by virtue of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (Application to Customs and Excise) Order 1985 under which the relevant provisions of the latter Act are applied directly to the activities of customs officers. With certain specific exceptions (eg Heads of State and accredited diplomats) any passenger is liable to be searched provided there are reasonable grounds.

Customs officers are required, and trained, to carry out all such searches professionally and with tact and courtesy. Female passengers may not be searched by or in the presence of male officers and internal examinations can only be undertaken by a qualified medical practitioner.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Mr. Michael Delaney

Mr. Cohen asked the Attorney-General if, in the light of the verdict of the coroner's court of unlawful killing in respect of the death on 10 January of Michael Delaney, he will take steps to prosecute those responsible for Mr. Delaney's death; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: No.

Lord Rothschild

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General if, pursuant to his answer of 24 April, Official Report, column 7, the Director of Public Prosecutions has yet received an interim report from the Metropolitan police in relation to the possible prosecution of Lord Rothschild under section 2 of the Official Secrets Act; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions received an interim report from the Metropolitan Police on 24 April and is considering it. It may be necessary to ask the police to make further inquiries before a decision can be taken.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Immigration

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give details of typical waiting times for the various categories of application for entry clearance at each port in the Indian sub-continent.

Mr. Renton: As at 31 March 1987, waiting times for interview in respect of applications for entry clearance for settlement are as set out in the table (in months):

	Priority Queue	Spouses and children under 18	Fiancé(e)s and others	re-applicants
Islamabad	3	8	14	15
Karachi	3	6	11	(no cases)
New Delhi	3	4	8	12
Bombay	3	6	10	12
Calcutta		No queues in operation
Madras		No queues in operation
Dhaka	3	7	7	21

The great majority of applications for visit visas is currently dealt with within 24 hours. In the few cases where a more detailed interview is required the waiting times are 12 working days in New Delhi, five working days in Bombay and one to three days in Madras. There are no queues for visit visas at the other posts listed above.

Hong Kong

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, pursuant to his answer of 27 April, Official Report, column 16, the changes in the conditions of employment for foreign domestic helpers in Hong Kong will apply to those helpers already working in the colony.

Mr. Renton: The revised conditions of employment for foreign domestic helpers will apply to those helpers already working in Hong Kong with the exception of the provision governing wage levels. This will apply only to those renewing existing contracts or entering new ones.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will enable oral representations to be made by the people of Hong Kong in response to the forthcoming Green Paper on the development of representative government in the territory.

Mr. Renton: The Hong Kong Government announced on 25 March that an independent survey office will be established to collect, collate and report on the public response to the Green Paper which is soon to be published in Hong Kong. In accordance with its terms of reference, the office will take positive steps to invite and encourage as wide a public response as possible. The people of Hong Kong will be able to express their views to the office through a wide variety of channels.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the minimum level of remuneration for foreign domestic helpers in Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Following an announcement by the Hong Kong Government on 16 April, the lowest possible wage for foreign domestic helpers entering or renewing contracts will be 2,300 Hong Kong dollars per month. The aim of the Hong Kong Government in announcing these changes is to protect the interests of foreign domestic helpers and their employers, as well as those of local domestic helpers.

Ascension Island (Cats)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in the control of feral cats in Ascension Island.

Mr. Renton: Ascension Island services and the Royal Air Force periodically undertake cat culls to ensure that the feral cat population does not increase to a level at which it becomes a serious threat to public health or the bird life of the Island. The most recent was last month, when 35 cats were destroyed. The next is scheduled for June. In 1986, 273 feral cats were destroyed.

DEFENCE

United States Forces

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what information he has as to why Dodge Ram, Chevrolet Blazer, Chevrolet Suburban cruise support vehicles and other commercial utility cargo vehicles were transferred from United States air force Greenham Common to (a) United States air force Molesworth and (b) United States air force Alconbury between 20 March and 10 April;

(2) what information he has as to how many packets of commercial utility cargo vehicles were moved to United States air force Molesworth and United States air force Alconbury between 20 March and 10 April;

(3) what information he has as to what cargo was carried in each packet of commercial utility cargo vehicles that were transferred to United States air force Molesworth and United States air force Alconbury between 20 March and 10 April;

(4) what information he has as to whether any United States air force Chevrolet security police vehicles have been moved from United States air force Greenham Common to United States air force Molesworth and United States air force Alconbury; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Numerous movements of commercial vehicles in and out of RAF Molesworth and RAF Alconbury took place on a routine basis during the period in question. It is not our practice to detail the goods being moved to and from service establishments, or generally to comment on military vehicle movements.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any personnel from the 501st tactical missile wing have been assigned to temporary support duty with the 303rd tactical missile wing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The assignment of United States service personnel to United States units is a matter for the United States authorities.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Air Force or other British forces personnel are currently attached to the 303 tactical missile wing.

Mr. Stanley: For security reasons I cannot disclose the number of British service men at a given location.

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what records are kept of damage caused to cruise missile convoys and support vehicles;

(2) whether specific forms are in use to record the damage caused to cruise missile convoys; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: Incidents causing damage to vehicles associated with cruise missile training are recorded on information sheets.

Explosives (Eastern Bloc Countries)

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Defence from which Eastern bloc countries explosives for use in British armaments are obtained stating, in respect of each, the percentage of total explosives used in British armaments.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The only known recent instance of the use of Eastern bloc explosives in ammunition for the British services was the 1985 use, by the Belgian company PRB, of a quantity of Polish TNT in fulfilling an order for 25-pounder shells for use in low-level training. The TNT in the order concerned constituted very much less than one per cent. of that used by or in use with the British services.

Royal Navy (Ship Orders)

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many major ships and submarines have been ordered for the Royal Navy since 1979.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Sixty-three major ships and submarines have been ordered for the Royal Navy since 1 January 1979.

Morthoe II

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the arrangements for the ordering, tendering, and production of the Morthoe II defence system; and to what extent the equipment being supplied (a) meets the original specifications, (b) will be delivered on the originally agreed date, and (c) will be supplied at the price agreed when the order was originally given.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have nothing to add to the evidence given to the Comptroller and Auditor General and to the Public Accounts Committee, as reflected in their reports; respectively, Ministry of Defence: Control and Management of the Development of Major Equipment (dated 22 July 1986) and sixth report (dated 18 February 1987).

Aero Engines (Sale)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will hold an inquiry into the source of the letter dated 19 March to companies in the United Kingdom purporting to announce the suspension of tenders in relation to the sale of surplus aero engines by his Department.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The source of the letter is being investigated by the MOD Police.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will place a copy of all correspondence sent by his Department to companies intending to tender for the surplus Palouste mark 102 aero engines relating to tender applications in the Library; and will he make a statement.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: On 9 March 1987, MOD issued a tender inviting bids for a number of Palouste mark 102 and other aero engines which were surplus to requirements. Tenders were due for return by 23 April 1987.

Early in April, my officials learned that two potential tenderers had received a letter dated 19 March, purportedly from MOD, advising that the tender had been suspended. Those letters were passed to the MOD and handed over to the MOD police for investigation.

Officials then wrote to all those originally invited to tender to inform them that the sale would proceed as originally indicated except that to allow for any inconvenience suffered by those who had received the spurious letter dated 19 April, the date for return of tenders would be extended until 14 May 1987.

I have placed copies of the correspondence sent by MOD in the Library.

Tender

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement as to the status of tender numbered 6P(Air)/187/88/294.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The status of tender numbered F 6t(Air)/1/87-88/294 is that it remains valid and the date for return has been extended until 14 May 1987.

Air Defence

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what changes are contemplated in the short-range air defence of Royal Air Force airfields in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: We are intending to make a significant increase in the number of Rapier fire units deployed at RAF stations in the United Kingdom. By deploying existing RAF manpower and using Rapier fire units from the RAF repair pool, we plan by the early 1990s to achieve a 50 per cent. increase in the number of Rapier fire units being used to protect United Kingdom RAF stations. This will be a further useful improvement in the United Kingdom's air defences.

Salamanca Barracks (Search)

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the nature of the witness evidence received which led to the commanding officer of 3 Regiment, Army Air Corps to authorise the search of the Navy, Army, Air Force Institutes hostel at Salamanca barracks, Soest; what were the alleged stolen goods; how many residents are at the hostel; how many military personnel were involved; and why a sniffer dog was used.

Mr. Freeman: Witness evidence was received to the effect that certain residents of the NAAFI had been carrying numerous items of electrical equipment to and from their rooms. Witness evidence was also received which indicated that one of the residents had been regularly seen fitting radios to privately owned vehicles in the barracks. There were six residents at the hostel at the time of the search and six royal military police were involved, one for each resident. A sniffer dog was used because information received from an additional source gave reasonable grounds to suspect that proscribed drugs were being used on the premises.

Nuclear Weapons (Deployment)

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the approximate number of nuclear (a) intermediate range, (b) short range and (c) battlefield weapons deployed by the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the Warsaw pact, respectively.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987]: I refer my hon. Friend to figures 15 and 16 of annex A to volume 1 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1987" (Cmnd. 101) published today.

United Kingdom-United States of America (Treaties)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list all treaties, agreements, memoranda of understanding and other formal arrangements currently in force between the United States of America and the United Kingdom covering the support provided by the United Kingdom Government either directly or indirectly for United States' military bases and installations and facilities in the United Kingdom and its territorial waters and for their expansion in a time of tension or war;

(2) if he will list all treaties, agreements, memoranda of understanding and other formal arrangements currently in force between the United States of America and the United Kingdom covering the use by the United States of military bases, both operational and support, and facilities within the territorial waters of the United Kingdom, the arrangements for the operational control of such bases and facilities, and their expansion in a time of tension and war.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to the answer, 1 May 1987, c. 300]: From the information that is readily available, is unclassified and can be released without incurring disproportionate costs I can list the following agreements.

a. The Churchill/Truman understanding 1952;
b. Exchange of notes relating to the sale of tobacco by the United States Government and the construction of housing and community facilities by HM Government 1956;
c. Memorandum of agreement on Fylingdales BMEWS 1960;
d. Agreement on the use of Holy Loch 1960;
e. Lines of communication arrangement 1973;
f. Memorandum of understanding on the use of Royal Air Force bases by United States Air Forces operational units 1974;
g. USAF Rapier MOU 1981;
h. Memorandum of understanding concerning ground-launched cruise missiles 1985;
i. Memorandum of understanding on the modernisation of the BMEWS, RAF Fylingdales 1986;

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all treaties, agreements, memoranda of understanding and other formal arrangements currently in force between the United States of America and the United Kingdom covering the use by the United States of America of bases and facilities in British territory outside the United Kingdom and support provided by the United Kingdom Government either directly or indirectly.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to the answer, 1 May 1987, c. 300]: US military facilities exist at Ascension Island, Bermuda and Diego Garcia under the following instruments respectively:

Agreement between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the United States of America concerning the extension of the Bahamas Long Range Proving Ground by the Establishment of Additional Sites in Ascension Island.
Dated 25 June 1956.

Treaty Series No. 25 (1956).
Command 9810.

Agreement between the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States of America relating to the Bases Leased to the United States of America and Exchanges of Notes.
Dated 27 March 1941.

Command 2761.

Exchange of Notes between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the United States of America concerning Facilities for United States Forces on Ascension Island.
Dated 30 March 1973.
Treaty Series No. 55 (1973).
Command 5311.

Exchange of Notes between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the United States of America regarding arrangements for the use by United Kingdom Forces of Military Facilities on Ascension Island.
Dated 25 March 1985.
Treaty Series No. 39 (1985).
Command 9590.

Exchange of Notes between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the United States of America modifying the Leased Bases Agreement of 27th March 1941.
Dated 19 July-1 August 1950.
Treaty Series No. 65 (1950).
Command 8076.

Exchange of Notes between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the United States of America regarding additional Civil Airport facilities at the United States Kindley Air Force Base, Bermuda.
Dated 4 June 1968.
Treaty Series No. 80 (1968).
Command 3753.

Exchange of Notes between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the United States of America amending and supplementing the Agreement of 27 March 1941, as amended, regarding Leased Naval and Air Bases on Bermuda.
Dated 5-6 December 1978.
Treaty Series No. 46 (1979).
Command 7561.

Exchange of Notes between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the Government of the United States of America further amending and supplementing the Agreement of 27 March 1941, as amended, regarding Leased Naval and Air Bases on Bermuda.
Dated 7 March 1985.
Treaty Series No. 46 (1985).
Command 9607.

Her Majesty's Government provide certain administrative and logistic support within the terms of these agreements.

SCOTLAND

Lung Cancer

Mr. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he will be taking to seek to bring down the high incidence of lung cancer in Glasgow; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: Tobacco smoking is a prime cause of lung cancer. The Government's strategy is to inform people about the health risks associated with smoking by the promotion of health education. At national level, the Scottish Health Education Group spent £267,000 (provisional) in 1986-87 on its anti-smoking programmes. In addition, by its sponsorship of the Scottish Football Association cup, positive health messages about non-smoking have been included in trackside and other advertising at football grounds. Information about health education programmes undertaken by Greater Glasgow health board can be obtained from the health board.

Tobacco smoking is the greatest single cause of avoidable ill health and premature death in Scotland and any reduction in smoking would consequently reduce the incidence of lung cancer.

Monofilament Nets

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has for bringing the treatment of English and Danish fishing vessels into line respecting the carriage of monofilament nets in Scottish waters and at Scottish ports.

Mr. John MacKay: None. The order relates to United Kingdom vessels in inshore waters around Scotland and was made to improve enforcement in salmon protection.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many Grimsby fishing vessels have been searched for monofilament nets in Scottish ports in the last year; how many such nets have been found; and what action has been taken at local level.

Mr. John MacKay: We do not keep our records in such detailed forms and it would not be cost-effective to do so. We have in the course of routine inspections found one such net on a Grimsby vessel and my officials have duly cautioned the skipper with a view to referring the case for prosecution.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what instructions he has given to his fishery officers in respect of treatment of English fishing vessels putting into Scottish ports and carrying monofilament nets for (a) safety reasons, (b) to seek emergency medical treatment, (c) for repairs and (d) to unload and sell fish.

Mr. John MacKay: As I indicated when we debated the Inshore Fishing (Prohibition of Carriage of Monofilament Gill Nets) (Scotland) Order 1986, my officials are under instruction to enforce it in a sensible way and not to refer for possible prosecution vessels carrying monofilament nets in cases of emergency, such as engine malfunction or medical problems or, subject to permission, where adverse weather conditions justify coming into the specified sea area or into port. In the absence of such emergencies, referal for prosecution would result from failure to respect the ban.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many English fishing vessels have been prosecuted for carriage of monofilament nets since the prohibition on carriage of these nets came into force; and how many prosecutions are pending.

Mr. John MacKay: None. There is one case currently under investigation and the skipper has accordingly been cautioned.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many Grimsby fishing vessels have been boarded, photographed and inspected in ports in the last month in Scotland and in fishing waters controlled by his Department.

Mr. John MacKay: We do not keep records by port of origin and to do so would add disproportionately to our costs without improving enforcement significantly.

Housing Organisations

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the future relationship between the Scottish Special Housing Association and the Housing Corporation in Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: I have today published a consultation paper "Scottish Homes—A New Agency for Housing in Scotland". The task of this agency would be to promote and assist the development of housing in Scotland and to build on the successes of the Scottish Special Housing Association and the Housing Corporation in Scotland. I expect Scottish Homes to operate in a flexible way and, more specifically, work towards the greater use of private finance in the provision of housing; to give tenants a greater choice in housing through diversification of tenure and ownership; and to form close partnerships with local authorities, housing associations and other landlords to improve housing, include large single-tenure local authority housing estates.

This new agency, which would replace both SSHA and the Housing Corporation in Scotland, would be an enabling and funding body with wide powers and a wide remit. The consultation paper also suggests that the new body should, under appropriate arrangements, take over the SSHA housing stock and also those functions which the Housing Corporation itself undertakes for Scotland.

I commend the proposals in the consultation document for careful study by all interests concerned with the future of Scottish housing and I shall be glad to receive and consider their views.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Police Complaints

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons were arrested by the police in Northern Ireland in 1986 under emergency legislation, and under other arrest powers; how many in each category complained whilst in police custody of irregular conduct by police officers during interview procedures; how many of any such complaints in each category were not subsequently pursued by complainants with the Police Complaints Board; and what proportion of those persons were arrested under emergency legislation who alleged irregular conduct by police officers during interview procedures were at the time being interviewed at (a) Castlereagh and (b) Gough police offices, respectively.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the right hon. and learned Member as soon as possible.

Maternity Payments

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many women in Northern Ireland were in receipt of maternity allowance grant for each year since 1978; and what proportion of those numbers will continue to receive state aid when the new Government regulations come into force.

Mr. Needham: Information is not available in the precise form requested. However, the number of £25 maternity grants paid was as follows:

Year ended 31 March	Grants
1978	24,040
1979	25,300
1980	25,590
1981	25,870
1982	[1]25,056
1983	27,653
1984	26,293
1985	26,682
1986	26,092
1987	22,705

[1] Estimated.

It is estimated that some 12,400 maternity payments at £80 will be made from the social fund during the year ending 31 March 1988.

Children in Care

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what number of children were in care in Northern Ireland for each year since 1978; and what proportion they were of the total number of children in Northern Ireland for each year since 1978.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is given in the table below for the years 1978-85, the latest year for which figures are available.

Children in care of the Northern Ireland Health and Social Services Boards under section 103 of the Children and Young Persons Act (NI) 1968 or under a Fit Person Order under that Act at 31 December.

Year	Total number of children in care	Rate per 1000 population aged under 18
1978	2,021	3·9
1979	2,127	4·2
1980	2,444	4·8
1981	2,584	5·1
1982	2,559	5·2
1983	2,547	5·2
1984	2,448	5·0
1985	2,512	5·2

Abortions

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what number of women died as a result of illegal abortions in Northern Ireland for each year since 1977.

Mr. Needham: In the years 1977 to 1985 there was one such death; in 1982.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much money has been spent on cervical cancer screening in Northern Ireland for every year since 1978; and what is the projected expenditure for each year up until 1990.

Mr. Needham: This information is not available as it is not possible to separate cervical cancer screening from other components of health service running costs. The Government are however, committed to an expansion of the cervical cancer screening service and to the introduction of a computerised call and recall system in the current financial year. Additional resources of £400,000 a year are being made available for 1987-88 to meet the extra laboratory, staffing, computer and administrative costs of the expanded service.

AFP Test

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many and what proportion of pregnant women in Northern Ireland were given the AFP test for each year since 1978.

Mr. Needham: The information is not recorded in the form requested and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Spina Bifida

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many and what proportion of babies in Northern Ireland were born with spina bifida for each year since 1978, broken down in terms of live and still births.

Mr. Needham: The information is as follows:

Year	Live spina bifida births	Rate per 1,000 live births	Still spina bifida births	Rate per 1,000 still births
1978	72	2·7	10	40·3
1979	67	2·4	19	74·8
1980	50	1·8	17	65·6
1981	52	1·9	18	75·3
1982	50	1·9	12	61·2
1983	41	1·5	7	36·1

Note: 1983 is the most recent year for which information on spina bifida births is available.

Detained Persons

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland of those persons arrested by the police under emergency legislation in 1986 in Northern Ireland (a) how many asked for access to a legal adviser during the first 48 hours in custody following arrest, (b) how many asked for access after the first 48 hours in custody and (c) how many requests were granted, respectively.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the right hon. and learned Member as soon as possible.

Land (Dungannon)

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will establish an inquiry into the use which has been made of his Department's grant in relation to the transaction of land between Dungannon district council and Tyrone Development Ltd.; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: I am satisfied as to the use which has been made of the Department of the Environment's grant and do not consider that an inquiry is necessary.

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations he has received from members of Dungannon district council expressing concern over a land deal involving the council and Tyrone Development Ltd; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: In December 1986 I received a letter from a member of Dungannon district council expressing concern about the Dungannon Park Farm project.

Suckler Cow Premium

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to announce increases in the suckler cow premium.

Mr. Viggers: The rate of suckler cow premium payable in 1987 will be decided and announced closer to the time when applications are due.

Urban Development Grant

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland from what date the urban development grant to Newry and Armagh will be paid.

Mr. Needham: The International Fund for Ireland board announced on 15 April 1987 that it would support an urban development programme for towns in Northern Ireland including Newry and Armagh. This will involve the extension of the existing urban development grant scheme to these towns. The Department, with the agreement of the board, will advertise the terms of the extended scheme shortly.

Milk

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has plans to seek to have the co-responsibility levy on milk production reduced or abolished; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: No. Within the latest round of price-fixing negotiations the Commission propose no change in levels of co-responsibility levy. Although the United Kingdom has been opposed to the levy on principle its continuation is considered acceptable until such times as levels of dairy produce in intervention stocks fall to a more realistic level.

Housing

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people are on the housing waiting list in the Armagh urban area and Keady urban area.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available; I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has as to how many new houses are to be built in the Armagh urban area and the Keady area 1987-88 year.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available; I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Pigs

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to introduce headage payments for pig production.

Mr. Viggers: There are no plans to introduce a system of headage payments for pig production.

Beef

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he expects to announce a reduction in the delay for beef intervention payments from 140 days.

Mr. Viggers: This is a matter for decision by the European Commission.

Anglo-Irish Beef (International) Ltd.

Mr. Mallon asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether Anglo-Irish Beef (International) Ltd., Newry, has applied for grants for 16 to 18-year-olds soon to be employed there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Canoeing

Mr. Mason asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will consult the water authorities regarding the implications of the expansion of canoeing activity for the operation of the Freshwater Fisheries Acts, with particular reference to disturbance of rivers and the impact on freshwater fish; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987]: If there were any significant impact of canoeing activity in the state of freshwater fish stocks or on the operation of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975, I would expect the water authorities to draw it to my attention. They have not done so and my understanding is that there is at present no general problem on either account. The question of mutually acceptable arrangements for the use of rivers for angling, canoeing and other sports is essentially a matter for local consultation.

Farming (Retirement)

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what is his policy towards direct income aids for farmers; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make a statement on measures encouraging retirement from farming within the EEC.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his replies, 5 and 6 May 1987]: At present, nationally paid direct income aids for farmers are incompatible with articles 92 to 94 of the treaty. However, the Commission has just published proposals on this subject which also include measures to encourage early retirement from farming in the Community. It would be premature to comment until we have had the opportunity to study these proposals.

Butter

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement setting out the price, in terms of pence per pound, at which the EEC management committee of the common agricultural policy agreed to the sale of 181,000 tonnes of butter to the Soviet Union under regulation 765/86 at its March meeting; and what will be the cost which the EEC will require to fund after 1989 when member states are repaid the sums involved in subsidising these exports.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987]: The price set by the Commission in the light of the advice of the milk management committee was 211 ecu/tonne. Converted to sterling at the current green rate this is equivalent to about 6p per lb. Sales of butter under regulation 765/86 no longer qualify for export refunds but are still subject to MCAs. Because of the large negative United Kingdom MCA the effective price out of United Kingdom stores would have been about 20p per lb had any butter been sold from the United Kingdom. In fact the majority of the butter sold came from Germany and the Netherlands, where, because of the relative strengths of the green currencies involved, the effective price to traders was approximately 8p per lb.

The total amount on the sale of this butter which will be reimbursed to the Member States concerned after 1989 is about £329 million at current United Kingdom green rates.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the representative of Her Majesty's Government serving on the management committee of the Common Market's agricultural policy supported the decision to extend the scope of regulation 2409/86 to enable the subsiding of butter sales for experimental industrial uses; and if he will make a statement setting out the possible experimental industrial uses which the committee had in mind and the price, in terms of pence per pound, at which butter will be made available for these experimental industrial purposes.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987]: Regulation 2409/86 was introduced to enable the oldest stocks of intervention butter, for which no other outlets was likely, to be sold for use in animal feed. But given the disppointingly low level of returns under this scheme and a number of inquiries from potential purchasers for other non-food uses, the Commission has decided to make available a limited quantity of butter at the animal feed price of just over 2p per lb in order to evaluate these possibilities. The United Kingdom supported this approach in principle in the hope that it may result in a less expensive stock disposal policy, but we abstained on the detail of the proposed experimental arrangements, as we felt that the two month period specified would not allow sufficient time for proper assessment of the results and as there were other unsatisfactory points in the text. The regulation as amended invites interested parties to submit projects to the Commission for prior approval. No particular uses are envisaged in the regulation itself, but the ideas previously suggested to the commission include use in cosmetics, as a high-grade fuel additive or in paint.

Fishing

Sir Patrick Wall asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangement he provides for British vessels to fish off the Falkland Islands.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987]: The licensing arrangements for fishing in the Falklands are a matter for the Falkland Islands Government. The scheme to provide support for exploratory voyages and joint ventures will continue under the new structural measures which I announced in my written reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir M. Shaw) on 30 April.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his policy towards seeking to reduce expenditure on the common agricultural policy in the light of the calculations of its cost to the average family contained in the recent evidence by the consumers in the European Community Group (UK) to the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities, a copy of which has been sent to him; and what is his Department's latest estimate of the cost of the common agricultural policy per average family.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987]: The Government's consistent pressure for a sustained policy of restrictive CAP prices has already brought significant results. Since 1979, the level of retail food prices in the United Kingdom has risen more slowly than the general level of prices, and of average earnings.

Any estimate of the costs of the CAP can be attempted only if assumptions are made about the alternative policy that would be operated. It is inconceivable that agriculture would go unsupported in the absence of the CAP. Any estimate which does not take proper account of that cannot be realistic. I am not prepared to speculate about such a hypothetical situation.

Shellfish

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research has been undertaken or commissioned by his Department into the bioaccumulation of metals in shellfish in estuaries as a result of acid deposition; and what were the findings.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1987]: The research programme of my Department covers the bioaccumulation of metals in fish and shellfish from all sources. Present levels are generally lower than those found previously.

Sugar

Mr. Spearing asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list all forms of subsidy, assistance or other financial support available to the beet sugar industry and not available to cane sugar refineries.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1987]: Refiners of ACP cane sugar do not receive storage refunds, but similarly they do not pay storage levies. ACP cane sugar refined in the Community is not eligible for sale into intervention. The main difference however between the two sectors is that the beet processing margin is calculated on a more satisfactory basis than the cane refining margin. In this respect I secured an undertaking from the European Commission at the Agriculture Council on 24/25 March 1986 to review the cane refining margin and report back to the Council. I expect the Commission to make its report in the near future.

ENERGY

Coal Mining (Subsidence)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he is yet in a position to publish his response to the Waddilove committee on coal mining subsidence compensation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government are still finalising the terms of their response, which will be published as soon as practicable.

Energy Management Companies

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made in classifying guidance to public sector bodies in the use of contract energy management companies.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Treasury and Department of Energy have issued a guidance note to other Government Departments on contract energy management. I believe the guidance to be an important step forward in the Government campaign to increase energy efficiency in the public sector, where potential savings total at least £400 million. The guidance emphasises that cost-effective energy efficiency measures should be encouraged and explains that contract energy management may well be an attractive option; it promotes worthwhile collaboration between the skills of the private and public sector, and guarantees improved energy management at no risk to the public sector.

The guidance makes clear that there are a range of options for improving energy efficiency. Contract energy management schemes are to be welcomed when they provide the best value for money.

Because they may provide an alternative means of financing energy efficiency capital investment, adjustments might also be required to public expenditure control totals where CEMs are used, to ensure consistent treatment with other directly funded schemes. The guidance describes what the adjustment should be, and when they are necessary.

The guidance will be kept under review in the light of experience. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House. The Energy Efficiency Office will continue to encourage the public sector to take up the opportunities offered by investment in the more efficient use of energy.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Handicapped Students

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he intends to take in response to the survey of provisions for students with special educational needs in further and higher education undertaken for his Department by the National Bureau for Handicapped Students; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: This survey report was commissioned by my right hon. Friend to provide the first full statistical summary of students with special educational needs in maintained, assisted and grant-aided institutions of further and higher education, and the courses provided for them. The Government intend to update this information periodically. They have been aware of developments in this area and have already taken related initiatives. A working group was set up last year to consider the training needs of further education college staff concerned with students with special needs, and its report will be published in the summer. Training for certain categories of such staff and local education authority staff has been made a national priority area under the LEA training grants scheme announced last year. An earlier initiative funded by the Government provided in 1985 a resource pack for teachers of students with special needs in colleges of further education. And the further education unit, which the Government fund, has also undertaken much valuable work in the special needs field in recent years, including the publication of guidance to colleges.

University of Wales

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table giving the numbers of United Kingdom students who were awarded degrees and diplomas from the University of Wales in the following subjects in the years 1979 and 1986, or the most recent year for which figures are available (a) social, administrative and business studies, (b) engineering and technology and (c) science.

Mr. Walden: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Butler Report

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science for what reason publication of the Butler report on geological surveying has been delayed.

Mr. Walden: I understand that the Advisory Board for the Research Councils and the Natural Environment Research Council, which jointly commissioned the study group into geological surveying chaired by Sir Clifford Butler, received the report on 29 April. It is for those two bodies to decide on what recommendation to make to my right hon. Friend concerning publication.

University Funding

Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give details of revised cash limits for his Department's Votes in respect of university funding in 1987-88.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate, the cash limit on class XII, vote 3 is being revised to take account of the increased provision of £40 million for the restructuring of academic staff pay announced to the House on 5 March at column 671-672; and of a further increase of £3·250 million in respect of the pay award to clinical academic staff. This increase takes account of the treatment given to the hospital and community health service in respect of the recommendations of the doctors and dentists review body. The effect of these changes is as follows:

	£'000
Class	XII
Vote	3
Description of Expenditure	Universities, etc
Current Cash Limit	1,664,683
Revision	+43,250
Revised Cash Limit	1,707,933

The increase of £43·25 million will be charged to the Reserve, so will not add to the public expenditure planning total.

Education Reforms

Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the educational reforms instituted since May 1979 together with any changes in the level of resources available to the education system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987, c. 307]: The Government's policies for raising educational standards in schools were set out in the White Paper "Better Schools" (Cmnd. 9649). We are seeking improvements in the school curriculum, including the establishment of a national foundation curriculum, to secure achievement by all pupils across a broad range of subjects necessary to prepare them better for adult and working life.

We have given financial support to promote technical and vocational education for 14-18-year-olds in schools and colleges and supported programmes for lower attaining pupils.

We have introduced the GCSE to improve examinations at 16 and are introducing the AS level to broaden sixth form studies. We are developing records of achievement for all school leavers.

The Education (No. 2) Act 1986 promotes the more effective management of maintained schools by in particular enhancing the role of governing bodies and the influence of parents. We have announced plans for the first two of a number of city technology colleges to be established in urban areas. The proportion of 3 and 4-year-olds at school has increased from 37 per cent. in 1979 to 43 per cent. in 1986. Spending per primary pupil has risen 17 per cent. in real terms; spending per secondary school pupil has risen 20 per cent. in real terms. The pupil-teacher ratio has improved from just under 19·1 : 1 in 1979 to 17·6 : 1 in 1986. Average class sizes have fallen and there are 41 per cent. fewer classes with over 30 pupils. £40 million is being spent this year on the assisted places scheme which is helping some 25,000 children from less well-off backgrounds to take up places in independent schools.

There are now 157,000 more students in higher education than in 1979 (85,000 full-time, 72,000 part-time). The number of mature students entering higher education has risen by 25,000 since 1979 and stands at 42,000. This has been achieved without loss of quality and with a higher proportion studying science and engineering, thanks partly to the Government's information technology initiative and engineering and technology programme. The number of science and engineering graduates has risen 30 per cent. since 1979. Greater cost-effectiveness has been achieved, especially in the polytechnics where unit costs have fallen substantially. the funding of universities now includes greater selectivity in the interest of concentrating support for research on the best centres. The Open University has increased its range of courses, especially in technology and in continuing education, and is admitting more students. Further major reforms to be implemented over the next few years were announced in the recent higher education White Paper.

In further education, development plans have been introduced with gains in relevance and efficiency. Course and qualification patterns continue to evolve, including the certificate of pre-vocational education, which the Government launched in 1983. Greater cost-effectiveness has been pursued through the NAFE joint efficiency study, the promotion of better management information systems and otherwise: student/staff ratios in the sector are being steadily tightened without loss of quality or opportunity. Across further and higher education the Government's professional, industrial and commercial updating programme has helped secure a big increase in work-related continuing education and is continuing its success.

The work of the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education is leading to improvements in initial teacher training, and new specific grant support for in-service teacher training is being introduced in 1987-88. The introduction of special bursaries and the establishment of teaching as a career unit are helping to improve the supply of teachers in shortage subjects. Education support grants are now well established.

The Government's plans provide for total public expenditure on education in the United Kingdom of £19.6 billion in 1987-88, more than double the equivalent figure for 1978-79.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Deaf and Dumb Children (St. Helena)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in the education of deaf and dumb children in St. Helena.

Mr. Chris Patten: An ODA supported specialist visited St. Helena in 1985 and 1986 to help establish a programme of special education for such children. Since then the St. Helena Government have reported good progress. A St. Helenian teacher is currently studying for a certificate in education (teaching of hearing-impaired children) at Oxford polytechnic. She will become one of the island's new co-ordinators for children with special needs when she returns to St. Helena later this year.

WALES

EEC Visits

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many times he has visited Brussels since he took office to discuss Welsh agriculture; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I have visited Brussels on a number of occasions to discuss Welsh agriculture. Apart from the negotiations on the sheepmeat regime in which I took part, the United Kingdom's representation in discussions with European Community Ministers on the common agriculture policy is effectively led by a single Minister and takes full account of the interests of Wales. A senior official of my Department is normally present on these occasions to advise on specifically Welsh interests.

Physical and Sensory Disabilities

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the total annual expenditure by social services departments in Wales on people with physical and sensory disabilities in each of the last 10 years at 1986-87 prices.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Rural Schools

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement concerning his policy on rural schools.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend's policy on rural schools is that they should provide the best possible quality of education for children in rural areas. The Welsh Office is supporting, through education support grants, projects to improve the quality and range of the curriculum provided in rural schools. We are also supporting research undertaken by Powys local education authority into the effectiveness of ways of providing support to small rural schools.

I have consulted interested bodies on a draft circular on the organisation of school provision: "Providing for Quality: the Pattern of Organisation to Age 19" and I am considering the comments received.

Where proposals for the closure of rural schools come before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales they are decided on the merits of the individual case, taking account of all the evidence and in particular the effects of the proposals on the quality of education provided.

THE ARTS

Education

Mr. Lawrence asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the role of arts organisations, including museums and libraries, in education and in particular in the general certificate of secondary education syllabuses.

Mr. Luce: I am convinced of the importance of the role that the arts and heritage can play in the provision of education and specifically in the GCSE syllabuses and wider development of the curriculum. This is a major opportunity to be grasped by museums, libraries and performing arts organisations for the future. My discussions with arts organisations around the country have indicated a keen awareness of the role they can play.

I am pleased to have had reports of the very active stance being taken by museums in the public and private sectors towards the GCSE. The facilities which museums and galleries have to offer are highly relevant to the new GCSE syllabuses, and my Department has sought to promote the linkage between museums and the education establishment in order to optimise the use of museums' resources. I welcomed a report by HMI, following a study in the north-west of England, which recommended schools to use museums and art galleries to interest and inspire pupils, and as part of new activity-based syllabus work. My Department, in consultation with HMI, has circulated to the area museum councils practical guidance on the GCSE and their prospective role in new syllabuses. I am delighted to learn that museums have reported a high level of demand from all parts of the country for GCSE-related visits.

In the field of the contemporary arts, a vital opportunity also exists for the arts—drama, literature, music, art and crafts—to play an important role in personal education and within the developing curriculum. The Arts Council, the British Film Institute and the Crafts Council each have education sections concerned to increase awareness in schools and colleges of the importance of the arts. Various schemes exist to bring the arts to education, for instance the project work of the Arts Council and the Regional Arts Associations undertaken in association with educational authorities and individual schools.

The library services also play a major role in meeting the needs of education within schools, colleges, polytechnics and universities, and in the community. Educational institutions, as well as their students and pupils individually, draw upon the services of the public library system. Public libraries also provide information, publicity, accommodation and support materials for a wide range of courses, and the development of the Open University and of open learning and distance learning has made their role even more vital. Within the educational curriculum, the increasing emphasis on resource-based learning and on the acquisition of information skills is placing additional responsibility on the library system, and presents new opportunities to the young and to adults in education to make use of public library facilities.

I am in touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education to explore further ways in which the links between arts organisations and education can be strengthened.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Overseas Voters

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) to which branches of the organisation known as Conservatives Abroad overseas registration documents have been supplied;

(2) by whom the review of the need for guidance on the distribution methods of overseas electors' declaration forms referred to in his answer to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West on 22 April, Official Report, column 531, is being carried out.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Overseas electors' declarations forms were distributed widely by our diplomatic missions. Information is not available centrally on all the bodies which received copies of the forms, but in practice missions would have supplied copies to any body, including a branch of Conservative Abroad, which requested them.

Police Overtime (Solihull)

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the west midlands as to how the police overtime resources at the disposal of the chief superintendent of police in Solihull in respect of D division compares with comparable forces and as to the extent to which overtime worked by Solihull police officers is actually discharged in other boroughs in the west midlands.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The chief constable has informed me that in the financial year 1986-87 a total of 37,617 hours' overtime was worked by police officers in the Solihull divisions at a cost of £299,176. Information on the extent to which overtime worked by Solihull police officers is actually discharged in other boroughs of the west midlands could only be obtained at disproportionate cost, and attempts to compare a division in one force with other forces would not be of value.

MV Earl William

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how much the ferry Earl William is costing to hire; how long it will be moored at Harwich; what regulations it is subject to; how many and what categories of detainees will be detained there; what will be the total weekly cost of keeping detainees on the ferry; and if he will make a statement;

(2) from which detention centres those detainees to be detained on the ferry, the Earl William moored at Harwich, are to be transferred; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Burglaries (Merseyside)

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the detection rate for burglaries in the Merseyside police authority area between: (a) 1975 and 1979 and (b) 1979 and 1986.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In Merseyside the average ratio of offences of burglary cleared up to offences of burglary recorded by the police was 36·5 per cent. in 1975-79, compared with 37·5 per cent. in 1979-86.

Vietnamese Refugees

Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further steps he is proposing to alleviate the problems caused by the continuing flow of Vietnamese refugees to Hong Kong.

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make a statement on his plans regarding possible admission of Vietnamese refugees from Hong Kong in 1987.

Mr. Hurd: This Government have an excellent record of participation in international efforts to relieve the problems caused by the outflow of Vietnamese to Hong Kong and elsewhere in south-east Asia.

Between 1979 and 1981 we accepted for settlement here, following the initial surge of departures from Vietnam, nearly 20,000 Indo-Chinese refugees of whom over 12,000 were Vietnamese from Hong Kong. Subsequently we continued to accept Vietnamese but applied the normal immigration rules governing family reunion. In 1985, however, following a recommendation by the Home Affairs Committee's Sub-Committee on Race Relations and Immigration, we agreed to accept around 500 Vietnamese (50 of whom were not from Hong Kong) whose family relationship with those already here did not meet the normal criteria. Following that agreement, some 1,200 further offers of individual resettlement from Hong Kong were made by other countries.

We have now considered what further steps might be taken against a background of the need on the one hand to maintain tight immigration controls and, on the other, to do everything possible to help Hong Kong. We have concluded that we should take a further number of Vietnamese from Hong Kong as a contribution to reducing the population in the camps in Hong Kong both as a contribution to reducing the population in the camps in Hong Kong and to give a signal to other resettlement countries of our continuing commitment to Hong Kong. We have decided therefore to accept for settlement here 468 named individuals who have been identified as close relatives of those already here. They will be resettled at a rate of about 20 a month spread over almost two years to ensure that our reception facilities are not overstretched. We believe that as in the past, other countries are likely to follow suit and offer a substantial number of further resettlement places for Vietnamese refugees in Hong Kong. We shall be making every effort to persuade them to do so. We do not, however, consider that resettlement alone is a sufficient answer to Hong Kong's refugee problem. Concerted international action aimed at a durable solution to the problem is required and, to this end, we shall be seeking to put to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the main resettlement countries the case for a common approach. In doing so we shall stress our own continuing commitment to Hong Kong of which the resettlement commitment announced today is clear evidence.

Neighbourhood Watch

Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evaluative research is available to his Department on the effectiveness of neighbourhood watch schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I have received a summary of the results of an evaluation of the effect of two schemes, one in Acton, the other in Wimbledon. This research was funded by the Home Office and was carried out by the Cambridge Institute of Criminology. Crime and attitude surveys were carried out in both areas before the schemes were launched in 1985 and again after 12 months. Although there was no evidence of a change in crime levels as measured by the crime surveys, the attitude surveys showed a decrease in the fear of household crime, an improvement in residents' involvement with others in home protection, a reduction in fear of crime for females and an increase in social cohesion.

I also understand that Merseyside police manpower development unit has completed an evaluation of four of its home watch schemes. This shows a substantial decrease in recorded burglary in three of the areas as well as a decrease in total recorded crime.

Prisons

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners have access to integral sanitation; how many are obliged to slop out; what plans he has to improve toilet facilities in prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 5 May 1987, c. 314]: According to the most recent information available to us (which relates to the number of certified places rather than to the total number of inmates), about 19,000 places have sanitary facilities and 22,270 do not. All new inmate accommodation will contain access to sanitation. In existing establishments, we are increasing the number of places with sanitary facilities in the course of our substantial refurbishment programme.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

North Atlantic Assembly

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list in the Official Report the United Kingdom parliamentary delegation to the North Atlantic Assembly.

Mr. Renton: The following represent the United Kingdom at the North Atlantic Assembly:

Sir Patrick Wall MP (Leader)
Mr. Roberts Banks MP
Mr. John Browne MP
Sir Peter Emery MP
Sir Philip Goodhart MP
Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith MP
Mr. Robert McCrindle MP
Sir Julian Ridsdale MP
Mr. Jerry Wiggin MP
Earl of Kimberley
Earl de la Warr
Mr. David Clark MP
Mr. Patrick Duffy MP
Mr. Bruce George MP
Mr. Kevin MacNamara MP
Lord Ardwick
The Right Honourable Lord Mayhew
Mr. John Cartwright MP

My right hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates) is a substitute member of the delegation.

EMPLOYMENT

HFW Plastics, Gateshead

Mr. Clelland asked the Paymaster General (1) what was the nature of the involvement of the Manpower Services Commission in the recent recruitment of workers at HFW Plastics of Albany road, Gateshead;

(2) what financial support is being given to HFW Plastics of Gateshead by his Department; and for what purpose.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Proctor asked the Paymaster General if, in the light of the recommendations by Sir Frank Layfield in the report of the Sizewell public inquiry concerning further work to be undertaken by Her Majesty's nuclear installations inspectorate, he will indicate what discussions he has arranged with the director general of the Health and Safety Executive on the resources implications of such further work; when he expects to be informed of such resource implications; if he will publish a report of the potential resources implications; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Age Concern (Scheme)

Mr. Winnick asked the Paymaster General why the Manpower Services Commission has reduced the funding of the Age Concern scheme in St. John's centre, Stourbridge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Construction Equipment

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Paymaster General (1) if he will make a statement on the background to the case currently being heard by the Fair Competition Committee in Brussels which refers to the anti-competitive implications of the United Kingdom proposal contained in CON (LO) 1981/82 which deals with the use of excavators as cranes;

(2) if he will make a statement outlining the case which Her Majesty's Government will be putting forward in Brussels in support of condition 6 of CON (LO) 1981/82 when the matter is considered by the Fair Competition Committee;

(3) if his Department has made or received any estimate of the cost to the United Kingdom construction industry of the reduced performance which would result from the fitting of restrictive check valves to construction equipment as required by CON (LO) 1981/82; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Deregulation

Mr. Cash asked the Paymaster General when he plans to publish a report on the progress made on deregulation since the publication of the White Paper, "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers," Cmnd. 9794 in May 1986.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A report to Parliament is being published today, setting out the progress that the Government have made over the last year to reduce the impact of regulation on business. Copies of the report, "Encouraging Enterprise", and a summary leaflet entitled "Lightening the Load", have been placed in the Library and are available from the Vote Office. We intend to make the leaflet widely available to the business community. Copies of the full report will be available on request from the enterprise and deregulation unit.

The report reviews the experience of the arrangements that have been set up to pursue the deregulation initiative across Government and, in particular, the procedures for assessing the cost to business of new proposals. It sets out the valuable progress that has been made at European level to tackle red tape. The report also gives a detailed account of action by Government Departments over the past year, and sets out a number of new proposals for future action. In his foreword to the report my right hon. and noble Friend, the Secretary of State for Employment makes clear the Government's continuing commitment to reducing the burden of regulation and identifies a number of priorities for the future.

Women's Skills Centre (Tyneside)

Mr. Garrett asked the Paymaster General if he will continue to assist in the funding of the Tyneside women's non-traditional skills centre.

Mr. Tracey: I have been asked to reply.

The Tyneside women's non-traditional skills centre is jointly funded by the five district councils in Tyne and Wear. In 1985-86, the Department agreed to provide urban programme grant to assist in the funding of the centre and this funding will continue to be made available if it is required by the local authorities.

TRANSPORT

Public Transport, London

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about public transport in London.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend receives representations from time to time on various aspects of public transport in London. Detailed matters concerning services are the responsibility of the operator concerned.

Helicopters (Stornoway)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland, of 30 April, Official Report, column 224, he will state precisely when he anticipates the Sikorsky S61N mark II helicopter will be on station at Stornoway; what operations the standard S61N machine will be able to perform at night until it is replaced; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The precise date when the definitive Sikorsky S61N mark II will be based at Stornoway is dependent on acquisition, installation and thorough testing of certain specialised avionics equipment, which, presently being unique to the Sumburgh helicopter, is not available off the shelf. However, the fully fitted aircraft is expected to be available for service in the autumn prior to the onset of winter weather.

In the meantime it is considered more satisfactory to place a standard S61N at Stornoway with suitably upgraded navigational and rescue equipment rather than have no facility at all. The only limitation to the interim aircraft operating effectively in most respects at night is the availability to the pilot of external references and good horizons for hovering; such a limitation is not particularly restrictive during the long hours of daylight during the summer and the relatively low incidence of thick weather.

Road Safety Review

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the Government's road safety review will be concluded; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: I have today sent a copy of the Review to the Chairman of the Transport Committee and will be placing copies in the Library of both Houses.

The main conclusions in the report are —there is no simple formula for solving the problem of road accident casualties;

—there needs to be a deeper understanding in society of the existing dangers on the road and how to tackle them;
—more research is required, both to expand knowledge of the human factors at work in road accidents, and to develop insights for future progress;
—the key task is the substantive reduction of casualties among vulnerable road users occurring on roads in urban areas;
—the key strategy is the redirection of available resources towards measures—existing and potential, national and local—which are demonstrably cost-effective in terms of casualty reduction, particularly in the fields of road and vehicle safety engineering.

Wheelchair Passengers

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport which existing construction and United Kingdom regulations apply to community transport vehicles used for conveying wheelchair-bound passengers; if he intends to introduce fresh regulations applying only to new vehicles of this type; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 1 April 1987, c. 525]: The department has now completed a revised version of the code (which was first published in 1982) in consultation with manufacturers and other interested organisations. It will be printed shortly.

The purpose of the code is to give detailed guidance on safe practice for the boarding, securing and carrying of wheelchairs and wheelchair bound passengers in minibuses and buses. We shall be encouraging voluntary groups and other operators to make the greatest possible use of the code in planning their purchase, hire or adaptation of vehicles. We have chosen to issue guidance rather than making new regulations, because of the need to avoid inhibiting innovation in an area in which new equipment is being developed and because many serviceable older vehicles cannot economically be improved to meet all the detailed provisions. The code will be available for the mobility roadshow on 12 June at the Transport and Road Research Laboratory where many of the latest vehicles and equipment for carrying people in wheelchairs will be on display.

DEFENCE

Engagements

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list his official engagements for Monday 4 May.

Mr. Younger: I spent the day in my constituency and returned to London in the evening.

Search and Rescue (Privatisation)

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has received from commercial companies advocating privatisation of the search and rescue services provided by the Royal Air Force and the Royal Navy; and whether he is giving consideration to these proposals.

Mr. Freeman: The Department has received proposals from Bristow Helicopters Limited advocating the transfer of responsibility for United Kingdom search and rescue helicopter units to civil contractors. These are being given careful consideration.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the dates when the high level group, the nuclear planning group, and the Defence Planning Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation each agreed to support the deployment of the W-79 nuclear shell by the United States in Germany; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the dates when the high level group, the nuclear planning group and the Defence Planning Committee of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation each agreed to support the deployment of the W-79 nuclear shell by the United States in Germany.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 1 May 1987, c. 301-2]: The discussions of the high level group, nuclear planning group and Defence Planning Committee are classified. I cannot add to the public communiqués issued after NPG and DPC meetings.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what information he has received from the United States authorities as to which variant of the W-79 nuclear shell has been deployed by the United States in Europe;

(2) what information he has received from the United States authorities regarding the deployment of W-79 nuclear shells with those United States custodial units which support the British Army of the Rhine; and if he will make a statement;

(3) when he was informed by the United States authorities of the deployment of the W-79 nuclear shell in Germany; and when he was first informed of the United States intention to carry out the deployment;

(4) what information he has received from the United States authorities about the deployment by the United States Army of W-79 nuclear warheads in the NORTHAG area of NATO;

(5) what information he has as to when deployment of the W-79 nuclear shell by the United States of America in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation commenced.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what information he has received from the United States authorities as to which variant of the W-79 nuclear shell has been deployed by them in Europe; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he was informed by the United States authorities of the deployment of the W-79 nuclear shell in Germany; and when he was first informed of the United States intention to carry out the deployment;

(3) what information he has as to when deployment of the W-79 by the United States in Europe commenced;

(4) what information he has received from the United States authorities about the deployment of W-79 nuclear shells with those United States custodial units which support the British Army of the Rhine; and if he will make a statement;

(5) what information he has received from the United States authorities about the deployment by the United States Army of W-79 nuclear warheads in the Northern Army Group area of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his replies, 1 May 1987, c. 301-2, and 5 May 1987, c. 364]: I refer the hon. Members to the replies I gave to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) on 22 April at column 588 and on 27 April at column 28. Information exchanges between Her Majesty's Government and the United States authorities on nuclear matters are confidential.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the grades and ranks of the civil servants and military officers who attend each of the following North Atlantic Treaty Organisation bodies: the High Level Group, the Special Consultative Group, the Nuclear Planning Group, the Study Group of the Nuclear Planning Group and the Defence Planning Committee.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the grades and ranks of the civil servants and military officers who attend each of the following North Atlantic Treaty Organisation bodies: the high level group, the special consultative group, the nuclear planning group, the study group of the nuclear planning group and the Defence Planning Committee.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his replies, 1 May 1987, c. 307 and 5 May 1987, c. 364]: The Secretary of State for Defence heads the UK delegation to the Defence Planning Committee and the nuclear planning group and is supported by a team of senior officials and serving officers, whose composition may vary from meeting to meeting, drawn from the Ministry of Defence, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the UK delegation to NATO in Brussels. The DPC and NPG also meet at regular intervals between ministerial sessions at permanent representative level. The senior UK representative on the high level group is a grade 2 official from the Ministry of Defence and, for the special consultative group, a senior trade official from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. They are supported by teams of officials and serving officers drawn from both Departments. The UK representative on the nuclear planning group staff group is a grade 7 official.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Her Majesty's Government's approval is required prior to the allocation of W-79 nuclear warheads by the United States to its custodial units supporting the British Army of the Rhine; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Her Majesty's Government's approval is required prior to the allocation of W-79 nuclear warheads by the United States to its custodial units supporting the British Army of the Rhine; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his replies, 1 May 1987, c. 302 and 5 May 1987, c. 364]: Modernisation of any United States nuclear warheads allocated to the British Army of the Rhine would require the approval of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what information he has received from the United States Authorities regarding their deployment of the W70-4 variant of the nuclear warhead for Lance in Germany;

(2) what information he has received from the United States Authorities concerning a potential enhanced radiation capability in relation to the W-79 nuclear shell deployed by the United States of America in Europe.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what information he has received from the United States Authorities regarding the deployment of the W70-4 variant of the nuclear warhead for Lance in Germany;

(2) what information he has received from the United States Authorities concerning a potential enhanced radiation capability in relation to the W-79 nuclear shell deployed by the United States of America in Europe.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his replies, 1 May 1987, c. 302 and 5 May 1987, c. 364]: Information exchanges between Her Majesty's Government and the United States Authorities on nuclear matters are confidential. There have been no deployments of enhanced radiation weapons to Europe, nor has NATO any plans to introduce these weapons into Europe.

ENVIRONMENT

Freshwater Biological Association

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding the proposed closing of the Windermere and River Frame laboratories of the Freshwater Biological Association; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department has received some 20 representations about the future of the Freshwater Biological Association. The association is, however, an independent body grant-aided by the Natural Environment Research Council which is a responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Estuarial Developments

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy on granting permission for developments which, in the opinion of the Nature Conservancy Council, would cause significant damage to the scientific interest of an estuary which supports nationally or internationally important populations of wild birds.

Mr. Waldegrave: The advice of the Nature Conservancy Council on the conservation implications of proposed development in estuaries of scientific interest is an important consideration which is taken into account with other appropriate factors, before decisions are reached.

Mr. Allen Mckay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will inform the European Commission of the likely implications for bird conservation of development proposals currently relating to those British estuaries which have been designated or identified for designation as special protection areas under European Community Directive 79/409 on the conservation of wild birds.

Mr. Waldegrave: I see no purpose in doing so.

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make it a requirement that any application for planning permission relating to a river estuary which has been designated or identified for designation as a special protection area under European Community Directive 79/409 be accompanied by an environmental impact assessment.

Mr. Waldegrave: We published proposals for the implementation of the EC directive on environmental assessment, so far as it applies to projects coming within planning control, in April 1986. The measures necessary to comply with the directive will be taken by 2 July 1988.

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the relative importance of Britain's estuaries for international wild bird populations, and list the international conventions on this subject to which Her Majesty's Government adheres.

Mr. Waldegrave: British estuaries provide a substantial proportion of the wintering grounds and staging posts for migratory breeding waterfowl of the Palearctic region. The United Kingdom is a party to the following relevant international conventions:

— The convention of wetlands of international importance especially as waterfowl habitat (the Ramsar Convention).
— The convention on the conservation of European wildlife and natural habitats (the Berne convention)
— The convention on the conservation of migratory species of wild animals (the Bonn convention).

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what statements he intends to make to the forthcoming conference of contracting parties to the convention on the conservation of wetlands of international importance at Regina, Canada, concerning threats to the importance of estuary sites in the United Kingdom which have been designated or identified for designation under the convention.

Mr. Waldegrave: In preparation for the Regina conference, the Government have submitted to the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources a detailed report on the implementation of the Ramsar convention in Great Britain. This includes details of actual and potential changes to areas listed under the convention as wetlands of international importance — including some estuarial areas — and outlines the steps which have been or will be taken in response. I am arranging for copies of the report to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will issue new guidance to local planning authorities on the importance to nature conservation of river estuaries and the need to protect such sites from damaging development.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have no plans to issue further specific advice on this subject. However, we shall shortly be issuing revised and updated advice to local authorities reaffirming the importance we attach to the conservation of the natural heritage generally, and outlining the part which local authorities can play in this process.

Ministerial Speech

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will arrange for a copy of the speech by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) to senior industralists on Friday 1 May to be placed in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I did not deliver a speech to any group of industrialists on Friday 1 May. In the course of constituency engagements, I did have informal discussions with the Bristol Engineering Manufacturers' Association.

"Action for Cities"

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library the text of the statement made by the Minister of Housing and Urban Affairs, the hon. Member for Oxford and Abingdon, at a press conference held in London on 28 April on the subject, "Action for Cities".

Mr. John Patten: A text of the "Action for Cities" presentation held at Limehouse studios on 28 April has been placed in the Library.

River Avon (Fish)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will provide funds for a research project into the problems affecting fish for survival in the River Avon in Hampshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: There are a number of proposals for research projects into problems affecting fish in the Hampshire Avon. The Department is willing in principle to support research into these problems but I want to be satisfied that the specific proposals which have been put forward will assist in establishing the nature of the problem and possible solutions. Officials are seeking to reach agreement with other interested parties on the best way forward.

Conference Centre, Harrogate

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to his answers of 22 April, Official Report, columns 644-5, he will state (a) the size of the deferred purchase arrangements entered into by Harrogate BC to finance the construction of a conference centre, and (b) the size and timing of the additional conventional borrowing approval given to Harrogate in respect of the deferred purchase arrangement.

Mr. Ridley: I understand that the maximum facility offered by the deferred purchase scheme was £20·25 million. The additional borrowing approval was for a maximum of £16 million and was issued on 18 February 1982.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has had from traders outside enterprise zones about unfair retail competition from within such zones; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer this question shortly.

Power Station Emissions

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to control nitrogen oxide emissions from power stations.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government have endorsed plans by the Central Electricity Generating Board to begin a major 10-year action programme to install low nitrogen oxide (NOx) burners at the board's 12 largest power stations, at an estimated capital cost of £170 million.

Low-NOx burners technology will also be a requirement for all future fossil-fuel fired power stations, and discussions are taking place with Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution to determine appropriate standards.

The CEGB estimates that these measures will lead to a reduction in CEGB NOx emissions of nearly 30 per cent. on 1980 levels by the end of the century, despite rising electricity demand. The programme will result in a steady flow of work for boiler manufacturers.

I am particularly glad to be able to announce this programme during the European year of the Environment. It is a worthy contribution and, along with the measures announced last September to reduce sulphur dioxide emissions, shows again our determination to tackle the international problem of air pollution.

I expect today's announcement to be widely welcomed as a trend-setting example to other countries when delegates meet early next week in Geneva to resume negotiations for an international agreement on NOx controls, and at the EC Council of Ministers meeting later this month.

Capital Allocation (Hampshire)

Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Hampshire county council about the availability of an additional capital allocation under the arrangements announced in the Department's letter of 26 January about the rate support grant; and what response has been given.

Mr. Chope: Hampshire county council has sought an additional capital allocation in order to assemble a site at Chineham, Basingstoke, which will be sold for private sector development for industrial purposes. My right hon. Friend has decided to make available an additional capital allocation of £1,045,000.

New Towns

Mr. Trotter asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will make a statement on the future of the north-east new towns.

Mr. John Patten: On 22 December 1986 I undertook consultations under section 41 of the New Towns Act 1981 inviting comments on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment's proposals to wind up the new town development corporations of Aycliffe and Peterlee and of Washington on 31 March 1988; to dispose of their remaining assets to the private sector; to give English Estates the opportunity to purchase any unsold industrial assets; and to transfer any remaining assets and liabilities to the Commission for the New Towns.

My right hon. Friend and I have considered carefully the various responses received; we are most grateful to all those who let us have their comments. Having taken these into account, my right hon. Friend confirms his intention to wind-up the two development corporations on 31 March 1988. The necessary order will be made later this year.

My right hon. Friend and I are grateful to the development corporations for the steps they have so far taken in encouraging tenants to purchase their properties and in marketing their assets to the private sector, through, for example, the appointment of agents. We look forward to seeing the results of the marketing exercise. In assessing these, we shall want to take into account not only the size of the offers made but also the interests of the region.

Where assets are not purchased by the private sector, we continue to take the view that English Estates should have the opportunity to acquire industrial properties and that otherwise the remaining assets and liabilities should be transferred to the Commission for the New Towns.

Radiochemical Inspectorate

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total number of staff employed by the Radiochemical inspectorate annually since 1979 to 1987; and if he will give the projection for the next two years.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1987, c. 462]: The numbers of professional staff (that is excluding clerical and administrative support staff) dealing with radioactive waste management since 1979 are:

	Number
1979	11
1980	12
1981	16½
1982	19½
1983	20½
1984	18½
1985	25
1986	25
1987	25

Currently 23 of these hold warrants from Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution.

A total of 37 professional posts have been authorised up to 1 April 1988. The number of staff in post will depend on progress with recruitment. No decisions have been taken beyond that date.

Hedgehog Ladders

Mr. Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance is given by his Department on the construction of hedgehog ladders.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1987, c. 480]: My Department does not give guidance on the construction of hedgehog ladders. Advice on this matter is provided by the Agricultural Development Advisory Service.

Noxious Emissions

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will outline the technological measures applied between 1970 and 1980 and between 1981 and 1987 at fossil fuel power stations operated by the Central Electricity Generating Board aimed specifically at reducing emissions of sulphur dioxide:

(2) if he will outline the technological measures applied between 1970 and 1980 and between 1987 at fossil fuel power stations operated by the Central Electricity Generating Board aimed specifically at reducing emissions of nitrogen oxides;

(3) what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the target for reducing emissions from power stations of sulphur dioxide by 1993 and 1998, respectively; on what year's level those targets are based; what is the Government's policy on reduction of nitrogen oxide emissions from power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1987, c. 456]: The Central Electricity Generating Board is required to use the best practicable means to prevent emissions, and to render them harmless and inoffensive, to the satisfaction of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution. In the Inspectorate's view, abatement of sulphur dioxide (SO_2) and nitrogen oxide (NOx) emissions has not until recently been practicable. The board has, therefore, been required to construct stacks sufficiently high to ensure that emissions are dispersed and diluted in the air to reduce ground level concentrations of the gases to the minimum. Battersea A and Bankside power stations also operated systems of flue gas desulphurisation up to 1974 and 1981 respectively.

The inspectorate now considers that taking account both of the costs and availability of abatement technology, any new large fossil fuel-fired combustion plant should be equipped with means to limit SO_2 and NOx emissions.

The Government aim to reduce emissions of both SO_2 and NOx by 30 per cent. on 1980 levels by the end of the 1990s, which in the case of SO_2 will imply reductions of about 50 per cent. from 1970. The decision to require new plant to be fitted with appropriate abatement technology will make a contribution to the achievement of these targets, but in addition the Government have authorised the Central Electricity Generating Board to retrofit flue gas desulphurisation equipment to three major power stations and, as indicated in my answer today to the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Carlisle) to install low-NOx burners at the board's largest power stations.

The Government have set no targets for specific emission reductions by 1993 and 1998. In negotiations on the draft European Community directive on the control of emissions from large combustion plants, the Belgian Presidency has proposed 1993 and 1998 as dates for target emission reductions, to be achieved on a 1980 base. Negotiations on the directive are continuing, although substantial problems remain for several countries including the United Kingdom.

Land Use

Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when, following consultation, he intends to publish a circular on planning and agricultural land.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1987, c. 712]: I am publishing today the joint DOE/Welsh Office circular "Development Involving Agricultural Land" (DOE circular 16/87, Welsh Office 25/87). Copies are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Anti-fouling Paint Regulations

Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be able to announce the date for publication of anti-fouling paint regulations; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 10 April 1987, c. 476]: The Control of Pollution (Anti-fouling Paints and Treatments) Regulations 1987 were laid before the House yesterday. They will come into force on 28 May.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Government Support

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to support the agricultural industry.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Farm Animals

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to improve the welfare of farm animals.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Milk Quota

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what are the reasons for the cuts in milk quotas; and to what extent Britain contributes to dairy surpluses;

(2) what were the reasons for choosing 1981 as the year on which the United Kingdom's milk quota was based; and if he will estimate the difference from choosing 1983 as the base year.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Butter

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his policy on retaining stocks of butter in intervention.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Bovine Somanotropin

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the Government's policy on the use of bovine somanotropin.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

New Zealand

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the Government's policy on the import of agricultural produce from New Zealand.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Discrimination

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he has taken to resist discrimination against British agriculture.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Fertilisers

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the Government's policy on the supply and use of nitrogenous fertilisers.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Pesticides

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to control the supply and use of pesticides.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Food Safety

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to ensure the safety of food.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Sheepmeat

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to support British sheepmeat producers.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Dairy Farming

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to support British dairy producers.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Fishing

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to support the British fishing industry.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Rural Economy

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to diversify the rural economy.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Farming (Young Entrants)

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to support young entrants to farming.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Capital Taxes

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government has taken since 1979 to reduce the burden of taxes on capital on farmers.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Marketing

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to promote the marketing of British agricultural produce.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Small Producers

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to support small-scale agricultural producers.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Marginal Areas

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to support farming in marginal areas.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Beef

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to support British beef producers.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Environment

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to balance the needs of agriculture and the environment.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Tenancies

Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures the Government have taken since 1979 to improve agricultural tenancies.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Salmonella

Mr. John Townend asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his assessment of the effectiveness of the Diseases of Animals (Protein Processing) Order 1981 and the Importation of Processed Animal Protein Order 1981 in reducing the incidence of salmonella in processed animal protein.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Children's Food

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what definition of young children he now uses when considering requirements relating to foods sold as being suitable for young children.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Meat and Livestock Commission

Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he has taken to review the Meat and Livestock Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: As part of the Department's ongoing programme for reviewing the non-departmental public bodies, I arranged, with the agreement of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales, for a financial management survey of the Meat and Livestock Commission. This study, which was undertaken as an efficiency scrutiny, was started last December. The aim of the scrutiny was to examine the MLC with regard to the efficiency, economy, and effectiveness of its operations.

My right hon. Friends and I have now received the scrutineer's report and will be studying its recommendations which will be discussed in full with the Meat and Livestock Commission. I am arranging for copies of the report to be placed in the Library of the House and for it to be published.

Farm and Countryside Initiative

Mr. Jackson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many community programme places have been allocated to the farm and countryside initiative; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: I am delighted to inform the House that the farm and countryside initiative has continued to make excellent progress since its launch on 3 February 1986. Indeed, during the past few days not only has the milestone of 2,000 places been passed, but the latest total stands at 2,287 community programme places relating to 119 F and CI projects in England.

In rural areas the value of F and CI in providing jobs for long-term unemployed people and in affording opportunities for schemes to be undertaken which benefit the rural environment and rural communities is now widely recognised. I should like to pay particular tribute to those who have now come forward with suggestions for F and CI projects and to offer my good wishes to all those engaged on such projects.

Hedgehog Ladders

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what resources are made available by his Department for the construction of hedgehog ladders.

Mr. Donald Thompson [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1987, c. 473]: The Agricultural Development and Advisory Service offers a wide range of advice to farmers on the protection of wildlife including, for example, the provision of escape routes for small animals when cattle grids are being constructed. Escape routes can normally be provided at little or no extra cost to the farmer.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Health and Social Services (Expenditure)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the total annual expenditure by health and social services boards in Northern Ireland on people with physical and sensory disabilities in each of the last 10 years at 1986-87 prices.

Mr. Needham: The expenditure of the health and social services boards is not analysed in such a way as would enable the information requested to be separately identified.

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress he has made in his consultations concerning the extension by order to Northern Ireland of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; if he will host a conference on the Act for voluntary organisations, professional workers and people with disabilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: Consultations have already been undertaken within the Department of Health and Social Services and other interested Government Departments and the views of health and social services and education and library boards are now being sought. While there are no plans to organise a conference on the lines suggested, initial comments on the Act have also been invited from the Northern Ireland Council on Disability, which acts as an umbrella organisation for voluntary groups concerned with the disabled.

Strip Searching

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) how many strip searches were made of female prisoners in Her Majesty's prison, Maghaberry, in March and April 1987, respectively; if he will give the number of persons involved and the number of times each person was searched; whether any prison contraband, smuggled item or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items; in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being concluded; and if he will indicate the reasons for the search, namely making an appearance in court on remand and in which court, attending trial, inter-prison visit or other reasons;

(2) how many strip searches were made of female prisoners in Her Majesty's prison, Maghaberry, in June 1986; if he will give the number of persons involved and the number of times each person was searched; whether any prison contraband, smuggled items or illegal correspondence was discovered in any search, indicating which items; in how many cases prisoners refused to be searched and had to be restrained while the search was being concluded; and if he will indicate the reasons for the search, namely making an appearance in court, and in which court, on remand attending trial, inter-prison visit or other reasons;

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Police Federation

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why he has not consulted the Northern Ireland Police Federation about measures to enhance security in Northern Ireland; and what steps he is now taking to respond to the 13-point proposals on this and related matters made recently to his Department and the Chief Constable by the secretary of the federation.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to my hon. Member as soon as possible.

SCOTLAND

Physical and Sensory Disabilities

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total annual expenditure by social work departments in Scotland on people with physical and sensory disabilities in each of the last 10 years at 1986-87 prices.

Mr. John Mackay: Information available is provided in the following table. Column 1 of the table shows separately the annual gross current expenditure on services provided specifically or primarily for adults with physical disabilities. Column 2 shows the total gross current expenditure on other relevant services used by the groups in question; an expenditure figure for usage of these services by disabled groups alone cannot be identified separately.

information is available (1983-84 to 1985-86). Expenditure on training, administration and field social work is excluded.
[2] Comparable information for 1986-87 is not yet available.

Pipeline Assembly Yard, Ross-shire

Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to be in a position to announce his decision over the proposed pipeline assembly yard at Marrich Mhor, near Tain, Ross-shire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: As soon as possible.

Capital Projects

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to the answer of 5 May, Official Report, column 392, if he will list those capital projects that have received support from his Department since 1983, about which his Department has maintained a record; and what was the expenditure involved in each case.

Mr. Ancram: A list of the kind requested could only be compiled at disproportionate cost. Information about capital projects in Scotland funded by central Government expenditure is available in successive editions of the Supply Estimates for vote XVI (vote XV before 1986-87); and of "Public Expenditure: A Commentary on the Scotland Programme" copies of which were sent to my hon. Friend on publication. Information at project level about Government-supported expenditure by non-departmental public bodies, local authorities and the private sector is not held centrally.

Electoral Registers

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to ensure that electoral registration officers release to authorised persons in each constituency in Scotland representing political parties lists of those who have died since the inception of the electoral registers for 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: There is no requirement for electoral registration officers to be supplied with, or to maintain, lists of persons who have died; or to supply such lists to the political parties. My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to introduce such requirements.

Postal Voters

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to how many persons registered as postal voters in Scottish constituencies are resident in England and Wales.

Mr. Lang: This information is not held centrally. Each electoral registration officer is, however, required to make available for public inspection at his office a copy of the records he must keep of persons who have been granted a postal vote, showing the addresses to which their ballot papers are to be sent.

Student Fees

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will announce the fees to be charged to students attending Scottish institutions other than universities in the academic year 1987-88.

Mr. John MacKay For the academic year 1987-88, I have prescribed the following fee levels for home students and for students from other European Community countries on full-time advanced courses in the central institutions and colleges of education (fees for 1986-87 are shown in brackets):

Postgraduate courses	1,730	(1,680)
Undergraduate and equivalent courses	556	(536)

Fees for home and other European Community students on courses at local authority colleges are the responsibility of the local authorities. I understand that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities has decided to recommend fees as follows:

Postgraduate courses	1,730	(1,680)
Advanced full-time courses	556	(536)
Non-advanced full-time courses	360	(325)

For overseas students the Government's policy is that students should pay fees that cover the cost of their education. Local authorities and institutions are free to determine the fees to be charged in accordance with that policy, and in the light of their own circumstances.

I understand that the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities has decided to recommend to local authorities the folowing fees for students at local authority colleges paying the overseas rate who began their courses on or after 1 September 1980:

Advanced courses	3,720	(3,540)
Non-advanced courses	2,055	(1,947)

Prescriptions (Low Income Earners)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what evidence he has of an increase in the number of patients who are unable to pay for medicines prescribed by their doctor because of low incomes; and what consideration he proposes to give to the suggestion, put to him recently by Greater Glasgow North health council, that pharmacists should mark "not dispensed" on the prescription form as a means of ascertaining the extent of patients declining to pay for medicines.

Mr. John MacKay: There are existing arrangements whereby those on low income can be exempted from prescription charges and no one need therefore be prevented from obtaining prescribed medication on hardship grounds. In the circumstances I do not consider that there is any benefit to be obtained from introducing monitoring arrangements of the kind suggested by Greater Glasgow North health council.

Forestry Commission

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the members of the Forestry Commission, with biographical details, and their dates for reappointment.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

	Date on which present appointment ends
Sir David Montgomery (Chairman) Landowner and farmer. Prior to his appointment he was Vice Convener of Tayside Regional Council, Vice Chairman of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, a member of the Nature Conservancy Council, and Chairman of the Council's Scottish Committee.	31 August 1989

Captain W. F. E. Forbes (Part-time Commissioner) Woodland owner and farmer. Former Chairman of Scottish Woodland Owners' Association. Chairman of Scottish Branch of National Playing Fields Association. Chairman of the Central Scotland Countryside Trust.	30 September 1988
James Forbes (Part-time Commissioner) Chartered Accountant with wide business and commercial experience.	31 October 1988
C. R. Woosnam (Part-time Commissioner) Woodland owner and farmer in Wales. Chartered Surveyor with wide commercial and local government experience. Prior to his appointment, he was Deputy Chairman of Timber Growers UK.	17 October 1990

SOCIAL SERVICES

Chiropodists

Mr. Aspinwall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many chiropodists are employed in each of the health districts within the South Western regional health authority; and what were the corresponding figures for each year since 1975.

Mr. Newton: The table shows the figures for the years 1982 to 1985 inclusive. I am sorry that I am unable to give my hon. Friend all the information he has asked for. Because of the 1982 National Health Service reorganisation, information for years period to 1982 would not be comparable with those for 1982 and later years.

Physical and Sensory Disabilities

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the total annual expenditure by social services departments in England on people with physical and sensory disabilities in each of the last 10 years at 1986-87 prices.

Mr. Tony Newton: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Disability (Assessment)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the Disability Alliance concerning the proposed scales for assessing the severity of disability devised by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys; what reply he has sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: I have received a copy of a recent letter sent by Professor Peter Townsend on behalf of the Disability Alliance to an official in the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys, who I understand will reply shortly.

Elderly and Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce legislation to empower local authorities to regulate private organisations which provide domiciliary care to elderly and disabled people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Edwina Currie: We welcome the extension of consumer choice provided by the growth of private domiciliary services for elderly and disabled people. We are keeping developments under review but are not aware at present of any need to regulate firms providing these services and have no plans to introduce legislation to this effect.

Mentally Ill People

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will issue a directive to health authorities on co-operating with local authorities in carrying out surveys on identifying premises being used by patients with a history of mental illness on being discharged from hospital; (2) why his Department pays enhanced allowances to non-registered establishments which provide housing for people with a history of mental illness after discharge from hospital;

(3) why his Department withdrew support from a pilot survey in Birmingham to identifying the dwellings used by people with a history of mental illness after discharge from hospital;

(4) if he will make a statement on action by his Department following complaints about treatment of people with a history of mental illness after their discharge from hospital into the community by landlords (a) restricting access during the day, (b) imposing unreasonable curfews, (c) overcharging for electricity, (d) supplying poor quality bedding, (e) making charges for toilet paper, (f) offering poor quality and quantities of food and (g) misusing Department of Health and Social Security pocket money.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

District Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will tabulate in the Official Report the gross revenue expenditure of each district health authority in the Greater London area for each of the financial years of their operation since inception at 1985-86 prices.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS Capital Schemes

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to his reply of 5 May relating to National Health Service capital schemes, if he will list all such information as is available to him in the form of his replies of 10 December 1985, Official Report, columns 613-14.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

National Health Service Staff (Statistics)

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now publish the outturn figures for 1985-86 for compensation payments to National Health Service staff in respect of redundancies and early retirements in the manner described in the Government's reply to the first report from the Social Services Committee of Session 1984-85, breaking down the figures to distinguish between competitive tendering and other cases.

Mrs. Currie: The outturn figures for 1985-86 are as follows:

	Number of cases	Compensation cost	Total cost including superannuation
Competitive tendering
New cases	1,179	2,133,000	4,766,000
Continuing cases	300	195,000	391,000
Other cases
New cases	963	2,889,000	10,444,000
Continuing cases	6,847	11,000,000	30,071,000

Cash and Cost Limits

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any changes will be made to cash limits or gross running cost limits for the Department of Health and Social Security.

Mr. Newton: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, the following changes will be made:

The cash limit for class XIV, vote 1 (Hospital and Community Health and Other Services, England) will be increased by £262,060,000 (from £10,078,558,000 to £10,340,618,000) and that for class XIV, vote 3 (Miscellaneous Health and Personal Social Services, England) by £1,940,000 (from £397,724,000 to £399,664,000). These increases should enable services to continue to be delivered and developed as planned following the decision to implement, from 1 April 1987, the recommendations of the review bodies in respect of doctors, dentists, nurses, midwives and professions allied to medicine, as announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 23 April 1987.

As a result of these changes, the gross running cost limit of the Department of Health and Social Security is increased by £1,635,000 from £1,699,178,000 to £1,700,813,000.

The public expenditure costs of these changes have been charged to the Reserve and do not add to the public expenditure planning total.

Christmas Bonus

Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to pay the Christmas bonus in 1987.

Mr. Major: A Christmas bonus of £10 will be paid to people who for the week beginning 7 December are entitled to payment of one of the qualifying benefits. The special stickers for the value of the bonus will be included in some benefit books to be issued from the week after next. These will cover a 26-week period including the week beginning 7 December.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Fireworks

Miss Fookes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many shopkeepers have been prosecuted and convicted of selling fireworks to under-age children for the latest period of 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Howard: The figures for the number of convictions under the Fireworks (Safety) Regulations 1986, which enable persons selling fireworks to children under the age of 16 to be tried in a magistrates' court, will be published in the early autumn. Figures for convictions under previous legislation are not available.

Miss Fookes asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has any plans to seek to amend legislation controlling fireworks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: The Fireworks (Safety) Regulations 1986, which enable persons selling fireworks to children under 16 to be tried in a magistrates' court were made last summer, and similar provisions relating to persons throwing fireworks in the streets are included in the Consumer Protection Bill now going through Parliament. This legislation will need to be in place for some time before its effect can be evaluated. My Department reviews annually with the Health and Safety Executive and the firework industy the legislative and other steps needed to reduce firework injuries in the light of the accident and injury statistics and of a careful assessment of existing measures.

Companies (Purchasing Policy)

Mr. Craigen asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what Her Majesty's Government are doing to encourage companies, in both private and public sectors to use their purchasing power to buy goods produced in the United Kingdom and at the same time assist the export potential through the achievement of a greater customer base.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Pinewood Studios

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will receive a deputation from the work force of Pinewood film studios to discuss the proposed loss of over 250 permanent jobs there; if, in the light of the redundancies at Pinewood studios and the decline in British feature film production, he will review the operation of the Films Act 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 115

SESSION 1986–87

27th April–8th May 1987

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speakers rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Com = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
